obliged to give way to its madness." But what, Sir, did that madness come to? Why, the affirmation of the independence of this country against the pretensions of a foreign Prelate and Potentate. I say, then, that whether we consider the unnecessary encouragement the Bill would give to an agitation which it is the policy of the Court of Rome to keep up through its agents the Bishops in Ireland, to the detriment of the public peace; or, whether we consider this subject with reference to the peace and contentment of the subjects of Her Majesty, not being Roman Catholics, with whose confidence and comfort, and even loyalty, it is essential that there should be no wanton hand-tampering with the law, I say, that this Bill, whether we consider it in principle or in substance, is inappropriate and anomalous. What a flimsy plea it is to advance in support of the Bill, that it is necessary because of the possibility—for I believe that it is not at all certain—that the successors to the Bishops of the disestablished Church of Ireland may become liable to the penalties of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act! Your case, as against the Act, is, that its penalties are never enforced and yet suspicious; and because of this possibility of the penalties being enforced against the Bishops of the disestablished Church of Ireland, a danger in which I do not believe—for, as my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Charley) said, in Ireland there is no Established Church, and therefore no competition, for the terms of the statute of 1829 do not apply—yet you would repeat the statute of 1851. But, supposing it to be possible that the successors of the Bishops of the disestablished Protestant Church in Ireland should become liable to those penalties, which you say have never been exacted, is it for this that you are about to lame and incapacitate the great protest of this country against foreign aggression? Supposing, however, that your doubts are well-founded. I remember that the present Prime Minister, in the year 1851, earnestly and anxiously supported the 3rd clause of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act to exempt from these penalties the Bishops of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. [Mr. GLADSTONE was understood to signify dissent.] Well, if he did not, I can answer for it that he did not oppose it; and I certainly understood that he highly approved of the clause: at all events, I have never known him seek to repeal it. So far from that, I have known him to be an anxious supporter of another statute that gives the clergy of the Scotch Episcopal Church privileges across the Border in England. Surely he will not allude to that as treating the Scotch Episcopal Church with disfavour; and I would take the liberty of suggesting, if there is a doubt, whether the successors to the present Bishops of the disestablished Church of Ireland come under the prohibition and penalties as a consequence of the Irish Church Act of 1869, why not bring in a Bill of one clause to include them under the provision contained in the 3rd section of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act? Will the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General tell us what are his objections to that proposal? But, no! We understand perfectly well the motive. The more formidable an agitation among the Roman Catholics in Ireland becomes, the greater is the necessity imposed upon Her Majesty's Ministers to meet the demands of the Roman Prelates; and the more dubious the influence of the Government in this House, the more necessary to their safety is the influence of the Roman Catholic hierarchy. I do not believe that for any other reasons we should ever have found the Government in the House of Lords acting in direct contravention of the Report of a Committee, to the appointment of which they themselves were parties. This is the final clause of the Report of that Committee—

"It has been suggested that the object of the Act of 1851 would have been sufficiently attained by a simple declaration of the invalidity of any assumption of ecclesiastical titles of honour, or of any attempt to confer coercive jurisdiction otherwise than under the authority of Her Majesty, and according to the laws of the realm, unaccompanied by the enactment of any penalties. But the Committee are of opinion that, while a mere repeal of the section of the Act of 1829, and of the Act of 1851 would be open to misconstruction and therefore inexpedient, any advantage to be gained by a modification of those enactments in the manner above indicated would be more than counterbalanced by the evil of re-opening, without any sufficient reason, the discussion of a question always calculated to occasion much irritation of feeling."

Now, according to the judgment of the Committee of the House of Lords, the Government who have introduced this Bill are the real disturbers of the public

feeling on this subject; and yet we are treated as if we, supporters of the existing law, were the disturbers—we, who seek to preserve the existing state of things which has given contentment to the great majority of the nation for more than 20 years. Sir, were there ever such flimsy pretences propounded upon seemingly, but not really, public grounds as those which have been put forth in support of this Bill? No, Sir! I am sorry to say that there is great disingenuousness in all this proceeding. So far as guarding against the effects of a supposed omission in the Irish Church Act of 1869 is concerned, the Bill is utterly unnecessary. The only true reason that can be assigned for the measure is, that Her Majesty's Government think it expedient and necessary to do obeisance to the Roman Catholic hierarchy; while at this moment, while the statute of 1851 is still in existence, the feeling in Ireland has become so strong against the habit of governing Ireland through those ecclesiastics, appointed, as they are, by a foreign authority, as unwholesome, that at a recent election we have seen a Roman Catholic rejected and a Presbyterian candidate elected by Roman Catholics in his stead. God grant that that feeling may continue to grow in Ireland; and in order to foster that wholesome, tolerant, and national feeling, I, for one, heartily vote in favour of the maintenance—and the effective maintenance, of this law, which is not merely declaratory of the ancient status of this country, not only passed for the purpose of maintaining the family of the reigning Sovereign upon the Throne as Protestants, but for the clear purpose of defending the nation from foreign aggression.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, he would not follow the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) into the various grounds he had taken in opposing that Bill. He thought the measure, which aimed to repeal the Act of 1851, might be sustained upon this plain principle—An enactment was then introduced, imposing large penalties for the assumption of certain titles. It was said that that enactment was introduced at a period of considerable excitement; but, whether the Act was necessary or not at the time, this fact was undeniable, that never had there been a single prosecution instituted under it, notwithstanding the various Governments which had been in power since the Act was passed. The fact of this Act never having been acted upon, and thus remaining a dead letter for the last 20 years, justified the effort that was now being made to erase the Act from the statute book, if it contained elements of discord and animosity or was calculated to irritate a large class of Her Majesty's subjects. What institution of the country had been the better for the existence of that Act? Had the now disestablished Church of Ireland in any way benefited from it? The illegality by the ancient common law of the assumption of ecclesiastical titles derived from the Pope was not altogether so clear as the Attorney General seemed to think. The title of "Defender of the Faith" given to Henry VIII. was derived from the Pope and adopted by the Sovereign of Great Britain. True, that was not a territorial title; still, it was a legal title, and a recognition of the power of the Holy See to confer titles. He questioned whether the words of the declaration, that nobody but the Sovereign could confer any jurisdiction or authority whatsoever in this country, were not too wide; but that, and other points of detail could be better dealt with in Committee.

MR. GILPIN said, that in the year 1851, when the Act was carried, he had not the honour of a seat in that House, but he was a member of the Common Council of the City of London, and stood alone in his protest against a Petition in favour of the Act from his brother councillors. He voted heartily with the Government on this question, but on different grounds from any stated to-night. He voted for the abolition of the Act because he believed it never was necessary. There was no danger in the assumption of any titles whatever by any individual. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) might take to himself the title of the Cham of Tartary, and he (Mr. Gilpin) would not utter a word of objection any more than he would to the assumption of titles by dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church. The Act which they were now very properly asked to repeal was passed under the influence of Lord Russell, who excited the public mind by his "Durham Letter;" and when they remembered how egregiously that noble Lord had led them astray 20 years ago in that matter, and wasted nearly an entire Session upon it, it was to be hoped they would estimate at their proper worth his recent attempts to encourage the war spirit and increase the armaments of this country. He (Mr. Gilpin) stood there as an advocate of equality both for Roman Catholics—or rather Catholics, for he believed the word “Roman” was by some considered offensive—and Protestants. He would act side by side with his Catholic fellow-countrymen in obtaining equality; he would join with hon. Members opposite in opposing supremacy—equality for all, supremacy for none.

MR. T. CHAMBERS said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken with regard to the advocacy of equality. But if the Constitution of the country was to be evaded, the evasion must not be confined to one party. He thought that if ever there was an Act passed as the result of an enthusiastic and almost universal feeling it was the Ecclesiastical Titles Act of 1851. It was, in fact, passed with the universal assent of the country, excepting only the former member of the Common Council of London. Why, then, were they asked to repeal it? It was admitted that nobody had had his liberty infringed by it, or had any fines imposed on him under its provisions. Where, then, was the grievance, and why was that question now stirred? He denied that in the Act of 1851, rightly understood, there was anything insulting to any member of the community. The very first Roman Catholic Member who had got up to speak in favour of the repeal of this statute at once proceeded to deny that the assumption of the titles which had led to its enactment was an infringement of the common law of the land. The very moment that Her Majesty's Government thought fit to raise this question—and they had raised it most unnecessarily—the Roman Catholics laughed at them and scouted the notion that common law forbade the assumption of these titles by the Bishops of their Church. It was inexpedient that this Bill should be passed for the purpose of repealing an Act under which no Roman Catholic had suffered, but which simply remained on the statute book as a protest against the right of the Pope to grant territorial and ecclesiastical titles in this country. Had hon. Members forgotten the celebrated Bull that had led to the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, and the assumptions it contained? That Bull was an incident in the history of the contest between the Church of Rome and the Constitution of this country. The issue presented by the Roman Catholic Members of that House was that there was no common law which prohibited the Pope from parcelling out this country into districts, and giving territorial and ecclesiastical titles to the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church. What were the reasons assigned by the Government for disturbing the present state of things? He had heard of no irritation on the part of the Roman Catholics occasioned by this statute, and certainly no just grounds for such irritation existed. The Attorney General had asked the House to remove the last rag of religious intolerance; but there was nothing religious in the question. Before the promulgation of the Bull of 1850 the Roman Catholics in this country enjoyed complete religious freedom, and it was owing to a flagrant aggression on the part of the Pope that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was passed; and it would be a gratuitous insult to the people of this country were that statute to be repealed, in defiance of the enthusiastic feeling on their part which had occasioned its being passed.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON contended that the proposal to repeal this statute in no way attempted to alter the common law of the land. It had been argued that the attempt to divide England into Roman Catholic archbishoprics and bishoprics was an aggression on the part of the Pope, and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had said that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was intended to repel that aggression. In that case he was bound to say that to repel an international aggression by a municipal enactment was something altogether new in the history of international policy. If the Pope had violated international law, by illegally granting territorial titles in this country, that was a casus belli, but not a ground for passing an Ecclesiastical Titles Act. The sooner that Act was repealed the better for the honour of this country. He perfectly concurred in the view of the law which had been taken by the Attorney General, and thought the present Bill formed a necessary corollary to the statute which disestablished the Irish Church.

MR. JESSEL took objection to the view of the Common Serjeant (Mr. T. Chambers) that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act ought to remain on the statute book, as a protest against assumption by the Roman Catholic Church, and pointed to the fact, that though the statute was enacted 20 years ago it had been frequently infringed and never enforced, as one of the strongest reasons for its repeal. There was yet another reason which would, he hoped, weigh with the House—that, though utterly useless, the Act remained unrepealed, notwithstanding the fact that many thousands of their fellow-countrymen regarded it as an insult to themselves and to the religion they professed.

MR. GREENE confessed to some surprise in hearing eminent legal authorities contradict each other so flatly. One hon. Gentleman said the law was not enforced, because the Government dare not enforce it, while another had contended that the law was a dead letter. The Committee of the House of Lords who inquired into this subject were not of opinion that the Act which it was now proposed to repeal had been ineffectual, because since it was enacted there had not been any ostentatious assumption of territorial titles by Roman Catholic Bishops in this country. Lord Palmerston, in supporting the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, contended that it was not inconsistent with the Act of 1829, and that it should not be regarded as a measure of a penal character. But the Attorney General now said that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, although it had not been enforced, was distasteful to the Roman Catholic Prelates in Ireland. He (Mr. Greene) would ask whether the people of England were to be governed in accordance with English sentiment, or in accordance with the sentiment of Roman Catholics in Ireland? He deeply respected the Members of the Roman Catholic Church in that House for their consistency of conduct, and only wished the Protestants were as earnest. But why should we admit a power not religious only but temporal, which might bring about a state of things that would make another Reformation in England? The electors of this country should seriously consider whether it was not the policy of the present Government to favour the Roman Catholic hierarchy as against the Protestant Church of this country. Dissenters would find out their mistake in relaxing protective legal provisions on the ground of religious equality. The Act sought to be repealed was of great importance; it had had a very wholesome effect, and if it remained it would prevent a very serious collision. If anybody in that House were so sanguine as to believe that such men as Drs. Manning and Cullen could be easily defeated in their schemes, it was a great delusion. He was surprised that the representatives of Scotland, so renowned for its Protestantism, should go, one and all almost, into the Lobby with the Government, and he hoped that the bit of their mind which the constituency of Glasgow gave their Members would have some salutary effect. At all events, he could not allow the subject to pass without a protest against the introduction of a power which our forefathers had made such noble sacrifices in resisting.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had occupied much more time than he should in proving that the spiritual supremacy governed all temporal matters, and, having searched history through down to our own times, the only illustration of his argument the hon. Gentleman was able to adduce was that within the last few weeks a Catholic constituency had returned a Presbyterian in preference to a Catholic. It had been said there was no grievance in this matter; but the same argument was applied to both the Irish Church and the Irish Land Bills. It was not the men who inflicted a grievance who could best judge of that grievance, and sometimes the worst grievance of all was a sentimental grievance. The Irish people, with all their faults, were a high-spirited people. They would feel a material injury less than an insult, and he perfectly concurred in what the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had said, that as long as this Bill remained on the statute book there was an incessant feeling of wrong, insult, and grievance which would never disappear until the Bill was repealed. He had always wished that we should be a United Kingdom; but if it was asked—"Was Ireland to dare to differ from England; or was England to govern Ireland as she chose;" that was not the way to keep us united. It had been alleged by an hon. Member that there was no grievance, because the law had not been enforced. There were two reasons for not enforcing a law, and one of them was that the law was so bad that no one dared to enforce it. One of the greatest writers on this subject had said that laws, in order to be obeyed, must be the exposition of a nation's feeling and a nation's reason. Was the present law an exposition of a people's feeling? It was not, and that was the reason why it was not enforced. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) had argued that the law had not been violated. Was there a day or an hour in which it was not? There was no lesson that could be taught a people worse than this—that there were laws which it was no crime to disobey. If the poor man, however well taught, saw those above him in the highest offices of State, aye, up to the Throne itself, break one of the solemn laws of Queen, Lords, and Commons, how was he to be expected to obey other laws? Now, this law was not only broken by the people and by the Bishops, but by one of the most important Departments in this country. The Legislature had declared that the soldier of every religion should have the spiritual consolations of his faith; but no priest could act as chaplain in any portion of the British Army unless under the sign manual of his Bishop, and there was not a day that a sign manual was not issued, and went to the Horse Guards. If the law was a bad one—so bad that it could not be changed—it was useless to discuss it or enter into religious dogmas. He would only appeal to the spirit which ought to animate all hon. Members, and say—let us have no laws but those which are worthy of being obeyed.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, the Attorney General had maintained that it was proper to repeal this Act because it was antagonistic to the feelings of a certain portion of the Irish people. Since he had the honour of a seat in that House he had often heard that kind of argument. It had been used in the case of Catholic Emancipation, in that of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and that of the Irish Land Bill, and he thought they had had enough of this policy of conciliation. Had it been justified by the event? They had had one or two elections lately in Ireland, and he did not know that the Prime Minister could congratulate himself on the result. The Attorney General also based this Bill on the ground of necessity drawn from the passing of the Act for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He doubted whether there was any such necessity, or if there was, it might be met by a very simple clause, as had been done in the original Act with respect to the Episcopal Church in Scotland. Feeling that there was no ground of complaint against the law as it stood, he should certainly vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MINES REGULATION BILL—[Bill 16.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

MR. MAGNIAC protested against the Bill being proceeded with until hon. Members had been afforded a sufficient opportunity of consulting with respect to it the opinions of their constituents. Last year, when a similar measure was before the House, it was utterly impossible to procure any information from the Government as to how or when it was to be proceeded with. The difficulties which the right hon. Gentleman then experienced were, no doubt, very serious; but he believed they were very much of his own making. As to the measure of last year, it was received in Cornwall with the utmost dissatisfaction; and although, in regard to that Bill, page after page of the Amendments appeared on the Votes, none of those Amendments had been embodied, so far as he could see, in the proposal of this year. At all events, so far as time had admitted of a cursory examination, none of the Amendments proposed by the Cornish Members appeared to have found any place in it; and it was, at any rate, desirable that those who were interested in its provisions should know what it really contained. As, however, he had been fortunate enough to obtain an assurance from the Secretary of State for the Home Department that a sufficient amount of time for properly considering the Bill would be given before going into Committee, he did not propose to press his Amendment.

LORD ELCHO said, that he was glad to find the progress of the Bill at that stage was not to be delayed; but that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would endeavour to carry out the wish expressed last Session—that the Bill should be introduced this Session at a time that would allow of its going into Committee before Easter. All were agreed as to the principle of the Bill, and if those who represented the miners of Cornwall could not bring themselves to assent to the provisions of the measure as regards Cornwall they could easily except Cornwall in Committee. He had been requested by a deputation of miners to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his extension of the operation of the Bill to metalliferous mines as well as to coal mines. There had been several improvements introduced into this Bill. A most judicious compromise had been made with regard to the age at which children should be allowed to work in mines. Boys were to be allowed to work in mines at 10 years of age, but with restrictions with regard to the time of employment and provisions for their attending school—a change advantageous to the boy and for the interest of the mining population generally. The change in the provisions with reference to ventilation and the onus probandi clause did not appear to be advantageous. It would be necessary also to carefully consider the regulations with regard to penalties. He reminded the House that nothing but the excessive pressure of business last Session prevented the measure being passed then, and he expressed his thanks to the Home Secretary for having re-introduced it at the earliest possible period.

MR. FOTHERGILL said, the feeling against the Bill was very strong in South Wales, and he viewed with alarm the reading of the Bill the second time, before the people of South Wales had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon its provisions. He thought the removal of the onus probandi a very valuable change, and he had to thank the Secretary of State for the Home Department for giving those who were affected by the Bill the power to appeal. He objected to the payment of the men by measure or weight, and would have preferred its being confined to weight only. He hoped the second reading would not be pressed on.

MR. DILLWYN said, great disappointment would be felt in Wales if longer time were not given before the second reading of the Bill. That was the proper stage on which to take a discussion on its merits, and they would be unable fairly to do this unless time were allowed them to hear from their constituents. He was much disappointed at the omissions of the Bill, and also its general tenor. They had been legislating on a wrong principle hitherto. They adopted resolutions, but they made no provisions for carrying them out. He recommended that, to insure the proper fulfilment of the intentions of the Legislature, the appointment of properly-qualified underground overmen should be insisted on as of the first importance.

MR. A. F. EGERTON, as one who was largely interested in coal mines, declared himself most anxious for the passing of that Bill, as far as its principle was concerned, and also that it might pass as soon as possible. There were a few points, however, on which Amendments might be introduced into the measure at the proper time. For example, he would suggest that it was very desirable that some encouragement should be given to night schools for the instruction of collier lads—a point omitted from the Bill as it stood. Again, Clause 47 enabled a Court of summary jurisdiction to award imprisonment for three months, with or without hard labour—a power too great, he thought, to place in the hands of one stipendiary magistrate, or two justices of the peace, ignorant of the peculiar characteristics of coal mines. Such a power ought to be given only to a Court of quarter sessions. Clause 49 was also a curious one, as under it proceedings might be taken in an inferior Court and at the same time in a superior Court, and while the proceedings in the latter tribunal were pending those in the former might be stayed. The effect of that would be that a man might be tried in a superior Court and acquitted, and then find himself liable to have proceedings against him gone on with in a Court below. True, he could not be punished twice for the same offence, but he might be tried twice, or something very analogous to it. These were matters of detail that would require attention in Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could not regard the Bill as a piece of hasty legislation, as its subject had been for the last five years before the House, and his constituents interested in mining, both employers and employed, were quite tired of the agitation that had been carried on during that period. He hoped, however, before going into Committee, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would give them time to master the new features of his measure, and to place before the House and the country such Amendments in it as might be necessary. He thought a child of 10 years of age ought not to be allowed to work in a mine. He also disapproved of women and female children being allowed to work on the pit-bank, for nothing, in his opinion, was more discreditable to our civilization than the sights that were daily witnessed at the collieries, especially of Lancashire, where women, dressed in the garb of men, worked with the banksmen, smoking short pipes with them, except, perhaps, when their babies were brought to the pit-bank and nursed there by mothers in men's attire and with blackened faces. This practice of employing women outside coal pits, as they were formerly employed down the mine itself, prevailed also in some parts of Scotland and Wales. He besought the Government to put an end to so degrading a practice. There ought also to be a provision in the Bill for weekly payments, for the truck system lived by long payments; and in order that the framers of the measure might more fully apprehend the evils of the system, and see the necessity of insisting upon weekly payments in opposition to those evils, he suggested that they should have the Report of the Truck Commission before them, and have the advantage of the important evidence it had obtained. He also strongly advocated weighing the quantities raised from the pits by the workmen as a means of preventing disputes. With regard to inspection, he reminded the House that of the 330,000 miners in Great Britain, 1,100 were killed annually, 10,000 injured; and of this last number 5,000 were permanently lamed. Were the system of inspection thorough, experienced men in these matters estimated that half the number of these casualties would be spared. He thought this country might learn a profitable lesson from Saxony, where no man was allowed to act as superintendent or overseer of mines who had not passed through a scientific education at the mining school. The Bill should be passed in a complete form, and an end put to the agitation of that question.

MR. BROWN said, he was sorry that more time had not been given them to consult their constituents on the subject of that measure. The inspection at present was a mere farce, and if the number of Inspectors were not increased, inspection had better be done away with altogether. He agreed with other hon. Members that 10 years of age was too early for a child to work hard underground in a constrained and unhealthy position. The employment of women and female children on pit-banks ought to be abolished, as degrading and unsexing in its tendency. He also urged the introduction of a clause providing for the payment of wages weekly, which he believed would put an end to the evils of the truck system. He trusted that the Committee on the Bill would be put off till such time as would enable Amendments to be framed which would effect a final settlement of the question.

MR. A. W. YOUNG said, this was not the Bill of last year, for the present Bill was considerably altered from the previous measure. He did not object to the second reading; but some interval should be allowed to elapse before the Committee was taken, in order to allow hon. Members to communicate with their constituents.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) with respect to the clauses regulating the age of boys working in mines, and he thought that the provision in last year's Bill was calculated in districts where collieries were close to factories to turn the whole labour of those districts into certain occupations. So far from regarding the Bill as a retrograde one, he thought it a Bill in the right direction.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he thought the Bill of the Secretary of State for the Home Department dealt rather too tenderly with the evils it was intended to prevent. He thought it permitted children of too young an age to be sent down into mines, and that it failed to require efficient inspection. In North Germany no child under 16 was permitted to be employed underground. The overmen could not at present be expected to pass a theoretical examination, but there could be no hardship in requiring that all men appointed after a given distant day, say 1st January 1876, should be required to produce certificates showing their competency to discharge their peculiar duties. As regarded inspection, the Secretary of State for the Home Department would admit that if it could be had, it was worth paying for; and when they were going to vote £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 to repay the over-regulation prices to those whose only claim was founded on their own violation of the law, they ought certainly not to grudge an extra sum of £10,000 or £15,000 per annum for the efficient inspection of mines. He did not think it could be possible to inspect every mine once in three months, but the difficulties of inspection, and even the number of mines actually in operation had been greatly exaggerated. Many, particularly in South Staffordshire, were returned as at work, which has been closed for years. The Secretary of State for the Home Department ought to be in possession of the state of discipline in every mine in the United Kingdom, and this could only be ascertained by the personal examination of Inspectors. It had been urged that by appointing Inspectors, all responsibility would be taken away from the owners of mines; but he could not see the force of the argument, because, in his opinion, the owners of mines were anxious that their mines should be worked on sound principles. The system of propping by the contractors or butties still prevailing in South Staffordshire, was the cause of twice the number of deaths, by fall of roof occurring there, than took place in the North of England. He trusted the Secretary of State for the Home Department would show a little more courage in dealing with the matter, and that he would make the provisions of the Bill far more stringent than they were at present.

MR. ELLIOT expressed his opinion that the clauses of the Bill dealing with the safety of the miners could not be much improved, as they showed that the framers of the measure were acquainted with mining affairs to the utmost minutiae of detail. Upon the question of the age at which children should be permitted to be employed in mines, he thought the matter might be left to the discretion of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, where the mineowners and parents were agreed, because, whereas in some districts it would not be right to permit children under 12 years of age to descend the mines, in others no harm would result from permitting children of 10 years of age to be so employed. In regard to the penal clauses, he hoped that it would be found practicable to impose fines—up to £100, if they liked—on the owner, and up to £10 on the miner, and only to resort to imprisonment if those fines were not paid. No man had taken a deeper interest in the safety of mines than himself, and if he thought that sub-inspection would result in the saving of lives he would gladly approve of its adoption. But he remembered his own experience as manager of a colliery, and he knew how natural it was for a man in that position to feel that when the Government Inspector had been over the workings all responsibility on his part was at an end, at least for a time. Such a feeling ought never to be encouraged; and any legislation that tended to encourage it would create a greater evil than it remedied. On the whole he felt sure that the Bill would prove acceptable both to the owners of mines and to the men employed in them, and would be the means of effecting many useful reforms, and therefore he hoped it would be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. BROGDEN said, he did not consider the Secretary of State for the Home Department at all chargeable with undue delay in this kind of legislation, the present Bill, in substance, having been long before Parliament. He approved of the limitation of the age as pointed out by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), but regretted that the Bill embraced not only coal mines, but metalliferous mines also, the conditions of which were in many respects entirely different. Before the last-named class of mines was introduced into the Bill, time should have been allowed for an expression of opinion to be received from those most closely interested in the question. When the proper time arrived—in Committee—he should invite the attention of hon. Gentlemen to this point.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY complimented his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the discussion which had arisen, although he thought every objection that had been taken could have been more satisfactorily taken in Committee than in a debate on the second reading of the Bill. He could not quite understand the view taken by some hon. Members, who began by making sweeping objections to the measure, and ended by saying that, as their constituents disapproved it, they ought to have an opportunity of seeing the Bill. It reminded him of the captain who bound a man with two chains, and then asked who he was and what he had done. The hon. Members first prejudged the Bill and then wanted time to look into its provisions. This was one of those measures which, when introduced two or more years ago, it seemed desirable to pass in the first instance, but which a subsequent acquaintance with the facts had been shown to need modification in some particulars; and he had no doubt that when it had passed through and been further amended in Committee, and was brought to its final stage, it would be found to be a measure deserving a satisfactory reception in all parts of the country which would be affected by its provisions. The districts of England in which the Bill would operate were dissimilar in many respects. In some parts of the country it did not matter whether the restriction as to the age at which children were to be allowed to go into the mines was fixed at 10 or 16 years, for they would find their way there in the end; but in districts where there were not only mines but manufactories, it would be found that they would be sent to the factories at an early age, and then the mine owners would altogether lose the advantage of youthful labour. He did not see why children should not be allowed to labour in the mines, where, as a rule, they would be engaged in work with their own fathers—under the same or similar “half-time” regulations that obtained in factories. If this were not so, the colliery owners in certain districts would have a right to complain that a law was being meted out to them different from that under which manufacturers conducted their business. With respect to another branch of the subject, he felt sure that a system of minute inspection, such as was suggested by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. B. Samuelson), would result in enormous expenditure, with but small corresponding benefit, and would, at the same time, afford little or no additional protection to the workmen, because it would decrease the responsibility of colliery owners and managers. He felt confidence in the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, because, in his opinion, the measure hit the mean between rendering managers almost entirely irresponsible, through excess of Government inspection, and allowing them to conduct their business in a reckless manner, because the Government inspection was either insufficient or inefficient. He believed that it would be impossible to inspect thoroughly one of the larger mines in Northumberland in less than a fortnight. Such an inspection would be costly, and it would be of no benefit to the miners themselves. He was quite sure that the miners would regard this measure as a well-considered compromise, and he trusted that it would be passed in a shape that would be satisfactory to the workmen and the mineowners, and also to the Houses of Parliament.

MR. BRUCE said, he was far from complaining of the remarks that had been made, whether as to the time at which this Bill was proposed, or as to the details of the Bill. With respect to the objection as to the time at which the Bill was proposed, the answer had been already sufficiently given that the Bill had been before the country for a long time. Last year the Bill was read a second time without any opposition. The changes that had been introduced were few, and as a general desire had been manifested that the Bill should be proceeded with with all diligence, and the Bill was essentially one of detail, he thought the best course was to get it read a second time as early as possible, with the full understanding that ample opportunity should be given to consider its details before going into Committee, and with that view he proposed that the House should not go into Committee until the expiration of three weeks. If there was one exception to the general tone of the discussion, it was the speech of the hon.

Gentleman who commenced the discussion (Mr. Magniac), and whose complaints were unfounded. That hon. Gentleman said that certain Amendments with respect to the inspection of mines had been introduced for the first time without the wish of the Cornish miners. Now, so far from that being the case, every single Amendment affecting mines in Cornwall was introduced after discussion with, and with the approval of, the Members for Cornwall themselves, the only difference being that the clauses were arranged more systematically. The children employed above ground in connection with coal mines were not included in the Workshops' Regulation Act, and therefore the Select Committee suggested that the Workshops' Regulation Act should be applied to such children. But the character of the work done by the children in Cornwall and elsewhere in cleaning the produce of copper and tin mines already subjected them to the operation of that Act. He would proceed to notice very shortly a few of the objections to the Bill. He thought the best answer that could be given to the objection of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. B. Samuelson) was that given by the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Elliot). Hon. Members must know that as to framing rules on a subject of this kind, anyone occupying the position of Secretary of State for the Home Department must take the advice of the most competent advisers—namely, the Inspectors of Mines, and with them he had consulted, and had largely availed himself of their advice in preparing the general rules contained in the Bill. Since the measure was before the House last Session, he had received suggestions from various parts of the country against an absolute exclusion of children under 12, who, it was said, earned very considerable wages. He had so far altered the Bill of last year that children of 10 years of age would be permitted to work underground but only for three days a week, and with provision for their education up to the age of 13 years. With regard to the employment of women above ground—no women were employed underground—he agreed very much with what was said by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that that question must be left to the general feeling of the population, and to the spread of general enlightenment. As to the complaint of the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. Brown) that masters and workmen were differently treated with respect to appeals, he denied its justice; the appeal was given to both parties whenever the magistrates imposed a sentence of imprisonment without the alternative of a fine. As to the remarks of the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Elliot), he thought that for ordinary offences, which might cause some injury to machinery, fines would be an amply sufficient punishment; but that as to greater offences whereby the safety of people engaged in mines was endangered, there ought to be the power of inflicting severe and summary punishment; but in these cases an appeal to a higher Court had been provided. As to short payments, the whole of that question would be brought under the consideration of the House when the Report of the Commissioners on the Truck System was presented. The evidence was now completed; but it was voluminous, and the Report could hardly be expected in less than about five weeks from the present time. It was of the utmost importance that the means of obtaining a complete education should be afforded to mining agents. But no mining schools existed in this country, or at least to an extent altogether insufficient for the education of so numerous a class. Let schools and means of education be provided, and then we should have a right to insist upon a strict preliminary examination. The case of shipmasters was not analogous, because the shipmaster went to sea for perhaps five or six months, and during all that time the lives of the crew were in his hands. But an agent who committed a mistake might be taken before a magistrate and immediately removed by his employer. All these things, however, were matters for Committee, and, in order that ample time might be given for the consideration of the Bill by the country, and for putting Amendments on the Paper, he should name the Committee for that day three weeks.

Motion agreed to.

mittee not for the purpose of delaying, but rather of facilitating its progress. He thought it was desirable the Commissioners should be allowed to judge of the requirements of a particular locality, for they were perfectly competent to decide what allotments should be given to labourers, and what land should be set aside for the purposes of recreation. How much better, too, he would ask, would it not be that where ground was of a swampy and bad nature it should be drained and properly cultivated than left as it was, paying nothing in alleviation of those local rates which pressed so heavily on particular districts? He was, of course, far from saying that allotments should not be given to the labouring poor, and as to the commons, of which the hon. Baronet who had just spoken seemed to think the great landowners and lords of the manors got the lion's share, he might instance the case of one inclosure in his own immediate neighbourhood in which the lord of the manor got only a sixteenth part. Under all the circumstances, the proper course, in his opinion, to pursue, was to send the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he hoped the House would not accede to the hon. and gallant Gentleman's proposal. He felt very grateful for the introduction of the Bill, because it recognized the principle that the people had a real interest in the public lands of this country. Before the year 1845 the rights of the poor in connection with waste lands were systematically and absolutely ignored. No less than 4,000 private Acts had up to that time been passed for making inclosures—2,000 in the last century, and 2,000 in the first half of the present century. The Bill of 1845 directed the Commissioners to authorize inclosures only when expedient, and contained provisions with respect to recreation grounds and allotment gardens. Under it, about 500,000 acres had been inclosed, yet only an infinitesimal portion had been set aside for recreation grounds and allotments; nor did it appear that the Commissioners had ever stopped any inclosure on the ground of the interest of the public generally. The Act of 1866 provided that, within a certain distance of the metropolis, commons should not be inclosed under the Inclosure Acts at all, thus recognizing the interests of the general public as against those of the lords and the commoners. The present measure extended this provision to all large towns. It also improved the earlier provisions as to allotments and recreation grounds. The Bill did not go quite far enough, however, for it only considered the interests of the public in the particular locality in which the waste lands were situated. We were only beginning to open our eyes to the sanitary conditions under which our immense population was living, and perhaps hon. Members were scarcely aware of the growing extent in which our increasing population was pent up in towns. Those growing masses of the people had an immense interest in the little that was left of the waste lands of the country; and the Legislature would be recklessly improvident if it did not consider the interests not only of the present population, but also of the very much larger population which would follow them. It was not enough to provide for the interests of the locality, around, for instance, the Malvern Hills, Helvellyn, or Snowdon; such places were frequented by the public from a far wider range, whose interests were entirely unprotected by the Bill. He did not think the interests of the landed proprietors of the country were more adverse to the public interest than were those of any other class; perhaps they were less so. But he asked them to recollect that their number in this country was constantly diminishing; that estates were growing in size, and getting into fewer hands; that the occupation of land was also getting into fewer hands, and that as farms became consolidated and the use of machinery increased, fewer labourers would be employed on the land. He did not complain of this; but what would be the result if the number of persons brought into direct contact with the land as owners, occupiers, and cultivators diminished in number while the population increased? Those persons who favoured the present system should, therefore, consider how it might be made most tolerable to such as had no land. If all land were inclosed, and the rights of property strictly exercised over it, the people being kept to the public roads, living in England would become intolerable. At present, the liberal use of their parks and of private waste land allowed by certain landed proprietors was a mitigating circumstance. As a landless man and an habitual trespasser he gratefully acknowledged this. But the public had an interest in the use of the public waste lands of the country; and if you allowed no vent to the indescribable longing for a country life among the town masses of the population, there would be a growing feeling of discontent which would operate much more seriously than the advocates of inclosure were aware of. One point he wished to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who praised the liberal administration of the Crown lands. There was no private proprietor who used the rights over waste lands in so grudging and so niggardly a manner as the Crown and the Duchy of Cornwall. The Crown lands were coined into the last farthing; and what might give enjoyment to thousands would be sold for a halfpenny if no more could be got for it. He would, therefore, make these practical suggestions—First, the Crown and the Duchy of Cornwall should be expressly restricted from inclosure. Next, no inclosure should be allowed anywhere except under the Inclosure Acts, so that under no circumstances could the lord and the commoners, acting together, or the lord alone under the Statute of Merton, evade the intentions of the Legislature. Again, no inclosure ought to be made until the Secretary of State, or some other responsible person, was satisfied that not only were local interests satisfied, but that the interests of the public at large were not injuriously affected. Parliament was asked to legislate very much in the dark on this question. In 1844, Mr. Blamire's estimate of the extent of waste lands in England was 8,000,000 acres. Another estimate was 6,000,000; but we now really had no accurate knowledge on this point, and the extent of land available for the public use was probably much smaller than was supposed. He suggested, then, that there should be a survey of the waste lands of the country, and under the direction of the Ordnance Department such a survey could be made with very little difficulty or expense. Until a survey had been made they ought to hold their hands, and he therefore trusted that his hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would consider favourably the Amendments which he should place upon the Paper for proposal in Committee, with a view to prevent inclosures without the sanction of the Secretary of State, and to provide for the survey of the waste lands of the country.

MR. WALSH said, he had no great fault to find with the Bill. In the county which he represented (Radnorshire), where there were a great many waste lands, they were regarded as unmitigated nuisances. Not only did they give rise to a great deal of local crime, but they especially afforded facilities for sheep stealing and harbouring of vagrants. They were also a fruitful cause of bad blood and feuds, in consequence of disputed rights of pasture. So much was this the case, that shepherds were frequently selected not because they were well skilled in the management of sheep, but because they were proficient in pugilism. It would, therefore, be a source of congratulation if those lands were inclosed on fair terms. Nearly every class in Wales was in favour of their inclosure; but that the lord of the manor should not have the right of veto different to that enjoyed by the Commissioners. Although not entertaining that view, he considered it was one that might be advantageously submitted to a Select Committee. He believed, however, with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Winterbotham) that no lord of the manor was so hard a taskmaster as the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. Indeed, the encroachments made by the Commissioners were constantly increasing, and but little, if any, attention was ever paid to the rights of the commoners. He should not vote against the second reading, but he should support, at a later stage, the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Barttelot) to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. FAWCETT moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he hoped that his hon. Friend would not press the Motion. Looking at the business before the House, he feared it would be many a long day before so good an opportunity could be found for the discussion of the question, and it was still early.

MR. J. LOWTHER supported the Amendment for the adjournment of the debate. The hon. and learned Member for Stroud (Mr. Winterbotham) had propounded a most extraordinary doctrine —namely, that the waste lands of the country were to be reserved for the enjoyment of tourists, or rather gentlemen excursionists, rather than for those who had a pecuniary interest in them. The whole matter might become a question of compensation, and if the Malvern Hills and similar lands were to be reserved for the public it might, perhaps, be worth consideration whether a demand in respect of them might not be made upon the Consolidated Fund.

MR. LOCKE said, he thought these commons ought not to be treated as if the lords of the manor and the other persons possessing particular rights in them were the only interested parties, as it should be borne in mind that the public in general had a right to pass over them. He objected to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee, thinking it would be better to consider its provisions in the ordinary way in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. BRUCE said, he would not resist the Motion for adjournment.

METROPOLIS—ST. JAMES'S PARK.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ROYSTON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is his intention, this Session, to open the communication for the public between Marlborough House Gate and Storey's Gate, Birdcage Walk, by the east end of St. James's Park?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, when the question as to opening a communication between Marlborough House and Storey's Gate by the eastern side of St. James's Park had last been put to him, he stated that no change would be made, unless it could be shown that the change was absolutely necessary to enable hon. Members to obtain access to the House. But, as he had heard no suggestion to that effect, no occasion had arisen for bringing the subject under the notice of the Government.

METROPOLITAN BOARD.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware of the fact that the measure of last Session increasing the maximum borrowing powers of the Metropolitan Board (under the Loans Act of 1869) was introduced into a Public Bill of the Government, and that the three Bills introduced this year for further extending such borrowing powers are Private Bills promoted by the said Board; and, whether the Government, having intimated their intention to introduce a Bill to amend the said Loans Act of 1869, purpose to allow the Private Bills to go to Committee before the introduction of the Public Bill, or defer the Private Bills until the House has the Public Measure before it?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that the hon. Gentleman had misapprehended the answer that he gave him the other day on that subject. He had not intimated the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to amend the Loans Act, 1869. What he had stated was that the Metropolitan Board had prepared a Bill, which they were about to submit to the Government; but that it had not yet been so submitted to the Government. The object of that Bill, as he understood, was to explain and amend the Act of 1869, and not in any way to extend their borrowing powers, or their powers of consolidation. As to the three Bills now before Parliament, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, it was not the intention of the Government to interfere with their progress; but he thought the Notice of Motion given that afternoon with regard to those Bills by the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), was one well worthy of consideration.

ARMY—PROMOTION OF COLONELS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is intended after the abolition of Purchase, to continue to mulct each Colonel on his promotion to the rank of Major General in the regulation value of his commission, which would be equivalent to selling the rank of Major General at the price of £4,500?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, by the existing regulations, colonels succeeding to the rank of major general, cannot sell their regimental commissions. It is not intended to recognize any new claims to sell commissions, but simply to enable those who, under existing regulations, have the right to sell out of the service, to realize the value of their commissions on their retirement from the Army.

ARMY—WIDOWS OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of Purchase in the Army being abolished, the widow, children, or next of kin of an officer, who is either dangerously ill or who has died before he has been repaid the customary price of his commission, will receive the money from the State to which that officer would have been entitled if he had lived; and, whether, in the case of an officer being killed in action or on duty, or dying of his wounds, before he has been repaid the customary price of his commission, his widow or children, or next of kin, as the case may be, will receive the money to which he would have been entitled had he lived?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the widow, children, or next of kin referred to in the first part of the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman do not receive the purchase money, according to the purchase system, and, therefore, will not be entitled to compensation on the abolition of the system. As regards officers killed in action, the rule expressed in the Warrant G 1,069 will be strictly followed.

DANGEROUS MANUFACTURES.

QUESTION.

MR. BROGDEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has issued or intends to issue any general instructions for the guidance of Justices in granting licences for places for the manufacture of articles of an explosive nature; and whether he has appointed or intends to appoint inspectors for such workshops or places?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had directed a very experienced officer some time ago to inquire into the practices of manufactories of explosive materials, and had obtained from him a very valuable Report; but, before any legislative action on the subject was taken, it was desirable that those inquiries should be pursued further. He had directed an analysis of the present Acts, and certain regulations now adopted at the Government factories to prevent danger, to be prepared and forwarded to the local authorities wherever those manufactories were known to exist, with a request that they should be issued to their managers. He had no power at present to appoint special Inspectors for those works; but he would require the Factory Inspectors to see that the provisions of the Act now in force were carried out, and also to suggest such additional precautions as, although not provided by the Act, were really desirable for the security of persons engaged in those establishments.

Colonel C. H. Lindsay

METROPOLIS—NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether Her Majesty's Government have approved any design for the exterior architectural elevation of the proposed Natural History Museum at South Kensington; whether the approved design is a modification of that by the late Captain Fowke which was selected after the competition instituted by the Right honourable Member for South Hants when First Commissioner of Works, and which Mr. Waterhouse was appointed to execute; whether the approved design is in architectural harmony with the adjacent new buildings of the South Kensington Museum; and, whether he will, as early as possible, exhibit drawings and a model of the approved design within the precincts of this House, for the inspection of Members?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, considerable progress had been made in the preparation of the plans and designs for the New Museum of Natural History proposed to be erected at South Kensington; but it would be some time before they were perfected. Until that was done it would, of course, be impossible to exhibit them, nor had they at present received the sanction of the Government.

ARMY REGULATION BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends, before proceeding with the Second Reading of the Army Regulation Bill, to lay upon the Table of the House the new Regulations regarding promotion and retirement which are to take effect after the abolition of purchase?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I am not yet in a position to promise how soon I can lay any such Paper on the Table, but I will do so as soon as I am able.

COLONEL ANSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it would be possible to divide the Army Regulation Bill into two separate Bills, one dealing with purchase and the mode of its abolition, the other with the remaining objects of the Bill; and, whether there is any objection to Officers of the Army communicating with Members of Parliament and criticizing the Bill on points affecting their pecuniary interests and future prospects in their profession?

MR. CARDWELL: I think, Sir, the Bill can be much more conveniently considered as a whole. My hon. and gallant Friend is himself a distinguished officer, and I trust he will give no countenance to anything which would prejudice the good order and military discipline of the service. It is quite possible for any officer to communicate with a Member of this House on the subject of the Bill without incurring the reproach of being party to such a breach of discipline.

MAJOR DICKSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has prohibited the promotion by sale in succession in regiments where there are supernumerary Officers, and whether such regulation is not contrary to all precedent and obstructive to promotion in those regiments?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I have not prohibited the sales in question, and everything which has been done has been in strict accordance with the practice pursued when the former reductions were made in 1866. The absorption has always been in the junior rank, in which there was a supernumerary.

ALLEGED CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES TO THE CROWN PRINCE OF GERMANY.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement in the Daily Telegraph is correct—viz., That Captain Hozier has been charged with messages of congratulation from Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Cambridge to the Crown Prince of Germany upon the successes won by his Army?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: In the temporary and unavoidable absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, I must ask the hon. Baronet to defer his Question for a short time.

SIR HENRY HOARE: I beg to give Notice that I shall repeat my Question when the right hon. Gentleman appears in his place.

CEYLON—ADAM'S BRIDGE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE rose to call the attention of the House to the necessity of cutting through Adam's Bridge, and thereby obviating the necessity of circumnavigating the island of Ceylon. The subject was one of the greatest commercial importance, and it had been brought several times under the notice of the Indian Government, and in 1862 a Committee, over which he had the honour to preside, was appointed by the House, which recommended that the Indian Government should cut a passage between the island of Ramisseram and Point Tonitory, at the western end of Adam's Bridge, with the view of shortening the present route to and from the Bay of Bengal by 360 miles; but, notwithstanding that recommendation, from that time to the present, no steps had been taken in the matter. That the trade which would be benefited by the execution of the proposed works was not an unimportant one, was shown from the fact that, imperfect as the existing channel was, it had increased from 7,000 tons in 1829 to 200,000 in last year. Having twice visited the locality he was in a position to say that no difficulty whatever would have to be encountered in executing the proposed works. The opening of the Suez Canal had occasioned the Indian trade to be carried on almost entirely by steam vessels, and he believed that, in the course of two or three years, sailing vessels would be engaged in the traffic. This would, of course, greatly augment the utility of the proposed works. The Colonial Government at Ceylon had determined to make a large and deep-water harbour at Colombo, and if the proposed canal were cut there would be a saving of 250 miles between that port and Madras. The navigation of the Gulf of Manaar was the safest in the world, and it appeared from the annual Reports of the Indian Presidencies—which, from the clear and ample manner in which they treated all

Indian questions, he should be glad to see in the Library of that House—that in the course of last year 2,222 vessels passed through the existing channel through Adam's Bridge, of which, although they were navigated by natives, only two were lost. What he now proposed was that the Indian Government should cut a canal through a promontory in the Madras Presidency, for a distance of two miles and a half, the height of the land being 12 feet, at an estimated expense of £91,000, whereby a magnificent harbour, containing 16 miles of smooth and deep water would be obtained. Last year 117,000 bales of cotton were shipped at very great risk and expense at Tutacorin; whereas if the harbour to which he was referring was constructed ships could load at jetties along the shore, to which the cotton could be conveyed by means of a short branch line of railway. The Province of Madura, in the Madras Presidency, was extremely rich in cattle, sheep, and other produce; but the harbour at Point de Galle was one of the most incommodious that could be found on any coast. Canals were no new things in those parts. The Madras Presidency had already 89 miles of canals, one of nine miles in length having been recently constructed for the purpose of connecting Madras with the great rice-producing district of Pennaar; but the Indian Government would not incur the expense of making the two and a half miles of which he was speaking, because the opening of such a canal would be an Imperial question, and ought, in their opinion, to be defrayed out of the Imperial funds. As the making of the canal would save vessels making the voyage to Calcutta—720 miles of sailing—ship-owners would be willing to pay a remunerative toll for the privilege of passing through the canal, and so the work would be self-supporting. His belief, indeed, was that it would pay the Indian Government most handsomely for the outlay. He desired further to say a few words in regard to another question connected with maritime matters on the coast of India. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India in addressing his constituents two or three years ago, took credit for having 40 lighthouses on the coast of India. But the coasts of India extended from the Persian boundary at Beloochistan

to the limits of the kingdom of Siam at Tenasserim, a distance of 4,000 miles, making about one lighthouse to every 100 miles of coast; but, to his own knowledge, there were 14 points between Bombay and Cape Comorin where lighthouses were so much wanted that ships had to make much longer passages, and to run far greater risks, than would be the case if the shore was properly lighted. Having sailed along 1,200 miles of the coast of India in the course of last year, he could say that there was no civilized country in the world worse off for necessary coast light and harbour accommodation. If the channel he had alluded to had been in the hands of M. de Lesseps, he would have done in nine months what the Government of India had taken as many years to accomplish. By means of the dredges used by M. de Lesseps on the Suez Canal, the great rivers of India might be rendered navigable and useful for the purpose of carrying the inland produce to the coast for shipment during the whole year, instead of during a part of it only, as was the case at present; while the mouths of many of them might easily be converted into good harbours by the appliance of those scientific means which were so well understood in this country. But the science of constructing harbours was so little understood in India that there were not to be found on the whole continent harbour works of equal magnitude with those which had been constructed by private enterprise at Grimsby and many other places on our coast. To sum up his object in bringing this question forward, it was to save the mercantile marine of Great Britain from the expense of 720 miles more of sailing than was necessary in making the voyage to Calcutta, and from the risk of sailing round one of the most stormy and disagreeable promontories in the world.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, no one could doubt the importance of the opening of Adam's Bridge advocated by the hon. and gallant Member. The object of saving a dangerous voyage of 700 miles in going to or from Calcutta was so great that the Indian Government could not, now that the Suez Canal was opened, longer avoid the necessity of looking into it. A proper survey and estimate should be at once obtained, and whether made by the Indian or by the English Government, such tolls might be levied on ships passing through the canal as in a few years would be sufficient to pay the cost, after which a very small toll would be all that would be required to keep it in repair.

MR. EASTWICK said, he was surprised that so little had been done by the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Committee of 1862 in reference to this among other Indian questions. He could not explain to himself why it was that the Government had failed to undertake a work, the expense of which was so small, and the advantages so great and certain. One of the great advantages of carrying out the recommendations of the hon. Baronet was that it would encourage the coasting trade; it would also enable the mariner to avoid a circuitous route, and a most dangerous place to touch at, Point de Galle, often attended with loss of life. But the chief advantage of all was the securing a good harbour. Indeed, having been himself nearly lost in the passage going from Calcutta to Madras, he could fully appreciate the advantage of a good harbour on that coast. There was this further Imperial advantage—that the construction of the new harbour would be found of almost incalculable advantage in case of war breaking out in that part of the Queen's dominions.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had no doubt of the advantages of the proposed work. It could be made, and it would save the dangers and loss of money and time in making the voyage round the island of Ceylon. The East India Company had annually, for many years, devoted a sum of money to deepening the channel; but owing to the difficulty of excavating the rock under water, the progress had been comparatively slow and ineffective; the rocky barrier, however, could be removed by the employment of diving bells and competent excavators.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he did not doubt the advantage of having a deep-water channel all through the strait between Ceylon and the coast of India. Such a channel would add considerably to the commercial facilities of the world. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that such a channel could be made, who was to make it? The Government of Ceylon had not hitherto considered that its subjects were sufficiently interested in the matter to expend any very considerable sum of money in carrying into effect any such proposal as that which had been advanced by the hon. Baronet. Was it, then, to be the Imperial Government? The Imperial Government refused to do anything of the kind. The Admiralty said that ships coming from the Red Sea would, no doubt, be very glad to save some hundred miles by using a deep-water channel through Palk Straits, if one could be made; but they would think twice before paying the toll which it would be necessary to exact. As for ships of war, they would continue to go round the outside of Ceylon, and touch, as they have been long accustomed to do, at Trincomalee. Was it, then, India that must make the channel? Well, but India was making it to the best of her ability. For 42 years the Indian authorities had been paying considerable sums for improving the water way, and a large amount of Indian shipping now went through what was known as the Paumben Channel. If Government were now to alter its plans and adopt the new channel proposed by the hon. Baronet, the whole of the money that had been spent in improving the Paumben Channel would be thrown away. He (Mr. Grant Duff) had been arguing on the assumption that what the hon. Baronet proposed was not impossible; but the information laid before him by persons acquainted with those seas, and familiar with the soundings, amounted to this—that the Paumben Channel had been greatly improved, and would be still further improved; but that, when all had been done that could be done, neither it nor any of the other channels which had been proposed could be made available for large ships, the water being very shallow for a long way, both in the Gulf of Manaar and on the other side of Adam's Bridge, so that both the north and south entrances of the proposed channels would be unapproachable by large vessels, unless an expenditure altogether disproportionate to the object to be attained was incurred. Passing from that subject to the much larger question to which the hon. Baronet had referred—the question of lighthouses and other maritime improvements on the Indian coast—he (Mr. Grant Duff) was very far from denying that there was an immense deal to do on the Indian coast; but when the hon. Baronet compared the harbour works of India with the harbour works of this country, he should remember the very different amount of capital that was available for such purposes in England and in India. He could not give the hon. Baronet much hope of anything being done for the particular project which he had recommended for improving the water way between Ceylon and the mainland; but he could assure him that the Indian Government was quite alive to the importance of improving harbours and creating more light-houses around the shores of India.

OF MR. ODO RUSSELL.—QUESTION.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI, in rising to call attention to the provisions of the Treaty of Paris (1856) as to the Black Sea, with reference to the statement on that subject lately made by the Prime Minister, said: Sir, in the remarks—the few remarks, and the fewer inquiries—I am about to make respecting the Treaty of Paris of 1856, it is not my intention, or my wish, to enter into any discussion as to the great principles of policy involved in that subject. A more important theme could not engage, in my opinion, the attention of Parliament; and on a right appreciation of all the circumstances connected with it I would venture to say that the future power of this country greatly depends—and, more than that, the fortunes of no inconsiderable part of the globe. But a subject of that kind is not to be treated in a casual and desultory manner. An hon. Member has already given Notice of his intention to bring the whole question before the House, and I have no doubt that the House will then enter into the discussion with that interest and attention which the gravity of the question requires. The remarks that I am about to make are rather preparatory to a discussion of the matter. They will divest the theme of some controversial details, which, if not now treated, would only embarrass that greater discussion of policy which is involved in the Notice that has been given. Among other points which I should like to decide to-night would be to ascertain, for example, the avowed object of the Conference that is now sitting in London. That subject seems involved in an atmosphere of ambiguity. The reasons which have been given by persons in authority for that Conference appear to be perplexed and, in a certain degree, contradictory. The whole matter seems to be mixed up with so much mysterious inconsistency, that I thought no time should be lost in order that the House of Commons should more precisely and accurately ascertain the state of affairs with respect to it. I therefore took the earliest opportunity I could of giving Notice on that subject last Friday; but I was not so fortunate as to be able to bring the matter before the consideration of the House.

I had occasion to advert to the subject of the Treaty of Paris of 1856 in some remarks I made on the first night of this Session, on the meeting of the House. They were necessarily of an imperfect character, and the view from which I then took, it was not possible for me to enter into any detail with respect to that particular Treaty. I had one object, and only one object, in making those remarks on the first night of our meeting. I thought that, considering the great events—almost unprecedented in importance—which had occurred in the interval since the Prorogation, it was not inexpedient to draw the attention of the House to their great consequences. I wanted to impress upon the House that in the interval, in consequence of those events, there had been a great revolution in all our diplomatic relations—that all the principles and traditions with respect to external affairs had become obsolete—that the balance of power in Europe was destroyed—that in consequence of that balance of power being destroyed there had been a repudiation of treaties by several States, and that of all existing countries the one which would most suffer by any diminution of diplomatic morality and any violation of public law would be our own. That was the object I had in making those remarks, and as they necessarily extended over a variety of instances, it was not possible for me to dwell in any minute detail upon any particular treaty. Nevertheless, with regard to the Treaty of 1856, I did venture to make more than one observation as to its character. I said distinctly, with regard to that Treaty, that Russia, in repudiating the conditions of the Treaty which referred to the neutral character of the Black Sea, had, in fact, repudiated the very gist of the whole subject—the essence of the Treaty; and that, in fact, that was the question for which we had struggled and made great sacrifices, and endured those sufferings which never can be forgotten. Sir, I did not think it necessary to enter into any demonstration of such a position, even if I had the opportunity. I knew well that I was speaking to a House of Commons, of which even now a majority of the Members were Members of Parliament during the Crimean War, and were perfectly acquainted with all the circumstances which preceded, accompanied, and terminated that great struggle. The House, therefore, I assumed, was perfectly aware that after that war had been waged one whole year, Russia intimated her desire to come to some understanding with her opponents. The Government of Austria in 1855—the Government which, when I described as neutral, the right hon. Gentleman disputed the accuracy of that definition, but which I find mentioned in official documents of 1855 as a Government friendly to both parties, to the Allies and to Russia—the Government of Austria interfered with a view to bring about a pacification. I will treat the circumstances with extreme brevity; but it is necessary that I should place them clearly before the House. After some communications it was ascertained that peace might probably be successfully negotiated on four points—those celebrated Four Points which hon. Gentlemen may still recollect. The first point referred to the government of the Principalities. The second to the free navigation of the Danube. The third point was that some means were to be invented for terminating the naval supremacy of Russia in the Black Sea. The fourth point referred to the future protection of the Christian subjects of the Porte. A Conference was held at Vienna—Russia having intimated that she was prepared to negotiate on these four points—that is to say, having admitted the principle which these four points embodied. The result of the negotiations was shortly this—The first two points, as framed by the Allies, were, after discussion, admitted by Russia. The fourth point, which referred to the protection of the Christian subjects of the Porte, was never brought under formal discussion at the Conference; but Russia privately intimated that she would accede to that fourth proposition, and so no difficulty arose in that case. But with regard to the third point, when the Conference had to decide upon the means by which the naval supremacy of Russia was to be terminated in the Black Sea, great difficulties arose. It appears that Russia having admitted the principle of the third point, the Allies, with great courtesy, and I think wisdom, suggested that Russia should herself propose the means by which that result should be attained. But, after waiting for instructions from St. Petersburg, the Russian negotiators declined to do that; and, therefore, the proposition of the Allies for establishing the neutral character of the Black Sea was brought forward, and that proposition, after considerable delay, and after waiting again for instructions from St. Petersburg, was utterly rejected by Russia. The state of affairs, then, was this—Russia had consented formally to the two first propositions, and privately to the fourth. The government of the Principalities, the free navigation of the Danube, the due protection of the Christian subjects of the Porte not by one Power, but by all the Powers—these points were all conceded; and the point upon which the negotiations for peace were broken was the neutral character of the Black Sea. A great responsibility, therefore, rested upon the negotiators of the Allies, and especially upon the English Government, which took so eminent a lead in these negotiations. Was the war to be continued? Was immense treasure to be further expended, and great sacrifices of human life to be incurred for this unsettled point—the neutralization of the Black Sea? It was an awful responsibility, no doubt, to decide on this point; but responsibility in a free State is not, or should not be, a source of annoyance to individuals, but rather of honourable pride; and it would be well for the House to remember, so far as this country is concerned, who were the statesmen upon whom this great responsibility peculiarly devolved. The Prime Minister of this country then was Lord Palmerston; who, however some of his last feats of foreign policy may be questioned, must be admitted by all to be a man who had a most vigorous perception of what were the interests and duties of this country, and who at that time was unquestionably in the full exercise of his powers, and with no apparent diminution of that decision and that spirit with which he had always conducted our foreign affairs. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was that distinguished nobleman whom the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) invited more than two years ago to assist him by his experience—Lord Clarendon. The negotiator who represented this country at Vienna was a nobleman who was a Member of this House for nearly half a century—who has the largest experience of public affairs of any individual of our time, who has occupied every office, from Paymaster of the Forces to President of the Council, and who had been for seven years Prime Minister of England—Earl Russell. These were the men upon whom, so far as this country was concerned, peculiarly devolved the responsibility of deciding whether, under the circumstances, the war should be pursued. They did not hesitate, in order to obtain the neutrality of the Black Sea, as it is expressed in the Treaty of Paris negotiated the following year, to recommend their Sovereign to prosecute the war, and not to cease until the Allies had effected a settlement similar to that which Russia had rejected. Well, the war continued another year:—and the House and the country have never forgotten the circumstances—great glory and honour to the Allies and to Russia also, much exhibition of heroic conduct on both sides, and on both sides, no doubt, unprecedented suffering. In the course of another year Russia was exhausted, and the Treaty of Paris was negotiated. And what was that Treaty? Russia was exhausted; but the Allies, victorious and triumphant, though they had incurred immensely increased expenditure, and endured aggravated sacrifices of life, did not demand from Russia the Crimea, which they might have restored to Turkey. They did not demand any indemnity for the expenses of the war. All the points in that Treaty, except the neutrality of the Black Sea, had been offered by Russia at Vienna in the preceding year, and therefore had been obtained by our negotiators in the first instance; but as a full satisfaction, as a settlement that completely justified the great exertions and sacrifices that had been incurred, as a settlement which they believed would secure the peace of the world so far as that portion of it was concerned, they insisted that the neutrality of the Black Sea should be accomplished.

Now, Sir, having touched—I hope accurately—upon these important facts, and recalled them I trust not without convenience as regards future discussion, I would venture to ask was I not justified in my statement the first night of the Session that the neutrality of the Black Sea was the very basis and gist of the Peace of Paris of 1856—that it was the main object of the war, the great result for the accomplishment of which this country and France and their Allies made the vast sacrifices of life and treasure now so freely acknowledged? That being the case, I asked myself, had we any reason to believe that the policy of England had ever changed? I believed myself it had not changed—I believe that it cannot change. But when I spoke the first night of the Session we were not in possession of Papers which have since been placed on the Table. Now, what do these Papers show with reference to this policy? We find in those Papers a despatch from the Queen's Ambassador at St. Petersburg; and what does he say? Sir Andrew Buchanan writes to the Secretary of State, Lord Granville, and mentions that he had long foreseen that Russia would attempt a revision of the Treaty of 1856, and that he had frequently expressed that opinion to his Lordship and to the late Earl of Clarendon. From these Papers it appears that what Sir Andrew Buchanan had long foreseen did at last occur, and though he had for some time avoided touching on the subject with the Russian Minister, he is at last obliged to encounter the disclosure which he had so long dreaded. And what were the expressions which were used on that occasion by Sir Andrew Buchanan to Prince Gortchakoff? He stated to the Russian Minister that he had the most serious apprehensions as to the light in which the report would be viewed by Her Majesty's Government, and that he should expect to receive orders immediately to ask for his passports and to quit St. Petersburg. Now, I ask the House to bear in mind that Sir Andrew Buchanan is one of the most experienced members of the diplomatic service. He has been engaged to my knowledge for 40 years in posts of important trust; for I recollect that when I was in Constantinople in 1830 he was, if I mistake not, Secretary to the Embassy; and he is a man of ability and sagacity, as well as of discretion. Can it be doubted, then, that, having frequently expressed to Lord Granville and Lord Clarendon his apprehension of the danger which he foresaw, those distinguished statesmen had furnished him with instructions as to the tone he should adopt when the disclosure was made, and the language which he should use? And that the language used by Sir Andrew Buchanan was language strictly in accordance with the instructions which he received, no one who knows him can for a moment doubt. That is a proof, therefore, in these Papers, that the policy of England, with reference to this question, had not undergone a change. But they furnish us, on that head, with another proof. Her Majesty's Ministers, in the difficult position in which they were placed through the repudiation by Russia of the condition of the Treaty of Paris which refers to the Black Sea, took a step which, on this occasion, I will not criticize—I reserve any such criticism for that larger debate which is impending—but I may now at least observe that it seems to me to be one of the most remarkable steps ever taken by a Government. They resolved on sending a special envoy to Count Bismarck. Now, I am not quarrelling with the Government, because, in a position of great difficulty, they decided on sending a special envoy to what may be called the Prussian Court. I can easily conceive adequate reasons why Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin should not leave the seat of his labours. Nor am I here to quarrel with the selection made by the Government for the post. It is said that one of the tests of competency to fill the office of Prime Minister is the capacity for fixing on the right man for any public appointment, and I do not challenge for a moment the propriety of selecting Mr. Odo Russell in this particular instance. He may not have the experience of Sir Andrew Buchanan, and for a reason with which I am sure he will find no fault—because he is a younger man. But Mr. Odo Russell has, nevertheless, had great experience in diplomacy. He has had questions entrusted to him at a post where they were both critical and delicate; and, so far as I am acquainted with his conduct, has, upon all occasions, proved himself to be a man to whose judgment and knowledge might be safely committed the interests of his country. Mr. Odo Russell, moreover, was not abroad—and that was an additional reason why he should be selected as a special envoy to Versailles. He had been re-called from his diplomatic appointment, and promoted to a post in the Foreign Office of the highest trust and importance. He was the right-hand man of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and was in daily communication with his chief. Now, hon. Gentlemen must see at once of how much consequence it is, when you have a special envoy who is to execute, under extraordinary circumstances, business of the most difficult and delicate kind, he should be a man with whom the Minister is in personal connection, so that he should not have to depend merely on written instructions prepared for the special occasion; but an envoy who—fresh from frequent intercourse with the Secretary of State and the head of the Government—should set out upon his mission thoroughly impressed and impregnated with their policy and their views, and thoroughly acquainted with their resources to meet all contingencies. Under such circumstances, we could hope and expect that its interests would be faithfully represented and attended to. Now, what happened in the case of Mr. Odo Russell, our special envoy under such favourable circumstances, and personally so well qualified as he was for the post? He left England late in November, and it was some time before he succeeded in arriving at Versailles, owing to the difficulties of travelling through the seat of war. He, however, arrived at Versailles at last, and lost no time in placing himself in communication with Count Bismarck. There is, in these Papers, an interesting narrative of what occurred on that memorable occasion. Mr. Odo Russell was twice closeted with Count Bismarck in the course of the day. He saw him in the morning, and in consequence of what then passed Count Bismarck communicated with St. Petersburg. He saw him again at 10 o'clock in the evening, and was closeted with him until midnight. Now, Mr. Odo

Russell having, after much trouble and pains, obtained the interview which he sought for, did, I have no doubt, full justice to his mission, and spoke with that adroitness and judgment which became the representative of the interests of this country, instructed by the highest authorities of the State. Well, what did Mr. Odo Russell say to Count Bismarck? He pressed for a settlement of a question which, as he informs us, he had frankly proved to Count Bismarck was of a nature, in its present state, to compel us, with or without allies, to go to war with Russia. I ask the House again, was I not justified in the statement which I made on the first night of the Session, that the question of the Black Sea was the real question which was involved in the Treaty of Paris? Have I not proved to the House that this was the view of eminent statesmen like Lord Palmerston, Lord Clarendon, and Lord Russell, who were engaged in the negotiations at Paris and Vienna? And have we not primâ facie evidence that on the 22nd of November last this was the confirmed policy of the English Cabinet—the policy of such men as Lord Clarendon and Lord Granville? I was, I must confess, astonished to learn, having these Papers before us, from the highest authority, that Mr. Odo Russell made the representation to which I have just referred to Count Bismarck without the sanction of the Government. I have heard many remarkable things this Session, which, although it has but just commenced, promises to be rife with interest. We heard last night, for example, that on Monday next a Secret Committee is to be moved for, in order to discover for the Government how to govern regenerated Ireland. How to govern regenerated Ireland! when we thought that we had employed the last two Sessions in perfecting that exalted and sublime legislation which was not only to cure the evils of the past, but which even anticipated the remedies for the future! It seems to me, I must confess, that our Irish legislation is somewhat like our Crimean Treaties, which assume a different character to that contemplated when they were originated. I heard also this Session—and I look upon it as one of the most remarkable things of which I have any recollection—that a functionary who sought to publish a correspondence connected with his Department, which he not only believed to be necessary to vindicate his character, but to be of the greatest interest to the country, received permission to do so, provided he altered the dates. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Yes; that was a thing that certainly surprised me, and I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman agrees with me at least on that point. Secret Committees and such frank permissions are certainly surprising things; but I cannot help regarding it as more surprising still that a special envoy should be selected at such a critical moment—himself admirably adapted, as nobody will deny, for the post, and with the immense advantage of being fresh from interviews with Ministers of State and of receiving in person instructions from his chief—and that he should be sent on one of the most trying occasions not only in the history of his own country, but of Europe, not further than Versailles, and should, the very first moment he encounters the great opponent with whom he had to deal, immediately take a course which his instructions did not justify. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I never said that.] The right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, by-and-by notice the observations which I am making. I heard what fell from him on a former night, and I was certainly under the impression that—to use a phrase which, though vernacular, is perhaps scarcely fit to be employed within these walls—Mr. Odo Russell was “thrown over” by the right hon. Gentleman. If it be a mistake, I believe it is a mistake which was shared by both sides of the House. I understood the right hon. Gentleman distinctly to say, in answer to a distinct inquiry, that Mr. Odo Russell had no authority to make that representation. There is one observation I wish to make with regard to Mr. Odo Russell. For a special envoy to declare to a foreign Minister that, with or without allies, we were prepared to go to war for a particular object, is one of the most decided announcements ever made upon political affairs. Admit that he had no authority to make the declaration—an admission which is overwhelming in its incredibility—why was no despatch written by the Secretary of State to contradict the declaration? Why was no printed record made with the frankness becoming an English Government, so that the indiscretion of the special agent should not be concealed from us? Why do we not learn that, at the moment when Her Majesty's Government heard of such an announcement, the special envoy was told by a flash of lightning that he had exceeded his authority? Sir, there is not a line—not a scrap—not a jot to this effect; and until the inquiry was made, and the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman, no one doubted for a moment, looking to the character of the official Papers, that the declaration was made by authority, and that Mr. Odo Russell was sent to Count Bismarck to make it.

I have now, Sir, placed before the House these remarks, the object of which is to show, first, that I was entirely justified in the description I gave of the condition relating to the neutrality of the Black Sea in the Treaty of Paris on the first night of the Session—that it was the cardinal point of British policy; that it was always so considered; that for it, and for it alone, the war was continued and the greatest sacrifices made. I think I have also shown, from the Papers furnished us by the Government, that until within a brief space—which we shall probably hear more about on another occasion—the Cabinet was faithful and firm to this policy, and that men of the vast experience of our Ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburg and the great ability of our special envoy at the Court of Versailles were instructed—and, I think, admirably instructed—how to treat such a violation of the Law of Nations and of public morality. And now, Sir, having, I hope, placed this matter fairly before the House, let me advert to the remarkable manner in which my observations upon that head were met by the right hon. Gentleman on the first night of the Session. I had endeavoured to recall to the recollection of the House the vital importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea. I did not enter into any proof of a policy which I believe was supported by the people of this country, and by the majority of the House, and upon which it appeared to me it was then far from necessary to enter into any controversy. I was content to confine myself to an opinion as to the vital importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea? What said the right hon. Gentleman? Lest I may be accused of inaccuracy, I avail myself of a memorandum containing, I believe, an accurate report of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. He entirely joined issue with me. As for the vital importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea, he said—

“That was never, as far as I know, the view of the British Government.” The right hon. Gentleman said—

“In this House, in the year 1856, I declared my confident conviction that it was impossible to maintain the neutralization of the Black Sea. I do not speak from direct communication with Lord Clarendon; but I have been told since his death that he never attached value to that neutralization. Again, I do not speak from direct communication, but I have been told that Lord Palmerston always looked upon the neutralization as an arrangement which might be maintained and held together for a limited number of years, but which, from its character, it was impossible to maintain as a permanent condition for a great settlement of Europe.”

Now, Sir, upon these startling observations of the right hon. Gentleman I will make one or two remarks. And, first, when the right hon. Gentleman says the vital importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea was never, as far as he knew, the view of the British Government, and that he had declared his confident conviction in 1856 that it was impossible to maintain it—I would observe that the right hon. Gentleman—unintentionally, of course—conveyed an erroneous impression to the House by allowing himself to mix up his own individual opinions with those of the British Government. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No; I do not admit it.] Does the right hon. Gentleman complain of the accuracy of the report? Of course, I shall take any explanation which the right hon. Gentleman has to offer, and if he said exactly the reverse of what is attributed to him, no one will congratulate the House and the country more sincerely than I shall. But, Sir, when the right hon. Gentleman talks of the views of the British Government and brings forward himself as an authority, allow me to inform the House—because some time has elapsed, and we fortunately have a good many young Members among us, and some old ones—that when the right hon. Gentleman made this speech against the importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea in 1856 he was not a Minister of the Crown, nor was he the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman was connected in this House with a minute coterie of distinguished men, who had no following in the country at the time. They were condemned by the country on account of their conduct with respect to this very question of the Black Sea and Turkish affairs generally. Rightly or wrongly—I will not enter into the question now—the country was convinced that the Crimean War was occasioned by the lukewarmness and the hesitation of this small body of distinguished men. But of these distinguished men the most unpopular in the country was the right hon. Gentleman; because, when war was inevitable, and was even declared by the Cabinet of Lord Aberdeen, the right hon. Gentleman at that time having the control of the finances, it became necessary that he should propose the Ways and Means for carrying on the war, and the country was of opinion that the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman were not adequate to the occasion, and were not such as the honour and the interests of England demanded. The people of England remembered a celebrated item moved by the right hon. Gentleman in Committee of Supply—namely, a Vote proposed by him, in a spirit of ironical finance, for the despatch of Her Majesty's Guards to Malta and back again. They never forgot and never forgave that item. They foresaw then, with an instinct of Englishmen which it is impossible to deceive, that we were about to prosecute a war in a spirit which must bring calamity and disaster upon the country. Such was the position of the right hon. Gentleman; and, therefore, the House must not be influenced by his statement of the views of the British Government at that time. He did not represent the British Government. He represented no party in this House and no party in this country. I come now to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman about Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston. It was a very responsible thing, I ventured to say, to advise the continuance of the war in 1855. But almost as responsible a thing, in my opinion, is it to impute to statesmen of great eminence, and now unfortunately departed, opinions not only which they did not hold, but which were contrary to their convictions, which contradicted their whole policy, and which would intimate that public men of the highest distinction who proposed a policy, in enforcing which the treasure of the country was expended without stint, and the most precious lives of the country were sacrificed, were laughing in their sleeves at the excitement of the nation. I would make one remark respecting those extraordinary quotations of the opinions of Lord Clarendon and Lord

Palmerston as to the neutralization of the Black Sea. Nothing can be more inconvenient and injurious to the privileges of this House than such quotations by Ministers of the private opinions of their Colleagues—and especially if those Colleagues are deceased. Why, we are so punctilious on these matters that a Minister is not even permitted to quote from a despatch without laying it upon the Table! There would be an end to all freedom and force of discussion if it were in the power of a Minister to get up and say—"You have taken such and such a view of affairs, but your facts are wrong," and thus to carry away the House by some declaration of which we had no proof whatever. Everyone must feel that we cannot be too rigid in the application of our rules on such matters; and even if the right hon. Gentleman was convinced that these were the private opinions of Lord Clarendon and of Lord Palmerston, he was not justified in referring to the private conversations of Ministers who are since dead. I am not here to vindicate the honour either of Lord Clarendon or of Lord Palmerston. There are those in this House connected with Lord Clarendon by blood, and who, moreover, resemble him in his capacity of conducting public affairs. An eminent Relative of Lord Clarendon has a seat in this House, and upon him should devolve the duty of defending the noble Earl's memory from such misstatements. Nor am I here to vindicate the honour of Lord Palmerston; but I may make one observation with regard to that distinguished man, because it may throw some little light on these painful disclosures which have agitated and surprised so many persons. We have also had it stated in "another place" that Lord Palmerston made some light observation to a diplomatist who spoke to him on the subject of our policy with regard to the Black Sea. Now, everyone who knew Lord Palmerston well knew this of him—that with a smiling countenance he often evaded inconvenient discussions on serious affairs. Lord Palmerston was a man who, when most serious, availed himself very often of the weapon of banter, and not merely the diplomatist in question—and I do not seek to inquire who he is—but many diplomatists, if they would only acknowledge it, would confess that when they have wearied Lord Palmerston with their grave assiduity, or have attempted to pump Lord Palmerston with their practised adroitness, he has often unsheathed his glittering foil and has soon disarmed and disabled inconvenient opponents. Lord Palmerston was a master of banter and disliked discussion of grave matters when not in his Cabinet or in this House. But I cannot refrain from recording my solemn conviction that the policy of Lord Palmerston with respect to maintaining the neutrality of the Black Sea never wavered for a moment, and that nothing but securing that great condition of the Treaty of Paris would have reconciled him to the comparative leniency of the other terms.

Now, Sir, I hope I have vindicated myself from the charge that I was not authorized in the description which I gave the first night of the Session of the importance of the neutrality of the Black Sea; that I was not justified in saying that it was the cardinal principle of the settlement of 1856; that those were the opinions of Lord Palmerston, Lord Clarendon, and Lord Russell; that they broke up the negotiations at Vienna; and that the war was renewed, or rather continued, solely with the view to maintain that condition. I think I have shown that the policy then adopted by Her Majesty's Government was the policy not only of Lord Clarendon, but that it must also have been that of Lord Granville up to a very recent period. Now, Sir, I have only one observation to make upon the Conference. Why a Conference was called is to me a matter difficult to comprehend, and I hope we shall learn clearly to-night what its object is. I think myself that, under any circumstances, a Conference would have been a mistake. But if the Conference had been called to vindicate the honour and the rights of England and of Europe, I should have thought it, though a hazardous, at least a bold and loyal course. But why a Conference should be called—a Conference which Russia did not require—for Russia only really initiated an abstract outrage of public morality, and only theoretically violated a treaty, and, therefore, it was quite unnecessary to do anything, even if you felt you were not prepared to resist her when she put her policy into practice—I say why, under such circumstances, a Conference should be called merely to register the humiliation of our country passes my understanding. But there was one declaration made by the Secretary of State which may, perhaps, have some light thrown upon it by that consummate master of language who has several times contradicted me in the course of this speech, and who will very likely follow the same course when he rises on his legs. The declaration was made by a Secretary of State who was at one time ready to go to war with or without allies, but whose policy changes in a moment, and the policy being changed, a satisfactory and plausible reason is offered to the British people. The Conference is to be held, but on this understanding—there is to be no foregone conclusion on the subject. That statement was generally accepted. What was the weight and value of that condition I will not now attempt to ascertain; but, at any rate, it meant something. If it was not to influence events, still there was a semblance of dignity about it. And now, if the Conference was to be held without any foregone conclusion by any of the Powers upon the question of the neutrality of the Black Sea, I want to know how the right hon. Gentleman reconciles that position with the statement which he made the first night that Parliament met, in which he proved that there was a foregone conclusion—a foregone conclusion in the mind of the Prime Minister, and that, a foregone conclusion against the honour and interests of this country?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in the remarks which the right hon. Gentleman so studiously announced as intended to be very few and very brief, his anxiety for brevity in the course of his hour's speech led him to refer to two subjects outside the circle of discussion. One of those was—and I am sorry to be compelled to follow the irregularity of the right hon. Gentleman in referring to it—a Notice given by my noble Friend near me (the Marquess of Hartington), that on Monday next he would move for an inquiry into a dangerous conspiracy existing in a certain spot in Ireland, and I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman's regard not merely for the ordinary propriety of this House, but for the principles which govern public order—and which it is necessary to observe for the security of life and property—would have led him to refrain from an illusion intended to prejudice the Motion of my noble Friend near me on a subject of gravity so extreme. The right hon. Gentleman is the judge—I make my protest against that reference. The right hon. Gentleman then referred to a subject of much slighter moment, and condescended to taunt me with having told Sir Spencer Robinson that if his Minute were dated on the day after his resignation of the Lordship of the Admiralty it would remove all formal difficulty as to its production. Why does the right hon. Gentleman condescend and stoop to take up this paltry and contemptible accusation? [“Oh!”] Hon. Members opposite cry “Oh!” [“Hear, hear!”] I see the hon. Member for Stamford. [Sir JOHN HAY: Hear, hear.] Yes, very good. Well, if not contemptible, it is a most grave accusation, and I challenge the hon. and gallant Gentleman to put this accusation into words and make it the subject of a Motion. There is nothing I would desire better, as far as I myself am concerned; and if the House thinks fit that it should be discussed, by all means let it be brought to an issue. Sir, I now come to the main subject—which is a more important subject—of the right hon. Gentleman’s remarks. The right hon. Gentleman has studiously confounded in the course of his speech matters which are entirely and absolutely disconnected. In the first place, he says I denied that the subject of the neutralization of the Black Sea was of vital importance in the Treaty of 1856. Sir, what I did was this—I challenged the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that it was not only of vital but of exclusive importance—and by exclusive importance I mean paramount and central, such as he has described it to night. Now, Sir, that I hold to be totally untrue. The great object of the negotiations, and the great object of the peace, was to put an end to that system of interference in the affairs of the Turkish Empire, grounded on real or alleged treaty rights, which enabled Russia at her will, through the medium of Turkey, to disturb the peace of Europe. Russia had those rights in a pacific form in the Principalities; she likewise had them, or was supposed to have them, with regard to the Christian subjects of the Porte; and it was the power of thus interfering between Turkey and her subjects which gave to Russia her standing ground in the Ottoman Empire; and it was at the total abolition of that system that the war and the negotiations were aimed. Therefore, when I spoke of the neutralization of the Black Sea, and objected to the extravagant statement of the right hon. Gentleman, this subject was totally overlooked and passed by, and this power of interference on the part of Russia in the internal affairs of the Ottoman Empire was treated as a matter of no account. I never denied that, even in my own opinion, and much more in the opinion of the British nation and Government, the matter was one of great importance at that time. “But,” says the right hon. Gentleman, “it has been the policy of the British Government to treat this question of neutralization as a question which formed the whole pith and substance of the Treaty of 1856; and so it was until the 22nd of November; but on the 22nd of November we find, from the course that was taken, so different from what the language of Sir Andrew Buchanan led us to expect, and from the course taken with respect to Mr. Odo Russell, that the importance of neutralization was forgotten, the policy of the Government was reversed, and the honour of the country was compromised.” The right hon. Gentleman—I have no doubt without any intention—has entirely misrepresented the sentiments of Sir Andrew Buchanan. He has given it to be understood that the alarm of Sir Andrew Buchanan, the pointed representations which he made to the Russian Government, and the apprehensions which he expressed that he would have to send for his passports, turned upon this—that there was a question as to the neutralization of the Black Sea. Sir Andrew Buchanan never used one of these words with respect to the question of the mere policy of the neutralization of the Black Sea. The language of Sir Andrew Buchanan had reference to the Note of Prince Gortchakoff; the intimations which Sir Andrew Buchanan threw out were intimations which left perfectly open the question of the neutralization of the Black Sea, and had exclusive reference to the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, involving the principle that a single Power, having been bound by its signature to a treaty, had a right, at its own option, to release itself from this obligation. And it is impossible to conceive a more gross misconception, a more absolute misapprehension, a more pointed misapplication than the right hon. Gentleman has made in his speech, founded upon my speech of a fortnight back, and carefully hatched during that fortnight. What is the page of the despatch? [Mr. DISRAELI: Page 45.] No; it is page 13. The right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented the meaning of Sir Andrew Buchanan. I did not think he would have been so consistent as to misstate even the page of the despatch. Sir Andrew Buchanan says—

“ I regret to say that I have reason to believe the Russian Government have decided to open the question of the Treaty of 1856 in a way which may prove embarrassing to Her Majesty's Government. I have long foreseen that a proposal on the part of Russia for the revision of the Treaty would not be long delayed, and I have frequently expressed this opinion to your Lordship and to the late Earl of Clarendon. I confess, however, that I was not prepared for the manner in which, if the report which has reached me be authentic, it is proposed to carry out this intention.”—[Correspondence, No. 16.]

He then goes on to describe his expectations that despatches either had been, or would be immediately, forwarded to the great Courts of Europe, communicating to them that Russia would not acknowledge hereafter the obligations she had contracted under the Treaty of 1856. It was upon these expressions that Sir Andrew Buchanan founded his intimation that he expected he would have to send for his passports; and it is upon that passage that the right hon. Gentleman leads the House to believe that this intimation was founded upon the sense which we entertained of the value and importance of the neutralization of the Black Sea. So much for Sir Andrew Buchanan. I do not think we shall hear much more on that subject. [“Oh!”] We shall see. I now come to Mr. Odo Russell. And there, again, I must complain that the right hon. Gentleman made an uncandid and most inaccurate reference to my language. The question was put to me—I am speaking from memory of what occurred—the question was put to me, as I understood it, whether Mr. Odo Russell made a particular statement by the authority of Her Majesty's Government—that is, by the direct authority or instruction of Her Majesty's Government. I answered that I imputed no blame whatever to Mr. Odo Russell for the statement, but that he did not make it by the authority or instruction of the Government. And then the right hon. Gentleman comes down and says that I declared that the statement was not justified. I never said anything about its being justified; but the right hon. Gentleman chose a word insinuating a meaning that he did not think fit openly to express. I will now call the attention of the House to what Mr. Odo Russell says, and will point out that again the right hon. Gentleman has studiously employed the very same artifice. The language of Mr. Odo Russell has been handled in the same way as the language which Sir Andrew Buchanan used with reference not to the neutralization of the Black Sea, but exclusively to the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, and the principles which that Note asserted—twisted by the right hon. Gentleman into a reference merely to the neutralization of the Black Sea. Here are the words of Mr. Odo Russell. Now we have got to page 45—

“ The Chancellor authorized me to telegraph to London that if your Lordship consented he would willingly take the initiative ”—

I beg the House to follow me closely—

“ of proposing a Conference for the purpose of endeavouring to find a pacific solution to a question which I had frankly proved to him was of a nature in its present state to compel us, with or without allies, to go to war with Russia.”—[Correspondence, No. 76.]

I am bound to say in construing this sentence, and exercising the same liberty of opinion which every Gentleman who hears me is at liberty to use, that these words appear to me not to be the words of Mr. Odo Russell himself—this is not a vital point of the case—but I conceive that Mr. Odo Russell is reciting words which Count Bismarck had used. [“ Oh ! ”] I will read them again, that hon. Gentlemen may see if I am right—

“ He authorized me to telegraph to London that if your Lordship consented he would willingly take the initiative of proposing a Conference for the purpose of endeavouring to find a pacific solution to a question which I had frankly proved to him was of a nature in its present state to compel us, with or without allies, to go to war with Russia.”

That I understand to have been the language of Count Bismarck, repeated by Mr. Odo Russell. [“ Oh ! ”] I should be glad if hon. Gentlemen had this book before them, in order that they might observe whether I am right or wrong. But about that I am comparatively indifferent—what I want to point out is that Mr. Odo Russell never conveyed upon any construction of these words—or that Count Bismarck, if the words were his, as I believe they were, never implied—that the question of the neutralization of the Black Sea was a matter which would compel us to go to war with or without allies. What becomes, then, of the pretended policy which, according to the right hon. Gentleman, remained fixed until the 22nd of November, and then dissolved like an airy vision? Whether the language were that of Mr. Odo Russell—which I do not think it was—or that of Count Bismarck, what was said was this—that the question was of a nature in its present state to compel us to go to war. What was “the present state” of the question? One in which a solemn State Paper was before us, emanating from the Russian Chancery, and in our opinion maintaining and asserting, on the part of Russia, a right to liberate herself from one or all of her treaty engagements; and that was the principle, and not the neutralization of the Black Sea, which Count Bismarck judged was one that would compel us, with or without allies, to go to war. Well, you may say, why did we not correct Count Bismarck? If Count Bismarck had spoken with regard to the neutralization of the Black Sea, there might have been some necessity for such a course; but, while he kept to the Note of Prince Gortchakoff, it would have been very wrong in us to give instructions for any such purpose to Mr. Odo Russell. We never said that the policy involved in the Note of Prince Gortchakoff was not a matter that might lead to difficulties between the two countries—even, possibly, eventuating in war. We never said that it would; but we never compromised our own liberty on the subject. And that, I say, was the wise and rational course to take, although it has laid us open to the ungenerous and torturing process of language practised by the right hon. Gentleman, who has endeavoured to show that we were speaking of neutralization when our words had reference to the “present state of the question,” and the present state of the question alone—in which we had before us a Russian document that appeared to us—rightly or wrongly is not now the question—to assert, on the part of Russia, a right and

intention to release herself, at her own mere will, from any treaty obligations whatsoever. I hope I have shown that these two great pillars of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the policy which we maintained up to the 22nd of November have entirely crumbled away. He has furnished no foundation whatever for the policy which he attributes to us. What our policy was with reference to neutralization I will now proceed to state, but a little more carefully, in combination with the retrospection of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the language which I used a fortnight ago; he has examined it at great length, and with the advantage of collateral lights thrown upon it by discussions reported to have occurred “elsewhere,” which he has brought in aid of his own ingenuity. The right hon. Gentleman has anatomized the language which I used on that occasion. I will go over the points to which he has referred. The right hon. Gentleman has said that I misled the House by causing it to suppose that I was a Member of the Government in the year 1856. Now, it is not altogether pleasant to have imputed to oneself accusations which imply a degree of childishness and a degree of ignorance unworthy of the lowest boy in a National School. The right hon. Gentleman, having studied a report of my speech in the newspapers, thinks it worth his while to state that I implied to the House that I was a Member of the Government in 1856. Now, Sir, I refer confidently to what I did state, and I affirm that, in addition to the words reported in the newspaper, I used on the 9th of February preparatory words, carefully distinguishing between what referred to the Government and what referred to my own personal position. Before I went to the graver part of the case, I said that even as respected myself there was a personal difficulty—namely, that in 1856 I had objected to the neutralization of the Black Sea. Therefore, I do not require the obliging reminder of the right hon. Gentleman that I then had no following, that I was not in the Government, that I sat in an undistinguished post, and was the most unpopular man in the country. All I know is that I was trying to do my duty, and I do not care a pin whether I, or the right hon. Gentleman, or anybody else was the most unpopular man in the country. It may fairly be asked—"Why did you indulge in egotism—why did you quote your own insignificant words in 1856?" My reason was this—Although they were the words of a person who at that time had no official responsibility, yet they had been quoted and printed in St. Petersburg during the present year as words very convenient to be used by the Russian Government in its negotiations with the Government now in Office. That is my apology for having referred to myself. Then comes the question of my conduct as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and my insufficient proposal with regard to the Russian War of sending the Guards, or a certain number of men, to Malta and bringing them back again. Has the right hon. Gentleman looked at dates, and does he know whether that was done in the war or not? Not having the power of reference at the present moment, I cannot be certain; but, to the best of my recollection, it was a very early and preparatory measure taken by us, and had no connection with those operations into which the war subsequently developed. What is the nature of the charge made by the right hon. Gentleman? He seems to be so ill-acquainted with the relations of Cabinets in which he has often sat, that he thinks it is in the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this country, after the country has entered into an European war, to limit its cost and fix its scale. Such a charge to be made by the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly absurd. Surely any man who has learnt his A B C in political matters must know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he had the power of doing such a thing as that, would not be Chancellor of the Exchequer alone, but would absorb in himself the entire power of the Government, while the rest of the Cabinet would be reduced to mere ciphers. I am sorry to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this country has not power enough when war breaks out. When a war breaks out in Germany, the old principle of parsimony and good thrift is not forgotten, and in the wars of Napoleon every franc which was spent had been as carefully considered as if it had formed part of a grant to the Louvre Gallery. In this country, however, the case is different, and from the moment war is contemplated, the Chancellor of the Exchequer becomes a cipher. His responsibility and his control, which are real in time of peace, are entirely absorbed, and the whole of his mind is directed towards providing Ways and Means for carrying out the plans framed by others, and in respect to which he can only give his opinion, like any other Member of the Cabinet. As regards war expenditure, I do not know whether it is to the interest of the right hon. Gentleman to provoke discussion on that subject, but if he chooses to return to it another night, I shall be most happy to follow him. The right hon. Gentleman enlarged on the subject of Lord Clarendon and Lord Palmerston, and the iniquity of my referring to their real or supposed opinions. The right hon. Gentleman is loud in their praise. How generous he is in his praises of the dead! I have heard him eulogize the late Sir Robert Peel and many others who have passed away, and I cannot but think it would be as well, if with that liberality for the dead, he mingled a little equity for the living. The right hon. Gentleman has treated this matter as if I had professed to give accurate information. In point of fact, I was careful to state that I spoke on indirect information; but I take the first opportunity of stating that though, from the character and position of the person who principally informed me about Lord Clarendon, I thought I was justified in mentioning what I did mention, I now have reason to believe that that information was erroneous, and I have no intention of saying anything about Lord Clarendon and the neutralization of the Black Sea. With regard to Lord Palmerston, however, the question stands differently. The right hon. Gentleman speaks as if I had made some imputation on Lord Palmerston. He objects to my referring to anything that Lord Palmerston said or did which is not recorded in an official document; and next he regards it as an imputation on the character of Lord Palmerston, to say he looked on the neutralization of the Black Sea as being of temporary rather than of permanent value. With regard to the first of these objections, I want to know on what principle the right hon. Gentleman can show that it is an offence against our cardinal rules to mention something I have heard related in regard to what is matter of history—namely, the opinion of Lord Palmerston.

Why, the right hon. Gentleman himself, in his speech delivered on the very same evening, entertained the House for a quarter of an hour with a statement—void, as I believe, of the slightest foundation—of what he had heard and what he had gathered with respect to a tour of Lord Clarendon on the Continent, and all manner of political plans and schemes then arranged between him and the Ministers of Foreign States. With regard to the alleged imputation, was it an imputation on Lord Palmerston? My proposition was that Lord Palmerston—and I asserted it as a fact not actually known, but rationally believed—looked on the neutralization of the Black Sea, not as a thing insignificant, not as a thing unimportant, but as a provisional arrangement, which could not be permanently maintained. That was the whole of my argument. I never said the neutralization of the Black Sea was not important in the view of the Government; I never even denied it was important in my own view, though I thought the difficulties of maintaining it so formidable that they might in time become insurmountable. Lord Palmerston took the just and rational view that, for a time, the neutralization of the Black Sea could be maintained, and that, if it were maintained for a time, Turkey would be afforded that opportunity of effecting internal reforms and improving her organization, on the right use of which the possibility of her maintaining her place among the Powers must ultimately and substantially depend. Now, with respect to the right hon. Gentleman's references to my language, I may remark that it was used in reply to him; and those who think it was wrong in me to accumulate evidence on the subject of the neutralization of the Black Sea should consider what charges had been made against the Government on the first night of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman said—adopted by Her Majesty's Government. The plan of a Conference on the Treaty of 1856 which France could not attend was not politic, and the inability of France to take part in it was alone a sufficient reason in refusing to listen to any such project.”

The right hon. Gentleman had condemned our policy. He had said—“You ought not to have had a Conference; you should have intimated to Russia that she must take the consequences of the step she has unhappily been induced to adopt.” In other words, with one great quarrel and controversy raging in Europe, in the midst of blood and fire, the right hon. Gentleman would have recommended us to keep open another, and not to take any means to arrive at an amicable solution of the question. We were to say—“No, we will not negotiate; we will stand on our treaty rights, and refuse all modification of them; and if you act in the way you point out you must take the consequences.” This is what the right hon. Gentleman recommended. This is the sort of policy by which he seeks to maintain the honour of England. He recommended that at a moment when France was prostrate—when it was known that France had long ago expressed her willingness to modify the Treaty of 1856 with regard to the neutralization of the Black Sea—when Austria had actually taken the initiative in proposing some years ago the abrogation of that part of the Treaty—and when Russia had made known to us that she would not abide by the Treaty as it stood. The wisdom, the policy, and the resources of the right hon. Gentleman suggest to him nothing more than this in such a state of European sentiment and feeling. When Russia uttered this announcement, we should have merely said—“Very well, you must take the consequences;” thereby at once placing ourselves in a position of estrangement from that important Power at a time when we thought we had one most sacred duty to discharge—namely, to keep together, if possible, in harmony and co-operation, the neutral influences of Europe, in the hope, that in some happy moment we might be able to contract that range of misery and destruction which we had long seen extending. And then, Sir, he is sad and melancholy about the honour of his country, and he thinks there was a foregone conclusion when the Conference was held. Certainly there was a foregone conclusion to the extent that I stated on February 9th, and to the extent that had been stated in the gracious Speech from the Throne; a foregone conclusion to this extent—that it was hoped that the principles of public right and the general policy of the Treaty would be upheld, and that the Powers would co-operate cordially in the revision of some of its conditions in a fair and cordial spirit, and would accept the results of that revision. The right hon. Gentleman asks—“What is the object of the Conference?” I would rather have said nothing about the Conference, which we might have discussed with very much greater advantage possibly in the course of a few days, now that we have, I am happy to say, a French Ambassador in London, and there is a prospect of peace being restored; but as the Conference has been dragged into debate, I will say that the object of the Conference is to receive, in a manner compatible with, and conformable to, public international law, the representations that Russia may have to make; to give to those representations a fair, candid, and friendly hearing; and to consider, renovate, and, if need be, fortify any of the other provisions of the Treaty of 1856 against which it may be found by the Conference any reasonable objection can be raised. Now, Sir, I believe I have met the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman, though, I am afraid, not in a manner satisfactory to him. I need not go back upon his recital of the Four Points, and the different matters which, I have no doubt, are to be found in the Annual Register of that day, of which he gave us a copious, interesting, and, I have no doubt, an accurate account; but with regard to the fundamental fallacy that ran through the whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, his continually representing the question of public law raised by the despatch of Prince Gortchakoff as being simply the question of the policy of the neutralization of the Black Sea, and with regard to the intentions of the British Government, I trust I have succeeded in showing the House there is not the slightest shadow of foundation for the charges he has made.

ALLEGED CONGRATULATORY MESSAGES TO THE CROWN PRINCE OF GERMANY.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE: I wish to put the Question to the head of Her Majesty's Government, which I previously addressed to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs—namely, Whether the statement in the “Daily Telegraph” is correct—viz., that Captain Hozier has been charged with messages to the Crown Prince of Germany from Her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Cambridge, of congratulation upon the successes won by his army?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I cannot answer the Question without expressing my very deep regret that such matters as the personal communications between august persons nearly related in blood, and, of course, feeling that relationship the more closely from the painful and dreadful circumstances of the day, should become the subject of scrutiny in this House. I even venture to hope that there may be some caution exercised in the Press with regard to the printing of matters of that description, unless after the greatest care to ascertain the accuracy of what is printed. I know not whether I should make an appeal to my hon. Friend himself, if I say I am very sorry such a Question should be put in the House of Commons—which, indeed, I am. Still, my hon. Friend might reply that this statement has been published, and as it has been published, and may do mischief, it is well that an opportunity of contradiction should be afforded. At the same time, there are limits to the doctrine which I sometimes see adopted by the Press—that any gentleman who is charged with something criminal and disgraceful ought to be very much obliged to those who print it, because it gives him an opportunity of contradicting it. I can only express a hope, with regard to those exalted personages who have not the same powers of self-defence that we employ, that great caution will be used in the publication of matters of this kind. When I saw this Question, I doubted whether the House would wish to have such a subject dragged within its sphere unnecessarily, and it was for some time a doubtful matter with me whether we ought to take cognizance of the Question. However, upon the whole, as it would give me the opportunity of expressing a respectful, but very earnest hope that such things will not come up again, I thought I had better make a full answer to my hon. Friend. When I read the paragraph referred to, I had the fullest conviction that there was no foundation for the implication—rather than information—conveyed in it—namely, that anything had passed between Her Majesty, or between the other exalted personages mentioned, and any of those at the head of the German Army, of a nature in any degree to compromise the character of this country, or to go outside of what lies strictly within a neutral's duty; and upon making examination into the matter, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying I feel myself authorized to say that the inference or assertion, be it what it may, that congratulations have been conveyed, or any message or communication has been conveyed, of a nature to imply the taking of sides in this war—for that is the point of my hon. Friend's Question—is totally and absolutely void of foundation. Do not let it be supposed that in saying this I make any imputation upon anybody; I make none. There is a little game which is sometimes played when eight or ten people are sitting round a country fireside, and having nothing else to do. One sets the ball rolling by telling a little anecdote to the friend next him, and who keeps the game alive by narrating it to the next, who passes on the tale to his next friend, and so on until it has gone round the circle from one to another, and returned to the one who began the game, who then tells out aloud what he has just heard from his last neighbour, when it invariably falls out that the story in the process has lost all resemblance whatever to the form in which it was originally given; and I believe that is something like what has happened in this case. That Captain Hozier is a gentleman of discretion and ability I am confident; he was entrusted with the duty of conveying certain messages to persons in exalted situations; they, gratified by the kindly expressions of feeling they had received, communicated them to persons of their own rank, and they to others nearly as exalted; thence they filtered down to aides-de-camp, then became the subject of conversation in the Army, and from that source they were picked by Special Correspondents, anxious to cater for the English public, and well versed in that sort of innocent cookery which gives additional interest to statements of this kind. The message sent by Her Majesty requires to be no matter of secrecy at all. It was simply to say everything kind to the Emperor, the Crown Prince, and the persons with whom she was related; everything kind, that is, from friend to friend, from relative to relative, with respect to their condition of health, after the trying scenes they had been going through, and with no regard whatever to the political interests of the war which has been carried on. I will not weary hon. Members by going more or less into details with regard to the other illustrious personages—the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge; but I will assure them, in the same way, of my entire conviction that there was not a word sent from them which could by possibility be supposed by any fair person to convey opinions upon the war. Indeed, I am not able to make out that anything was said relating to military matters in any way or form whatever. I am sure my hon. Friend will be as satisfied as anyone at receiving this answer; but I hope the matter will be duly weighed, and I trust we shall not be subjected to a repetition of such Questions.

MR. GRANT DUFF*: When I addressed the Committee upon the financial position of India in August last, my Statement was founded upon three documents—upon the Actual Accounts of the year ending the 31st March, 1869; upon the Approximate Accounts of the year ending the 31st March, 1870, technically described as the Regular Estimate; and upon the calculations and conjectures of the Governor General and his Council for the year now passing over us, the year ending the 31st of March, 1871.

On this occasion I must base my Statement upon two documents only, as anything corresponding to the third document which I used last year does not yet exist—that is to say, I must base it on the Actual Accounts for the year ending the 31st March, 1870, and on a telegraphic summary of the Approximate Accounts for the year now passing over us, so far as they were known to the Viceroy and his Council on the 21st February—that is, last Tuesday—an abstract, in other words, of the Regular Estimate for the year 1870-1, which will, after undergoing, perhaps, some correction, be laid before Parliament, according to law, in the month of May. Hon. Members will be good enough to observe, that this abstract gives the figures in round numbers.

I am all the more glad to make the Indian Financial Statement at the beginning rather than at the end of the Session, because I have not to be now, as I was on the 3rd of August, 1869, and on the 5th of August, 1870, a Job's messenger. On the first of these occasions, I had to announce that the Actual Accounts of 1867-8 showed that India was about £1,000,000 to the bad; and, on the second occasion, I had to announce that India was nearly £2,800,000 to the bad. Now, however, I have to announce that India was, in the year ending on the 31st March last, nearly £120,000 to the good, and that, so far as the information which we have received up to the present moment extends, but making all the reserves necessary, there is every probability of her being, in the financial year now drawing to a close, fully three-quarters of a million to the good. In short, we have reason to believe that we shall this year have almost, or altogether, the surplus which we think we ought to have, and for which the Secretary of State has laid down that the Governor General and his Council ought to arrange—that is a surplus of between half a million and a million.

The Regular Estimate for 1869-70, which was presented to Parliament in May last, showed an estimated excess of expenditure over income, excluding, of course, public works extraordinary, of £563,495. The Actual Accounts show an excess of income over expenditure of £118,669. The result shown by the Actual Accounts is, therefore, more favourable than the Regular Estimate by £682,164. It will be in the recollection of some Members of the Committee, that I prepared them for this agreeable result by communicating to them the substance of the information which we had received from India by telegraph up to the 16th of July—that is, up to a date three months and a half later than the day on which Sir Richard Temple made his Budget Statement, the 2nd of April, 1870. On the 5th of August I used the following words—

“We have assurances that the Actuals will turn out better than Sir Richard Temple believed when he made his Budget Statement. The substance of the information telegraphed by the Viceroy on the 18th of July was that the accounts of 1869-70, adjusted up to 16th July, were better than Sir Richard Temple expected on 2nd April by about £700,000, so that we may expect, as at present advised, a small surplus, or at least an equilibrium, thanks to the prompt and decisive action which was taken in the autumn of last year by the Viceroy and his Council assembled at Simla.”

It is satisfactory to observe that almost every head of receipt has been a little more productive than was anticipated. I will not burden my Statement with the figures, but hon. Gentlemen will see them by looking at the Papers which they have in their hands.

So much for the comparison of the Actuals of last year with the Regular Estimate. Let us now look at the figures of the Actuals of 1869-70 as compared with those of 1868-9. These two will be found comforting from various points of view. First, let us look at the total receipts. The total receipts of last year exceeded the total receipts of the year before by no less than £1,638,390. Then let us see how this increased receipt was made up. £1,161,848 came from land revenue, the most important, the oldest, and the most satisfactory of all our sources of income. This increase is largely attributable to the fact that the land revenue of the year 1868-9 was, as I mentioned six months ago, unusually depressed by a bad season in Madras and the North-West Provinces, and to the coming into play in 1869-70 of a new settlement in Oude, and a re-settlement in some of the non-regulation Provinces of Bengal. The increase of about £600,000 under assessed taxes arose from the income tax, which it will be remembered was augmented in the second half of the year 1869-70 from 1 to 2 per cent. The increase of £300,000 under salt arose from the fact that the salt duties in Madras and Bombay were also raised during the last half of the year 1869-70 from 1 rupee 8 annas to 1 rupee 13 annas per maund—that is by $7\frac{1}{2}$ on 82 lbs. These are the increases of gross receipt which it is most important to notice. On the other hand, there were some important decreases of gross receipt. For instance, customs in the year 1869-70 brought in less than they did in the year 1868-9 by over £263,000, thanks to the generally depressed state of Indian trade. Opium, again, brought less in last year than it did the year before by about £500,000. The general result, however, was, as I have said, highly comforting. Our Revenue was better in 1869-70 than it was in the year before by £1,638,390, and hon. Members may possibly recollect that the receipts of 1868-9 were themselves better than those of 1867-8 by £728,000.

Now let us look at the Expenditure. The Expenditure in 1869-70 was less than the Expenditure in 1868-9 by £1,254,309. This result was arrived at chiefly by a very large reduction in public works ordinary—that is to say, works of comfort and convenience not directly remunerative. A small but important saving in India of £160,000 was obtained by a diminished Army expenditure; and the charge for guaranteed interest on railway capital, less net traffic receipts, was £153,406 lower than that of the previous year, thanks to the large increase in the net traffic receipts during the year 1869-70, an increase which amounted to nearly £400,000. On the other hand, there were some considerable increases in gross expenditure in India, of which perhaps the most worth mentioning were £72,000 under post office, £143,000 under marine charges, owing to the debts of the Port Canning and Calcutta Port Funds having been written off as irrecoverable, and £235,000 from the loss by exchange on bills on India. As I have said, however, the total diminution of expenditure in India and England chargeable against income in 1869-70, as compared with the previous year, was £1,254,309.

Such are the more noticeable features in the receipts and disbursements of the year 1869-70.

I come now to the year 1870-1, the year just drawing to a close. The one great fact of the year, which is already certain, is that opium has come to the rescue. When Sir Richard Temple made his Statement in April last, nothing could be much more gloomy than the prospect of the opium revenue for the financial year which had just begun, and although in the month of August I was able to say that the prospect was somewhat better, yet even then we felt anything but comfortable about the ultimate result. From almost all quarters came prophecies of evil, and the prophecies from China were the gloomiest of all. The very able man who lately represented Her Majesty at Peking even went to Calcutta to confer with the Governor General about the increased growth of the poppy in China. Owing to some cause, however, which we cannot in the least divine, all anticipations have been for this year falsified. Sir Richard Temple took the price of the chest of Bengal opium for the year at 975 rupees, whereas the average by our latest advices has been 1,113 rupees. This is another illustration of the truth that, after an intercourse of some hundred years, Europe really knows very, very little indeed, about the circumstances of China—that marvellous country, one of whose functions seems to be to force the nations of the West again and again and again to re-consider generalizations, in religion, in politics, and in social economy. In spite, however, of the favourable results of this year, I dare not venture to unsay anything I have said about the extreme care with which we should watch our opium revenue. Considering the enormous extent of country, even in Asia alone, where the poppy can be grown with fair success, it is really almost too much to hope that the Indian drug will continue to be so distinctly preferred by those who can buy it, as to enable us to lighten by many millions every year the price which India pays for civilized government; for whatever some Gentlemen may have to say against the opium revenue, let them never forget that hardly any of it comes out of the pocket of our Indian fellow-subjects, and if it were done away with, India would not be lightened of an impost, but robbed of a splendid estate.

To return, however, to the telegraphic summary of the Regular Estimate for the year 1870-1, which hon. Members have in their hands. In round numbers, the Regular Estimate for that year—that is, the Estimate founded on about eight months' Actuals and four months calculations and conjectures—shows that India's income for this year will be about £51,000,000, and her Expenditure, including no less than £1,800,000 for guaranteed interest on railway capital, will be somewhere about £50,000,000, the probable result being accordingly a surplus of nearly £1,000,000. Hon. Members may be surprised that I do not say more about this year 1870-1, but I do not dwell upon it, advisedly, because we have given them all the information we possess ourselves, and have in fact, fallen under the curse of Voltaire—"Woe unto him who says all he knows upon any subject." We see the figures, we can form conjectures about them, but the usual explanations of details we cannot give. There are disadvantages and difficulties in corresponding by telegraph about the affairs of an Empire.

The Committee will, I hope, do us the justice to remember that we are making this Statement at a time anything but convenient to us, under the impression forced upon us by an experience of many years, that Parliament will only give up a whole night to India, I mean, of course, in perfectly peaceful and easy times, either at the very beginning or at the very end of a Session. We should like to make our Financial Statement each year somewhere about the 15th or 20th of June; but when we have made a feeble effort in that direction, all Governments of all parties have always treated us as amiable children who asked for the moon.

Such, then, are the facts of the year that is completed, and the probabilities, so far as they are known to us, of the year which is now in progress. As to the year to come, I can say little, because we have not yet received, and cannot for some time receive, the plans of the Government of India for meeting the outgoings of 1871-2. There are two points, however, as to which I am in a position to make some explanations. First, there is the income tax of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or, say, $7\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the pound. To that income tax the Home Government consented with considerable reluctance, and I am glad to say that, unless some very unforeseen and quite extraordinary emergency arises, in the next few weeks, it will certainly be reduced. It can be shown, no doubt, that, even at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the income tax hardly redresses the balance of taxation as between the higher and the lower classes. In India the poor man certainly pays quite enough, and the rich man as certainly pays too little, but, unhappily, the masses are still not sufficiently educated to know their true interests. The classes affected by the income tax are the classes who can make themselves heard not only by the Government, but by the people; and it would not be difficult to bring evidence to show that this very income tax, which, if it could be used as we use it in England, might enable us to adjust the burden of taxation with almost scientific accuracy—is really unpopular to some extent with the very classes whose burdens it lightens. Populus vult decipi, and as usual it obtains its wish; nor must it be forgotten that the income tax has been sometimes used by unscrupulous Native collectors as an engine for the oppression of their own countrymen. The Native in power is too often, in ours as in all previous ages of Indian history, apt to use his position for his own pecuniary advantage.

The other matter on which I am in a position to give some explanation is the long discussed question of financial decentralization. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that I dwelt upon that last August as upon an expedient which ought to be tried. Well, we are going to try it. The proposal to which the Secretary of State in Council has given his sanction will be best explained by reading an extract from a Resolution of the Government of India, dated December 14th, 1870—

"The Governor General in Council is satisfied that it is desirable to enlarge the powers and responsibilities of the Governments of Presidencies and Provinces in respect to the public expenditure in some of the Civil Departments. Under the present system these Governments have little liberty, and but few motives for economy in their expenditure; it lies with the Government of India to control the growth of charges to meet which it has to raise the revenue. The local Governments are deeply interested in the welfare of the people confided to their care, and not knowing the requirements of other parts of the country, or of the Empire as a whole, they are liable, in their desire for administrative progress, to allow too little weight to fiscal considerations. On the other hand, the Supreme Government, as responsible for the general financial safety, is obliged to reject many demands, in themselves deserving of all encouragement, and is not always able to distribute satisfactorily the resources actually available. Thus it happens, that the Supreme and local Governments regard from different points of view meatures involving expenditure, and the division of responsibility being ill defined, there occurs conflicts of opinion injurious to the public service. In order to avoid these conflicts, it is expedient that, as far as possible, the obligation to find the funds necessary for administrative improvement should rest upon the authority whose immediate duty it is to devise such measures. This is the more important because existing Imperial resources will not suffice for the growing wants of the country. The Supreme Government is not in a position to understand fully local requirements, nor has it the knowledge necessary for the successful development of local resources. Each Province has special wants of its own, and may have means of satisfying them which could not be appropriated for Imperial purposes. A tax adapted to the circumstances of one part of the country may be distasteful or inapplicable elsewhere, and everywhere rates may be proper for provincial or local purposes which could not be taken for the Imperial revenue."

It would have been satisfactory had his Excellency in Council been able to propose the enlargement of the power and responsibility of the local Governments, without charging upon local resources any part of the existing Imperial expenditure. This cannot be done, but it has been determined to make as small a demand upon these resources as possible. At the same time it should be remembered that the relief of the Imperial finances has been a principal object in the discussion of such measures on former occasions.

"The Government of India is accordingly pleased to make over to the Governments, under certain conditions to be presently set forth, the following Departments of the Administration, in which they may be supposed to take special interest, and to grant permanently from the Imperial Revenue for these services the sum of £4,688,711, being less by £330,801 only than the assignments made for the same services in 1870-1,—gaols, registration, police, education, medical services (except medical establishments), printing, roads, miscellaneous public improvements, and civil buildings. Unless some fiscal misfortune, such as a heavy loss in the opium revenue, or national disaster, such as war or severe famine, occurs, the Governor General in Council will maintain for the future the assignments for 'Provincial Services' at the amounts now fixed. They will not, in any case, be reduced without previous consultation with the Governments. The actual permanent Imperial assignments for 'Provincial Services' will be as follows:— £

Central Provinces	301,363
Burmah	275,352
Bengal	1,168,593
North-West Provinces	640,792
Punjab	516,321
Madras	739,488
Bombay	880,078

These amounts for works of comfort and convenience, and local purposes of many kinds, are as large as we can afford, but they are not really very large, much less extravagant. Let us see what they amount to, if we use Colonel Chesney's convenient scale of comparison with countries nearer home. Oude, which is about as large and as populous as Holland and Belgium united, will receive from the Imperial Government for its works of comfort and convenience, and other things which have more or less of a local character, an allowance of something over £200,000. The Central Provinces, which are about as large as Great Britain and Ireland, but rather sparsely populated, will receive about £260,000. Burmah, which is about three times as large as Scotland, will have about £275,000. Bengal, or say the Austrian Empire, will have nearly £1,200,000. The North-West Provinces, about equal in area to Great Britain, and more densely peopled, will have £640,000. The Punjab, or say the Kingdom of Italy, will have about £520,000. Madras, which is rather larger than Great Britain and Ireland, and about as thickly peopled as France, will have £739,000. And Bombay, which is somewhat bigger, will have £880,000. All local services and works, not directly remunerative, that cannot be paid out of these allowances, will have to be paid out of taxes raised by the authority of the local Governments within the area under their rule, and, presumably, to be benefited. I need not say that the imposition of these local taxes will be subject to regulation by the supreme authorities.

By this arrangement the Central Government will save in 1871-2, as will be apparent to the Committee, about £300,000 on the low Estimates of 1869-70, and prevent the growth of some terribly expensive items of expense. On the other hand, income tax will bring in a smaller amount, and, although there will doubtless be some reduction under various heads of Expenditure, there will be increase under others; but beyond this I can form no conjecture which would be worth laying before the Committee as to the finances of the year 1871-2. The Home Government, as has been truly said, controls, but does not direct, Indian finance, and in the nature of things, cannot do so. Of one thing, however, we may be certain, and that is, that there will be the usual difficulty in making the ends meet. "But why should there be a difficulty," some one may say, "in making the ends meet?" For many reasons, of which the two chief are—first, that we discharge the most expensive duties of sovereignty for 200,000,000 of men with a revenue derived from 150,000,000 of men; and, secondly, that we discharge the duties of sovereignty after a scientific and civilized manner, with resources which would better become an uncivilized and unscientific discharge of them. "But why should you continue to do these things?" it may be asked. To that question I reply, after the manner of my country, by putting two others. My first question is—Are the objectors really prepared to adopt the short and easy methods of ridding themselves of treaty obligations which have been sometimes put forward? My second question is—Are we to go back on our steps, and to administer India as a whole, after the old rough-and-ready unscientific system which is still excellent for certain outlying districts? In this matter, the Government occupies a middle position between two extreme views. On the one side, you have the view which was well set forth by a very distinguished Native statesman, speaking to an Anglo-Indian statesman, a year or two ago—

"You English," said this eminent person, "make a great mistake. All this improvement of the country, about which you talk so much, is mere moonshine. Leave the country alone. Instead of the immense taxation which you levy to give us roads, and canals, and railways, and schools, and improved courts of law, and what not, let these things be. Levy much smaller taxation, and, instead of spending the money on improving India, spend it in helping out the English Revenue, or anything else you please. You will be extremely popular, and your rule will continue long in the land."

The latest apostle of the diametrically opposite view is an hon. Friend of mine, whose maxim is—"Pay; for God's sake, pay, with both hands open. Borrow money right and left from all who will lend it. Do not be such purists as only to raise loans for expenditure which you believe will be directly remunerative. Raise loans for all those objects which you are satisfied will be indirectly remunerative. Increase, in short, the wealth of the country, and you will be at the same time increasing your own."

Now, to the first of these, the Native critic, the Government answers—Even if we wished to adopt your policy, English public opinion would not allow us to adopt it. Various views prevail in England as to the moral right or wrong of our original acquisition of our Indian Empire. Some think that it was forced upon us by circumstances; others, that it was a justifiable exertion of superior power; others, that it was an unjustifiable exertion of such power. Some say that our rule in India must continue as long as the world endures; that while the Native improves in arithmetical, the Englishman will improve in geometrical ratio; and that the stronger race will always be necessary to the weaker, as guide, philosopher, and friend: others hold an opposite opinion, and say that even now, in the year 1871, we should be admitting more and more the Natives of India into the higher posts of the government, with the distinct and defined intention of some day abandoning India. But all the holders of all these antagonistic opinions agree in insisting that, while we hold India, we must endeavour to improve India according to our lights.

To the second of our critics, to my hon. Friend, the Government replies—We wish we could take your sanguine view, but we do not find that the increase of the general wealth of the country shows itself anything like so rapidly in the increase of our wealth as you suppose. The great source of our income is the land revenue. That land revenue is fixed, and must be fixed, for long periods, and it is only very slowly and at distant intervals that we can increase it. India is the most conservative of countries, and no sooner do we try a new experiment for getting some increase to the resources of government than there is a shriek from some quarter or other. This year the shriek has been on account of the income tax. Another year it will be on account of another tax, and so on ad infinitum. We must disregard these clamours to a certain extent, but we dare not disregard them as much as would be necessary to carry out your views; and we should end in sheer bankruptcy and confusion, to say nothing of the moral guilt we should incur by tempting capital from England, which might be properly expended at home or elsewhere, to be, as we in our heart believe, unprofitably expended in doing things for India which should not, in our opinion, be done by capital at all, or in doing things which should one day be done by capital, but for which the country is not yet ripe. Well, but if we do not try heroic remedies for our chronic impecuniosity, like those of which I have been speaking, we are thrown back upon expedients—and expedients we have been trying one after another ever since the Mutiny. First came Mr. Wilson, keenest and most clear-headed of men, exactly the kind of man whose appointment a large party is, or was, lately clamouring for as a panacea for Indian financial evils. Well, what were Mr. Wilson's expedients? First, reduction, especially military reduction. That was excellent; but, remember, he had a military expenditure of £23,000,000 to reduce, while we have now one only of about £16,000,000. Second, an income tax; and third, revised or partially enhanced customs duties. As to the income tax, which I think a very good tax, especially in its improved and later form, it is the very central grievance which is put forward in all the complaints which we receive about the financial policy of Government; and as to the enhanced customs duties, which seem to me a less good expedient, how long did our own manufacturers allow them to continue? Then came Mr. Laing, and what is the burden of his song? It is—"No Government in Europe and no private company ever thinks of charging to current revenue such things as extraordinary public works and interest during construction on unfinished railways, &c., which in India are so charged, and create the deficit."

In other words, he maintains that there is no deficit at all. Then came Sir Charles Trevelyan. He was followed by Mr. Massey, to whose reign belong the license tax and the certificate tax, which are really only income taxes affecting portions of the population. Last of all came the crisis of September, 1869, to which belongs the sudden enhancement of the income tax and the salt duties. But the upshot of the whole, is that the principal expedients that have been hitherto tried to fill the deficit, always excepting the obvious expedient of reduction, have been three—some form of income tax, some form of revised and increased customs duties, and the enhancement of the salt duties. "But," someone may say, "this shows a great poverty of financial resource. Might you not try many other expedients? Have not many persons advised you to tax tobacco, to tax successions, to tax Native marriages?" Yes, all these expedients have been suggested to us, and have had powerful advocates; I will not commit myself against any one of them. Nothing is more possible than that, sooner or later, in Indian history one or other, or all of them, may be tried, either by the Central Government or by one or other of the local Governments in this or that part of India; but there are, certainly, a great many considerations which would have to be most carefully weighed before any one of them was adopted, and which have hitherto prevented their adoption. "But," I am told, "you are at least sure of your present sources of revenue, and these are highly expansive." Expansive they are, no doubt, but hardly highly expansive; and as to our being quite sure even of them, that I doubt too. The salt tax in some parts of India is confessedly too high, and will, sooner or later, in the exceptional districts, have to be reduced. I have again and again pointed out that under the head of opium we may have great disappointments; and the retention of the few export duties which remain to us under the head of customs must be defended rather on the ground of necessity than of principle.

Is, then, our chronic impecuniosity to be mended by saving? Yes, to some extent; but, as I have pointed out on former occasions, our margin for reduction is not, after all, enormously great. We must always have a very considerable British force. The British soldier in India is a fearfully expensive instrument, and one not likely, I fear, to become cheaper. By the last Returns we had 61,481 European officers and soldiers in India, and 133,229 Native officers and soldiers. Add these together, and it gives you about one man for every thousand of the population of British and feudatory India. That is not an overwhelming force, though it might be very rapidly raised, in the very improbable event of trouble ever assailing India from without, to be an overwhelming force. Then consider the endless auxiliary expenses which the maintenance of even this moderate force requires, and it will be understood that, though we are in the course of making reductions, neither these nor any possible civil reductions will go very far to put us at ease in our circumstances in India.

The position of the Indian financier is altogether different from that of the English one. Here you have a comparatively wealthy population. The income of the United Kingdom has, I believe, been guessed at £800,000,000 per annum. The income of British India has been guessed at £300,000,000 per annum. That gives well on to £30 per annum as the income of every person in the United Kingdom, and only £2 per annum as the income of every person in British India. Even our comparative wealth will be looked back upon by future ages as a state of semi-barbarism. But what are we to say of the state of India? How many generations must pass away before that country has arrived at even the comparative wealth of this; and how long will it be before the rulers of India can feel that they can in an emergency very largely increase the taxation? No; I am afraid we must make up our minds in India to have as much to do with our money as we can well manage. The bright side of Indian affairs will not, I fear, in any time to which we can look forward, be the purely financial one. But as long as we keep our debt within moderate limits, so as to make it absolutely certain that we can always keep faith with the public creditor, and so long as we are conscious that every year's end shows a steady advance in the civilization and well-being of the country, we must be content, I fear, to remain, as a Government, very far from rich. As I said last autumn, the Indian financier must make up his mind for many a long day to sail between Scylla and Charybdis—the Scylla of doing too little by public works and improved administration for a country, the physical and moral conditions of which require great expenditure on public works, and an administration which must be progressively costly as civilized supersede semi-barbarous ideas of polity—the Charybdis of too large a debt, damaged credit, and financial embarrassment.

I am not forgetting the various alleviations of our burdens to which I have alluded in former Statements; the fact that our debt is relatively small; the fact that we shall get rid in 1874 of a charge of about £430,000 a year on account of East India Stock; the fact that the receipts from the railways will gradually improve; the probability that the sale of waste lands will slowly grow larger; the certain, though far from rapid, increase of our land revenue; and the not unnatural expectation that the improved material prosperity of the country will enable it to consume more taxed articles; I am not, I say, forgetting these things, but, nevertheless, I should think that I was doing very wrong if I left on the mind of the Committee the impression that I thought our pecuniary prospects were couleur de rose. If, however, we look away from the mere bare question of our annual balancesheet—the question whether we have, or are likely to have, a wide margin of yearly income over yearly expenditure, and ask whether in the immediate past India has not been prospering and rapidly improving, if perhaps just a little too rapidly for her purse, the answer must be a most agreeable one.

For more than two years we have had profound peace. Since the conclusion of the Frontier Campaign in 1868, hardly a shot fired in anger can be said to have awakened the echoes of even the wild North-West, and the very last news which I have seen from that quarter—a letter written on Christmas Day by Sir Henry Durand, the distinguished Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, who met his death in so melancholy a way—was to the effect that one of the most intractable of the intractable tribes who look down upon our frontier posts from their crag castles beyond the Indus, had been showing a very marked desire for the elements of education—the three R's at least. There has been a little uneasiness at the opposite side of the Peninsula, where our people have had some annoyance from the Looshais, who form one section of that great company of barbarians who fill up the angle between our Province of Assam, and the dominions of the King of Burmah, and amongst whom there have lately been many symptoms of disquiet, the causes of which are by no means clear. Everywhere, however, except on the very uttermost fringe and outside edge of our possessions, there has been deep quiet, a fact which should not, however, be allowed for a moment to make us forget that, in that mighty Continent which we call India, there are many elements of unrest. The agitations that have disturbed several of the countries which fall within what may be called the influence of India's political attraction, have not required anything more on our part than an attitude of friendly but absolutely passive observation. The Coast of Oman has been the scene of a prolonged conflict, but the peace of the Persian Gulf has not been disturbed; and the civil conflict in Affghanistan has had no direct result upon us, except to postpone the lending of our assistance to the Persian and Affghan Governments in arriving at a friendly and permanent understanding about certain disputed questions of boundary.

I will say nothing as to what we are doing with regard to public works, irrigation, state railways, and so forth, because, the year being incomplete, I have no figures which I can properly lay before the House later than those to which I referred in my Financial Statement of the 5th of August, 1870, and to those contained in Mr. Danvers's Railway Report, which was circulated towards the end of last Session; but they have been progressing as rapidly as circumstances would permit. It is well known to the Committee that the present Viceroy has a very keen and strong interest in all matters of this kind. I may add, with reference to a caution that fell from the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) in 1869, that the attention which is being given to railways and irrigation is not making us forget the importance of harbours, and that, especially at Kurrachee, and in the Hooghly, much good work has been lately done.

In one respect fortune has conspicuously favoured us of late, for we have not, during the last two years, suffered from any of those sudden and overpowering physical disasters which so often confound human sagacity in India. Bad seasons there have been, as I have had occasion already to mention, but nothing sudden and overpowering, like the Orissa drought, or the cyclones and inundations of some former years. Against calamities of that sort man is powerless, at least, in the present state of his knowledge; but we are doing what we can to fight against preventible calamities—witness the very remarkable monograph upon cholera which has recently been published under the authority of the Government of India. Nor are there wanting agreeable indications that our efforts in the direction of sanitary reform are beginning to find favour with the Native mind. An opinion has lately been given, by very high Brahminical authority, in favour of using the water supplied to Calcutta by European agency, a fact which has been described, not unjustly, I think, in an Indian newspaper, as a real social victory.

The Trigonometrical Survey, the Topographical Survey, and the Geological Survey are progressing satisfactorily, and extending the network of our knowledge all over the peninsula.

Some want of organization having been observable in the efforts to preserve and to describe the architectural treasures of India which were set on foot in 1867, we have sent out, at the request of the Government of India, one of the most distinguished of Asiatic archæologists, General Cunningham, to give to the Archæological Survey that definitiveness of aim and regularity of procedure which seemed to be wanting; and a cognate duty, with regard to the preparation of a complete Gazetteer of India, has been intrusted to Dr. Hunter, whose book on the Annals of Rural Bengal attracted so much and such deserved attention two or three years ago.

The lamented death of Mr. Hayward, on his way to explore the Pamir Steppe, has excited great indignation and pity throughout India. Mr. Forsyth, a Government officer sent by Lord Mayo to the Court of the Ataligh-Gazee, the stronghanded Chief who rules in Eastern Turkestan, met with but moderate success in his diplomatic capacity—the ruler whom he sought being far away from his capital, warring in the north. Still Mr. Forsyth brought back a certain amount of commercial and other information, which will not be without its uses. In another part of our frontier we are anxiously looking for the day when it may be possible to re-establish a friendly commercial intercourse with Thibet, which has been too long interrupted by irrational jealousies. Still further, on the extreme north of Burmah, we are trying to foster into renewed existence the old traffic between South-Western China and the sea-board, to which an end was put, some years ago, by the Mussulman insurrection in Yunan.

The Franco-Prussian War has interrupted the training of our forest students at Nancy, but there is every reason to hope that the interruption will not continue long after the conclusion of peace.

We have not yet succeeded in getting a satisfactory machine for working up the Rhea fibre, to which I alluded last August, and the time for sending in machines on trial has been extended.

We have sent out six more cotton gardeners, and are enlarging the area of our experiments in the production of this most important article.

The sudden death of the distinguished Indian botanist, Dr. Thomas Anderson, has not prevented our continuing the arrangements, of which he had charge, for naturalizing the Ipecacuanha, to which, as I mentioned last year, in the interest of the abatement of human suffering, we attach some importance.

We are not unmindful of the hints which we have received from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield, and others, about silk, to which the Madras Government has of late been giving special attention.

As little have we failed to play into the hands of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, who wants his constituents to have facilities for giving English salt a fair chance of competing with the cheap salts of Madras and Bombay; and we are not without hope that we shall make a reasonable profit, as well as confer great benefits upon the neighbouring districts, by the manufacture of salt at the Sambhur Lake, which has been leased to us by the Princes of Jeypore and Jodhpore.

I had hoped to have been able to announce that the new Department of Revenue—Agriculture and Commerce—had begun its work, but the arrangements are not yet quite completed. The creation, however, of such a Department has been sanctioned by the Secretary of State in Council, and only matters of detail remain unsettled.

It seemed that the great war which has been raging in Europe was going to exercise a very unfavourable influence upon our trade; but the fears at first entertained have turned out to be exaggerated, though not unfounded. In a very excitable population, like that with which we have to deal in many parts of India, the occurrence of such a world-catastrophe as we have been witnessing of late must, of course, cause a great deal of what I may call political feverishness, and there have been rumours and speculations, without end, in the bazaars; but nothing has occurred in any way to excite uneasiness, and the scare at Allahabad, which was telegraphed to Europe in the autumn, and produced some momentary surprise and discomfort, turned out to be the offspring of mere delusion.

Our relations with all the Princes of India, and all the independent States around and near our borders, are perfectly friendly.

The administration of justice is steadily improving throughout the country, and there is no department of affairs for which intelligent Natives seem to show more aptitude than for this. Of these intelligent Natives more and more are coming to this country; a few to compete, sometimes very successfully, at the examinations for the covenanted Civil Service, the majority to qualify for various professions.

It is to be hoped that the death of the two Natives of India of the highest rank who ever left their country for Europe—the Rajah of Kuppoothulla, on his way hither, and the Rajah of Kholapore, who was present and took a most intelligent interest when we last discussed Indian affairs in this House, but who died on his return journey—may not prevent the resort to England of many persons whose names are as closely connected as theirs with the history of India. I am sure if they are as amiable and as sensible as the Rajah of Kholapore, whom many of us came to know, they will be welcome from considerations altogether independent of political expediency.

The extension of education amongst the higher and middle classes shows increasingly satisfactory results, and the Government has been giving very special attention of late to extending the facilities for elementary education—that potent engine for the working out of all good, as well in the East, as in the West. It is probably known to some hon. Members that India is to contribute her share to the Exhibition, which is to be opened in the month of May, at South Kensington, and, I think, that there can be little doubt that if the local authorities act in the spirit of the very sensible Memorandum which has been circulated by the Home Office at Calcutta, the educational part of that Exhibition will

“Competition with other countries in educational appliances is,” it has been truly said, “not our object. To this we cannot hope to attain; but we can offer an illustration of a rise and progress in education such as no other country can offer; an illustration of the task which a European Government has to perform when, with limited resources, and in opposition to deep-rooted prejudices and irrational suspicion, it attempts to introduce and carry out over an enormous area, containing a vast variety of nations and tribes speaking languages or dialects, many of which have hardly yet been systematised in writing, those views upon popular education which have guided the civilized countries of Europe and America.”

India is also to send many contributions to the part of the Exhibition which is to be devoted to the illustration of what the world can now do in textile fabrics, and various other branches of manufacture. And in connection with this, I will venture to ask, whether it would not be extremely desirable, alike for the encouragement of manufactures in India, and for the education of taste at home, if some systematic attempt were made by persons of capital in this country to open in London a dépôt, on something like an adequate scale, for the sale of the artistic products of our Eastern Empire? Anyone who will visit the Museum at the India Office, wretchedly accommodated as it is, will go away wondering why in this metropolis, which is in close communication with all parts of India, it should be impossible to purchase almost any of the beautiful works with which those rooms are filled. It seems to me a very real evil, because I am convinced that, if society in this country could have the picturesque side of India forced upon its notice, the name of that country would cease to exercise upon all sorts and conditions of men here, not directly connected with it, that narcotic spell with which we are but too familiar.

Even the exaggerated ideas about the wealth of India, which used to prevail in England, and which still linger in France, were not without their advantages; they struck the popular mind and attracted attention to it, by investing it with a halo of romance. We know that these were dreams; but we also know that if India is not as rich in gold and gems as was believed, if her soil taken as a whole is not equal in fertility to that of England, yet that the patient application of science to the cultivation of that soil, and a minute investigation of its products, organic and inorganic, will illustrate the old story of the field beneath which a treasure was said to be hid, and will make India, if India remains peaceful and progressive, one of the most important factors in the prosperity of mankind. We know that the investigation into the history of the most venerable of her languages has been important not only from the actual addition it has made to human knowledge, but as putting into the hands of the student a key for the unlocking of a thousand secrets in the history of religion, of philosophy, and of society. We know that if we can once thoroughly penetrate India with all that is best in European civilization, it will not be India alone, but the whole of Asia, or at least the whole of Asia south of the great central ranges of the Continent, that will be benefited; and that when we ask our people to take an interest in India, we are asking them to take an interest in something much wider and deeper than the mere fortunes of a British dependency. I cannot help thinking that if the public mind were once thoroughly possessed of the idea that, in addition to being a great European, a great African, a great American, a great Australian, and a great Oceanic power, we are incomparably the greatest Asiatic power, we should get rid of that foolish self-consciousness which makes us perpetually fuss about what we are pleased to call our prestige and our position, and should make up our minds simply to do our duty as a cosmopolitan power according to our lights. I beg, Sir to move the Resolution which I have placed in your hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the total Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1870 was £50,901,081; the total of the direct claims upon the Revenue, including charges of collection and cost of Salt and Opium, was £9,230,823; the charges in India, including Interest on Debt, and Public Works ordinary, were £32,293,859; the value of Stores supplied from England was £1,379,052; the charges in England were £6,331,614; the Guaranteed Interest on the Capital of Railway and other Companies, in India and in England, deducting net Traffic Receipts, was £1,547,064, making a total charge for the same year of £50,782,412; and there was an excess of Income over Expenditure in that year amounting to £118,669; that the charge for Public Works extraordinary was £2,599,614, and that including that charge the excess of Expenditure over Income was £2,480,945.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, the hon. Gentleman had made, as on former occasions, a very clear, able, and comprehensive Statement on a very difficult and intricate subject. He regretted very much that his right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote), owing to his absence, as the House knew, on an important mission, could not give the Committee the result of his great experience, for he felt how far less worthy of attention would be the few remarks he should endeavour to make than those which would have fallen from him. The Committee discussed an Indian Budget under great disadvantages, because, while the statement of the Minister embraced three years, hon. Members only had the opportunity of considering one of these with the requisite information before them. Taking the last three years of which they had a precise account, it seemed to him that the Revenues of India were, on the average, nearly stationary, while the Expenditure was steadily advancing. The year 1869-70, the subject of the Resolution now before them, showed rather a better account than the two years immediately preceding; but it contained the seeds of increased annual expenditure in charges for guaranteed railways and in interest on loans for reproductive works constructed by the Government, and at the same time relied too much on the apparently diminishing and questionable opium revenue, while the receipts from excise, customs, and stamps, as well as those from land, appeared to rise but little in proportion. No one, he imagined, would consider this a satisfactory condition—ordinarily a serious deficit, nearly £2,000,000 a-year for three years; sometimes a small surplus, so small that a very trifling mishap or miscalculation would suffice to throw the balance on the wrong side. The telegraphic Budget which had just been placed in their hands, showed, it was true, a larger surplus. He hoped it might be so; but they had heard occasionally of amended Budgets, and in this case also the hon. Gentleman had used the ominous phrase, that opium had come to the rescue. Surely this was not a result on which the Minister could congratulate himself, or which could be satisfactory to the people of this country, who, in addition to the general interest they must feel in so magnificent a dependency, were becoming more and more personally interested in the prosperity of India on account of the capital which flowed from them for the construction of her public works. Was there any hope of inaugurating a more prosperous era? He need hardly say that this could only be done in two ways—either by reducing the Expenditure or by increasing the Revenue. Could the Expenditure be reduced? It was generally allowed that this could not easily be effected. True, it might be that here and there charges might be cut down for what might appear to economical reformers to be unnecessary pomp and ceremony. But all people did not see with our eyes, and we were told on excellent authority that it would be unwise and impolitic to bring down our establishments in India to Spartan simplicity. The Army was enormously expensive; but an Army so situated must be costly. We heard indirectly of reductions in the artillery. He hoped this arm might not be reduced so far as to be inconsistent with safety. It might be that some reduction was possible in the Madras Presidency. But, as the Navy was scarcely powerful enough, no material diminution could be looked for in the charge for defence. The other items were by no means excessive, and that for the collection of the Revenue—about 10 per cent—was moderate. Perhaps he might except the charges for stores supplied by this country, according to requisitions. Some experience as a West India proprietor convinced him that the object of those who made out such lists was to ask for at least enough; and, though the hon. Gentleman might say, and say truly, that these items were carefully examined and some even disallowed, he (Mr. S. Cave) had gone through that ceremony in West India accounts, and generally found that those articles which he struck out were discovered afterwards to be absolutely necessary, and were purchased at a much higher price on the spot. He did not know how the guarantee fund to be paid in 1874 was invested. [An hon. MEMBER: In Consols.] But it had been proposed to lend it to Indian railway companies, and so to obtain a higher interest. There was one way, indeed, in which a diminution might be made in the present charge. The small surplus of the year 1869-70 was obtained by carrying to capital account the expenses of extraordinary public works—that was, of reproductive works—of irrigation, railways, &c. To this no one could object. But there was no reason on principle why such charges as that for barracks should not be spread over a series of years. These were permanent works, designed to last for many years. They were works like stations, which would be placed to capital by auditors of a railway without hesitation, or like the fortifications which we had been paying for by loans. He said, then, that there was no reason, on principle, why this course should not be taken; but they were told that the credit of India would suffer if we borrowed so freely. That was a valid argument. The credit of England did not assist that of her dependencies, except in a few rare instances. He thought, indeed, that those instances might be extended with care and judgment, and that one of the most legitimate and safest ways of assisting rising Colonies was to enable them to borrow money for reproductive purposes at a cheaper rate by endorsing their bills. But until this was done he could not advocate straining the credit of India by borrowing for non-reproductive works, especially as we were told that these barracks, constructed at so enormous a cost, were eminently unfit for their purpose. Repetitions, probably, of the costly mistakes in the West Indies, where the barracks used generally to be built in the most unhealthy situations, one of which, now abandoned, he was told, was constructed of bricks from England, carried up mountain-paths on mules' backs, and costing 1*s.* 6*d.* each before they arrived at their destination. If, then, there could be no material reduction of Expenditure, what prospect was there of raising a larger Revenue? Take first the customs—export and import duties, both of which were, or ought to be, regulated by circumstances over which the financier had no control. Export duties were usually the most impolitic of taxes, as, unless the country had an entire monopoly of the article, the price was not increased by the duty, which, therefore, fell upon the producer. In India this was essentially the case, as the largest amount of export duty was levied on grain, especially on rice, and it was evident that this commodity must go into the markets of the world unduly weighted. He should rejoice to see the abolition of the export duties, or their reduction to a mere registration fee. No increase on that head could be expected or desired. Could the import duties be increased? He was not one of those who had any great objection on principle to tax the necessities of life. It could not be avoided in many instances. If a man used necessities only, and could not be taxed directly, you were unable to touch him in any other way. He (Mr. S. Cave) should have to enlarge a little on this presently. Nor was he much influenced by what was called the Manchester School, who thought that the end and aim of finance was to get Manchester goods into every country of the world duty free. His idea was that an import tax was a good tax, so long as it did not materially impede imports. But there were two incidents to this tax in India which must not be lost sight of. Cotton goods paid the largest share of the duties, though by no means heavily assessed. In the first place, these imported goods competed with home manufactures, and, without a countervailing excise duty, the competition was unequal. Secondly, the duty, supposing it paid by consumers, was a tax which fell upon the poor, as the upper classes were habitually the higher priced home-made fabrics. It was possible that a slight addition to the customs duties might not materially affect imports, but he did not expect that a very large increase could be obtained; and, though the revenue derived from these, together with other taxes, had been more elastic since the Mutiny, the increase had not been great for a population of 150,000,000. There were, indeed, articles such as tobacco and sugar, the latter of which, if not the former, India had begun to import, as well as to grow at home, a moderate customs and excise duty on which might bring in a fair return, and would press very lightly on the consumer. So much for customs duties properly so-called. He now came to that very peculiar, very profitable, and very much abused source of revenue, the opium duty. He need not re-capitulate the many arguments they had heard, and would hear again, on that subject; but if it were in Bengal, as in other parts of India, a mere tax, a transit or export duty, it might be susceptible of the same excuse that the present First Lord of the Treasury, he thought, made for the spirit duty in the United Kingdom—namely, that we could not be said to foster it when we put upon it as heavy a duty as it would bear without encouraging smuggling. He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman would have felt, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, if his well-meant efforts to discourage the consumption of spirits had been entirely successful. But unfortunately, in Bengal, opium was a Government monopoly. Government not only taxed it, but they grew, manufactured, and sold it. Tobacco was a Government monopoly in many countries. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed to make life assurance a Government monopoly here; but he did not know what the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would say if it were proposed to raise some millions in the United Kingdom by a Government distillery. This opium revenue had an ugly look in more ways than one, for we charged so highly for the drug that we had fostered its growth not only in China, where at present it had found no such suitable soil, but in Persia, where he understood it was nearly as good as in India; so that we might possibly lose this source of revenue without having the credit of giving it up for conscience' sake. Then came salt, which was taxed at rates varying from 500 to 2,500 per cent on prime cost in different parts of India. That had been regarded by many as not dependent on price, subject to few fluctuations—in fact, a kind of poll tax, rising with increase of population. Unfortunately, famine had destroyed vast numbers who paid this tax; but, more than this, a casual scarcity in the Government salt stores in Bengal had proved that a large portion of the inhabitants of India, when an article arrived at a certain price, did without it, and in that way entirely upset the calculations of the Finance Minister. He had said nothing about the income tax, in respect of which opinions so widely differed. It was at present very high, and without it the telegraphic Budget would have presented a less favourable result. With the exception of great merchants, such as the

Parsees, whose wealth was well known, though not more than their liberality, the money incomes of Natives was not generally very large. They had the apparent wealth of servants, horses, and magnificent attire; but we are told that the jewels on Oriental dresses and arms were not very valuable, being of the kind called "Lasque" diamonds, and that a very superb show might be made at a comparatively small cost. To say that the income tax was unpopular in India was no very strong argument. It was unpopular everywhere. But we must not forget that of all people the Indians were most suspicious of novelty. He believed they would prefer the doubling of an old tax to the imposition of a new one. This brought him to the mode in which he ventured to ask, with great deference, whether the deficiencies in the Revenue might not be supplied. There were three conditions of national existence, to each of which, as it seemed to him, a different plan of taxation was applicable. The first was that like our own, in which the people were settled and stationary, having much fixed property and many artificial wants. In the case of such a population direct taxation might well be applied to property, and indirect taxation to luxuries. Secondly, there was the newly-settled country in which the people were sparse and migratory, and though well to do and not in the habit of denying themselves, were impatient of taxation and difficult to reach. Indirect taxation, and on the necessaries as well as the luxuries of life, was the only method which paid the cost of collection in such countries; and he had always thought it most unfair that we should first call upon Canada to incur large outlay in self-defence, and then raise an outcry against her for obtaining the ways and means by almost the only method available for her. Thirdly, there was a class of people, like the Natives of India, who, owing to climate and habits, had few wants and little accumulated property. He spoke now of the masses, who, when prices rose, did without almost all the necessaries of life, as had been shown in the case of sugar, when the price in Europe had made it worth exporting. Upon such a class a hold could only be obtained in two ways—their persons and their land. In the Native States of India this had been recognized, and acted upon from time immemorial. There the bulk of the Revenue sprang from two sources. First, the land, in customary rents—namely, the portion of rent reserved for the State—and various local rates—cesses as they were called in India as in Ireland—secondly, from a sort of protection or poll tax, that which a man paid for the protection of the State. “Skin for skin, all that a man hath will he give for his life,” had frequently been the maxim of the Native Princes; and they had made it the excuse for the most grinding extortion and oppression. Mehemet Ali, in Egypt, justified his exactions in another way. He said that if he allowed the Fellaheen to have two shirts it would be impossible for him to govern them. That was not our policy; but he ventured to ask whether a way out of our difficulty might not be found in these two directions. A poll tax was the only tax for a naked man, who would live upon almost nothing, and he believed it would be found less objectionable and oppressive than the salt tax. Lord Grey, as was mentioned in a former debate, was in favour of taxing articles most used by negroes in the West Indies; but he was dealing with a people who, though adverse to work, would rather work than do without what they were accustomed to. The mention of the West Indies reminded him that the emigration of Indians to those Colonies, as well as the increase of public works in India, had caused so great a rise in wages in India that the labourer was far better off, and more able to pay, than in former times. With regard to land, he should doubtless be met by the “fixed settlement.” Well, he was aware of what, speaking with great humility, appeared to him the most unwise of all arrangements, by which the Government, unlike other landlords, precluded itself for long terms of years, and in some cases for ever, from sharing in the rapidly improving value of land. Where faith was pledged it must be kept, even to our own hindrance, but there was no reason why the landlord should afterwards lay out large sums in raising artificially the value of the same land, without demanding from the tenant a percentage of the cost, which in this country was freely given in such cases every day. Again, we had in this country a land tax redeemed in most cases at a fixed rate, but this did not prevent rates being laid over and over again upon land, for local, or what were called local, purposes. Education was defrayed, in great measure, by local rates here; in India it was charged on the Imperial Revenue. And surely we might fairly ask for local aid to railways and irrigation works, which had so enormously increased the value of land and its products, that exports had multiplied nearly five-fold, and corn had risen in price at Jubbulpore from 12s. to 36s. a quarter. And all this through the State sinking £200,000,000 in improvements, expenditure on which in the last complete accounts made, according to the Resolution of the Under Secretary, the difference between surplus and deficiency, and yet taking the same rent as before, and in some instances even alienating land in perpetuity for a mere nominal price. Might not this system of local rates lead to the local and decentralizing management of affairs which was considered so desirable to those who looked forward to the Native population assisting us to govern the country, and becoming less apt than they were at present to call upon Government to initiate social reforms? At least we might begin locally, and try them with five cities, before entrusting them with the Empire. And now, although he had detained hon. Members too long, he should like to say one word on this Committee, which was to inquire into Indian affairs. He doubted its doing much good, though it might do great mischief. But he was thankful it was not to be a Commission sent to obtain information in the country itself. Persons who talked of sending Commissioners to India, as if they were to inquire into Scotch Fisheries or English Factory Acts, little knew what they were talking of. It was said that the Saxons in Ireland, after all our attempts at conciliation, were merely encamped in an enemy's country. If that were so, what must it be with the handful of English in India? Looking to the difference of national character, which made conspiracy which was almost impossible in Ireland easy in India, we might well say of our countrymen there that they are on a slumbering volcano.

What mischief such a Commission might do by exciting vague hopes or fears among excitable Southern races might be imagined from the effect which the late most ill-judged roving Commission, sent out on most inadequate grounds by the Colonial Office to British Guiana, had exercised, and would for some time longer exercise, upon the coloured population. Then, what would be the composition of such a Commission? Possibly, old Indians, who would be quite able to draw up their Report without leaving the country; or men of books and theories, who would not stay long enough to realize their own ignorance. He remembered once going to look after some family property in the West Indies. He read everything that had been written on the subject, and went out to set everybody right, fully convinced that he knew their business better than men who had been engaged in it all their lives. It was not till he had been six months in the country that he began to find out how little he really knew. How little one knew of the inner life and real feeling of the working classes immediately around us; aye, without even excepting those who claimed specially to represent them. He had heard a distinguished Indian official acknowledge this with respect to the inhabitants of India—a man whose life had been spent among them, who could speak to them in their own language, and even, as he expressed himself, knew when they meant what they said and when they did not. It behoved us to beware of expressing doubts or hesitation. A vigorous government was far preferable to a much better government weakly administered. Revolutions had usually been in the reigns of good and weak, not of bad and vigorous rulers. A Governor General, even an able and energetic one like the present, had great difficulties to contend with—difficulties within his own Council, which was not so manageable as a Cabinet, though that was said to be not always a happy family; difficulties from conflicting interests and contending races; difficulties from the Press. All these, not unknown here, had to be encountered in an exaggerated form in India. A Committee would be apt to act on the notion that English ideas and English institutions were like a general fitting saddle, good for any country. But even in these days of telegraphs India must be governed in India. Mistakes must be corrected there, not at home. With a people, or rather peoples, of that kind, want of authority would be fatal, not only to good government, but to the very existence of our magnificent and dearly-bought Indian Empire.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. S. Cave), that this Statement would be far from satisfactory. In the first place, there was a supposed increase of the opium revenue; and, in the next place, a large decrease in the expenditure on public works. If hon. Members would turn to the figures they would find that the decrease in the expenditure on public works for 1870-1 was £1,000,000 as compared with the actual expenditure in 1869-70; and there was also a decrease in the expenditure on public works extraordinary amounting to nearly another £1,000,000. Now, it appeared to him that it was a very serious thing for the Government to commence so rapid a diminution in the expenditure on public works in India. He had read over and over again, on the authority of the very highest Indian officials, that the need of public works in that country was now as great as ever; that what had been done was comparatively nothing to what was required; and that over very large tracts there was a great deficiency of roads, bridges, embankments, and every other kind of the most necessary works. If that were so, he could not congratulate the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) on the decrease of expenditure this year under that head. While on this subject he begged to say a few words on a question of principle to which the hon. Gentleman had alluded with special reference to himself. He must say he held that if a public work was of a permanent character and was really useful to the community it ought not to be paid for out of revenue, but out of local taxation. In this country we should not dream of making a drain across a street without borrowing the money, because we were in the habit of proceeding on this principle—that those who came after us should share in the burden. In dealing with India we adopted a totally different principle. The hon. Gentleman had said that we did not find the result we might have expected from the money spent in India. Well, that would be an argument against making the expenditure out of revenue, for it would go to show that these works should not be constructed, as not being certain to be productive. Over and over again we had been told that the Indian Budget showed a constant deficit; but that had arisen of late years simply from this item of public works. The figures were very remarkable. In 1867-8, independent of the expenditure on public works ordinary, there was an actual surplus of £4,873,000. In 1868-9 the surplus was £3,809,000; and in the last year there would be a surplus of just about £3,000,000. Now, it puzzled him exceedingly to know why the poor people of India should have to pay additional imposts—an additional salt tax and an increased income tax, for instance—required to meet an increasing expenditure on public works. If a public work was paid for out of revenue it must be carried on in the most extravagant manner, because it would be constantly stopped in the middle for want of funds, and the works discontinued could not be resumed except at an additional expense. Take, for example, the works on the Godavery, which had been so much talked of in that House, and had almost become a by-word. He knew that a telegram had been sent out to stop those works in the middle, the men were all dismissed, and the whole affair had cost half as much again as it would have done had it been pushed on quickly. On the other hand, if the money were borrowed and the work proceeded with with all possible rapidity, he ventured to say that one-third of the cost incurred by doing it in dribblets would have been saved. This was the course adopted in the construction of railways in this country, and he had yet to learn what difference there was in this respect between railways and public works so called. It had been said that those works were not directly remunerative; but a good road was as directly remunerative in its degree to the community as any work that could possibly be made; it was in its degree as remunerative as a railway, even if no toll was got out of it. So again with regard to military buildings, which formed a very large item in what was described as public works ordinary. It was of the highest importance that the lives of the troops should not be thrown away from being in bad buildings, and, therefore, to provide good barracks was a most remunerative expenditure. But he had been told that the barracks in India were badly built; but that only showed that in paying for works out of revenue there was no security against improper expenditure. The fact was it discouraged a good officer and made him feel that he would not get full supplies for his work, while it did not make the lazy man diligent. He had been exceedingly struck by a speech made last summer by Sir Bartle Frere, who was admitted to be a man of high authority in these matters, in which he said that in the Public Works Department of India the best man was not he who would forward works, but he who would check them. It was perfectly true that great caution was required as to the amount laid out in public works, just as in England in 1847 we laid out far more than the country could afford. That was a matter of judgment and discretion; but if they expected to find in paying out of revenue a security against extravagant expenditure, the check would prove utterly illusory. One or two other things in the Budget had struck him. He maintained the opinion he had expressed a year ago with regard to the opium revenue. They had been told that it was an extremely uncertain revenue; he believed it to be most unsatisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said, with great justice, that it was like a revenue derived by the Government from an enormous distillery carried on at the public expense. But such a thing would not be tolerated for a moment; and yet we talked of the opium revenue as perfectly innocent, and very few Members lifted up their voices against it. In his opinion, it was an immoral thing for a Government to have a hand in, and the sooner they got rid of it the better. He was told last year it was a matter of dispute whether it was or was not injurious to the people of China. He was persuaded that it was injurious, and he felt that our conduct in this matter had not been marked by the high principle which ought to be expected from a nation as civilized and advanced as our own. The expenditure on the Army had also been referred to, and certainly it was very great. He would call the attention of his hon. Friend to an opinion expressed on this point by Sir Charles Trevelyan a few months ago—that almost the whole cost of the Army of Madras was a sheer waste of money. Now, if he mistook not, the cost of that Army was nearly £3,000,000, and therefore he would recommend to the hon. Gentleman to see whether there was not a possibility of some economy with respect to it. Looking to all the circumstances, he considered the appointment of a Committee on Indian Finance as a very satisfactory proceeding on the part of the Government, which he was sure would go into the inquiry in a business-like manner. In his opinion, it was high time that the whole question should be thoroughly investigated, because he was one of those who believed that the danger of India was the danger of England. It was perfectly true that the House of Commons was not responsible for the debt of India. For the money which was invested there the people of this country got Indian security and nothing more; but he felt assured that if we were likely to lose India, the public would demand that English credit should be pledged in order to save her. Anything, therefore, which endangered her position was of great importance to every taxpayer in England, and a question of greater moment could not, therefore, be brought under the notice of a Committee. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. S. Cave) had used a very serious expression when he said the English population in India were living on a volcano. That he hoped was an exaggeration; but certainly there were enormous dangers arising out of the peculiar prejudices and ideas of the people of that Empire; and living as we did in ignorance of those prejudices, there were, perhaps, many dangers the extent of which we failed to appreciate. If, then, by means of the proposed Committee, we could convince the people of India that we wished to treat them with perfect justice, and to avoid unequal taxation, we might win them to a more thorough devotion to our rule, and thereby confer a great benefit on the whole Empire.

SIR CHARLES WINGFIELD said, that if the Indian Budget was henceforth to be laid before Parliament in the month of February, the Indian year of account must be made to agree with the calendar year. The Financial Statement of the Minister for India, in which he reviewed the results of the last year and stated the Estimates for the next, was the occasion on which the only debate of interest as to the internal conditions of the Indian Empire, arose in that House. But upon the present occasion, owing to the desire of the Government to make that Statement at an early period of the Session, they were without either of those necessary items of information. In fact, the only difference between what they knew now and what they knew in August last, was that they now had the actual instead of the estimated results of 1869-70, and a revised Estimate of 1870-1. It was said that they could not adopt the calendar year because it would not fit in with the land revenue accounts. He did not agree with that. The land tax in India was fixed for a term of years or perhaps in perpetuity, and the amount was therefore known; the instalments were payable at variable periods in different parts of India. If the calendar year were adopted as the Indian year of account, it would only affect the first year's reckoning; after that the year's land revenue would fall into the year of account. The very same inconvenience had been got over without difficulty a few years ago, when the 31st of March was adopted as the close of the year of accounts instead of the 30th of April; and there was no greater difficulty in putting back the year three months than one. If that were done, the Indian accounts could be laid before the House with the Financial Statement and the Estimate of the current year in February. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) had read extracts from an order of the Government of India, announcing a scheme of decentralization of the finances. He (Sir Charles Wingfield) had examined that scheme, and it seemed to him good as far as it went; but it did not go very far. The Government of India relinquished all control over the distribution of the sum it assigned to each provincial Government from the Imperial funds for the support of certain specified establishments and works; the local governments would submit their Estimates for these services as before, but they would be able, within the limits of the assignment, to transfer funds from one head of account to another, whereas formerly they had to obtain the sanction of the Government of India. Practically, no doubt, this sanction was little more than a form. On the other hand, the Government of India relieved itself of an immediate charge of £350,000, by reducing the aggregate grants of 1870-1 by that amount, and of all prospective charges beyond the reduced sum now granted; and as these charges related to the very objects in which increased outlay was sure to be called for—namely, education, gaols, local roads, &c.—the Government of India merely abandoned an authority it found it troublesome to exercise. The balance of advantage was clearly on the side of the Government of India. What the local governments and what Indian Reformers in this country asked for was, that after defraying the cost of their civil establishments, and having contributed pro rata to the Imperial expenditure—that was, debt, army, diplomacy, &c.—they might be allowed to spend the balance of their revenues as they thought best. In short, they asked for some control over their receipts; what they got was control over certain allotted items of expenditure. He thought, therefore, that this scheme had no pretension to be styled decentralization of the finances. He came now to the most important subject of all. He was not conscious of exaggeration when he said he apprehended great danger to the security of our Empire in India, if the course on which the Government of India appeared to have entered of imposing increased taxation by its own discretionary will be uncompromisingly persevered in. He might meet with the usual fate of those who declined to prophesy smooth things; but he might claim, without egotism, to know something of the feelings and ideas of the people of India, and, entertaining the strong convictions he did on the subject, he was bound not to remain silent. The Government of India, as the scheme to which he had just referred showed, had avowed its intention of restricting its grants from the general revenues for provincial purposes, and of requiring the local governments to raise the additional funds they needed by local taxation. Now, local taxation in England meant self-taxation; but that was not what it meant in India—there was no self-government in India. There the additional taxes would be levied under Acts of Legislative Councils in which the Natives were not represented at all. Already serious discontent and irritation had been aroused by attempts to raise new cesses and imposts. He had seen a memorial from Natives of the Madras Presidency complaining of a Bill that had been brought into the Legislative Council to raise funds for local purposes—sanitation being one—by a variety of new taxes, one of them a tax on marriages. The memorialists urged that religious observances and social customs were not fit objects of taxation. It appeared to him to be no defence of such a tax to plead, as had been pleaded by the Government, that it had been levied by Native rulers. Why, they could find justification for any enormity in the example of Native rulers; but, if they could do nothing better than reproduce the Native model of government, he did not see what business they had to be in India at all. Despots for despots, the people of India might say, give us our countrymen. Again, after the 30 years' settlement had been concluded a road cess had been imposed by an Act of the Legislature; and in Oudh, where cesses for education had been provided, it was now sought to double the amount. That he regarded as a departure from engagements on the part of the Government. He was aware of the argument on which those impositions were defended—namely, that promises of the Executive Government could be overridden by Acts of the Legislature. That argument would be of more force if the people were represented in the Legislature; but, composed as the Legislative Council was of members of the Executive Government and Government nominees, mostly servants of the Government, the Government, in accomplishing its objects through such a legislative body, made itself judge in its own cause. It was well observed by a Member of Council, in the Papers on education recently presented to Parliament, that—"We have no standing ground in India save brute force if we forfeit our character for truth." He (Sir Charles Wingfield) therefore held strongly that if they sought to impose additional taxation for local purposes, they could only do so safely with the co-operation of the people. To that end councils should be established at the seat of each provincial government, composed mainly of leading members of the landed and commercial interests. The representative element should enter into their constitution, and without their concurrence no new taxes should be imposed. No one could fail to perceive that there was a great and growing demand among the upper and educated classes, who were the leaders of Native opinion, for some voice in the management of their affairs, especially in the matter of raising and spending new taxes. It was useless to attempt to wring more money out of a poor people—they only further impoverished them—they must trust to time, and the effects of works of public utility, to enrich the country, and in the meantime they held the great source of increased income in the future, the share in the rental of land. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) remarked last Session that representative institutions were not yet for India. He (Sir Charles Wingfield) did not seek to transplant the British Constitution there; but there was surely a middle course between full-blown representative government and altogether refusing to consult the people on the matter, nearest and dearest to all people, the raising and spending the revenues they had to contribute. They must, moreover, bear in mind that there was in India an active and widely-diffused free Press, English and Native; and that there were facilities for higher education, of which the people eagerly availed themselves. Thousands now read with interest in the newspapers the reports of the debates on Indian subjects in that House, and of the political events happening in Europe; and every year, as knowledge and enlightenment spread, the people grew less disposed to submit without murmur to taxation, which they regarded as oppressive and unjust, or as a breach of promise on the part of the Government. If their complaints and remonstrances were unheeded, the sense of wrong would rankle in their breasts, to find vent some day—not in insurrection, for the power of the British Government was felt to be overwhelming, but in passive resistance to taxation, a form of opposition which would be far more embarrassing to the Government, for they could not issue coercive processes against a nation of 150,000,000. The hon. Gentleman attributed the unpopularity of the income tax to the oppressions of unscrupulous Native collectors. But that was the fault of the Government. From ill-judged economy they would not allow an efficient special establishment for the collection of the tax, and the duty was devolved on the overworked collectors and their deputies, and these were obliged to leave it to underpaid Native assessors, who extorted money from the poor and ignorant classes under threats of assessing them for large sums, and distraining their property in default, while many landlords re-couped themselves the amount of the tax from their tenants. He (Sir Charles Wingfield) hoped his remarks would not be understood as made in a spirit adverse to the Home Government. On the contrary, he attached the highest value to the Government by a Secretary of State in Council. He knew that complaints had been made of undue interference with the Governor General on the part of the Secretary of State. He did not sympathize with those complaints at all; so far from it, he considered that in every case that had come to his knowledge where the Secretary of State had modified or annulled the acts of the Governor General, his interference had been exercised for the public advantage. For instance, Lord Halifax had overruled a law making failure in a contract to deliver agricultural produce a criminal offence; and the present Secretary of State had disallowed two laws, one introducing the metric system, and the other the Contagious Diseases (Women) Act. It was most fortunate that there was an authority in this country to prevent the consequences of such empirical and doctrinaire legislation. It was worthy of notice, too, that this complaint of undue interference was never made by the people of India, who highly appreciated the controlling authority of the Secretary of State. And, when Lord Halifax resigned office he received addresses from the Native inhabitants of all Presidency towns, thanking him for the care and protection he had extended to their interests. The right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. S. Cave) laid it down as a profound political maxim, that India must be governed in India. If that merely meant that the initiative should rest with the Governor General, he (Sir Charles Wingfield) had no objection; but if it meant that the proceedings of the Governor General were not to be subjected to watchful supervision and control by the Secretary of State he entirely dissented from it. He could conceive no greater danger to our Empire in India than that the impression should prevail among the people that the Governor General must be supported at all hazards, and that there was no remedy against hasty and unjust measures. He was convinced that the decision of the late Secretary of State (Sir Stafford Northcote), restoring the kingdom of Mysore to its Native Prince, after repeated refusals by former Secretaries of State, had done more to inspire confidence in the Home Government and to unite the Natives of India by the bonds of attachment to this country than all the money they had spent on railways and canals had accomplished. The truth was that this maxim was first laid down at a time when there were no railways, no telegraphs, and when education was in its infancy. It was now quite antiquated. He heartily thanked the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for having acceded to the request for a Committee of that House on the financial administration of India. He assured him that the announcement would be received with satisfaction and gratitude throughout India.

MR. EASTWICK said, that, before adverting to the Statement they had just heard, he wished to express his belief that the course adopted by Government this Session with respect to India must be satisfactory to the people of India, and to all those who took a real interest in that country. He hoped that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into everything connected with the finance of India would go far to remove the impression—that most mistaken impression—that Parliament was really indifferent to the interests of India. That delusion would, he hoped, be further dispelled by the day for making the Indian Financial Statement having been changed from the very end to the very beginning of the Session. By a happy coincidence, although the financial year was not concluded, the alteration had not deprived the hon. Gentleman of the opportunity of making several important announcements. It might be otherwise on the next occasion, and it would, perhaps, be better that the Statement might be more complete, to appoint a day somewhat later in the Session—say, towards the end of June—for the Indian Budget. For this time, at least, nothing could be more felicitous than the alteration; and he hoped the people of India would now be disabused of the idea that there was, or had been, any real indifference on the part of Parliament towards them, except that which was not indifference, but rather an inability to act, on account of the overwhelming pressure of home business. He hoped the Anglo-Indian Press would put this matter in its true light; and would, at the same time, make the people of India understand how impossible it was for a nation that had to pay £26,000,000—much more than a third of its Revenue—for the interest of its own debt, to encourage the remittance of capital to India by way of Government loans, so as to increase the debt of that country, all of which, but 9 per cent, was already owing to England. There were a number of matters in the statement they had just heard to which he would like to advert. First, there was the important Resolution of December 14, 1870, on the decentralization of finance. It would be admitted that that Resolution was, at all events, a step in the right direction, because it would obviate the mistakes and delays which occurred in the mode of dealing with the representations of the local governments with respect to the 10 departments of expenditure to which it referred. Next, the sum allowed to the local Governments were stereotyped. Now, it was absurd to suppose that their wants could be stereotyped too, and would always remain represented by the exact sum of £4,688,711. Why, the wants of Bengal alone, in future years, for gaols, registration, police, education, and, above all, for roads and miscellaneous public improvements, might come to amount to that sum. How, then, was the deficiency to be made up? In his judgment, the better course would be for the Supreme Government to take such taxes as must be uniform throughout the Empire—say, customs, salt, opium, liquor tax, and a due proportion of the land revenue—and to say to the local Governments—“Take the rest, and make the best you can of them.” That would greatly increase not only their responsibility, but also their motives for economy, which, as they were told in the second paragraph of the Resolution, were now too few. He came next to the announcement made in the third paragraph of the Resolution, and which, he feared, unveiled the real reason for making these changes. It said that “existing Imperial revenues will not suffice for the growing wants of the country.” And again, in the eighth paragraph, they read that—

It was quite clear, then, that the Supreme Government found itself overburthened, and was shifting its difficulties on to the subordinate governments, which was like cutting away the trunk of a banyan tree and leaving the immense weight of its branches to rest on the suckers. He hoped the Supreme Government would not rely on any such prop, but would take the only safe means of planting itself firmly by reducing its enormous expenditure. Now, it seemed to him that there were at hand, two important means of effecting something like adequate reductions. The first, by re-establishing the local European Army for India, with long service engagements, and a very much smaller number of officers. He would not go into the question of the comparative merits of the late East India Company's European regiments. At all events, they did the work required of them in conquering India, and there could be no doubt that similar regiments could perform the much easier work of retaining it. Recruits for such regiments would cost less than £40 each, whereas those for the Imperial forces cost £100. Such regiments would be sufficiently officered with 20, instead of 33, officers. Indeed, as the Native regiments, which he supposed required more leading than Englishmen, had only seven officers, he could not understand why such regiments need have even 20. Then look at the expenditure on account of the Army and military works for the last four years, ranging between £175,000,000 and £185,000,000, and judge whether that expense could be borne out of an available Revenue of only £27,000,000, which was all the Indian Government had to deal with as they pleased. Other enormous savings might be made by the reduction of the Native Army to two-thirds its present force, and by obtaining from the Native States their fair quota of the expense for defending the Empire. At present, with the revenues of only a part of India, they defrayed the expense of defending the whole. One of two things ought to be done—either those States should disband their forces and maintain order with police, or they should be made responsible for the security of the country, and we might withdraw the troops which were now kept to watch their armies. Another way of reducing the expenditure would be by the introduction of Native gentlemen of rank into the higher civil appointments. He would ask, why should they be paying £2,250,000 to mediatized Princes, and, as they had been called by a Secretary of State, "titled stipendiaries," without obtaining from them any service in return? Why should they do this when many of them were capable of rendering good service to the State, and loathe their enforced idleness? Why, he (Mr. Eastwick) received a letter a few days ago from an Indian Prince, who, for the last quarter of a century, had been spending his income at Bagdad, and had always maintained a character worthy of his high rank, and had been thanked by our Government for his voluntary and gratuitous services in the Persian War. He was most anxious to be employed in his Native country. If he were so employed his large income, which was now spent abroad, would be spent in India, and the Government would derive advantage from his abilities and his great influence among his countrymen. And, no doubt, there were many pensioned noblemen and others who would gladly be employed for a moderate, perhaps, even for a nominal, salary. He thought that, when they remembered the gloomy anticipations which existed about a year ago as to the accounts of the year 1870-1, they might be glad that the out-turn had been as good as it had proved. But the element of chance was too conspicuous in the result to make it very satisfactory. The great success had been in opium, and an opium success was one that rather sobered than intoxicated his mind. He (Mr. Eastwick) would rather turn to the progress in the Orissa Irrigation Works, which had cost £1,043,698, and were now irrigating 100,000 acres. That was a legitimate cause for satisfaction. He was glad to learn, too, from private letters, that the Native Princes were strenuously engaged in the construction of irrigation works, as, for instance, the Rajah of Ahmedmyar, in the collectorate of Ahmedabad, who had lately expended about £40,000 in the construction of irrigation works, with an anticipated return of from 7. to 10 per cent. He was not going into the accounts, as he had hardly sufficient data wherewith to criticize them; but there was one point he could not forbear mentioning. He found a number of sums entered in the expenditure under the head of "Sundry Items." He had taken the trouble to add them up, and they amounted altogether to £404,379. Surely that was too large a sum to pass under such a heading, and details ought to be given. There were several matters on which he wished his hon. Friend had given them fuller information. Such was the Board of Agriculture and Commerce. He hoped that, when established, it would supply information why the agricultural produce of India was comparatively so small. Judging by the land revenue, that it might be estimated at £60,000,000, or, at most, £70,000,000; this, compared then with the agricultural produce of France or of Ireland, was in proportion very small. Another point was the small-gauge railroads, which, he understood, had been decided on, and one of which was to connect Mooltan with Kurrachee. Such railroads could be made very cheaply, but he apprehended that advantage would be counterbalanced by the disadvantage of having to break bulk. Lastly, he should like to hear something of the Princes and Chiefs who were drawing pensions from us. He should be glad to learn that some of them had been recommended to visit this country. The young persons among them ought, for two or three years, at least, to study in this country. They would get instruction here which would be of great value to them in India. The young Rajah of Mysore, for example, ought, in his opinion, to be sent to England for a time. On all these points he should be glad if his hon. Friend could supply them with information. He desired once more to express his satisfaction at the course taken this Session by the Government with respect to Indian finance.

MR. DICKINSON said, he was anxious to point out that this was the first occasion on which the results of canal irrigation had been included as part of the land revenue. He thought it very undesirable to mix up the land revenue with railways, canals, or any works of that kind, believing that the capital expended upon reproductive works, and the income which this produced, ought to be shown clearly in the accounts. He had put an Amendment upon the Paper; but, after the Statement they had heard, and finding that its result would be rather to limit the range of discussion, he did not propose to move it. There were in that House hon. Gentlemen who were, or who had been, connected with different Departments of the Indian Government, and some who had visited India in connection with the Civil Service, with professions, or with trade, and thus acquired a knowledge of the country, but there was not one who could say that he represented the people of India, or that he was thoroughly acquainted with their views and aspirations. There being, therefore, no actual representatives in Parliament of the people of India, this country, as the governing Power, was bound to give the benefit of the doubt to India, whenever the interests of the two countries came into collision. Why, then, he would ask, should we not bear our proportion of Indian charges instead of seeking to throw an undue burden on India itself? What would be said by Australia or Canada, if we proposed to inflict upon either of these Colonies an annual charge for ships of war cruising upon their stations for the protection of our own commerce? And if, without risk of a separation, we could not attempt such a charge upon Canada or Australia, how could we justify it in the case of India? It was, no doubt, necessary that commerce in the Indian waters should be protected; but, in this, English interests were quite as much concerned as Indian interests; but the division of the charges was not proportionate. Moreover, it should be remembered that the relations of the two countries was very different from what it was when India was governed by the East India Company. At that time the Company had to bear every charge connected with the home control of its Government. It was impossible that that traditional policy could be preserved under the present state of affairs. On the part of England, the greatest commercial nation in the world and mistress of the seas, the policy of placing this burden on the Indian Government was both niggardly and unjust; and when the proper time came he should press the subject on the consideration of the Committee. They were now concerned in a hurried consideration of the Indian accounts, and, therefore, he thought it would not be convenient to press the general question at that moment. Still, he would remind the House that if our rule was to be continued in India it could only be maintained by governing the people of India in the spirit of equity and justice.

Nearly three-fourths of the people were under English rule; we were in the position of the dominant power—yet we had never hitherto laid down with clearness what were the principles which were to guide our administration of affairs. A noble responsibility rested on us in determining the future destiny of that great Empire. He regarded any foreign attack on India as quite out of the question—our frontier was well protected by natural boundaries, and he had no fear of the Russian progress towards India; and, consequently, internal peace alone was required for the development of its resources. At present, of course, we could not give representative institutions to India, but this might be done at some future time. Education ought to be freely imparted to all classes, and the condition of the people elevated morally and socially. It was highly desirable that a decision should be come to as to the future language of the country, his own opinion being that English might be brought into general use. But at present he would not enter into the details referred to by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. C. B. DENISON congratulated the Under Secretary of State on having made his Financial Statement thus early in the Session, in accordance with the wish expressed by the Committee last year; and hoped that in future it might be found practicable to make up the Indian accounts on the 31st December in each year. At the same time he must admit that it would be attended with a certain degree of inconvenience, because complete information on many details could not reach this country in time. While hoping that the scheme of financial decentralization, which had been submitted to the House in the form of a despatch, would be successful, he feared it would involve an addition to local taxation of burdens which it was found inexpedient to couple with Imperial taxation. He had glanced over the Financial Statement that had reached this country by telegraph, and there were one or two points on which he desired to say a few words. He observed that £2,000,000 of the anticipated revenue was jumbled together under the head of "Miscellaneous." He hoped that in due time they would receive a statement explaining the exact character of the various items. He also observed that there was a serious diminution in the estimated expenditure for education. It was only £540,000, for the current year, instead of £750,000—a point that required explanation; it might be that part of the expenses had been relegated to the subordinate governments. Under the head of assessed taxes he found that there was an increase of nearly £1,000,000. They had been indulged by the hon. Gentleman in a hope that the 7½ per cent income tax would be reduced, but he must confess to feeling very doubtful whether that anticipation would be realized. The hon. Gentleman, in reviewing the financial administration of India since the days of Mr. Wilson, had characterized it as a period of experiments and suggestions. The retrospect was to him (Mr. Denison) very unsatisfactory—it seemed to him that these experiments and suggestions were such as were generally understood under the maxim fiat experimentum in corpore vili. He had always been of opinion that more than half the difficulties of Indian finance had been difficulties of audit more than anything else; and had there been a definite system of audit and of accounts much inconvenience would have been avoided. When the income tax was doubled, instructions were sent to every officer to reduce his expenditure, without delay, to the lowest amount possible; and a chief engineer reported that it was impossible for him to keep his expenditure within the grant, except by postponing the charges of that year to the next. A system under which accounts could be postponed from one year to the next must lead to financial difficulty and embarrassment. He anticipated good results from the inquiries of the Select Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he wished to take this opportunity of calling attention to the step recently taken by the Secretary of State for India in establishing a College for Civil Engineers, a step which appeared to him (Sir Francis Goldsmid) directly opposed to the whole course of recent policy adopted by the Government and approved by the House. Appointments in the Civil Service of India had been thrown open to public competition. Haileybury College, where formerly young men intended for that service were educated, had been abolished; and now this new College was established, education at which was to be a necessary preliminary to young men entering as civil engineers the service of the Indian Government. Could a more retrograde step be imagined? It was said, indeed, that admission to the College was to be open to public competition. But it was to be open only to those who could afford to pay £150 a-year for three years. Before the establishment of County Courts, when it cost £30 or £40 to recover a debt of £10, the reply to the remark that the King's Courts were open to all the King's subjects, used to be—"So is the London Tavern to all who can pay the bill." The new Civil Engineering College was to be open to all on the same principle. The reason alleged by the Government for a measure so strangely contrary to all that had of late years been done, was understood to be that without it civil engineers for the service of India could not be obtained. And to prove this, it was stated that at the recent examinations the number of competent candidates was quite insufficient for the exigencies of the service. But the reason for this failure was not far to seek. The Government had offered to the approved candidates no more than £240 a-year. Not only was this remuneration too low to attract young men of the qualifications required, but the Government had shown that they knew it to be too low. For, simultaneously with the establishment of the College, they had announced their intention of giving to the candidates who might be successful a yearly salary of £420 from the time of their entering the service. The Government had thus, if better candidates should hereafter present themselves, made it impossible to ascertain whether the improvement were due, as they would suppose, to the establishment of the College, or, as he should believe, to the increased rate of remuneration. If, said Bentham, you desire to persuade yourself that a measure of no real utility is extremely useful, adopt it at the same time with some highly beneficial measure. If you wish to learn its real value, try it alone. If you want to convince yourself that saw-dust is a drastic medicine, mix it with jalap. If you desire to know its actual efficiency, swallow it in water. The Secretary of State for India was mixing the saw-dust of his College with the jalap of a nearly doubled salary. If the Government were determined to proceed with the establishment of the College, let them at least show their confidence in its usefulness by allowing young men who had been educated elsewhere to compete with their collegians. But even this had hitherto been refused.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, that the Motion of the Prime Minister yesterday made it quite unnecessary to trouble the House with any particulars as to the anomalies and abuses of Indian financial administration, which were only too patent. The financial history of British India, like that of the Second French Empire, was a chronicle of deficit and debt, with occasional illusory surpluses, obtained, for the most part, by crediting special windfalls to current ordinary income. The inquiries of the Select Committee would go far to remedy the worst of these financial abuses, as would also the creation of the new Department of Revenue, Agriculture and Commerce. But, after all, finance proper was only one of the many subjects urgently demanding investigation at this moment in India. There was at this moment in course of signature at Calcutta a Memorial, praying for inquiry into the condition of the Native Army, the management of the Public Works Department, and the working of the income tax. He desired to draw attention to the last of these points, especially to the fallacy of the statement put forward by the Indian Government, that the income tax "does not touch the poor, but only the well-to-do-classes." Probably by this time Government had found out their mistake; he thought recent despatches showed that they had done so, and, if they had, he hoped that they would frankly acknowledge it. The usual complaints against this tax—styled "odious" by those very Members of Council who voted for it—was that it was unproductive; that it was novel; and that it was oppressive in the case of officials and other persons with fixed incomes. Every one of these objections was well founded. It was unproductive, owing to the general poverty of the country—in Bengal, out of 36,000,000, only 53,773 had incomes over £50 a-year, and this in the wealthiest Province in India; also from the difficulty of ascertaining and assessing the incomes of the few rich Native bankers and traders. It was novel, and therefore dangerous, in a country where men would endure patiently, as inevitable, almost any amount of exaction by ancient and customary methods, but regard every innovation with mingled hatred and terror. It was hard on officials and Government employés, who found their salaries heavily mulcted at a period when marked increase in the cost of living made a reduction of their pay peculiarly ill-timed. But while such objections as these had been more or less generally admitted, he felt certain that in this country, and in this House, it was not understood what a terrible instrument for grinding the faces of the poor was placed by this, or indeed by any direct tax, in the hands of subordinate Native officials. Some very startling facts had been brought to light by the Indian Press as to the working of the income tax in and around Calcutta. Men had been assessed and fined for non-payment—miserable ryots, whose entire property when sold did not amount to the nominal annual income on which they were assessed—perhaps not even sufficient to pay the fine, amounting to double the tax. Others, again, had paid to the assessors the sums demanded of them, “to save trouble, expense, and insult,” as they said, although their incomes did not amount to half the minimum chargeable with income tax. In one village 25 ryots were assessed; and after a magisterial investigation, it was found that five might, perhaps, be liable to assessment. If such things took place at the Presidency, within sight of the viceregal palace, he asked those who know India what was likely to occur in the remote Mofussil, where no missionaries and no Press existed, and where European officials were few and far between? Nor was it only selfish dishonesty and speculation which must be dreaded, official zeal was equally oppressive, and the desire to find favour in the eyes of a supreme Government. In all Oriental countries the minor agents of Government were a terror to the people, and the favourite title given to a popular Prince or magistrate was “Protector of the Poor.” It was to the sympathy of the British Parliament that the poor of India now looked for protection against this grinding tax.

as a proof of the beneficial results which had followed from that change. In 1856 the imports of India amounted to £25,000,000, and the exports to £23,000,000. Taking the 10 years, during eight of which the new Government had been in existence, the imports were £56,000,000 sterling, and the exports £67,000,000, so that the trade and commerce of India had very nearly trebled; and there was every manifestation of increase during the past year or two. But still the increase had not been so rapid as they had a right to expect. He did not think that the public works were developed with the energy they had a right to expect. Railways and irrigation works would give an immense impetus to the vast internal commercial resources of India. He did not share in the gloomy anticipations of the future of that great Empire. He rejoiced in the appointment of the Select Committee, whose labours, he thought, would be attended with the most beneficial results.

MR. HAVILAND-BURKE observed that last year the Under Secretary laid great stress on five points. The first of these was the military reductions; but in his Statement to-night he saw very little sign of this. The second point was the reduction in the civil charges; but everyone thought they were still very greatly in excess of what they ought to be. There had been a reduction in the charge for public works, and amongst other items was that of irrigation; but this, he thought, was rather to be regretted, for expenditure of this kind was, or ought to be, reproductive. The people would never believe that there was an economical administration in India so long as there were great charges amounting, as one hon. Member said, to £2,000,000, which were almost altogether unaccounted for. It was assumed that the present rulers of India were superior to the former rulers; but there might be a difference of opinion on that point, and it might be maintained that 150 years ago India was in a better condition as to material prosperity than at present.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that as the Government had moved the appointment of a Committee, it was unnecessary at present to discuss Indian financial questions in that House. He would suggest that the inquiry should be divided into two heads, the one being revenue and the other public works; and in that case the investigation might be concluded in a reasonable time.

MR. MACFIE said, that in listening to the statement of the Under Secretary of State he had been struck by the absence of any reference to the Indian Council; and he thought that this omission might possibly provoke the inquiry whether that body was really in existence. Complaint had been made of the want of public interest in Indian affairs; but the only way to excite interest was to increase knowledge of the subject, and to do that it would be advisable to admit the public and reporters to the meetings of the Council, and allow Members of Parliament to be unpaid members of it. He concluded, from the Statement that had been made, that the whole charges of every kind upon the people of India were less than 6s. 8d. per head, and that the proceeds from land and opium provided revenue for the whole cost of the administration—so that the people generally were taxed only for reproductive works. He trusted that economy would not be sought at the expense of the Army or Navy.

MR. GRANT DUFF reviewed at some length the various opinions that had been expressed during the course of the debate.

PAUPER INMATES DISCHARGE AND REGULATION BILL—(No. 16.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he would take the opportunity of entering more largely into the question of vagrancy than was necessitated by a simple exposition of this measure. Those who had attended to the question were probably aware that scarcely any subject had occupied to a larger extent the attention of the Legislature. The first statute was of as early a date as the 14th century, having been passed after the great pestilence. Its object was to punish or discourage vagrancy, and it enforced the principle that every able-bodied poor man must labour for his living; and it contained a provision that no person, on the colour of pity or almsgiving, should, on pain of imprisonment, give anything to encourage vagrants in their slothful disposition. This showed that our forefathers considered indiscriminate charity as one of the most fertile causes of vagrancy. The other statutes, of which an interesting synopsis had been given in a lecture by a Poor Law Inspector, were not of so lenient a character. The stocks, bread and water, corporal punishment, the pillory, cutting off the ears, branding with a hot iron, slavery, transportation, and hanging had been tried at various periods; and when these cruelties were abandoned, we had been content to employ the milder punishment of the treadmill or the tramp-ward. Recent legislation had been chiefly based on an Act of George IV., which, with few amendments, had remained the principal statute on the subject. In 1864 an important measure was passed, known as the Houseless Poor (Metropolis) Act, the chief object of which was to increase the accommodation provided for that class, and to charge the expense of their lodging and maintenance on the "common fund" of the metropolis, instead of on the several parishes or unions. It was, no doubt, a useful Bill; but it was one-sided, looking rather to the benevolent treatment of the vagrant than to the repression, as far as was consistent with humanity, of vagrancy. The result, therefore, as might be expected, was an immediate and considerable increase in the number of vagrants relieved in the metropolitan workhouses. In May, 1864, prior to the operation of the Act, the nightly average was 612; in May, 1865, it rose to 1,106, and in May, 1866, to 1,203. Now, there was some misconception in the public mind as to the existing number of vagrants. The number actually relieved in the workhouses of England and Wales was not so large as was popularly imagined. Taking the night of the 1st of July, when it was usual to take a Census, the number relieved in 1866 was 1,086 in the metropolis, and 4,075 in the rest of England and Wales. In 1867 the numbers were 1,573 and 5,248 respectively; in 1868, 2,085 and 7,946; in 1869, 1,802 and 6,692; and in 1870, 1,760 and 6,630. Taking the 1st of January, the numbers in 1866 were 1,501 and 4,469; in 1867, 1,452 and 5,027; in 1868, 1,673 and 6,129; in 1869, 1,802 and 7,020; and in 1870, 1,627 and 5,430. These figures showed that as the country had recovered from the commercial depression there had been a considerable diminution in vagrancy. They did not, however, show the whole number of vagrants in England and Wales. As far as could be ascertained by the police, the whole number on the night of the 1st of April, 1867, was 32,528; and in 1868, 36,179. No later Returns had been published; but it was believed that such Returns would show a diminution corresponding with that exhibited by the Poor Law Returns. Turning to the remedies which had been suggested to meet this evil, he would first allude to the proposal that the relief of vagrants should be entirely in the hands of the police. This he, at first sight, thought would be very advantageous, for it might be expected that vagrants would have a salutary dread of the police, and that applications for relief would be discouraged. There were, however, serious and, as he thought, fatal objections; in the first place, the police would be taken away from their proper duties; and, in the next, the building of separate sets of wards in connection with police-stations would involve a considerable expense. While rejecting the scheme for these reasons, he admitted that the police might be employed with advantage as assistant relieving-officers—that was, might be entrusted with the temporary relief of vagrants. A second plan, entitled to careful consideration, was that of “way-tickets,” to be given to a vagrant at one workhouse as a passport to another, in the absence of which he would be treated as a professional tramp. This, however, was not consistent with the cardinal principle of Poor Law administration—that the necessaries of life should be afforded to all persons absolutely destitute, but not to such an extent as to encourage them to live at the public expense and to discourage honest labour. Under this system, every person of good character who might set out on his travels in search of work would be entitled to food and lodging at the public expense, and this would be an encouragement to a large class of persons to subsist by such means. It would, moreover, encourage the officers of a union to give away tickets to any persons who might be likely to fall on the rates, and, while holding that every obstacle to the free migration of labourers should be removed, he doubted the policy of offering an artificial stimulus to such migration. Another difficulty was, that if vagrants were divided into two classes, honest wayfarers and professional tramps, the latter would be refused way-tickets, and would yet be punishable if they slept in the open air or in outhouses or farm buildings. A respectable person, on account of nobody knowing his character, might thus be refused a ticket, and consequently be unable to obtain shelter. Such persons would necessarily fall on private charity, which would be called forth by the knowledge that there were persons unable to obtain shelter in the workhouses. The Poor Law did not say that persons of good character should be relieved, but that all destitute persons should be relieved. He deprecated, moreover, the introduction of a passport system, the evils incidental to which on the Continent were well known. Passports were easily forged, and could always be procured by the dishonest; while a respectable man was sometimes unable to procure them. The object to be kept in view was to err neither on the side of humanity, nor on that of severity; but this system would err in both directions—in the latter as regarded the honest wayfarer, in the former as regarded the professional tramp, who would be liable to imprisonment as a rogue and vagabond. He ventured to say that the magistrates would not carry out such a law. It was better to adhere to the system hitherto pursued, with such ameliorations as appeared advisable. One of the defects of the present law was that the Poor Law Board had no power of securing uniformity of treatment as regarded food, lodging, and the labour test. Nothing could be worse than what now happened; that the treatment was comparatively inviting in one Union and deterrent in another. The object of the Bill was first to deal with a class which, though not vagrants, were of a similar class—namely, paupers who were in the habit of taking their discharge from the workhouse, and after a very brief interval of returning to it. It not unfrequently happened that inmates—generally persons of bad character—left in the morning, passed the day in immorality or crime, and returned in the evening. The Bill consequently provided that if a pauper, who had not previously discharged himself within one month, gave notice to leave the workhouse he might be detained, by order of the guardians, for 24 hours; that if he had discharged himself once or oftener within a month, he might be detained 48 hours; and that if he discharged himself more than twice within two months, he might be detained 72 hours. Nobody conversant with the administration of the Poor Law would object, he thought, to this regulation. With regard to vagrants, they had a great objection to being detained in the workhouse beyond the single night they slept there. The Bill provided, not only that they should not be entitled to discharge themselves before 12 o'clock, and before they had performed their allotted task, but that persons who at frequent intervals habitually entered the workhouse should not be entitled to discharge themselves before 9 a.m. of the third day after their admission. This, it was believed, would prove a considerable check upon such practices. The 6th clause enabled the Poor Law Board to issue orders securing uniform diet, lodging, and work throughout England and Wales. By the 7th and 8th clauses any vagrant absconding from the casual ward before he is entitled to discharge himself, would be dealt with as an idle and disorderly person under the Act

5 Geo. IV., c. 83, s. 3; and anyone who has been previously so convicted, or anyone who shall wilfully destroy his clothes, or injure the property of the guardians, was to be dealt with as a rogue and vagabond under the 4th section. The 10th clause provided that where, as in the metropolis, an Asylum Board existed, it might be intrusted with the carrying out of the Bill. The object in view was that where, as in large towns, separate establishments might be built for vagrants, where they might be relieved at smaller cost, and where a separation might be made between the professional tramps and other vagrants, the Boards which under a recent Act managed Asylums for the sick and other classes might manage the vagrant wards, thus avoiding a needless multiplication of Boards. The uniform treatment which the Poor Law Board, if the Bill passed, intended to secure, the separation of the vagrants into two classes, the sufficiently severe task of work, and the power of detention would, he believed, prove great improvements in the present law, without introducing that excessive severity which defeated its own object by stimulating indiscriminate almsgiving.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Kimberley).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he would reserve the discussion of the details of the Bill till the next stage, but having had some experience of the issue of way-tickets, especially in his own county of Hampshire, he would make a few remarks on what the noble Earl had said in reference to that subject. The promoters of that system had urged it as a provisional measure, in the hope that the Government would take up the question. They had been placed in considerable difficulty. Vagrancy had been increasing for many years, and each county had been more or less thrown on its self-defence. In this position the system of way-tickets was, he believed, the best; but he was glad that the question was likely to be made the subject of legislation for the whole country, with a view to a uniform system. As for the hardship apprehended by his noble Friend, to those who for various reasons might be unable to obtain tickets, such persons would be treated just as tramps now were, and would be deprived of the advantages to be enjoyed by the honest wayfarer. The system had been in force in Gloucestershire, and one or two other counties, and he was not aware that tickets had been forged in a single case. He doubted, indeed, whether it would be worth while on the part of anybody to forge them. As to the system encouraging vagrancy, the best reply he could give was that during the last few weeks it had been in operation in Hampshire, and had almost cleared the county of that class of professional tramps. He agreed with his noble Friend in the propriety of detaining vagrants till noon, for he believed nothing would be so much disliked by them as interfering with their habits and throwing them out of their plan for the day. Under the ticket system the honest wayfarer in search of work obtained the privilege of a slightly better diet, was insured food and lodging at the different workhouses along the route, and in a few days was passed out of the county, and so far expedited on his journey. There was no chance of repressing vagrancy, unless the public were satisfied that every fair provision was made for the honest wayfarer, for they would otherwise indulge in indiscriminate almsgiving and thus encourage professional vagrancy; but if the public would determinedly support the movement he thought satisfactory results might be brought about. As far as he was yet acquainted with the provisions of the Bill he was disposed to concur in most of them.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he entirely concurred in the Bill to which the noble Earl had asked them to give a second reading. At the same time, he must point out to his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) that no scheme could be effectual which was not applied to the whole country. It would be very unsatisfactory to have way-tickets in one county and not in another. He cordially approved the Bill, especially the power of preventing the worst class of paupers from leaving and returning to the workhouse as frequently as they chose. As to the statistics quoted by the noble Earl on the subject of vagrancy, he understood his noble Friend to infer that vagrancy was on the decrease. Now, so far as his own experience went, it was steadily increasing — of late, indeed, to an alarming extent; and he would ask whether the latest Returns showed a decrease as far as the whole kingdom was concerned?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY explained that with an improved state of trade the number of vagrants fell from 7,946 in 1868, to 6,692 in 1869, and 6,630 in 1870; but he had not wished to draw any inference as to a steady decrease of the evil.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was not about to take that occasion for criticizing the Bill. He wished to observe that it was a great inconvenience to the labouring class that they could not travel at an expense in any degree corresponding to the advantages enjoyed by other classes. He believed that honest vagrancy would be materially diminished by a slight alteration in railway law. It would be easy to carry labouring men about from place to place at very trivial charges, either by trains specially designated for the purpose, or even by goods trains, at all events with much less danger and hardship than at present. This should be accompanied by the condition of their being allowed to renounce their claim to compensation in case of accident. If any person had a power of renouncing at the railway station his right to compensation for accidents, the companies could carry passengers at a very much cheaper rate than was now practicable. He believed such a provision would gradually introduce an entire revolution in the mode of travelling of the labouring class, and would remove a grievance from which they now suffered greatly, while it would almost wholly remove the existing difficulty of distinguishing between the honest labourer and the professional vagrant.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was much obliged to the noble Marquess for the suggestion, assuring him that the point had not escaped the attention of the Government, though not in connection with the present Bill. The Board of Trade had a plan under consideration last Session. He did not go so far as to think that railway companies should be allowed to kill as many labourers as they pleased.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, they would have the option of renouncing claims to compensation or not.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that practically they would have no chance; they would either have to go at very inconvenient hours and at high fares, or accept this onerous condition. He did not think such a provision would be popular, and he was sure it would not be adopted by the Government. He admitted, however, that the law required some revision, and, without speaking for the Government, it had always been his opinion that in case of cheap trains, there should be a reasonable limit to compensation, thus enabling railway companies to offer cheap fares without being exposed to exorbitant claims.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the Items of Receipts and Expenditure of the Duchy for the Year 1870? The noble Earl said that very recently a right hon. Baronet had, in "another place," made a charge of extravagance and corruption against the management of the Duchy. The imputation met with very little consideration on the part of the noble Lord the Chancellor of the Duchy, and that, as he had been happy to observe, the charge of corruption had been distinctly withdrawn. Such charges, however, left a sting behind them unless they were directly met by persons conversant with the matter, and as the management of a Public Department was in question, he would ask the noble Lord to place on the Table a Return of the Receipts and Expenditure of the Duchy for 1870. There was a high officer at the head of the Duchy, who was frequently a Member of the Cabinet, and there was a Vice Chancellor, who exercised important functions in one of the most populous parts of the country. The expense incurred in its administration must not, therefore, be measured by the same standard as other landed estates.

LORD DUFFERIN: It is impossible for me at once to comply with the noble Earl's request, inasmuch as the accounts of the Duchy for the past year have not yet been closed and audited. As soon, however, as this is completed they will in due course be presented to both Houses of Parliament. The noble Earl's purpose will, perhaps, be equally well served if I take the opportunity of communicating to the House the chief items of receipt and expenditure on behalf of the Duchy during the year 1869, which do not greatly differ from the corresponding items of the past year. I do so with the greater pleasure, because I am certain that a very few words and figures will completely rectify the misapprehensions to which the observations of a right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) in "another place" may have given rise, not only among your Lordships but the public at large. Those observations were brought under my notice by a noble and gallant Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke). I felt at once either that my right hon. Friend must be labouring under some great delusion, or that his words had been misunderstood and misquoted by the reporter; for knowing, as I did, his kind and generous nature, I was sure he would be the last person in the world deliberately to prefer so grave a charge as corruption against a number of public servants who, as I can testify from my own experience and knowledge, are not excelled in their zeal for the public service and in personal trustworthiness by those employed in any public Department with which I have had the honour of being connected. I am happy to think that my appreciation of my right hon. Friend's character has been amply justified by the generous, frank, and handsome manner in which on the very first opportunity that presented itself he came forward—unsolicited by me—and at once withdrew that very obnoxious phrase, which, as he himself has admitted and as I can readily understand, has as it were slipped into his speech during the agony of rhetorical parturition. But although the characters of those immediately concerned have been completely exonerated, there may prevail in some minds a suspicion that the affairs of the Duchy have not been conducted with due regard to economy, and it is desirable, therefore, that I should proceed to explain the exact circumstances of the case. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman was to the effect that whereas the gross income of the Duchy amounted to £50,000 a-year, only £25,000 a-year ever found its way into the Privy Purse. Now, the net revenue of the Duchy paid over to the

Privy Purse in 1869 was £31,000; and another sum appears in the accounts, which must have escaped the attention of the right hon. Baronet — namely, £7,000 placed to the credit of the Duchy as a cash balance; so that the actual amount of net revenue may be placed at £38,000. There still remains, however, between the sums of £50,000 and £38,000 a margin of £12,000, sufficient to challenge investigation and to require explanation. Of this £12,000 there is an item of £1,800 which at once disappears down the capacious throat of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the chape of income and other taxes. That, of course, is an item which is very unpleasant, and it is one which everybody concerned, from the Queen down to the humblest clerk in the Office, would be very glad to see diminished; but it is an item on which we cannot expect to make any considerable impression. Then comes an item of £2,000 expended on the part of the Duchy in donations to local charities, subscriptions to schools and churches, and to those objects which Her Majesty, in common with every landed proprietor, feels it incumbent on her, as the owner of a large landed property, to promote. Then there comes an item of £1,000 a-year expended in annuities and superannuation grants. Upon this item, of course, no impression can be made as long as the recipients live. There is, further, a small sum of about £200 paid to the Judges, in consideration of a portion of their services given to the County Palatine. These sums, together with the salary of the Chancellor, who, being a public officer, can scarcely be regarded as receiving it absolutely in consideration of his management of the property of the Duchy, amount to £7,000 a-year. The remaining £5,000 is left for the payment of expenses, whether in the shape of land agency, office expenses, establishment expenses, connected with very important functions discharged by the Chancellor in London, the audit of the accounts, travelling expenses, estate improvements, and the expenses incidental to the exercise of manorial rights. All these complicated functions, necessitating the employment of a considerable staff of officers, are discharged for £5,000 a-year—that is about 11 or 12 per cent of the total income of the Duchy. Your Lordships' experience, connected extensively as you are with landed property, will be able to say whether, taking into account the fact that there is property of the Duchy in almost every county in England, and that its estates are dispersed over the kingdom, £5,000 is a large sum. Having thus, as I trust, satisfied your Lordships that the revenues of the Duchy are managed with due economy, I would recall your attention to the gratifying circumstance that, while on the one hand, its revenues are continually increasing, the expenses of management during the last few years have been continually decreasing, and I am in a position to state that arrangements have been made whereby, in the course of a few years, as the persons entitled to receive certain sums disappear, there will be a diminution in that item also. I would, further ask the House to remember that the post which I have the honour to fill is an office which has been held by a great number of distinguished persons, in many of whom the country has placed such confidence as to entrust them with the discharge of the highest functions of the State, with the management of the Army, the Navy, Finance, and Foreign Affairs, and that all these arrangements, so severely criticized, have passed under the consideration of each one of them, and have from time to time received such improvement at their hands as they needed. I would observe, further, that my immediate predecessor was a gentleman peculiarly experienced in the management of landed property, and possessing exceptional advantages as regards the Duchy estates, from the fact that he had conterminous estates of his own in the Duchy in the County Palatine. It is also a great pleasure to me to pay a well-deserved tribute to the permanent officer (Mr. Gooch), the Clerk of the Council, who, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) well knows, is a gentleman of very large experience and very great ability. As everyone who has had the good fortune of coming into official relations with him must have remarked, he brings to the consideration and management of the Duchy affairs an amount of precision and conscientious labour such as, I am certain, is nowhere surpassed. Having said this much on the financial management of the Duchy, I may perhaps be permitted to say a word on behalf of the

Chancellor himself. He is popularly regarded as a fortunate personage, who, though shut out from that august Olympus where the Dii majores of the Ministry sit and deliberate, nevertheless enjoys in a peaceful and secluded region a kind of semi-divinity, unembarrassed and unimpeded by those weighty cares and responsibilities which engross the time and industry of his more dignified Colleagues. My own experience has not realized this picture. So far from resembling an Epicurean divinity the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster seems to me to be a kind of charwoman or maid-of-all-work to the Government; at the behest of one or other of the Secretaries of the State he is perpetually being saddled with all manner of work, foreign to his office. Within my own short experience he has been employed during the whole of one year in reorganizing the military education of the Army; during another year in reconstructing the schools of the children of soldiers and in improving the education of the schoolmasters of the Army. He has very narrowly escaped being called upon to preside over the Contagious Diseases Commission, and at this moment his thoughts are, day and night, occupied with the heavy responsibilities connected with the construction of war ships. Perhaps I may better illustrate what is really the position of this supposed sinecurist if I give an account of a single day's work I had to accomplish. In the morning at an early hour I had to present myself on the seat of justice, appropriately robed, and narrowly escaping a full-bottomed wig, and there I had to sit while the Lord Chief Justice delivered to an astonished Bar what he was pleased to call my judgment on the case. As soon as these weighty matters were concluded I had to hurry off to Chelsea Hospital, and in the capacity of Paymaster General of the Forces expend considerable time in admitting pensioners to that asylum, and in considering the claims of applicants for military pensions; thence I had to go to the War Office and employ the rest of the afternoon in examining general officers and colonels in matters requiring much consideration; and after that to attend in your Lordships' House to explain the intricacies of some important piece of Irish legislation. On one occasion I had to conclude 16 hours important public service by being pilloried for a couple of hours on the Woolsack as the locum tenens of the Lord Chancellor of England, while a dilatory House of Commons was putting its last touches to a Bill which noble Lords opposite assured me would greatly depreciate the value of my property in Ireland. I trust that, after this explanation, we shall not hear again that the management of the finances of the Duchy of Lancaster forms a gross instance of extravagance and financial mismanagement, or that the Chancellor of the Duchy, whatever criticisms may be addressed to the individual, is a useless or unnecessary functionary.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY expressed his obligation to the noble Lord for the satisfactory explanations he had made, and hoped, with him, that the charge of extravagance and mismanagement would not be repeated, or that his noble Friend would be again considered an Epicurean and sinecurist. He wished to know, however, the occasion for the cash balance of £7,000, and what policy the noble Lord was pursuing with regard to outlying estates?

LORD DUFFERIN stated that the cash balance was placed to the credit of the Duchy to meet those charges which it was known would accrue before the revenue of the Duchy became payable. As regarded the question of outlying estates, he had continued the policy pursued by his predecessors, and had never hesitated to sell such estates whenever occasion offered for doing so to advantage, while he had been extremely cautious about purchasing property except where it so lay into Duchy property as to make its acquisition clearly desirable.

OPPOSED PRIVATE BILLS.

The Lords following; viz.,

M. Lansdowne.		L. Colville of Culross.
Ld. Steward.		L. Skelmersdale.

were appointed, with the Chairman of Committees, a Committee to select and propose to the House the names of the five Lords to form a Select Committee for the consideration of each opposed Private Bill.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Monday, 27th February, 1871.*MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Diplomatic and Consular Services, *nominated.*PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading—Education (Scotland) [17].REVISION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.
QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it be the intention of the Foreign Department of Her Majesty's Government to promote a revision of International Law with the view of defining the external duties of nations and of their subjects?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Her Majesty's Government are fully sensible of the importance of defining the external duties of nations and of their subjects. They have proved this by the amended Foreign Jurisdiction Act of last Session, and by the appointment of the Commissioners who have proceeded to Washington; but, at the present juncture, they can give no more definite promise to the hon. Baronet than that the importance of this subject shall receive the fullest consideration at their hands.

IRELAND—NEW BARRACKS FOR TIPPERARY.—QUESTION.

MR. HERON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to commence the building of the new Barracks for Tipperary during the present year; and whether he has considered the wealth and population of the district, and intends to build the Barracks of sufficient size and accommodation to be the head quarters of a regiment?

MR. CARDWELL: The provision to be made at Tipperary will not be founded upon consideration of the wealth and population of the district, but upon the requirements of the service. It is not intended to provide for the accommodation of the head quarters of a regiment, but only for six officers, nine sergeants, and 154 rank and file.

THE LAWS OF MARRIAGE.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to bring in the general measure on the Laws of Marriage, which he informed the House in the Session of 1869, that he would introduce at the earliest possible moment?

MR. BRUCE begged to inform the hon. Member that what he had stated in 1869 was that he could not, on the part of the Government, undertake to introduce a Bill on this subject in 1870; and he now begged to state that he could not, on the part of the Government, undertake to introduce a Bill on the subject during the present Session.

EDUCATION—THE NEW CODE.

QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will state the grounds upon which he has in the Revised Code increased the number of attendances of School Children from two hundred per annum to two hundred and fifty; and whether he can lay the data upon which he has acted before Parliament; the grounds upon which he has made the changes with reference to Evening Schools; and if he will lay the data upon which he has made them before Parliament; and, whether as by the Act relating to Printworks now in force children there employed are only required to attend one hundred and twenty times, and one hundred attendances qualify for examination, the New Code, which requires one hundred and fifty attendances to qualify for examination, will during this year be put in force?

MR. W. E. FORSTER had to state, in reply to the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's Question, that the grounds upon which the compulsory attendances of the children had been increased from 200 to 250 were because it was felt that the amount of attendance required from children under the old system was too small; that there could be no greater evil than a want of due attendance at school on their part; and, lastly, because it appeared from the statistics that this additional stimulus could be safely applied. It appeared from statistics obtained from the manufacturing, the sea-ports, the metropolitan, and the rural districts, that 80 per cent of the children hitherto presented for examination had attended 250 times. If the right hon. Gentleman would move for further information upon the point, he should be happy to give it to him. With regard to the night schools, several alterations had been made in the Code. Perhaps the House would permit him to explain how those schools had been dealt with. The Council of Education had come to the conclusion that the night-school system required careful revision. There were many night schools which, although doubtless of much advantage in a social point of view, were almost valueless in an educational point of view, and the Council had come to the conclusion that it would not be right to ask the House for money unless they gave substantial educational results. Under these circumstances, it had been determined to alter the mode of examinations, which, in future, would be conducted either by the Inspectors or by other officials, and not left in the hands of the managers solely. It had also been determined to allow Government aid to night schools not connected with day schools, and the amount of the grant had been considerably increased. At present all that was required was that the schools should be open on 40 evenings in the year, and that those who were presented for examination should have been present on 24 evenings, and it was felt that it was desirable that the number of evenings on which the schools should be open should be increased to 80, and the attendance required to 50. With respect to the last part of the right hon. Gentleman's Question he had to state that there were now only about 1,000 children under the operation of the Act, and probably the new regulations would be put into force with regard to them at the beginning of next year.

ARMY—YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

QUESTION.

MR. MILLES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the reductions proposed last year of the number of Troops and Officers in the different Regiments of Yeomanry Cavalry are to be carried out from the 1st of April next?

MR. CARDWELL: The new regulations for the Yeomanry made last year had in view the increased efficiency of the force, as well as some economy in the expenditure upon it. No change has been made in those regulations, and the present Estimate has been framed upon them.

NAVY—SALE OF DEPTFORD DOCKYARD.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the sale of Deptford Dockyard to Mr. Austen was completed, and the purchase-money paid, before the transfer of Mr. Austen's rights in the property to the Corporation of London; and, also, if he is aware that a very large sum was given for the site by the Corporation beyond the price for which it was sold by the Admiralty?

MR. BAXTER: The sale of a portion of Deptford Dockyard was so far completed that the bargain had been made before the transfer of Mr. Austen's rights to the Corporation. The purchase-money, however, had not been paid, because, in the first instance, there was considerable delay in consequence of questions having arisen between the Admiralty and the Woods and Forests, and afterwards because the City of London applied to have the title direct from the Admiralty. I have no knowledge, except from common rumour, of the pecuniary arrangement which has been made between Mr. Austen and the City of London; but I do know—and I stated it to the House in May last—that the Corporation then might have purchased the property for the price given by Mr. Austen. Let me remind the hon. Baronet that when he brought forward this question last year my statement was corroborated by the hon. Baronet the Member for Greenwich, whose words were, he (Sir David Salomons) called on the Secretary of the Admiralty and asked him whether a price had been put upon it, and the reply he received was that he thought the price was £80,000, but that £75,000 might be taken. With this information he went into the City, and, failing to induce the Corporation to purchase the dockyard for their contemplated market, he tried to induce the dock companies to do so, but failed in this also.

ARMY—MILITARY EXAMINATIONS— UNIVERSITY CANDIDATES.—QUESTION.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether gentlemen who took their degree of B.A. at Oxford or Cambridge last autumn, and were invited to go to Sandhurst until appointed to some regiment, will not be allowed precedence of those who have passed the ordinary military or any other examination since that period?

MR. CARDWELL: The University candidates are appointed to the number of commissions assigned to them without regard to relative precedence in respect of other candidates. At present the number assigned is 12 in the year, and they are appointed, as nearly as may be, at the rate of one a month.

THE EDUCATION ACT—VOTING FOR SCHOOL BOARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering that the Second Schedule of the Education Act enacts that the poll of a parish shall be taken in like manner as a poll of ratepayers is usually taken, the Education Department has power to direct that in voting as to the expediency of having a Board the ratepayer is to have but one vote?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he conceived that to admit the principle of plurality of votes would be contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the Education Act. Therefore, the Department would not think of directing that any elector should have more than one vote.

METROPOLIS—ALBERT MEMORIAL AND THE HALL OF SCIENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Who signed the alteration in line of the broad walk by Speke's Monument in Kensington Gardens; and, whether the walk being made to run direct towards the Memorial of the late Prince Consort is with the view of showing how much the effect of that beautiful structure is injured by the proximity of the Hall of Science immediately to the south of it?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, the second part of the Question assumed as a fact that which appeared to be simply a description of the hon. Member's own feelings with respect to art. The fact was that the site for the Albert Memorial was selected in order that it might be in close proximity to the site for the Albert Hall; and the walk to which he refers was made not for the purpose of enabling people to see through, but to walk upon, from the centre of Kensington Gardens to the Albert Memorial, in order that persons might avail themselves of the ground laid down around the Memorial, for the purpose of looking at it from any point of view they might like best.

RETIREMENT AND COMPENSATION IN THE CUSTOMS.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is proposed, upon the reductions in the Customs staff in London taking place, to offer the same terms of retirement and Compensation as were given in the War Office reductions; and, whether the Customs officials who shall remain are to be paid at the same rate as their fellows in west-end departments?

MR. STANSFELD said, in answer to the first part of the Question, that the Commissioners of Customs had been authorized to offer the same terms of retirement and compensation upon the reductions in the Customs staff as were given in the War Office reductions. With regard to the second part of the Question, he must say that the Treasury received from time to time applications from the clerks in various Departments for increased salaries, and in many cases they accompanied the applications with statements of salaries paid in other Departments; but however much those applications might vary in some respects, they were identical in that the applicants invariably compared their own salaries with those which were higher, and never with those which were lower. Therefore, if Her Majesty's Government were to accept the principle suggested in the Question of his hon. Friend, two things would follow: in the first place, the salaries in each Department would be raised to what is now the most highly paid Department; and in the second, as the equality of payment so arrived at would be entirely artificial and not justified by the labour performed or the qualifications required for its performance, a new crop of applications would immediately spring up. He must, therefore, give a positive negative to the second part of his hon. Friend's Question, and he would add that, in his opinion, the only true principle upon which to deal with public officials and their salaries was to pay them the full market value of their labour, always taking into account rights founded upon contracts expressed or implied.

should be happy to give it to him. With regard to the night schools, several alterations had been made in the Code. IRELAND—CORONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Memorial which has been lately addressed to the Lord Lieutenant by eighty of the Irish Coroners, requesting that a measure may be introduced by Government on their behalf in accordance with the pledge of last Session, and irrespective of the proposed Grand Jury Bill?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In the first place, I must apologize for my unavoidable and unexpected absence from the House on Friday last. I have no objection to lay on the Table the memorial referred to by the hon. Member; but I must guard against the impression that any pledge was given by the Government in last Session that a measure would be introduced this Session independently of the Grand Jury Bill. The pledge, as I understood, was, that the subject of the Coroners would be included in the Grand Jury Bill to be introduced in the present Session.

BRAZIL—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the investigation of the claims of British Subjects against the Government of Brazil has yet been completed; and, whether there is now a prospect of their being paid?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Before making any proposal to the Brazilian Government for the settlement of claims of British and Brazilian subjects, it was necessary to arrive at as accurate an estimate as possible of the amount at which the Brazilian claims could be set. This was a work of considerable labour, and was kindly undertaken by a gentleman peculiarly conversant with the questions at issue. The result of his inquiry is now before the Secretary of State, and it is hoped that instructions may shortly be sent to Brazil on this subject.

IRELAND—VACANT SEATS.
QUESTION.

MR. HERON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session to provide for the Distribution of the Seats vacant by the Disfranchisement of Cashel and Sligo?

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If, in the event of a Bill being introduced to provide for the distribution of seats vacant by the disfranchisement of Cashel and Sligo, he will consider the claims of Dublin and Belfast to return three Members each to Parliament?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in answer to the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Heron) said, Her Majesty's Government had not yet decided whether they would, in the present Session, be able to introduce a Bill for the distribution of the seats rendered vacant by disfranchisement either in England or Ireland. In reply to the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston), he said, that in considering the question when the proper time came, the claims of cities so important as Dublin and Belfast would be very carefully considered.

EDUCATION—SUPERANNUATION OF SCHOOLMASTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Government is prepared to assist the Schoolmasters receiving Government Grants to establish a system of mutual superannuation?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that the Question was a very important one, and the Education Department had very carefully considered whether it was possible for them to initiate some such system as that to which the hon. Member in his Question referred. They had found it impossible to take that step; but as there could be no doubt as to the importance of providing pensions for schoolmasters, the Government would be glad to consider a scheme for the purpose, if it could be drawn up on behalf of the managers, and intrusted to the hands, say of his hon. Friend, who had asked the Question now under consideration. They would do this the more gladly for the reason that, though they recognized the importance of the subject, the Government could not put itself in direct communication with such an immense body of men as the schoolmasters would shortly become under the operation of the Education Act of last Session.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—GRANTS TO ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. DIXON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether under the last paragraph of Clause 74 in the Education (Scotland) Bill the Scotch Education Department would not have power to make Grants to Roman Catholic and other Schools that may be hereafter erected but not placed under the control and management of the School Board; and, whether this power be not inconsistent with Clauses 28 and 29, which require the School Boards to provide all necessary School accommodation?

THE LORD ADVOCATE replied that the leading enactment provided that Parliamentary grants might be made to any schools which, in the opinion of the Education Department, were efficiently conducting the secular education of the parish or district in which they were situate. To this there were two qualifications, the first being that no such grant should be made to any such school in respect of religious instruction; and the second, that no such grant should be made to any school, not being a public school, established after the passing of the Act, unless such school should, after inquiry made, appear to the Department to be specially suited to the requirements of the parish in which it was situate. He would answer the last sentence of the Question in the course of the discussion that would shortly be held on the Scotch Education Bill.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—ENTRY OF GERMAN TROOPS INTO PARIS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY: I wish to ask some Questions of the Prime Minister, of which circumstances prevented me from giving any other than a private Notice to him. I am given to understand that the state of affairs is such that it is desirable I should confine myself to putting the Questions. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend, Whether it is true, as stated in The Times of this morning, that peace has been agreed on at Versailles as between the Prussian Government and the French Plenipotentiaries, and, if so, whether the terms are correctly stated; the terms being these—France is to yield to Germany Alsace and Lorraine, including the fortified town of Metz, and to pay a further indemnity of £200,000,000? If that indemnity is correct, I wish to ask my right hon. Friend, whether other parts of France than the Provinces that have been ceded are to be occupied by the German troops until that debt is discharged? I wish further to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether Her Majesty's Government, to use his own words, has been watchful, and has endeavoured, in concert with other neutral Powers, to moderate these terms, and, if not in concert with other neutral Powers, whether instructions in this sense have been given to Mr. Odo Russell? I am informed that the triumphal entry of German troops into Paris has been adjourned until Wednesday next. We have at the head quarters of the German Army at this moment a special envoy and two military attachés—one a general officer and the other a captain of dragoons, both distinguished officers of Her Majesty's Service. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend, whether orders have been sent to these Military Officers, should the head quarters of the German Army be transferred by this triumphal entry to Paris itself, not to take part with or accompany the German troops during their triumphal entry into Paris?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will answer the Questions of my hon. Friend as distinctly as present circumstances will permit. I will begin by thanking my hon. Friend for the considerate course he has pursued in confining himself at the present moment to putting these inquiries, without entering upon a discussion which I think would have been premature. As regards the first Question of my hon. Friend, with respect to the conditions of peace, the German Ambassador was kind enough to communicate to Lord Granville and myself this morning authentic intelligence that the preliminaries of peace have been signed; but that, I believe, is the only knowledge of which we are officially in possession at the present hour. Therefore, I am not in a condition to give my hon. Friend any further information on this subject. With respect to the second and third Questions—namely, whether the Government has made any effort in concert with neutral Powers to moderate the terms of peace, and whether instructions have been sent in this sense to

Mr. Odo Russell—my hon. Friend has referred to a declaration made by myself in the House of Commons that we should carefully watch for any opportunities that might offer of being useful. With regard to these two Questions, I have to say that we have not been unmindful of that declaration; but I must beg my hon. Friend to be content with that answer. We shall not lose a moment, I can assure him, in laying before the House all the information which will place them in full possession of such steps as we have thought it our duty to take. But that information will not be complete until we have received from France communications of which we are in expectation, but which have not yet had time to arrive. I trust that in a very short period we shall be able to lay on the Table of the House Papers which will convey information on the subject. With respect to the fourth Question—whether orders have been sent to the military attachés at the head quarters of the German Army not to accompany German troops in any triumphal entry into Paris—there is no reason why it should not be answered at once. The general rule which is laid down in the instructions of the Foreign Office with respect to the line of conduct to be pursued by our agents abroad in cases of celebrations, which are commonly of a religious kind, is this—it is dated 1860. The instruction refers to celebrations of military success in foreign countries. It contains these words—

That is not the whole of the language, but that is the practical effect of it. Of course, in general, this applies to diplomatic agents, and cases of military agents would not absolutely and primâ facie fall into the same category. At the same time, Her Majesty’s Government are of opinion that substantially the same rule ought to be observed; and, having no other desire than that of acting both according to the letter and according to the spirit of neutral obligations, they have directed General Walker and Captain Hozier not to accompany any triumphal entry into Paris. There is a precedent which I think is applicable to the case; for in the year 1859, at the close of the war waged by the Emperor Napoleon with Italy, Colonel Claremont had been attaché to the Italian Army, and he was directed not to enter Paris with the French Army in triumphal procession. If it was thought right that Colonel Claremont should not accompany any triumphal procession of the French Army into its own capital, I think it is manifest that it would be improper to allow any of our officers to accompany a triumphal procession of a foreign Army into that capital.

IRELAND—WESTMEATH, &c. UNLAWFUL COMBINATIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the House is aware that a Notice was given by the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of his intention to make a Motion of very great importance with respect to a portion of Ireland. It seems to me that it would be most agreeable to the House that no time should be lost in giving information on this subject. Therefore, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should avail himself of the privilege of postponing the Orders of the Day, in order that that Motion might be brought under the consideration of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to make a suggestion of this kind, but my answer was that I should have been very glad to accede to such a suggestion had I been in the possession of it at the time when the Notice was given. But the Government gave an engagement to the Scotch Members, and to the House in general, that they would proceed with the Scotch Education Bill as the first important business this evening. We had every reason to suppose that that measure, which has been so long delayed, and with regard to which Scotland has very naturally become eager, would not occupy any very considerable portion of the evening. Therefore, I should not feel justified in proposing, without Notice of Motion, that the Orders of the Day should be postponed. At the same time, I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be very inconvenient that the Motion of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) should be made except at a convenient hour. Therefore, for the purpose of obviating any possible difficulty upon that subject, and having had some information since I came down to the House as to the time which the debate on the second reading of the Scotch Education Bill is likely to occupy, and seeing that there is no other measure with which it is material for us to go forward, we shall propose the postponement of the other Orders of the Day to take the Notice of my noble Friend after the debate on the second reading of the Scotch Education Bill has concluded. If, however, that debate should not be concluded at 9 o'clock, we shall move that it be adjourned, in order that my noble Friend may make his Motion.

NAVY—CASE OF SIR SPENCER ROBINSON.—OBSERVATIONS. QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN HAY: I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a moment in reference to the Correspondence between Sir Spencer Robinson and the First Lord of the Treasury—to the challenge which the right hon. Gentleman threw out to me to bring before the House in a distinct form the allegation respecting the suggested alteration of the dates. I immediately gave Notice that I would bring the subject under discussion, and I now wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will lay on the Table a Copy of the Correspondence, in order that that discussion may take place?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it does not appear to me that the correspondence between myself and Sir Spencer Robinson is such as could be regularly laid on the Table of the House. I will not enter into the reasons, but they are various, which would prevent me from laying such Papers on the Table of the House. In regard to the matter of the correspondence, it is entirely at the command of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and he can pursue his own course with respect to it. It is a mistake on his part to say that I challenged him to discuss the subject of that correspondence. The challenge, if such it was, was originated in this way—that the hon. and gallant Baronet seemed by his cheers to support the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that I had wished the date of a document to be falsified.

MR. KINNAIRD asked, Whether the Secretary to the Admiralty would state why the Minute of Sir Spencer Robinson, in answer to the Minute of the First Lord of the Admiralty, which has been laid on the Table of the other House two or three days ago, has not been laid on the Table of this House?

MR. BAXTER said, the hon. Member was not quite correct as to the facts. The Minute had been laid on the Table of both Houses, but had not as yet been printed. It would, however, be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow morning.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reference to the appointment of the Committee on this subject, asked after what hour the question would not be brought on?

MR. GLADSTONE: If there is any disposition to question the list of names as it stands on the Paper, I will take care that it is not brought on at an inconvenient hour.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. William Edward Forster.)

[BILL 17.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GORDON said, it was essential that time should be allowed the people of Scotland for the proper consideration of the provisions of this measure. On the first day of the meeting of Parliament his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate in the discharge of his duty gave Notice that he would, on the following Monday, move for leave to introduce this Bill. This prompt action was to have been expected, because the measure was one that had been anticipated for a considerable time, and had been mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech. On the following Monday the House had the satisfaction of hearing from the Lord Advocate an explanation of the general provisions of the Bill. It appeared from that statement that the measure about to be introduced was one of very great importance, affecting the interests of individuals, of Churches and denominations, of education and religion, and, therefore, he ventured to think that even had it not contained two provisions which had not been included in any previous Bill, a considerable interval should have been allowed before the second reading was moved. But in the statement with which his right hon. and learned Friend introduced the Bill he intimated that it would contain several provisions which were not only new, but quite inconsistent with the recommendations of the Commission which had reported on the subject, and also inconsistent with the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, and with the measure which had been proposed by them in 1869. It was, therefore, the duty of his right hon. and learned Friend, when asking leave to introduce the Bill, to fix such a day for the second reading as would admit of the Bill receiving due consideration. His right hon. and learned Friend, however, proposed that the second reading should be taken on the Monday fortnight. If the Bill had been printed in due time that interval might have been sufficient for a consideration of its provisions. But what was the actual state of affairs? They waited during the whole of the first week for the delivery of copies of the Bill. During that week he saw many hon. Gentlemen, Members of the House and others, interested in the subject, visiting the Bill Office like pilgrims to some popular shrine; but the answer to all their inquiries was that the Bill was being subjected to revision. But surely with the advantages which the Government had at command, and as their Bills were printed by the Queen's Printer, they ought to be in the hands of Members immediately, or, at all events, shortly after their introduction. But the first week elapsed and there was no Bill. Then, on the Monday following, a few copies reached some fortunate individuals who had been ardently hunting them; but it was not until Tuesday that the Bill was issued; the result being that, instead of 14, or at least 10 days for the consideration of a measure of such importance, they had not more than five. Moreover, it was necessary that they should get the views of their constituents on so important a subject; but with the very insufficient postal facilities in Scotland it was impossible that that could be done in so short a time. Now he asserted that five days was a very insufficient time for the consideration of such a Bill. The cause of delay he did not know. There might, perhaps, have been some material change in the provisions of the Bill; but these ought to have been settled before its introduction; or there might have been some contest with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the amount to be bestowed on the Scotch people for the promotion of their education; for his right hon. and learned Friend on bringing in the Bill gave the House a glowing description of the benefits to be bestowed upon Scotland by the measure: he stated, according to some reports, that "seven" times, and according to other reports that "several" times, as much would be expended on education in Scotland as was now the case; but on examining the Bill he found that no addition whatever was made to the contribution of the Government in support of the Scotch schools. Certainly Scotch Members could not expect that more would be granted to them than the 50 per cent granted to English schools; but then it should be noted that, while the Bill professed to give a grant of 50 per cent, there were such numerous deductions that the addition to an ordinary school would appear to be more like 15 per cent than 50. Now, as he had said, he much regretted that there had not been time to receive information from their constituents. No doubt many hon. Members might reply that they were complete masters of the subject; but he ventured to affirm that it was the duty of the Scotch Members—especially when a Bill containing new propositions was brought before the House—to wait for information as to the reception it would meet with in Scotland. What that reception would be it was difficult to say; but he had observed that there was a studied reserve in the expression of an opinion on the part of the newspapers in Scotland, particularly those connected with Members on the other side. There was an exception, however;—there was one newspaper which had spoken out, and that was one materially connected with the county which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary represented (Renfrewshire). That paper used some exceedingly strong expressions as to the manner in which the promoters of this Bill had proceeded—they said that their examination of the Bill had served to confirm their original impression both as to its merits and demerits, and especially as to the sweeping nature of the change it proposed: that the entire Scotch principle of education had been altered, and there remained a spick-and-span new system carefully divested of every national peculiarity. The question, however, was—What is the Bill we now have to consider. It contained many provisions which he (Mr. Gordon) highly approved. It provided for the establishment of a system of education in burghs where a great deficiency existed at present. It also provided for the establishment of evening schools and industrial schools; and that, too, he approved. He felt great difficulty, therefore, in taking any course which would have the appearance of a Motion for the rejection of the Bill on the ground of principle. At the same time, as the Bill contained some provisions which were novel as regarded Scotland, and opposed to the conduct of Government on former occasions, he thought it a question worthy the consideration of the House whether there should not be some delay with regard to the second reading. He held it to be of the greatest importance that there should be a discussion on the second reading of any such Bill as this, because, if the discussion was delayed until the House went into Committee, it would be quite impossible to get together a sufficient number of Members interested in its details, and it was only by ventilating questions which arose on the face of the Bill, that a fair attendance of Members, and consequently a fair consideration of Amendments, could be afterwards secured. He, therefore, respectfully submitted to the Government whether it would not be better that the debate upon this question should be adjourned. He saw, indeed, that at a meeting of the Edinburgh Free Presbytery this was expected. Moreover, the Free Church and Established Commissions of the General Assembly were to meet on Wednesday next, and it was of the utmost importance that the question with which the Bill dealt should be discussed by those Commissions. Nor did he see any reason why the Government should not be able to fix the measure for some future day. The Home Secretary told his constituents in Scotland that this would be a Scotch Session, and, therefore, he did not see why he should be unable to appropriate a day somewhat later for the consideration of this great Scotch measure. To show how important it was that further time should be granted, he would make a few remarks on those provisions of the Bill which were new. The House would remember that a Commission was issued in 1864 for the purpose of inquiring into the subject of Scotch education. It was composed of men of all political parties. It included, among others, a former Speaker of the House of Commons (Lord Dunfermline), the Duke of Argyll, Lord Polwarth, and other distinguished men, who fairly represented the educational and religious interests of Scotland. They recommended in their Report, which appeared in 1867, that a Central Board of Management for the superintendence of the schools in Scotland should be established, and that that Board should hold its meetings in that country. They also recommended that the parochial schools should be left untouched; and they reported that in Scotland what was known as the religious difficulty had no existence. They added, with reference to the state of education in the country districts apart from Glasgow, and some of the large towns, where there was great educational destitution, that there were 1 in 6·25 children attending schools—a larger percentage than in the case of Prussia. Now, Scotchmen were rather inclined to pride themselves on the state of education in their country; but they were scarcely prepared to find that the proportion of children attending school was even greater than in Prussia. As to the deficiency of education, the Commissioners reported that there were about 200 schools required. But when that recommendation came to be examined it would be found that they had set down every instance in which a clergyman had thought proper to say that an additional school was wanted, although on the face of the Report it was evident that so small was the number of the inhabitants in some of these districts that it was impossible that schools should be placed there solely for their benefit. The question which he wished, in the first place, to consider was that which it was proposed to do with respect to the superintendence of education in Scotland. On looking at Sections 2 and 3 of the Bill he found they contained provisions for the establishment of what was called a Scotch Education Department, which was to have all the rights and privileges conferred on the English Education Department, in addition to others conferred by the present measure. Then it was provided that the Scotch Education Department should be at liberty to employ the officers who might be from time to time employed by the Education Department in England. In other words, the permanent officials of the Scotch Education Department would be the same as those now attached to the English Board. Now, that provision would, he felt satisfied, be very unpopular in Scotland. He was confident that among Scotchmen there was but one opinion as to their ability to manage their own educational affairs, and that they did not wish to be mixed up in any way with the Privy Council. It was, moreover, provided that Scotland might be invaded occasionally by sending officers down there for the purpose of obtaining information on educational matters; but that, too, was a proposal which, he ventured to say, would be very distasteful to the people of that country. Now, those provisions with regard to the Board for superintending the schools in Scotland were entirely in opposition to the Report of the Commissioners, who were unanimous in recommending that there should be an Educational Board established in Scotland; although they differed, and he thought very properly, as to what should be the constitution of that Board. It had been, for instance, proposed to place on the Board the Provosts of three or four of the towns, notwithstanding the general feeling that they would not, on the whole, be suitable representatives; for the reason, among others, apart from any question of personal fitness, that their time was already fully occupied with their own municipal affairs. But that there should be an Education Board in Scotland was not the opinion of the Commissioners only. In 1869, when the Scotch Education Bill was brought forward in the House of Lords, what took place? The most natural person to introduce the measure would have been the Lord President of the Council (Earl De Grey and Ripon); but instead of that nobleman—the head of the Educational Department in England—the duty was entrusted to the Duke of Argyll, the Secretary of State for India. What was the reason for this? Plainly because he was acquainted with the system of education which prevailed in Scotland, as well as with the habits, feelings, and prejudices of the Scotch people. For that reason the Duke of Argyll, and not the President of the Education Board, was selected to introduce the Bill into the House of Lords. [The LORD ADVOCATE: There was another reason; the Duke of Argyll had been Chairman of the Commission.] At all events, the matter must have been well considered by the Government; and, that being so, it was important to learn what the Duke of Argyll said in introducing the Bill into the House of Lords. His Grace said that there must be some properly constituted authority to go over Scotland and say where education was defective, and where more or new schools were required. His Grace went on to say—

“That being the case, we must have some authority instituted to which Parliament will commit that full power of investigation as to the localities in which new school accommodation is required. The only point which I have heard questioned as to the Report of the Commission is as to the constitution of the authority to be vested with these large and discretionary powers. I have heard differences of opinion as to whether it should be vested in a Department of the Government in London, or in some body more particularly connected with Scotland. Now, for my own part, I cannot conceive any doubt being entertained on the question by those who have really looked into the extent and nature of the power it is proposed to entrust to this body. I have great respect for my noble Friend the President of the Council (Earl de Grey). There are few persons in England to whom I would more completely defer as a discretionary authority in such matters. I know that to some extent he is acquainted with Scotland, and that, at all events, during those two months in which Englishmen betake themselves for health of body and mind to Scotland, he occasionally honours us with his presence. But still I confess that if an ukase came from his office to me, saying ‘In your parish there is a great want of a school, and I desire it should be erected,’ I am not quite sure how I should comport myself in deference to the authority delegated to my noble Friend. It seems to me apparent that where you give such large powers, independent of parochial and municipal authorities, you must vest them in some body which is in the main Scotch, which is acquainted with the feelings and habits of the Scotch people, with the principles of their educational system, and, above all, which is of a representative character. It was on these grounds, and with these feelings, that the Commissioners unanimously recommended that a discretionary power should be vested in the Board, which was sketched in their draft Bill.”—[3 Hansard, cxciv. 287.]

His Grace then alluded to the different bodies who were to be represented on the Board, and gave his clear and explicit opinion—and no one was better able to give an opinion on the subject of education than the Duke of Argyll—that there should be a superintending Board sitting in Scotland. Well, the question came before this House, and the late Lord Advocate, the present Lord Justice Clerk, referring to the proposal to make the Privy Council the Board of Education, said he had come already to the conclusion that there must be a Central Board in Scotland. Now, those were the answers of two men well entitled to express their opinion on the subject, both of whom had made the matter the subject of their earnest consideration. Opinions had also been expressed on the subject by the Home Secretary, and Vice President of the Council (Mr. W. E. Forster), and these were likewise in favour of the Scotch Board. The latter said there was no intention of interfering with the matter except as regarded the grants of the Privy Council, the control of which the Council desired to keep to themselves. Now, the disposal of the grant was a consideration that might very fairly be left to the Privy Council, though, at the same time, it was a question whether it would not be better that a sum of money should be voted to the Scotch Board for educational purposes. But it was never suggested that all supervision as regarded Scottish education on the part of a general Board in Scotland should be extinguished, and the present Lord Advocate supported Lord Moncreiff in the proposal then made. Why, then, had the Government changed their policy? In introducing the Bill the right hon. Gentleman said the Government were going to be so liberal that he was almost ashamed to state the extent of the grant, but the amount now given would be increased several times, or, as another report had it, seven times. I was astonished when I heard this, and had no great hopes of the promise being realized. In what way was the liberality of the Government to be extended to Scotland? This Bill did not indicate it. The right hon. Gentleman said, in effect—"Do you expect we would give the management of so large a sum to a Scotch Board?" Such a question was enough to rouse the ire of any Scotchman. What was done with respect to Ireland? Ireland received £400,000 for educational purposes, and there was an Irish Board, with paid officials. Why was Scotland to be differently treated? Ireland was a spoilt child, and, like other spoilt children, gave a great deal of trouble to its parents. Unfortunate Scotchmen—though, perhaps, he should not call them unfortunate—did not grumble or proceed to acts of violence; but that was no reason why they should be treated worse than Irishmen in the bestowal of favours by the Government. That was a mode of treatment of which Scotchmen had just reason to complain, and it was inconsistent alike with the recommendations of the Commissioners, and with the arguments and acts of the Government themselves in 1869. The only reason suggested by his right hon. Friend was that Scotchmen could not be trusted with the management of so large a sum. That Scotchmen could not look after money was a statement he had never heard before. His hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had shown that they contributed to the Exchequer a larger amount than Ireland did, and that there was a much smaller expenditure by the Government in Scotland than in Ireland. That proposition would, therefore, be distasteful to the people of Scotland—it would certainly make the English Board very unpopular—it was a new proposition, and he wished that time had been given to the country to consider the matter, instead of pressing forward the Bill with such undue haste. His argument against the proposal was not founded merely on sentiment, though such arguments had been used to carry great measures. A Scottish Board was necessary for good and substantial reasons. If, for example, the Board was in London, there would be great difficulty in communicating. Then it was no slight matter for schoolmasters to be put to the inconvenience and expense of travelling up to London. His principal reason, however, for pressing a Scotch Board sitting in Scotland was, that the people of Scotland desired it; and he could admit no doubt that it would properly discharge its duties. The Board in England would have the right of dismissing teachers; and here he must say the provisions of the Bill were exceedingly harsh towards that class of persons. Any of the new teachers might be dismissed without, apparently, any notice of the charges against them. There was a provision that schoolmasters who had a life interest in their offices should have a copy of the charges before dismissal; but, under Section 70, it was in the power of the Privy Council to withdraw their certificates of competency, the effect of which would be the destruction of the prospects of these men, who could not hold office without such certificates. These were cases of individual hardship, which the injured parties would have the greatest difficulty in bringing before Parliament. He maintained that a Scotch Board would act with a more direct sense of responsibility than any English Board possibly could, and that they were better fitted to administer the system of school education than the Board proposed by the Bill. He thought that all the arguments of his right hon. and learned Friend against a Scotch Board amounted in substance to this—that you could not entrust Scotchmen with the administration of the fund. His answer was, that a Scotch Board was quite as trustworthy as an Irish Board. In questioning the expediency of entrusting such powers to the Privy Council, he was making no charge against the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster), or against the Home Secretary, who was a Scotchman; but it was impossible that Englishmen could efficiently superintend the vast duties which now devolved upon them under the Education Act, along with similar duties as regarded Scotland. Many of these duties necessarily devolved upon subordinate officials, and when once an order issued from the Board, it was like the laws of the Medes and Persians—very difficult to alter. Another point worthy of consideration was, that in the Bill there was no limitation as regarded the amount of rate. The Bill gave power to the Privy Council to order, without restriction, such buildings as they might think proper; and, therefore, the ratepayers would have to consider whether that was a proper power to be vested in a Board discharging its duties in London. By the provision contained in the 4th section of the Bill, a school board was to be elected in every parish and burgh. Now that section, taken in connection with the following clauses, involved the entire destruction of the parish schools as they now exist in Scotland. The Bill, he must say, was framed in a somewhat peculiar way. It was designated “a Bill to amend and extend the provisions of the law on the subject of Education in Scotland,” and recited in the Preamble certain former Acts on the subject; and then goes on—“Whereas it is desirable,” &c. Now, one would suppose that that would be followed up by leaving at least some remnant of the Acts recited in the Preamble—because the usual course was to begin by repealing the Acts; but it was not till they came to the last clause that these Acts were repealed, and that clause was an entire repeal of all Acts relating to education in Scotland. He must say that that was cutting off the parish schools as they previously existed, root and branch. He asked whether such a proceeding was not an unfortunate matter, after those schools had been held up by the Prime Minister, among others, during his election tour in Lancashire, as a pattern to all the rest of the world. He said the parish schools of Scotland were the foundations of the prosperity of Scotland, and of the success of Scotchmen in their own, and in other countries, and he spoke of the system as one of the best which existed in any part of the world—Prussia not excepted. These schools, then, were swept away root and branch by this Bill, and a spick-and-span new system substituted. He must ask, for what purpose was that? Why that change—that total destruction of the Scotch system of parish schools? The only reasons assigned by the right hon. the Lord Advocate was, because it appeared to him necessary to have the rate imposed on the real rent and not upon the valued rent; and because that change would bring the parish schools within the same sphere of management as the new national schools proposed to be established. They had had no Petitions praying that the assessment might be transferred to the real rent—the assessment was quite as certain at present as it would be if imposed on the real rent; and the only effect of his right hon. Friend's proposition was to change the incidence of taxation. Any person purchasing property in Scotland, on learning the valued rent, knew what proportion he would have to pay to the schoolmaster—it was an ascertained amount; but if the assessment were placed on the real rent, then, as the latter had become, in process of time, greater than the original valued rent, the purchaser would be subject to a larger impost than he thought he would have to pay when he made the purchase; while in those parishes where the real rent had fallen below the valued rent he would have to pay less than when he bought. Again, where manufactories had been established, and where there was a necessity for additional means of education—they were about to shift the burthen on the ratepayers and on the small proprietors. He ventured to say that many of those ratepayers would not thank them for subjecting them to the payment of rates which had been hitherto paid by the proprietors of land; at the same time the landowners were far from sure of getting ultimate relief—for a school board entailed a clerk and a treasurer; and he was inclined to think the new system would be found more expensive than the old. Another reason given by his right hon. Friend was, that the new system would bring with it great simplicity. But simplicity was not always the surest mode of arriving at the successful solution of questions with which the habits, customs, and feelings of the people were interwoven. No doubt there were many persons who would undertake to produce a much more simple plan of the British Constitution than the confused and complex arrangements on which it now rests. It was very possible to devise, as many French theorists had done, entirely new constitutions; but these inventions wholly wanted the elements of stability; and he ventured to say that a novel system, though possessing the deceptive attractions of an apparent adherence to logic, ought not in this case to be rashly adopted, because the existing system of the parish schools was one that was highly prized both by those who had attended the schools and also by the teachers. It was obviously of the greatest importance to the well-being of any school system that they should have good schoolmasters. The schoolmaster was the life of the school; and the Scotch system had had the effect of attracting the most valuable teachers, he ventured to say, who ever conducted the education of any nation—men who, by their devotion to the humbler classes, had not only trained them admirably for the sphere of life that was before them, but also educated many men who had filled distinguished positions in this country. Only that morning he had a letter from a gentleman who knew of two young men brought up in the parish schools in the immediate neighbourhood of his residence, who, if they had not had the advantage of the secondary education as obtained there, would probably now be following the plough-tail; whereas they were both Professors in the same University—the one teaching the classical languages, and the other some other branches of learning. Again, he had the pleasure the other day of meeting the Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of St. Andrews, who had been selected at the request of Dr. Pusey—one of the first scholars of the day—for the purpose of taking part in the revision of the Bible which was promoted by the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. Well, that gentleman received his education in a school conducted entirely on the same principles as the parish schools—a sort of side-school—and his two brothers have also occupied distinguished positions. Surely, then, they should not rudely destroy a system like that in order to build up another, merely for the purpose of introducing what they called simplicity and uniformity. That was not the policy adopted in the measure of 1869; and when last year the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) brought in the English Bill he said, among other things, that the question was how they could cover the country with good schools; that they must take care, in establishing a new system, not to destroy the existing one; and that they should, consistently with the attainment of their object, entail on the taxpayers the least possible burden, and refrain to the utmost from injuring existing and efficient schools. Those sound principles of educational reform had not, however, he (Mr. Gordon) regretted to find, been observed in framing the present Bill. He was not speaking in the interests of any particular denomination. Though belonging to the Established Church of Scotland himself, he had a sincere desire for a union of the Churches of that country, which, he thought might easily be, as they did not differ in any substantial points of doctrine, and he should not object to see the ministers of other denominations in the parish associated in the management of the schools. No class of men had taken a greater interest in education than the clergy of Scotland, without whose assistance, indeed, the cause of education would have sunk very low; and he could not see why there should be such objection, and such terror, in respect to their sharing in the management of the schools. In 1869 the principle of the Bill introduced by the Government was, as described by them, to enlarge the system of management and to popularize it to some extent, and they proposed to adopt the principle that those who paid the rates should have a voice in the management. Why, then, were they now going to change the whole character of the parish schools, contrary alike to the opinion of the Commission, and also to the policy of the Government in 1869, and contrary even to the decision of that House at the end of the year? It was a question on which much interest was aroused. The universal desire among schoolmasters and managers was, that the established schools should be continued as they now existed—to serve as models to the new schools, and not only to form them but to stimulate them. Again, how was the matter of religion dealt with in the Bill? That was a subject in which Scotchmen took no small interest. How was it dealt with? Simply by ignoring it altogether. The measure of 1869 contained a provision that the Government Inspector should examine in religion, if requested to do so by the school authorities; but the present Bill provided that the Government Inspector should not examine in religion; the only mention of which in the Bill, therefore, being something like a warning-off from the subject. It was said there was no statutory provision for religion in the old Scotch system. But why was that? Because the schools were placed under the control of the Church in 1663. Episcopalianism prevailed then in Scotland, and the schools were placed under the Bishops; and when, in 1666, Presbyterianism was established, the schools were placed under the presbyteries; and they so continued down to the present day—so that really there was a communication between the ministers of religion and the schools, and there was no occasion to make provision for religious education. There was a strong feeling in Scotland in favour of teaching religion, accompanied with the utmost liberality as regards the conscience clause. But the Government dared not face the difficulty, and were shifting it over to the local boards. It had been already shown that what was called the religious difficulty existed only to a slight extent in Scotland. Here you had a Board representing almost as large a constituency as Scotland itself, and he could not but admire the skill and good management by which the religious difficulty had been avoided; but when they sent this Bill down to the small parishes in Scotland the effect would be to stir up sectarian animosities, and the vanquished party, he feared, would not settle down without a feeling of humiliation and anger. Those who were actuated by strong feeling would bring the matter again and again before the board, and its continual recurrence would greatly tend to the disturbance of peace and harmony. If, then, there was no religious difficulty, why not at once say that which, he believed, was the opinion of the great majority of the Members of the House, and which was the opinion, undoubtedly, of the great majority of the people in Scotland—why not say plainly that religious instruction should be given in the schools? That would be a proper way of dealing with the question, instead of imposing the burden upon those who were opposed to a system of religious education, because, though they still had the conscience clause to protect them, disturbing elements would always exist. This was a question upon which all the Churches in Scotland felt great interest, and it was now fairly recognized that the great majority of parents in the humble classes were incapable of giving instruction in religion. Ministers had duties enough to occupy their attention, and the best thing, in his opinion, was to keep to the system which had given much satisfaction, and had produced such good and able men in Scotland—namely, the recognition of religion. He felt that he had trespassed too long upon the attention of the House; but it was a question of great interest to Scotland, where a strong feeling existed that this Bill was being pressed forward to a second reading with undue haste, seeing that it contained several new provisions never yet laid before the public—propositions at variance with the former proposals of the Government. He did not want to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, but he desired the question to be settled, and he did not think there had been time enough for it. A discussion upon the second reading of the Bill was of the utmost consequence, as directing the attention of the House to the value of the provisions afterwards to be considered in Committee. He would again press upon the Government to consider the desirability of not pressing the Bill forward at present.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I am glad to assure the House that I shall only occupy a very few minutes in my remarks, as the previous debates in 1869 have exhausted the subject, and there is little use in making speeches at the stage which this question has reached. The Bill before us is simple, logical, and homogeneous, and therefore generally calculated to fulfil its purposes. That purpose is to make education as national as formerly—when our Scotch ancestors established a system suitable for the requirements of the country as it then was. There is often a confusion, and sometimes an intentional commingling of the clerical and national aspects of Scotch education. Its first period, as in all countries, was purely clerical; then from 1696 it was purely national; and only from the time of the disruption of the Churches, about a quarter of a century since, did it assume a denominational aspect. The original idea of the Church was that every kirk throughout the land should have a school attached to it; but that was not the course adopted by the State, which imposed this duty on the nation by a tax upon property. The Bill proposes in all simplicity to restore this ancient idea of national duty, supplementing it by Imperial aid. My previous speeches on this subject will show that I have never underrated the efforts of the Churches and their various ministers to introduce vitality into the national scheme of education. The ministers of religion in Scotland are of the people in origin, sympathies, and education. They have gained their superior position by possessing higher natural attainments than the people around them, and these have been developed through the schools which are common to both. They have returned lovingly to those schools in their future career as parish ministers, and done their best to improve their character and enhance their resources. It will be a deep disappointment to me, and to all lovers of education, if the ratepayers, in their selection of school boards, forget what the country owes to her ministers of religion. But this voluntary recognition is one thing, and a statutory obligation is another. It was not till 1803 that the parish minister was added ex officio to the school managers, though it was a custom almost equal to law before, and I hope will be a custom again. It is a great error to try to force religion into the hearts of people by law. Vital religion does not penetrate men's hearts by such compulsory means. Yet the cry arising against this Bill in Scotland is that it is a godless Bill, because it does not legislate in this way. There is an outcry that the "use and wont" of religious instruction should be acknowledged and enforced in this Bill. Will my hon. Friend the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen, and the hon. Baronet the Member for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk, point out to me a single Act of Parliament in which religion in schools is enforced by statute in Scotland? No doubt religious instruction is the use and wont, and as long as it is left to use and wont, Scotland will be a God-loving country. It is because I desire to see this religious character of my countrymen preserved that I am anxious to leave religious education in their hands, and not to come between their consciences and their duties by arid provisions of an Act of Parliament. By all means let us have "use and wont," but it ceases to have its strength as use and wont the moment you make it statutory. That the Lord Advocate has not been indifferent to religious education may be judged of by the fact that he adopts exactly the course recommended by Dr. Chalmers, who is, perhaps, the most highly appreciated divine among our past worthies. What does Dr. Chalmers recommend? He first begins with the impossible hypothesis that there might be a theological Parliament sufficiently versed in dogma to legislate on true dogma, and then he goes on to say—

"But failing this, it seems to us the next best thing that, in any public measure for helping on the education of the people, Government were to abstain from introducing the element of religion at all into their part of the scheme, leaving this matter entirely to the parties who had to do with the erection and management of the schools which they had been called upon to assist. A grant by the State upon this footing might be regarded as being appropriately and exclusively an expression of their value for a good secular education."

Well, this is simply and entirely what the Bill does. No one can doubt the Presbyterian orthodoxy or religious fervour of such an eminent divine as Dr. Chalmers, and we may feel confidence that we are not damaging the interests of religion in Scotland when we follow his advice. I have said enough about the religious question, and will delay till Committee my remarks on the small parasites of denominationalism which the Lord Advocate still allows to grow on the national educational tree. But I now turn to the framework of the Bill—the “Scotch Education Department”—which is to be entrusted with carrying its provisions into effect. The whole Bill gives to this Department a real administrative existence, with large and full powers for superintending education in Scotland, and for preserving its distinctive peculiarities. The fact that this appears in the Bill admits the necessity of a concession that there should be a national administrative Department of some kind. That is not the form which I would have preferred. I still entertain the opinion, which I expressed two years since in this House, that the simplest, cheapest, and most effective method of administration would be by a local Board sitting in Edinburgh. But the Board to which I look is, I am bound to admit, not that which receives most favour from the Scotch people. My desire is to have a small executive Board, paid, and, therefore, responsible for its work, and subject to the Committee of Council in matters of finance and general administration. That was the form which the Board ultimately took in the Bill of 1869; but it is not the form which the Commissioners recommended, and which the people of Scotland seem to prefer. They indicate a Board representative of different classes of the community, unpaid, and undominated by the Government. Such a Board is somewhat allied to the Irish Education Commission; and I am sure that this House will never again entrust the administration of large annual grants to an irresponsible body of this kind. The only advantage of a Scotch Board in Edinburgh would be to represent national interests and peculiarities of education. When the Commissioners recommended their scheme of a representative Board, there was a wide divergence of system between the education of England and Scotland. The former had only a contributory, and not a national system, and possessed no organization for its adequate extension. The aspirations of the Committee of Council were limited to teaching the three “R’s” by a strict mechanical method. All this was so unlike the

Scotch system that it was repulsive to Scotch teachers, who shuddered at the idea of being caught in the mechanical embraces of the Committee of Council. They looked upon that Committee much in the same way as the Lacedæmonians looked on the wife of Nabis, their tyrant, who tempted them to approach her by the magnificence of her apparel. She then seized them in her embrace, for it proved to be a mere mechanical figure, constructed to torture them until their riches were squeezed out. So we thought if the Revised Code seized hold of Scotch schools, all our educational riches would be expressed in its mechanical grip. But we approach the question to-night in a very different position. England has now a more organized scheme of education than Scotland; but, above all, we have a new Revised Code just laid upon our Table, which does infinite credit to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council. It is a vast improvement upon its predecessor, and encourages higher education in our elementary schools, and goes far to remove the sources of jealousy which have hitherto prevented Scotland from submitting to this Code. Under these changed conditions we no longer want a sort of Scotch Education Parliament to frighten the English Education Department from interfering with our national peculiarities. At least, for my own part, what I wish to see is not a debating society, but an active and responsible administrative Board. Nevertheless, I fully admit that the constitution of such a Board is looked upon with keen jealousy, both by the Church and by the teachers; and I have little hope of inducing this House, in the altered circumstances of the case, to accept a proposition which passed in 1869. Compelled, then, to look at the alternative presented by this Bill, my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate will not be surprised if I ask him to give us assurance that the Scotch Education Department, to which he gives such large powers, is not a myth, but a reality. The clauses of the Bill, indeed, make it a formidable and active reality, but the definition clause shakes our faith in its substantial character. It is there described as a Committee of the Privy Council for Education in Scotland. Now, we know that the corresponding Committee for England is a purely consultative, not an administrative, body. The exalted personages who compose it are rarely called together, and even the existence of "My Lords" is scarcely believed in by the persons who correspond with the Department, and are answered in the name of the Lords of the Committee. There is no doubt of the potential activity of the Vice President, and even of the Lord President; but the potentiality of the Committee as an administrative body is not believed by anyone. Now, what the people of Scotland would like to know is, whether this Scotch Education Department is to be as mythical as the English Committee, who we hear of only in our letters from the Department; or, whether it is to consist of real individuals, with sufficient knowledge, and, what is equally important, sufficient time to give active aid and advice to the Vice President of the Council in his immediate administration of his Department? I have no desire to diminish his responsibility as the real Minister of Education of this country, but the people of Scotland will not be satisfied unless the Scotch Education Department is a reality, capable of giving for the first year or two ample time to aid him not only in preserving, but also in extending the peculiarities of education which they cherish so dearly. If I felt confidence on this point, I would hail this Bill as a great boon to my country. The position of Scotland as a nation, in spite of its small area and contracted natural resources, has been gained by the universality and gradation of its education. Assure us that this Bill will in reality preserve to us the means by which the intellectual fund of the country will be sought out and developed as in past times, and the people will sink their minor differences, and co-operate with the Government in passing a Bill which, in its careful provisions, seems well calculated to give increased prosperity and contentment to the northern part of this kingdom.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, he was sorry to have to say that he was not as completely satisfied with the provisions of the Bill as his hon. Friend (Dr. Playfair), for whose judgment on the question of education he had the highest respect. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (the Lord Advocate) when introducing the Bill to the House, had not invited suggestions or assistance from either side with a view of making his Bill more perfect or generally acceptable to the people of Scotland; yet he could tell the right hon. Gentleman that there were several Members who sat opposite to him who would willingly have given their aid. He hoped the Bill might not miscarry hereafter, from any obstinate resistance to Amendments which might be suggested—provided they were good and useful Amendments—from whichever side the House they might come. Though the secret had been well kept, he heard, before the introduction of the measure, that it would be "stronger and simpler than the English Bill." When he heard that it was to be stronger, he guessed, at once, that it would be more distasteful to himself, more upsetting, more sweeping, and more regardless of securities for religious instruction; and his anticipations had not been deceived. But he heard that it was to be simpler also—and he found it simpler indeed, for it made a clean sweep of the present parochial system, against which no charge had ever been made, except that it had broken down in the large towns. But even the voluntary system, with all its efforts, had broken down in large towns—and there was no charge against the parochial system, the value of the instruction given in which was universally recognized, and which, as a system, was admittedly free, in the religious instruction afforded, from all suspicion of sectarian taint. The measure appeared to have been framed rather with the intention of overriding all possible claims and privileges, than of recognizing the special wants of Scotch education. Those who had seen the working of the present system, and knew the value of its primary and secondary instruction, as well as of the stated religious instruction given under it, could not regard without apprehension the rash manner in which so much that was valuable was thrown into a common crucible—upon the chance, apparently, that whatever came out would be as good as what had hitherto existed. In the English Bill the Church schools were exempted from its operation. There was no analogy between them and the parochial schools in Scotland; but he heartily wished that it had been possible to make the change more gradually, and at present to reserve the parochial schools from the action of the Bill, with only such changes as to liberalizing the management, and as to inspection, as now-a-days were thought advisable. Passing to another matter, which had not been mentioned in the debate, he might notice that the present Bill would afford another instance of that most detestable thing called permissive legislation. He was aware that the subject of compulsion was supposed to be one of the perquisites of the Liberal party; but, in regard to education in Scotland, he believed some measure of compulsion to be absolutely necessary. He would read a brief extract from a letter written by one of the ministers of the Established Church of Scotland—a class of men whose connection with the parish schools was to be severed, and who, by that irony of circumstances which attends reckless legislation, would be disqualified from sitting on school boards because they were not ratepayers. The writer said—

Now, in the Bill, the power of making education compulsory was to be left to the school boards. It had been said that we were not ready for compulsion, but he was sure that the school boards which it was proposed to appoint were not ready to be entrusted with the power of giving, or withholding, compulsion. In a large city like Glasgow, where, no doubt, the school board would be composed, like that appointed for the metropolis, of some of the best men of the city, he did not doubt that compulsory education would be started soon after the passing of the Bill; but there were many small towns where compulsion was needed, and where it would be a very invidious task to introduce it. He doubted whether the school boards elected in such places would venture to initiate compulsion. Parliament was, in fact, shirking the difficulty when it left it to be dealt with by the school boards. That was something like what the House of Commons did when afraid to give a decision on a troublesome subject: it referred it to a Select Committee, to whose judgment the House often paid very little attention. He hoped other hon. Members would join him in urging on the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of enacting compulsion, at least in the large towns—and, indeed, he should be glad to see the principle extended to the whole country. There was another point to which he must refer. There were some clauses towards the close of the Bill where religious instruction was, he would not say recognized, but honoured by being mentioned, but chiefly in the way of prohibition and limitation. It had been said, again and again, that there was no religious difficulty in Scotland; but the Lord Advocate had said that there was an ecclesiastical difficulty. And he wished to learn whether he was to thank the ecclesiastical difficulty for the slight mention, or rather for the omission, of the subject of religious instruction from the Bill? He admitted that the first business was to supply ordinary secular education—and if he said a few words in defence of religious instruction, it was certainly not with a view to disparage secular learning; for he agreed with what had been said by a distinguished living teacher of youth, that “the spectacle of a nation very ignorant and very devout is a fancy, and not a fact.” But he thought the right hon. Gentleman might have introduced into the Bill language which would have offended no one in Scotland, and which the great majority of the people of that country would have heartily welcomed. They were told that they must trust to the religious sentiment of the people of Scotland. He desired to throw no doubt on the existence of the religious sentiment, for it rested on a basis of well-known and long-established credibility; but he would say that it was to be put to a very severe test. Nor was it really trusted; for though the religious instruction be left to the discretion of the school boards—and of this he made no complaint, yet inspection in religious subjects was forbidden, and it was doing dishonour to religious instruction to enact that such instruction should not be inquired into by the Inspectors, as it could hardly be supposed that the same care would be given to it as was bestowed on those subjects which would come under the Inspector's cognizance. He would trouble the House with a few lines from a letter of a Free Church minister, and which specially bore on that point—

“Even were every board in the kingdom to make provision for religious instruction in the schools, that would not relieve the State from the discharge of the duty proper to itself in this matter; which is, in the way competent only to it to do—to give legislative expression to its own views in order that they may afterwards be carried out by the subordinate executive and administrative departments.”

After all, he must say he had great misgivings that anything that might be said on that side the House would not meet with the same attention as if it came from the other side. Even if it were so he felt that he had discharged his duty in that matter. His saltem accumulem donis, et fungar inani munere. He did not speak as an absolute opponent of the Bill altogether; but he confessed he had noticed many omissions in the Bill, and looked with considerable distrust and misgiving at some of the intentions which he thought he could discern between the lines. He thought, however, it might be made a good Bill if there were not too obstinate a resistance to Amendments; and he looked forward with some confidence to the action of the Committee. If he did not entertain that confidence he should not have been able to assent, without protest, to the second reading.

MR. GRAHAM said, he thanked the Government for having introduced the Bill at so early a period of the Session, and thus offered the opportunity of settling the question this year; but, at the same time, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) that it was to be regretted that more time was not allowed for the consideration of the Bill, and obtaining the opinions of their constituents upon it. It would, he thought, have been better if the second reading had been fixed for next Monday, instead of that evening; but as the question had been already gone into very fully, and as they had learned from former experience the dangers of delay in this House, he thought it would be a great pity to lose a stage to-night. Therefore, he was prepared to enter into the discussion, though upon the distinct understanding that hon. Members were not to be thereby committed to any of the details of the Bill, or to any approval of the three new principles which it contained—those principles being the entire abolition of the parochial school system of Scotland, the denominationalism of the Bill, and, notably, the committal of the management of Scotch education to some shadowy and undefined body called an Education Department in London. He desired to offer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman his acknowledgment of the simplicity and comprehensiveness of his new Bill, which he believed to a very large extent would meet the wishes of the people of Scotland. Much as he regretted the rejection of the Bill of 1869, in the interests of the large number of children who had drifted away past help through the interval, he believed the Government would have great assistance in the discussion of an Education Bill this Session from the progress of public opinion and feeling which had taken place since that period—and he believed they now entered upon the question with a better prospect of unanimity and of a permanent settlement than had been possible at any previous time. They all knew that the people of Scotland were deeply attached to their parochial school system, and that they would be very jealous of any interference with it. Nor was that to be wondered at. For 300 years it had been intimately connected with the whole intellectual material and social progress of Scotland. It was the education of the parish schools which was the foundation of that cosmopolitanism which had sent Scotchmen into every part of the world, wherever there was good work to be done, and which had enabled them to achieve independence, and to distinguish themselves in every branch of enterprise. At any previous time the system which the Government now proposed for doing away with the parish schools, would have met with universal resistance; but he was not prepared to say now that it would be condemned, or that it would not commend itself to the people of Scotland. It simplified the task to be done; and under the new Code it need not necessarily imperil any of the interests the people of Scotland had so much at heart—but still the proposal of the Government was one that was so unforeseen that the representatives of Scotland had no right to commit themselves to it without the fullest discussion and the approval by their constituents. He observed that, in abolishing the present system, the Bill proposed to make an important concession to the owners of land by relieving them of their liability for the maintenance of the parish schools. If that charge were to be considered, as maintained by many authorities, the property of the nation, he doubted whether the proposed concession would be just or expedient. No doubt, the landowners would be liable to be rated as citizens; but that liability involved no right to their being relieved by the State surrendering its share of property of which it might to that extent be supposed to be a joint owner. The second new principle involved in the Bill respected denominationalism and religious teaching. It could not be too clearly understood that in Scotland there was no religious difficulty. Its schools, excepting a few belonging to Episcopalians, had maintained perfect freedom of conscience at all times; and even Roman Catholics had had no hesitation in sending their children with confidence to the parochial and borough schools. The people did not need nor desire any change; at the same time they were willing to give any proper guarantees that might be required. The doctrine of responsibility for belief, and of the rights of religious toleration, lay at the very foundation of Scotch Protestantism, of whatever denomination it might be; and the Scotch did not need either a secularist propaganda nor the Draconian strictness of Privy Council regulations to teach them their duty in that respect. The differences between the chief denominations in Scotland related almost entirely to matters which had no bearing upon the education of children, and not to those antagonisms of doctrine and belief which produced so much bitterness in England. The idea of a religious difficulty was not properly Scotch at all; it was introduced into Scotland from across the border; and in Scotland it arose mainly from sympathy with those in England who were fighting the battle of religious toleration and equality. In all the discussions in Scotland there had been a claim for undenominational and unsectarian teaching; and a candidate who had announced himself in favour of denominational education would have had very little chance of being elected; yet the Government proposed for Scotland a system which was intended to be, and could be, worked out only as a denominational system. The cry for undenominational education had had, however, much more to do with undenominationalism in England, and more especially in Ireland, than with the circumstances and wants of Scotland. Where toleration was perfectly understood and faithfully carried out the question of denominationalism had very little practical importance. In a country where there was a dominant, or aggressive sect, the question became a vital one. Any Scotch claim for undenominationalism was, in fact, part of the contention for religious toleration as against the supremacy of the Established Church in England, and still more extravagant claims to supremacy elsewhere. So far as England was concerned that battle was fought and lost last year, mainly because the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and his Friends chose to argue the question upon the ground of a rationalistic secularism, with which the people—of Scotland especially—had very little sympathy, instead of arguing it in the interests of religious opinions and beliefs, too sacred in themselves, and too important to the welfare of children to be taught in any mere formal routine of common-school education, or within the narrow limits of any Privy Council Code. Now, it was all very well to talk of religious education, and yet to exclude dogmatic religious teaching in our schools. But exclude creeds and catechisms as they would, the simple question of a little child would frequently open up the most profound points of religious belief, and compel the teacher, if he were at all conscientious, either to overstep his assigned limits, or to stand silent and rebuked in the presence of the infant he was professing to instruct. As regarded the proposed Department sitting in London, he thought the control of Scotch education by a body sitting at such a distance would give anything but satisfaction. For anything that appeared it might be that the proposed Scotch Education Department would consist of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the English Department, and the Lord Advocate, sitting with or without appropriate national costume. He fully appreciated the high character of those right hon. Gentlemen, but, nevertheless, he thought that the powers entrusted to them would be regarded with jealousy in Scotland; for, if there was one feeling stronger than another in Scotland, it was one of dislike and distrust of the Privy Council, and the desire to keep in their own hands the management of their own education. The Scotch were not content with the English standards, although these were improved under the new Code; and they hesitated to trust the Privy Council to fix the standard of competency for teachers. In addition, the Scotch were naturally jealous of the coolness and indifference with which Scotch matters were treated by the Government and by Parliament. They would wish to commit their education to men practically acquainted with Scotch education, who would elevate, rather than lower, the standard of it. He trusted nothing would be done by the Bill opposed to the great value placed in Scotland upon higher education, and the importance of affording to children who exhibited great capacity the opportunity of entering the higher class schools. He would like to have seen stronger compulsory clauses, because public opinion in Scotland was far in advance of what it was in England; but, no doubt, wherever boards were created in Scotland they would have no hesitation or difficulty in enforcing compulsory clauses. He should also like to see the system of the Ballot introduced into the school boards. But these were details which might be considered in Committee. He had no objection to offer to the second reading; but he assented to it only on the understanding that a full opportunity should be afforded of discussing the subject on the Motion for going into Committee, by which time, probably, they would have had the opportunity of obtaining the opinions of their constituents on the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL said, he did not at all agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and who had advised them to hesitate in giving an opinion on the Bill; for he thought the short time the Bill had been before them had been quite sufficient to convince most Scotch Members, at any rate, that it was the most statesmanlike measure of education which had been presented to Parliament for many years. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) had referred with approval to the measure of 1869; but no one, he thought, could recall the history of that Bill without something like pity; certainly very few regarded it with any feeling of regret. It was founded upon the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, who proposed an elaborate scheme for removing the parochial schools from their present management; and he was quite satisfied that compared with it the present scheme of the learned Lord Advocate was a very great improvement. With regard to the machinery proposed to be set up for establishing a new system of education in Scotland, no doubt men's minds were divided, as to the central authority, between the fear of tyranny in London and of jobbery in Edinburgh—it was difficult to say which feeling was the stronger—but he thought if the Board were strong enough to resist the Anglicizing tendencies of the Privy Council it would give satisfaction. With regard to that part of the Bill which allowed compulsory powers, he thought Scotland perfectly ripe for universal compulsion. What was wanted in Scotland was not so much additional schools as a uniform system and the power of enforcing attendance; and this was true not only of large cities, but of many small localities, such as fishing villages, where the children began to earn something at an early age. It was not advisable that Scotland should in this follow the example of England in the Bill of last year. Compulsion should be made universal. With regard to the religious difficulty, the learned Lord Advocate had certainly said very little. He appeared to think he might solve the difficulty by ignoring it. But as the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gordon) had pointed out, they were relegating knotty and delicate points, which ought to be settled by the authority of Parliament, to what sanguine people called the good sense of local boards. No doubt, local boards would have their own share of good sense; but if there was one subject on which they were certain to take a narrow view it was the religious question. Last year, when this point was raised by some of his hon. Friends, they were told that the difficulty was of their own making, and that when the country was consulted it would vanish into thin air. But what was the actual experience? The election of school boards all over England had turned on this very question of the religious difficulty, and the school boards had to commence their labours separated into two hostile camps on this very delicate subject. They were told, indeed, that there was no religious difficulty in Scotland; no doubt, up to the present time, there had been a most laudable amount of toleration in Scotch schools; but circumstances would be changed under this Bill, because there would be compulsory taxation, and in some places, if not in all, compulsory attendance; and he was very much mistaken if, when men found themselves saddled with new taxes, perhaps, for giving religious instruction of which they did not conscientiously approve, the religious difficulty did not crop up. There would be, in fact, in Scotland, when this Bill received its full development, a purely and entirely denominational system of education. There was only one solution of the difficulty, and that was this—the State should cease to undertake the religious education of children. The Scottish people were, perhaps, more than any other imbued with the spirit of religion; there was no country where religious and moral training was more highly prized; and none in which there was a body of clergy more qualified by learning and piety to undertake that duty. In that country it would, therefore, be perfectly safe to leave religious instruction to voluntary effort. He hoped that Amendments would be brought forward which the House might accept with a view to meet these points; and if, in debating those Amendments, there should be any renewal of the bitter contests of last year, the blame would rest with the Government, and especially with the Vice President of the Council. If they had, instead of adopting a course of compromise, adhered to their own principles, and thrown themselves on the loyal support of their own party, they would not only have carried their Bill, but—what was of far more importance—they would have laid down sound lines upon which, by common consent, might have been built a national system of education for each of the three divisions of the kingdom. They had not done so, and they now reaped the somewhat bitter fruits of that conduct; but he hoped there would be as little asperity as possible in the discussion, and that the Government would be found willing to make what concessions were necessary.

MAJOR WALKER said, he joined in the remark that it was to be regretted that more time had not been given to Members from Scotland to consult their constituencies regarding this Bill. For himself he could say that he had received only one letter on the subject, and that was confined to matters of technical detail. No man, however, was more anxious to see this question of Scotch education settled on a broad and firm basis, and he thought this measure offered such a basis. While disapproving many points there were others which he highly approved, and, on the whole, he thought it an honest and fair attempt to settle the question. He only wished to refer to two points in the Bill in its present stage. With regard to Clause 67, which touched upon the higher education to be given in the parochial schools, it was within the knowledge of every Member of the House that the parochial schools in Scotland did not limit themselves to giving merely elementary education, but rendered themselves valuable feeders to the Universities. Clause 67, as he understood it, in dealing with the higher class of education given by those schools, seemed to provide that the public examiners should take notice of it only in cases where at least 50 scholars received such instruction. The effect of that clause, therefore, seemed to him calculated to wipe out all the higher instruction at present given in those schools, and thus to be at variance with the acknowledged principle of the Bill, which was to extend and improve education throughout Scotland. He thought the provision would give very great dissatisfaction in Scotland. He agreed with those hon. Members who were of opinion that practically the religious difficulty did not exist in Scotland. There would be but very little change in the religious education in Scotland brought about by this Bill. In the rural schools in Scotland religious instruction would continue to be given as now; but the 73rd clause of the Bill would bring about this objectionable state of things—that, whereas, under the existing system the religious instruction now given was superintended, at least, theoretically, by the presbytery, and thus a sort of guarantee was obtained that that instruction was sound and satisfactory, the clause to which he referred took the matter out of the hands of the presbytery without appointing anybody to superintend religious instruction in their place. Take the case where a local board had agreed that religious instruction should be given, what means would that board have for seeing that the schoolmaster was properly qualified for giving such instruction, or that, possessing the necessary qualification, he properly instructed the scholars. The practical result of Clause 73 would be that where religious instruction was given at all it would be given as an extra, in the same manner that modern languages and mathematics used to be given in our own public schools some years since. That would, most assuredly, not be a very satisfactory system, and was not one which the people of Scotland were likely to tolerate, and he hoped that a provision calculated to produce so mischievous and melancholy a result would be struck out. There were many other parts of the Bill open to objection; but, as they were mostly capable of alteration in Committee, he should not now touch upon them.

MR. M'LAREN said, that while many hon. Members had talked much about a Scotch Board no one had attempted to point out how the Scotch Board should be composed. He wanted to know what difference it would make whether the Board sat in London or in Scotland? Their power would be equally absolute, perhaps more absolute in Edinburgh, because a Committee of the Privy Council would be amenable to the censure of this House, while a Board sitting in Edinburgh would not be represented here at all. Those who expressed a decided preference for a Scotch Board should explain themselves clearly, and give an exact definition of the kind of Board they required. To talk about the Board was absurd, before you know what it is to be. Then with regard to the parochial schools. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Glasgow University (Mr. Gordon) had said a great deal about the "swamping and extinction" of the parochial schools. Now, he (Mr. M'Laren) denied that any parochial school in Scotland would be extinguished by this Bill. It did not interfere with the parish schools in the way of extinction; it only improved their management. No doubt by the Bill of 1869 a Scotch Board sitting in Edinburgh was proposed; but hon. Members seemed to have forgotten that since 1869 the Education Act for England had been passed, and that under the present Bill many things which before were to be done by the Central Board, were now to be done by the local boards. He thought this Bill immeasurably superior to any Education Bill for Scotland previously introduced, and he should greatly regret if anything occurred to retard its progress. The fourth rule in the Schedule with regard to the money to be raised in certain parishes, seemed a very extraordinary one. It provided that when in certain insular parishes, where the assessment at 3*d.* in the pound yielded less than £30 for each school, or less than 18*s.* per head on one-sixth part of the population, the Education Department may pay a sum not exceeding twice the ordinary grant, the total grant not exceeding 16*s.* per head. The peculiarity of this provision was that it assumed that 18*s.* per head on one-sixth of the population for educational purposes was a rather small sum to raise in Scotland in reference to the number of children to be educated. There must be some extraordinary blunder here. The calculation that such a sum would be necessary was to be based on the population of the country at the last Census; but before the Bill became law the Census of 1871 would have been taken. That Census would probably show a population of 3,300,000, and an assessment of 18*s.* a head on a sixth of that number of people would produce £500,000. But did the right hon. Gentleman really believe that such a sum would be necessary to supply the educational requirements of the country? In a great proportion of the small burghs in Scotland it would require not 3*d.*, but 2*s.* in the pound to realize the 18*s.* a-head. Were the Government serious in wishing to impose such a tax on these small burghs? The thing was out of the question. The working of the Bill as now framed would be to relieve taxation to the richer classes in the country, and to make it a heavy burden upon the poorer populations. With regard to the religious difficulty, he thought the proposal of the Bill would meet the case in a satisfactory manner. It contained the principle which had been contended for for years past in Scotland. The people of Scotland simply wished to be left alone in this respect. The Bill assumed that religion would be taught; but one of its clauses provided that no child should either be compelled to attend religious instruction, or to suffer injury for being absent therefrom. The great blot in the Bill was the retention of the cumulative vote in the election of the school board. He had always thought that a most extravagant and absurd proposition. England had made a blunder in this respect; but Scotland ought not to be compelled to blunder for the mere sake of preserving uniformity. Nothing could be more unjust than the proposal of the Bill to relieve the heritors from the payments they now had to contribute. The Act of 1696 provided that the heritors and the minister should supply school accommodation in every parish; but by the present Bill, if passed, the heritors, whose property had been enormously enhanced in value since the valued rent was fixed in 1674, would pay the merest fraction of the whole cost, while poor people, down to rentals of £4, would have to contribute in the same ratio as the richest landed proprietors. It was out of the question to suppose that this would be so trifling an assessment that nobody would feel it. It would raise an outcry against the Government, of which the end would not be heard for many years. The principle of the Bill in that respect was altogether indefensible.

COLONEL SYKES said, he fully concurred in the complaint of the right hon. and learned Member for Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. Gordon) that the constituencies in Scotland had not been afforded a sufficient opportunity to consider the provisions of the Bill. If, therefore, it were read a second time that evening, it must be on the understanding that Scotch Members would be perfectly at liberty to object to any part of it in Committee. The 2nd clause declared that "the Scotch Education Department" of the Privy Council "shall," and so on. Now, what was the Scotch Education Department? He turned to the definition clause, and he found that it was to consist of "the Lords of the Privy Council appointed by Her Majesty for Education in Scotland." Now, his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. W. E. Forster) would, he should have thought, have quite enough to do in the management of educational questions in England without undertaking to deal also with the Scotch system. If, moreover, the clause to which he was referring were to pass in its present shape, it would, he felt assured, be contrary to the feelings and opinion of the great majority of the people of Scotland. What he would suggest was, that there should be a popular element in the Board to be called the Scottish Board and resident in Scotland. It should be what he might call a peripatetic Board—that is to say, the members in the intervals of their quarterly meetings should visit different parts of the country, as was the practice with the Lunacy Commissioners in Scotland, and report their observations to the Board, as was also the practice with the Lunacy Commissioners in England. There might be two paid officials named by Government, and with them there might be five or six elected members. He was sure there was patriotism sufficient in that country to secure competent men to discharge the necessary duties, and the elective principle would give great satisfaction. The late Lord Advocate had stated in the course of his speech that the Bill aimed at the destruction of the parochial schools of Scotland. It was well hon. Members should know what these schools really were. They did very much more than teach what was commonly called "the three R's." In Aberdeenshire an estate, now of the value of £3,000 a-year, had been left by Dr. John Milne of Bombay, formerly of his (Colonel Sykes') regiment, from which augmentations were made to the salaries of the masters of certain parochial schools. There were 89 participating schools in Aberdeenshire. What were the schoolmasters competent to teach? 88 schoolmasters taught geography, 74 mathematics, 74 Latin, 42 taught Greek, and 18 taught French. In non-participating schools which have the same headings of teaching, and 27 in number, the whole 27 schoolmasters taught geography, 10 mathematics, 21 Latin, 4 Greek, and 2 French. How was it that the scholars or pupils were capable of being taught those higher branches of education? Simply because the parish schoolmaster was a man who had gone through a University course. And how had he been able to do that? First in the parochial schools he got the elements of an educational system, which enabled him to go to Aberdeen and compete for a bursary of £15 or £20 per annum, which, with the frugal habits of a Scotch lad, sufficed for his support, at the University he got a degree of Arts, and then went back again as a schoolmaster, the increased salary rendering it worth his while, and with a degree of competence that few in England were able to obtain. No parochial school in England, indeed, few second-class schools, could teach the subjects accessible to a farmer's or shopkeeper's son in Scotland, and this was entirely owing to the cheapness and facilities for acquiring an University education in Scotland. In Clause 48 of this Bill there was no limit placed to the power of the school boards to tax the ratepayers. All those who were assessable to the poor rates were assessable to the school board. Surely there ought to be some limit placed upon this power. For the rest, he did not object to the measure as a whole, and should vote for the second reading, on the understanding that its provisions should be made more palatable to the people of Scotland in Committee.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that while anxious that the Bill should be read a second time, he must enter a strong protest against the way in which Scotch business was beginning to be dealt with this Session. The Home Secretary had honestly admitted to his constituents in his public address during last autumn that Scotland had been badly treated last Session. Scotch business was postponed in the interest of Ireland for the last two Sessions, and of that he made no complaint. He had been willing to stand aside, in the hope that, when pressing legislation for Ireland had been settled, Scotland would have her turn; but that evening a most important Scotch measure—a measure which had been mentioned in Her Majesty's gracious Speech—had discussion upon it limited to three or four hours, one-third of which time had been occupied by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gordon) who spoke first. That was a mode of proceeding to which he, for one, was entirely opposed, seeing that Scotch Members were this evening almost completely tongue-tied on an occasions affecting very materially the interests of their country. The Bill itself in its general principle should receive his most cordial support; but there were some details to which he wished to invite the attention of the Lord Advocate, in order that the objections which he entertained to them might, as far as possible, be obviated. He referred to the constitution of the school boards—the mode of election in which the system of nomination was retained, though it was about to be abolished in all Parliamentary and municipal elections, the cumulative vote, the absence of the Ballot, as well as of any qualification for those who might sit on the boards. He hoped his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would adopt a more stringent conscience clause, and remove the small remnant of denominationalism which was tacked to the end of the 74th clause, and would adopt the principle that the school boards, which would be possessed of unlimited powers of taxation, should contain no member who was not himself a ratepayer.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was this difference between the present Bill and the Bill introduced in 1869—that whereas the Bill of 1869 proposed the establishment of a Scotch Board for the purpose of deciding where national schools should be set up in Scotland, no such Board was now proposed. But there was a very good reason why such a Board should not be established, inasmuch as his right hon. Friend found—and he was exceedingly glad he did find—that a national school could be established in every parish in Scotland. Consequently, there was no want of a Board in Edinburgh or anywhere else to decide where they should be established. He could assure hon. Gentlemen that his own experience in educational matters had shown there would be no advantage in having a Board between the Department which had to distribute the Parliamentary grant and the school board; and that, if they attempted to establish any such intermediary Board, it would prove to be a hindrance rather than an advantage. The Scotch Education Department proposed in this Bill was precisely the same as that established for England, but with the necessary exception—that, whereas there had heretofore been but one Educational Committee for both countries, there would now be a special one for each, and the Government proposed that that Member of the Government who was especially responsible for Scotch business should be added to the Scotch Education Department—namely, the Lord Advocate. That Scotch Department would be consulted whenever any change was proposed with regard to principles in the administration of the Committee of Privy Council in Scotland, or in the working of this Bill. He thought it would be a very bad thing for England, or for Scotland, if the daily administration of the Education Department were put into the hands of a Board rather than of the Minister at the head of this Department. The Government looked forward to there being a special permanent Scotch officer responsible for Scotch business in the office of the Scotch Education Department; so that in the daily working of the administration, Scotch feelings, Scotch views, and Scotch ideas would be consulted, and also with reference to any change of principle with regard to the distribution of the grant. He looked upon the Education Department as being an Imperial Department, and as being just as much Scotch as English. At that moment he was glad to say it was a good deal more Scotch than English. The Secretary of the Committee of Council on Education, a gentleman of whom he could not speak too highly, was a Scotchman; and the newly-appointed Assistant Secretary of the Committee, a gentleman of whom also he could not speak too highly, was a Scotchman, and in their new Code the Department had adopted many Scotch ideas. In reply to the observation of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell) that he had last year abandoned the principles he had previously announced with regard to educational matters, he would simply state to the House that he had never made, either there or out-of-doors, any statement which could be considered inconsistent in the slightest degree with the position he took last year in reference to the education question.

MR. M'LAGAN said, that if the Department had been limited to the distribution of the Privy Council grants, he should be satisfied with its constitution; but he found that in many places the local boards were entirely under the control of the Education Department, and he should, therefore, like to see a much more responsible Board sitting in Scotland. Indeed, the difficulty seemed to have occurred to the Government themselves, for in the 3rd clause they proposed that the Education Department should have it in their power, with the consent of the Treasury, to employ such officers in Scotland as they may adjudge necessary to perform the duties connected with the said Department. Now, if the duties were to distribute the fund, why not appoint a Central Board in Scotland, and let the local boards be subject to them, the Privy Council having the distribution of the funds as at the present time? He looked with suspicion on this proposal to have the same officers for England and Scotland. In the 2nd clause it was said—

“The said Scotch Education Department shall be at liberty to employ the same officers who may from time to time be employed by the Education Department for England.”

He believed the result would be that the Education Department for Scotland would be merged in the Department for England, and that they would be subjected to the same rules and regulations as for England. He was sure that the Scottish people would not consent without a struggle to have that system of education done away with to which they had been so much indebted for the success of their sons in the battle of life, both at home and abroad. Regarding the local boards, he should like some qualification to be given to the members. With regard to the payments made by the heritors, this £40,000 or £50,000 was a simple educational rate put on 200 years ago, and trebled 10 years ago. He thought, therefore, the Lord Advocate, in proposing the change, had properly substituted one educational rate for another, and had properly relieved the heritors in this respect. He was glad to see that the Lord Advocate had put into the Bill the sums to be given for infant, evening, and industrial schools; but he was sorry that in respect to evening schools, he had limited the grants to places where there were at least 1,000 inhabitants. He (Mr. M'Lagan) would suggest that a limit should be made, not in reference to the population, but to the attendance at the schools. He had great hopes of the advantages to be derived from these evening schools, which should be encouraged as much as possible, especially in small villages.

MR. DIXON said, that as no English Member had yet spoken, he wished to express his regret that more time had not been allowed for the discussion of this very important matter. He trusted that the Government would not suppose that everything in this Bill was assented to because English Members were silent. It must be understood that in Committee hon. Members should have full opportunity of discussing the principles of this Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had certainly no reason to complain of the debate of that night. He assumed that the second reading of the Bill would be taken without a Division. He would refer for a moment to the adverse criticisms of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. Gordon). These criticisms were in entire accordance with the observations he made on the occasion when this measure was introduced. His hon. and learned Friend characterized it as a destruction of the system of parochial schools, and he made observations of the same character in criticizing the proposal of the Bill with respect to central authority. As to the parochial schools, it certainly was not the purpose of the Bill to destroy the parochial system of education. On the contrary, the purpose—the leading object—of the Bill was to strengthen and extend it. The system had become insufficient. Even in country districts the parish schools supplied education to a very small proportion of the children who required it, and the system had never been extended into the burghs at all. The purpose of the Bill was to enlarge the system in country districts, and to extend it into the towns, where heretofore it had no existence at all. His hon. and learned Friend seemed to regard as tantamount to destruction the change which the Bill proposed in the school boards. No doubt that change was considerable. The management at present was vested in a limited number of a limited class of heritors, with the minister of the parish. With the extension of the parochial system, which he hoped would follow upon the Bill, it would be necessary to provide more extensive funds than had hitherto been provided; it would therefore be necessary to extend the area of rating. Accordingly, it seemed impossible to him, with an extended school system and an enlarged area of rating, to leave the management in the confined condition in which it was at present. He proposed to do only what the law establishing the system, which had been so much lauded, originally did—namely, to make the management commensurate with the rating—to vest the management in those who paid. To say that there was any destruction of the Scotch school system because the management was to be in an elective body was a novel proposition to maintain in the House of Commons at the present day. The excellence of the Scotch parish schools was attributable to the excellence of the schoolmasters; and the influence of the parish schools had been owing in great measure to the mere fact of their existence. It early became a custom for parents to send their children there, and that custom had continued to the present day; so that some education was furnished to the children in every parish. But with regard to the extent to which the people of Scotland were indebted to those schools, he could not use such unmeasured language of laudation as his hon. and learned Friend had done. The Royal Commissioners reported that 75 per cent of these schools were good, leaving 25 per cent either indifferent or bad. And with regard to the Free Church schools, his recollection was that they said they were very much on a par with the schools under the parochial system. They were not first-rate any of them; but they had been assisted by a very efficient board, and were supplemental to the parochial schools, and were much of the same character. The Free Church schools have undoubtedly been a blessing to the country. He did not exactly understand what was meant by an expression which had been very frequently used by his hon. and learned Friend, “the peculiarities of the Scotch system of education.” No doubt the parochial schools had furnished very excellent schoolmasters, which was attributable probably to this—that the clergy of the Established Church of Scotland were very moderately provided for; none of the great prizes which were so attractive in other Established Churches fell to their lot; they therefore came chiefly from the humbler classes—commonly from those boys who had shown an aptitude for learning in the parish schools, had been encouraged and sent to the University, and had found an intermediate resting-place between the school and the ministry in the office of the schoolmaster, and accordingly they had in most of the country schools in Scotland a schoolmaster with a University education, and he was able to take up boys who showed an aptitude for learning, and send them in the same course he proceeded himself; and so the Church was supplied with ministers and the schools with masters. That was not a peculiarity in the system of education. In England, he presumed, reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught in the same way as in Scotland. The Educational Department of the Privy Council — jealousy of which had been so freely expressed in the course of that debate—recognized the advantage of instruction in more than mere elementary knowledge. Geography, grammar, mathematics, Latin, Greek, and modern languages, were all provided for in the Revised Code. That was not a peculiarity of the Scotch system. They had schools in which Latin to a certain extent, and Greek to an infinitesimal extent, were taught; but there was no feeling, as far as he was aware, adverse to this among those who were charged with education in England. Now, a few words with regard to the central authority. His hon. and learned Friend asked—“Why depart from the provisions of the Bill which appeared good to the Government and to Parliament in 1869?” The Bill which he had now had the honour of laying upon the Table was in many important respects, with reference to the question he was now adverting to, at variance with the Bill of 1869. The Bill of 1869 proposed to establish a Scotch Board undoubtedly, but only one, which was to be at Edinburgh—it was not proposed to establish one in every parish and every burgh in the country. That Board was to have the exclusive power of determining when and where national schools were to be established. When that Central Board had determined that a national school was to be established in any locality, then a school committee was to be called into existence in that locality. But the one Board established by that Bill was the Central Board at Edinburgh. But by this Bill he would establish within six months after its passing a school board in every parish and district in Scotland. There would be plenty of school boards, and every one of them would be charged with the duty within its own district which was proposed to be conferred on the Central Board at Edinburgh by the Bill of 1869 with respect to the whole of Scotland. Then the question arose, which did not arise in 1869—whether an intermediate Board was required between the parish or burgh boards and the central authority: which must, of necessity, be in London—not because there was any apprehension that the people of Scotland were not able to manage their own affairs, but because when Imperial money was to be given for any purpose it was considered desirable, if not essential, that the administration should be in a Government Department immediately answerable and amenable to the House of Commons. There was, as his hon. and learned Friend had pointed out, an exception in the case of the Irish Education Department; but from information which had reached him as the true lesson of experience that was not an example which it would be well to imitate. Even his hon. and learned Friend had referred to Ireland as a spoilt child, and that spoilt children are very troublesome to their parents. This conferring of a Board of Education on Ireland was one of those acts of over-kindness which induced a troublesome disposition on the part of the children. He therefore thought that they ought to avoid that exceptional instance; and, therefore, a central authority must exist in London for most important purposes. As the central authority was to administer Imperial money, it was interested to see that the local boards were not extravagant in the expenditure of the money raised by the rates that they imposed; for any extravagance in that direction would, according to the provisions of the Bill, lead to a corresponding increase in the expenditure of the Imperial money paid in grants. Therefore, it appeared to him that this provision was a natural one, and likely in its operation to be a useful and efficient check in every direction in which a check was required. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council had stated that the Department would be made a Scotch Department. Now, the very name “Scotch Department” had a power of virtue in it, for it was an intimation by Parliament that the administration in this matter was to be a Scotch administration. It was wrong to suppose that Scottish views and interests had been in any way overlooked in the framing of the Bill. An Education Department for Scotland would be created under the Bill, which would be empowered to take full cognizance of the wishes of the people of Scotland with regard to the education which they desired their children to get, and that Department would be able to act in all matters relating to local affairs. As he knew that the House was desirous to get to the next Question on the Paper, he should reserve any further observations he had to make on the details of the Bill for another occasion. He should now content himself with saying that the several suggestions thrown out by the various speakers who had taken part in the debate would receive his fullest consideration before the Bill passed into Committee, and that he should endeavour to make the Bill as agreeable to the House, and as valuable and useful to Scotland, as possible.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 20th March.

WESTMEATH, &c. UNLAWFUL COMBINATIONS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in rising to move—

said: I need hardly attempt to describe the feelings of painful dismay with which I undertake the task now before me, for, in addition to the want of experience and knowledge of Irish affairs under which I labour, I have to approach a most difficult and distressing question, which has perplexed English statesmen for many years—namely, the manner in which Irish crime should be dealt with by Parliament. Under these circumstances it may be excusable, though it may not be wise, if, to begin with, I approach the most agreeable part of my subject. I feel, then, a pleasure to be able to say that the condition of Ireland as regards crime has during the last year very greatly and sensibly improved. Those who recollect the condition of Ireland for a much longer period than I can, will be able to make their own comparisons as to the state of things that existed in that country within their own recollection, and that which exists at the present time. They can contrast the present comparative quietude and peace in that country with the scenes of almost open warfare and bloodshed which they can recall to their recollection. I shall not go back to any distance of time, but I shall be satisfied if I can point out to the House, as I think I can, that within the last year there has been a great and material improvement in the state of Ireland. It will be within the recollection of the House that during the last winter and spring agrarian and other crimes were very prevalent in that country, but that a great improvement in that respect has taken place, the proof of which can be traced in many ways. For instance, the assizes in different circuits are approaching, and there is hardly at any of them any considerable number of cases coming on for Crown prosecution. That circumstance, however, is not always the test of peace, for unfortunately when crime is rife it is often not possible to detect the criminals to a sufficient degree to bring them to trial in the Courts of Justice; but the reports received from the constabulary, who specially report every instance of violence and crime throughout the country, equally show a remarkable improvement. Within the last months of last winter, the months of January, February, and March, the number of offences specially reported by the constabulary was—in January, 713; in February, 601; and in March, 741; while in the first four months of the present winter the number was in October 224, in November 255, in December 204, and in the past January 231. If we compare the state of Ireland now with that of last winter with respect to those crimes classed in the criminal statistics as agrarian, the comparison is still more satisfactory. Whereas in January of last winter the number was 391, in February 303, and in March 356, the number in the first four months of the present winter was in October 11, in November 30, in December 20, and in January 35. I do not wish the House for one moment to believe that I attribute this great improvement—for a great improvement it is—to that course of remedial legislation which it has been the pride of this side of the House to initiate during the two last Sessions of Parliament. I am aware that we have had in operation during the present winter the Peace Preservation Act, which conferred on the Government powers considerably exceeding those ordinarily in the hands of the Government; but I claim for the Government the credit of having used both the ordinary and the extraordinary powers which have been placed in their hands with vigour, firmness, and decision. During the past year it has only been necessary for the Government to issue but one Special Commission, but that has been attended with results of the best character. We have in every disaffected part of the country prosecuted the most vigorous searches for fire-arms, which have resulted in a large number of them having been taken from the hands of the disloyal and criminal classes. The constabulary force has been augmented in every disturbed district; experienced detectives have been employed in certain parts of the country not with all the effect that might have been expected, but still not altogether without effect; constant patrols have been established wherever, in the opinion of the constabulary, they could be of advantage, and the Attorney General and the Crown Solicitor have been instructed personally to undertake every case which appeared to be of any unusual gravity, and they have discharged their duty in a most satisfactory manner. Altogether, therefore, I assert that at no time within the recollection of any Member in this House, have the powers of the law been more vigorously, and at the same time more impartially, executed. This is an answer to those observations made in so fair, candid, and generous a spirit by the right hon. Gentleman opposite a few nights ago. I do not ask for a Committee of this House, nor do I wish the right hon. Gentleman to inquire how Ireland is to be regenerated or governed. We hope and believe that time and wise legislation will regenerate Ireland, and meanwhile the present Government is determined, as much as any Government has been, to exercise the powers conferred on them by Parliament, and to govern Ireland according to law. I now come to the painful exceptions from the general tranquillity alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, and those exceptions occurred principally in the counties referred to in the Notice of Motion I have placed on the Paper—namely, in the county of Westmeath, and certain small districts bordering on that county, in King's County and Meath. In respect to the figures I shall have to lay before the House I shall not have much to say in reference to Meath and King's County, and, probably, it might not have been necessary to include them in the Notice

before the House, had it not been that we thought it better that the Committee to be appointed should not be fettered by any rigid line of boundary, but should be able to extend the inquiry, if they thought fit, beyond the circumstances of Westmeath to what has happened on its border. In Westmeath there has also been some diminution in the number of those offences which are classed under the head of agrarian crimes during the last winter; but I am sorry to say there has been a marked increase in the more serious class of crimes. In 1869 there were two murders and two attempts to murder in Westmeath; in 1870 there were four murders and seven attempts at murder; and in the past winter there have happened three murders and two attempts at murder; and in January of this year there occurred one further attempt to murder. In King's County there were in 1869 one murder and one attempt to murder; in 1870 two attempts; and in January, 1871, one attempt. In Meath, I am happy to say, there has been no serious attempt at crime; but, in the statement I shall have further on to make, I have reason to suppose that that part of Meath is as much subject to the Riband conspiracy as any part of Westmeath or King's County. Perhaps the House will allow me to read the particulars of two murders, which will show in a clearer manner than the mere recapitulation of statistics what is the nature of the crime with which we have to deal. The first occurred on the 25th of November last, and was as follows:—

“Francis Dowling, an Army pensioner, steward to Messrs. Perry, of Ballinagore Mills, when returning from his office in the evening, and about entering the gatehouse where he resided, was fired at and shot dead by some person unknown, who, from the impression made by his knee when taking aim, appears to have been concealed about two or three yards on Dowling's right. Four pellets struck Dowling. Deceased was an inoffensive man, and generally liked. About two years ago a man was dismissed from Messrs. Perry's employment. He was succeeded by Dowling. Revenge for this is the only motive assigned for the crime. Messrs. Perry have been three times noticed by threatening letters to discharge four persons, of whom Dowling was one, and about six months ago were informed that a man was told off to shoot Dowling. Two men were arrested (one of whom was the party dismissed), but both were discharged for want of evidence.”

The next case to which I wish to call particular attention is that of the murder

“Thomas Waters, process server, was found by a police patrol one mile from Mullingar, at 11 o'clock, p.m., shot dead, his body still warm. There were three bullet wounds in his left breast. The Rev. Mr. Crofton, of Louth, about a month ago resolved upon evicting a notorious Riband leader, who had refused to pay an increased rent, but so great was the dread of this man that no one could be found to serve the ejectment notice. Waters at last undertook the task. His death deprives the landlord of proof that the notice was served, and the tenant in question will, in consequence, retain his farm for six months longer. It is believed that this crime was resolved on and carried out under the directions of the Riband conspiracy. The police repeatedly warned deceased of the danger of associating with known members of that society, and frequently escorted him (contrary to his wish) part of the way home. Three persons, all notorious Ribandmen, have been arrested. One of the three was seen drinking with Waters during the entire day of the murder.”

I regret to say that the three persons arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in this crime have been discharged for want of evidence. I will not refer to any other serious cases that have occurred, because there are persons in custody against whom there is more or less evidence, and with respect to whom there is more or less hope of obtaining a conviction; and therefore it will not be right, whilst their trials are pending, that I should say anything respecting their cases. These statements of actual murder and of attempt to murder within the limits of a small county are certainly bad enough; but I regret to say that does not complete the whole of my case. All these acts of violence are, we have reason to believe, the work of a Riband society in Westmeath, which has long been known as the centre and stronghold of that society. It has, no doubt, broken out at various times in other parts of Ireland, and it has, no doubt, also inflicted upon society in other parts of Ireland very grave and serious injury. In other parts of Ireland, I am happy to say, it appears almost to have disappeared; but in Westmeath, and on the borders of that county, it still continues to be in existence. That it is nothing new in Westmeath I think the following figures will prove. From a Return extending from the years 1848 to 1870 it appears that 40 persons died from violence within the county of Westmeath, and in 12 only of those cases were convictions obtained. In addition to these 40 cases there were 54 persons fired at,

and in five of these only were convictions obtained. Probably, most hon. Members know as well as I do what is the nature and object of a Riband society. Originally it had something of a religious and political character about it. I believe it began as a Roman Catholic organization for the protection of its adherents against the Orange society; later, however, it assumed a very different aspect, and devoted itself chiefly to enforcing a set of rules framed by its leaders for regulating the relationships between landlord and tenant; more recently, it has again assumed a religious character to a certain extent, but it still continues to take notice of breaches of its rules as regards landlord and tenant, and even interferes between employer and employed. This leads me to another part of the case—which is, that not only have these violent attempts prevailed to the extent I have described in the county of Westmeath, and not only do we suppose them to be the work of a secret society, but the information we receive from the resident magistrates, from the constabulary, and from private persons induces us to think that this society exercises an influence which no statistics I can lay upon the Table of the House will indicate sufficiently. The reports we receive show that such a state of terrorism prevails that the society has only to issue its edict to secure obedience; nor has it even to issue its edict, its laws are so well known, and an infringement of them is followed so regularly by murderous outrage, that few, indeed, can treat them with defiance. Riband law, and not the law of the land, appears to be that which is obeyed. It reaches to such an extent that no landlord dare exercise the most ordinary of rights pertaining to land; and no farmer, employer, or agent dare exercise his own judgment or discretion as to whom he shall or shall not employ; in fact, so far does the influence of the society extend that a man scarcely dare enter into open competition in the fairs or markets with anyone known to belong to the society. Under these circumstances, inquiry will naturally arise as to the powers given under the additional law passed last Session. We have already said what has been done by the Government with regard to the preservation of peace throughout the country. All those measures which I have before enumerated have been still more strictly carried out in the case of Westmeath and the neighbourhood. The ordinary police force in Westmeath has been added to by, I think, 130 men; additional stations, too, have been established wherever an outrage has occurred or is apprehended; the cost of these additional stations has been in many instances defrayed out of a tax upon the inhabitants; the police have arrested numerous persons under the provisions of the Act of last year for being out at night under suspicious circumstances; but in very few of these cases have the magistrates been able to inflict the penalties of the law, because those persons who were arrested had taken good care that they were out on business, and that they had a lawful and also an additional excuse; patrols have been established wherever a constabulary officer had reason to believe they were necessary, and special protection has been given in many cases to persons supposed to be in danger. So far have the precautions of the constabulary reached that in some cases some of the worst characters have been almost constantly watched; but so perfect and complete has been the character and organization of this conspiracy, that the constabulary have attributed but little importance to precautions like these. They believe the Riband leaders can concert measures and project a scheme of retaliation by the meeting of two or three men in the road or in the middle of a fair. An outrage can thus be planned within earshot of the police, and all the necessary arrangements be made with a precision which could not be exceeded if the conspirators assembled in a secret meeting place. I need not say that the Irish Government, that my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and myself have made most careful inquiries to see whether the police and magistrates possess any powers which they have not yet used; but they have conclusively shown us that even the additional powers of the Act of last year have not been sufficient to cope with this conspiracy of Westmeath and its neighbourhood. Now, if this state of things really exists—and it can be too readily proved—the Government say, and I say to the House, that it is an intolerable state of things. The Government are prepared to admit it, and we say that we are determined to apply to the House for a remedy. What we propose to-night to do is this—to lay the facts which I have stated, and other facts which are too long to lay before the House now—to lay all these facts before a Committee of this House. We ask to have a Committee to join with us in thoroughly sifting and attempting to elucidate these facts. We do not ask the Committee to provide us with a remedy. We feel that to be the duty of the Government. But we do think we may fairly ask the Committee to assist us in examining into these facts, and into the state of things which I have described. Bad as the case is, it is not one which we think requires legislation in haste or in panic. There has been quite enough of hasty legislation, and we believe that any legislation not based upon a full and complete knowledge of the extent of the evil, and of the nature of the evil, and of the cause or causes of the evil, would fail in its object. We ask, then, that a Committee of the House should examine with us into the facts which I have laid before them, and we ask this for several reasons. First, we ask this Committee for our own assistance. It may, of course, be said that we have within our own reach all the necessary means of obtaining information. We have, no doubt, the information of responsible magistrates; we have the information of the constabulary officers; we have the information which can be given us by the officers of the law, and I should be the last person to disparage the value and the accuracy of the information which those officers can give us. Still, even with regard to them, we do not think it will be amiss that their knowledge and experience, that their observations and the results of their observations, should be thoroughly investigated by impartial and independent means. We think that new light may be obtained by bringing new minds to bear upon the Committee. In addition to that, we desire to obtain the assistance and knowledge which can be provided by persons whose information is not readily accessible by the Government. We hope and expect that local magistrates will come forward and give us their information. We hope that employers of labour will come forward and tell us what they know. In short, we hope that persons of all classes and creeds, who are acquainted with the inhabitants, with their habits, and with their manners, will come forward and give us independent information upon this subject. And although, no doubt, the Irish Government have endeavoured to obtain as full information from those sources as they could, still we believe that a Committee of the House of Commons will have the means and opportunity of obtaining further information, and of sifting it in a more thorough and complete manner. That is one reason why we ask for this Committee. And the next reason why we ask for a Committee is in justice to ourselves and the House. It is possible—I do not know how that may be, but it is possible—that the House might, upon the statement I have made, be willing to admit that the case was proved, and to give the Government any powers which they might think fit to ask. But, Sir, I think the House, in taking such a course, would evade that responsibility which properly belongs to it. [Cries of "No, no!" and "The Government!"] I think, Sir, that the case does not depend on the mere figures which I have been able to lay before the House, nor upon the assertions which I have made, though I think them capable of being proved. I believe that the House has the means of obtaining full and sufficient proof of them, and I think the House would evade the responsibility which belongs to it if they took for granted from any Minister a statement of facts which they themselves have the opportunity of proving to their own satisfaction. The House does not, in ordinary cases, take for granted any statement made by a Minister on the introduction of a Bill; but the House examines for itself all such statements, and the grounds on which they are made. Why, then, in a case like this, when grave and great constitutional questions are involved, is the House to evade its responsibility, and refuse to examine the facts and grounds upon which a measure is to be laid before it? And, lastly, we ask for an inquiry in justice to the people of Ireland. We know the use that will be made by all the enemies of order and peace and of this country in Ireland, of any proposal made by the Government for additional and stringent powers. We know that the use made of it would be extended far beyond the district with which we are particularly concerned with to-night. We know that the evil results arising from misrepresentation would extend over the whole of Ireland, and we therefore think that, before we ask for additional powers, before we expose the whole country to the risk of mischief by asking for this inquiry, it is due to the people of Ireland that they should have the opportunity of coming forward and testifying to the truth or the falsehoods of the statements which have been made with regard to a small portion of their country, or of showing that they have been exaggerated. It is due to them to have an opportunity of saying that these evils exist in Westmeath only, and do not exist elsewhere. It is due to them that they should have an opportunity of denying any participation in these crimes and in this conspiracy. These are the grounds upon which we think we may fairly ask the House to enter with us into an examination of the facts. We do not shrink from any responsibility that properly belongs to us; but we do say that the House, no more than the Government, has any right to evade the responsibility which properly belongs to it. I repeat that, in asking the House for a Committee to inquire into the facts, we have no desire to ask the Committee to suggest a remedy. Upon the facts so established, as I believe they would be before a Committee, the Government will be prepared, as I have said before, to legislate. The Government think the state of things intolerable, and a remedy they are determined to find, if not within, then without, the ordinary limits of the Constitution. Now, as to the terms of the Motion, there are two observations which I desire to make to the House. The first relates to the words in the Motion, "the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and confederacy existing therein." These words may seem to some Members of the House to be pedantic, but they have been chosen as the description applied to the Riband conspiracy in a former Act of Parliament. These words have been chosen to show the nature of the inquiry into the state of Westmeath, and the nature of the conspiracy generally known by that name. The other observation is this—that I have added at the end of the Motion that the Committee are to inquire into "the best means of suppressing the same." Now, these words form part of the Motion, because I thought it probable and desirable that many witnesses who would come before the Committee, would wish not only to state the facts with which they are acquainted, but to state what in their opinion is the remedy that should be applied. I do not think it the least desirable that the witnesses should be precluded from giving their opinion on this subject. But I am quite aware that those words have been misunderstood and misapprehended. I am quite aware they have been misunderstood as meaning that we have asked the Committee not only to enter into an examination of the facts, but to provide a remedy. I am glad to state that that is not the meaning of the Government, and rather than that any false impression of the sort should exist, I will willingly consent either to alter the words referred to, or to omit them altogether, provided always it be understood that the witnesses shall not thereby be precluded from expressing an opinion as to the remedy they would suggest. Now, I come to one point of which a great deal has been made, and in respect to which much misapprehension exists, and that is the Notice which I gave upon the matter, but which does not form any part of the Motion—namely, that the Committee should be a Secret Committee. When the Government decided to move for the appointment of this Committee, we considered what evidence it would be possible to bring before it. In addition to the evidence to which I have already referred, it appeared to us that a good deal of evidence, and probably a good deal of valuable evidence, might be obtained from persons resident in the country, if they were not under the apprehension that their evidence would be published in the newspapers. It was thought desirable, therefore, that the Committee should have the power of giving gentlemen who may be willing to be examined the protection of secrecy. It has been my duty to examine the question as to what sort of protection the Committee could give. I found that there are only two descriptions of Committees known in this House—the ordinary Select Committees and Committees of Secrecy. The only difference between the two, I believe, consists in this—that a Secret Committee is one at which not even a Member of this House has a right to be present. The ordinary Select Committee has a right of excluding the public whenever it thinks fit, but, of course, secrecy in the case of any particular witness would be defeated if one or two Members of the House insisted on the right of being present. Therefore, following the precedents which we have upon the records of this House, I gave Notice on the part of the Government of their intention to make this a Secret Committee—that is to say, to the extent of giving the Committee power to exclude the public and also Members of this House whenever, in the opinion of the Committee, this was necessary for the protection of witnesses. But there never was any intention—and if hon. Members will refer to the precedents they will find that the appointment of a Secret Committee does not necessarily involve any intention—of making this a Committee to sit altogether with closed doors. It was always intended that the question of secrecy should be left entirely to the Committee itself; that the greater part of its investigations should be conducted as usual, but that they should have the power of affording to witnesses the protection of secrecy whenever in their opinion this might become necessary. But I am not surprised that this part of the subject has led to a great deal of remark, and has been very much misunderstood; and I will frankly admit to the House that the precedents to which we must go back for the appointment of Secret Committees are not precedents derived from the best periods of our history. It is not satisfactory to go back to the years 1812 and 1818 for precedents of Secret Committees to inquire into public matters. It is true that there has been, at a later date, a Committee of Secrecy, but that was an investigation of a very different nature—an inquiry into the Bank Acts. But to go back to precedents which are strictly applicable to this case, we should have to refer to the precedents of 1812 and 1818. The Government, seeing how much this matter has been misunderstood, have considered the matter again, and they prefer rather to make a deviation from the established practice than return to those precedents. We propose to leave the matter of secrecy entirely in the hands of the Committee. We propose that the Committee shall be appointed precisely in the ordinary manner; and if, in the course of their inquiry, they should think that by sitting with closed doors they can obtain evidence which they would not otherwise procure, then the Committee will come to the House and ask for the necessary authority, and the Government will give them all the assistance in their power. ["Oh! oh!"] That is the way the Government proposes to leave the matter. I myself do not believe it makes much difference whether the Committee is a secret one or not. I believe that witnesses such as I have described will be willing to come forward whether the Committee is a secret one or whether it is not; if they would be afraid to come and give their evidence openly it is very probable they would be afraid to give it even before a Secret Committee. Still, if the Committee should think that they would be able to obtain evidence in this manner which otherwise they would be unable to do, it will be always in their power to come to this House and ask for leave to sit with closed doors. I am told that the appointment of this Committee is going to be opposed. I do not know upon what ground the opposition will rest. Certainly, I shall be surprised if it be opposed by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. For there is a precedent in point; it is not necessary to go back to 1812 or 1818, for the appointment of a similar Committee. I find that in 1852 a Committee to inquire into a very similar state of things in the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth was appointed by this House on the Motion of Mr. Napier, the Irish Attorney General of the Government with which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) was then connected. That Committee was appointed without any such statement on the part of the Government as I have been authorized to make to-night—that the Government were prepared to take any responsibility whatever in putting an end to the existing state of things. Mr. Napier, on the part of Lord Derby's Government, simply told the House of the state of things in those counties, and asked for a Committee to inquire into the facts and to suggest a remedy. The Government, as far as I can see, took no responsibility whatever upon themselves for the appointment of that Committee. As far, also, as I am able to discover, no person in this House took any objection to the appointment. Therefore, whatever may be the grounds upon which the appointment of this Committee is going to be opposed to-night, I can hardly imagine that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have set us the example of resorting to this means of obtaining information for themselves, will grudge us a like opportunity of obtaining information which we are anxious to acquire. I am perfectly aware that the proposal I now have to make will expose us to innumerable taunts as to the failure of what is called our system of remedial legislation. I know that, very shortly, we shall hear some criticisms, not of the most agreeable character, upon remedial legislation in general, and upon our policy of conciliation. But even if the proposal which I have now to make involved the most ample confession of mistake and failure, I believe Her Majesty's Government would not shrink from proposing to Parliament that which they felt it the duty of Parliament to undertake. But I beg to say for myself, and for the Government, that I do not feel in the least that I appear here in the character of a penitent in a white sheet, or that the proposal which I now make involves any confession of failure on the part of the Government. I certainly never heard any Gentleman on this side of the House say that the establishment of religious equality or the passing of a law regulating the tenure of land in Ireland would put a stop to the Riband conspiracy. I think it would have been the height of insanity for anybody to say so. I cannot see on what possible ground it could be imagined that the establishment of equal and just legislation should have any effect on the minds of men who have a system of laws of their own—not just laws, but the most unjust, the most arbitrary, the most tyrannical, and the most barbarous. I cannot conceive what sympathy such men could have with good legislation. And, therefore, I cannot imagine on what grounds it could enter into the mind of any man that justice, as applied to Ireland, would have the immediate effect of putting down Ribandism. I know it has been said—and I believe it to be true—that Ribandism and other forms of disaffection in Ireland derive their chief strength from the sympathy of the people. I believe that this strength is partly derived from this sympathy of the people, and partly from the fear which these organizations inspire in the minds of the people. But I believe, also, that sympathy with these forms of disaffection is waning day by day under the influence of just government; and I believe that the Government will, with the assistance of this Committee and of the House, be enabled to pass such measures as will, in a short time, put an end to that fear which is the other formidable weapon in the hands of these conspirators.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Westmeath and certain parts adjoining, of Meath and King's County, the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and confederacy existing therein, and the best means of suppressing the same."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. DISRAELI said: The noble Lord commenced his observations by confessing the sentiment of dismay with which he rose to make the proposition with which he has terminated his speech, and I quite sympathized with the noble Lord. I thought it was a sentiment most natural, and it did him great honour, in my opinion, to be under its influence at that moment. Considering how the House of Commons has passed the last two years; the sacrifices which have been proposed and which have been submitted to, the unceasing vigilance, the teeming device, the constant energy, the great exertions that never have been wanting; remembering how legislation has been carried on to the exclusion of all subjects of Imperial interest but those which related to Ireland; how England has submitted to the postponement of measures of great importance, and Scotland has given up that darling scheme of national education which we have found so interesting and entertaining this evening; and viewing what apparently is the result of two years of constant legislation by a Government elected for the purpose of introducing an entirely new system in the administration of Ireland, and which cannot for a moment pretend that it has not been supported generously by the House in any of the measures which it deemed necessary to consummate this great end, I can quite understand, or, at least, I could quite understand, until the closing observations of the noble Lord, that he rose under a feeling of some dismay. But, according to the noble Lord, in his concluding sentence, there is no reason whatever why he should be dismayed—the state of Ireland at present, in the instance of this disturbed county and the adjoining districts, is exactly that which we ought to have expected. He tells us that religious equality, that agricultural equity—great ends which have been attained under his administration—were never for a moment to be counted on as a means by which a state of society such as he now introduces to our notice could be ameliorated. If that be the case why should the noble Lord be dismayed? The noble Lord should pluck up his courage. If he is to succeed in the singular proposition he has made to-night, he should have come forward, not as a daunted, but rather as a triumphant Minister. He should have said—"It is true that murder is perpetrated with impunity; it is true that life is not secure, and that property has no enjoyment and scarcely any use; but this is nothing when, in the enjoyment of abstract political justice—and by the labours of two years we have achieved that for Ireland—massacres, incendiarism, and assassinations are things scarcely to be noticed by a Minister, and are rather to be referred to the inquiry of a Committee."

Now, after the somewhat perplexing address of the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, let me recall the attention of the House to the position in which hon. Members find themselves to-night, after the Notice which was given 48 hours ago. Suddenly the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant comes down and announces the appointment of a Secret Committee to consider the state of a portion of Ireland, and not only to consider its state of combination and confederacy against the law, but also to devise means for suppressing the same. That was the way in which the question was put before us. Now, however, we are told it is not to be a Secret Committee; but have the Government well considered the effect of making such an announcement to the world, and expressing an opinion that it was necessary to have a Secret Committee to consider the condition of a portion of Ireland? Why, the telegraphic cable must have flashed the announcement to America 48 hours ago, and what do you think must have been the effect of it on those treasonable confederacies which are always in action—and are at this moment in action, as we know—against the authority of England? What must have been the effect of such an announcement? It must have produced a conviction in their minds that the Government found the whole state of society in Ireland undermined, and that the authority of the Queen was in imminent danger. To announce 48 hours after this that it is not the intention of the Government to propose a Secret Committee, indicates a tone of levity in dealing with a great question which ought not to pass unnoticed. Surely a Minister who proposes a Secret Committee on the condition of Ireland, by that proposition alone incurs the gravest responsibility. Now, to-night we find it is not to be a Secret Committee, and then, to our great surprise, we find it is also a Committee which is not to devise means for remedying the evils complained of. Then what is the Committee to do? Observe the description of this district of Ireland, where there are not only these evils, but these spreading evils—observe the description of it given by the Minister. It is brief, and terse in the extreme. He tells us it is intolerable. He tells us the state of Ireland is intolerable—[“No, no!”]—that the state of a great portion of Ireland is intolerable, and therefore will want inquiry. [“No, no!”] Well, that the state of a county in Ireland is intolerable. Is it reduced to that? Is a county in a state so intolerable that you must come to a Senate to ask for a Committee to inquire into it? Can you not get out of the difficulty without coming to the House of Commons, and asking it to appoint a Secret Committee to devise means to govern a county? Well, Sir, secrecy is given up and devising means are given up; so the question is—“What is this Committee to do?” Every impartial Member on either side of the House must have felt the difficulty, and asked himself that question. Why, the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant gave us ample explanations as to the various means by which he might have gained complete information on all points which the Government required to guide them in order to meet the evils of this district; and, indeed, under the very Act which we passed last year, they have powers—extraordinary powers; so that, for instance, if there is a felony committed in a district, they can summon witnesses before them and examine them, even although such witnesses may not be connected with the felony. Why, what power has a Committee of the House of Commons, compared with this power? I would impress on the House the inexpediency of assenting to a Committee which is to relieve the Government from their responsibility as an Executive.

But the noble Lord, who says he will never appear in the sheet of a penitent, and holding the taper of remorse, told us to-night that, whatever the original intentions of the Government were, it is not their intention now to ask this Committee to devise any means to suppress the evils of which they complain, and which they describe as intolerable. I would say myself at once that, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly prepared to support the Government in any demand they may make upon their own responsibility to terminate an evil which they describe, and I believe justly describe, as intolerable. There is no need to enter into an antiquated history of the horrors of Ribandism to induce the House of Commons to come to this conclusion. We know the evil. We have long heard of the evil, and of the perpetration of these new crimes and these new horrors; and I was only astonished that in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne they were not referred to with more distinctness. We have recently had from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland an announcement with reference to them which prepared us for the legislation which I suppose the Government will come forward and propose; and if the Government would come forward and propose a remedy, I think I might venture to answer for every Gentleman on this side of the House that he would give it an unflinching support. The evil is intolerable and ought to be put down, and we are prepared to support Her Majesty's Government if, in the exercise of their constitutional functions, they come forward and propose a measure, instead of asking the House of Commons to enter upon an inquiry into the matter. The matter is urgent, and the business of a Committee is necessarily always long. A Committee—to do what—to examine officers of the Government, to examine magistrates, to call for information from a miscellaneous multitude of witnesses? Why, a Committee of Inquiry for such purposes is always in existence. It is the Cabinet of the Queen. They have the best information, and they are selected men, who are supposed to be most competent to decide on that information; and on the results of their deliberations and on their convictions they ought to introduce a measure, and not move for a Committee, when the state of an Irish county is intolerable. Let the Standing Orders be suspended if the case is urgent.

The noble Lord has made some reference, from that richness of precedent with which he has been crammed on this occasion, to what occurred in 1852, and, in the midst of the distress of this regenerating Government of Ireland, supported by a hundred legions, and elected by an enthusiastic people, in order to terminate the grievances of that country and secure its contentment and tranquillity he must needs dig up our poor weak Government of 1852, and say—"There was Mr. Napier, your Attorney General, he moved for a Committee, and you were a Member of that Cabinet." If I had had a majority of 100 behind my back I would not have moved for that Committee. I did the best I could, and I passed a good Bill by a respectable majority. But was the situation in which I was placed similar to the situation of Her Majesty's present Ministers? Look for a moment to the relations which this Government bear to the House of Commons with regard to the administration of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) was elected for a specific purpose; he was the Minister who alone was capable to cope with these long-enduring and mysterious evils that had tortured and tormented the civilization of England. The right hon. Gentleman persuaded the people of England that with regard to Irish politics he was in possession of the philosopher's stone. Well, Sir, he has been returned to this House with an immense majority, with the object of securing the tranquillity and content of Ireland. Has anything been grudged him? Time, labour, devotion—whatever has been demanded has been accorded, whatever has been proposed has been carried. Under his influence and at his instance we have legalized confiscation, consecrated sacrilege, and condoned high treason; we have destroyed churches, we have shaken property to its foundation, and we have emptied gaols; and now he cannot govern a county without coming to a Parliamentary Committee! The right hon. Gentleman, after all his heroic exploits, and at the head of his great majority, is making Government ridiculous. If he persists in this absurd suggestion I shall leave it to fortune to decide what may be its results. If he will bring forward a measure—an adequate measure—a measure which will meet the evil, he will be supported. The late Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) knows very well what is the measure that will meet the evil, because he plaintively asked the magistrates at Meath what he should propose to help them out of their difficulties, and they met in quarter sessions, passed a resolution, and told him what was necessary. What the magistrates told the late Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant will be the groundwork, the gist, and the pith of the measure which Her Majesty's Government must bring forward. Under certain circumstances they will have to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act; but after the flashy speeches of the right hon. Gentleman opposite upon that subject we must have a Parliamentary Committee as a veil in order that he may save his self-love.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK, who had given Notice of his intention to move the Previous Question said, that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland originally gave Notice of his intention to move the appointment of a Select Committee, including an inquiry not merely into the disturbed state of the county of Westmeath, but of a portion of the county of which he had the honour to represent (King's County), as well as of the county of Meath, and also the best means of suppressing the same. As representing one of the counties to be affected by the inquiry—an inquiry which in its terms suggested legislation to follow upon inquiry—and that inquiry being suggested as of a secret character, he deemed it his duty to his constituents to give Notice of his intention to oppose the formation of that Committee. The omission of the element of secrecy materially altered the nature of the case. Secrecy naturally suggested suspicion. No matter how high might be the character of that Committee—no matter how respectable might be the witnesses summoned before it, the moral impression left on the country arising from a secret inquiry and the decision of a secret tribunal would never have satisfied those who would have been effected by the legislation that the inquiry had been fair and impartial. The result of all legislation, in reference to crime ought to be not merely to prevent crime, but to satisfy those in the community who had no sympathy with the criminals that justice had been done. The investigation before the Committee would not have obtained that result. He submitted, however, that the suggestion of the noble Lord, although an alteration in terms of his original Motion, would still leave on the minds of the people of Ireland the impression of secrecy, because he had informed the House that the Committee would have power to apply to the House from time to time for powers enabling them to exclude strangers, and carry on their investigations with closed doors. Now, the Committee, consisting of a large portion of official Members, would, he presumed, think it their duty to accept the suggestion and adopt the hint thus thrown out. And the Committee, whether directly secret or indirectly secret, would never satisfy the people that the inquiry had been a fair one, and that no undue means had been resorted to in order to obtain information which was not strictly accurate, and did not represent the actual condition of the parts of the country affected. It was a very important fact that in King's County, which would be affected by the inquiry, there had not been a single murder since 1869; and, therefore, so far as that county was concerned, there did not appear to be any pressing necessity for legislation to suppress any increase of crime in that county. The noble Lord had stated that the means which had been resorted to consequent upon the legislation of last year, had been of the most strenuous and energetic character. The country had been patrolled, a Special Commission had been appointed, the police had been increased, and every power that could be used by the Government had been brought into operation. And all to do what? To restore peace to this county, which had been destroyed by a very small band of men, who, if they were not affected by the entire power of the British Government—who, if they were not subdued by its patrols and increased police, still continued in the exercise of their nefarious pursuits, notwithstanding the coercive legislation of the Government, because we had had these inquiries, and this legislation, and these Preservation Acts year after year—and the Act of last Session was suggestive of this—that it referred to various Acts of Parliament commencing 30 years ago, all of them having the same objects in view, all of them being coercive in their character, and all of them failing to procure the end which was now suggested as the result of this present inquiry—the unity of Ireland. Well, it appeared to him, that if coercive measures had failed, they should look to some other measures—to some other cause for the origin of these offences, and to some other means of repressing them. The cases adverted to by the noble Lord were not agrarian offences. The murder of a steward arose out of a private quarrel, and that of the process server from a too strenuous discharge of his functions; and in neither case was the original cause of quarrel any dispute about land. It might be said that the well-conducted portion of society ought to have no objection to the introduction of a measure which would merely affect the ill-disposed, and those who were likely to commit crime, and which would not prejudice or affect those members of society who were not amenable to the law, because they had not committed such crimes. But they had been told by the noble Lord that additional sums had been imposed for the employment of supernumerary policemen, consequent on the committing of the crimes. Now these Peace Preservation Acts had operated sometimes with considerable injustice to those who had in no way participated in the crimes committed. As an instance in point, he might refer to the case of the King's County, in which there had been only one attempt to murder in the course of the last six months. It was a very extraordinary case, and one illustrating the hardship which resulted from the passing of these coercive measures to those who had no connection with the crime. The case was this—A small farmer, with seven acres of land, became embarrassed in circumstances several years ago. Being unable to pay his debts, he made over his farm to one of his creditors, and went to America. After living in America for a number of years he returned home, and hearing that his creditor had repaid himself by the possession of the farm, he asked him if he would restore it. The new occupant refused, and disputes and altercations arose, and the landlord, a gentleman of small property, kindly interfered to restore peace, but without effect. The debtor returned to America, but intimated, on going away, that he would have his revenge, and shortly after he left this country his creditor was fired at one Sunday on his way to church. His wife was wounded. Now, what had been the result? Additional police had been placed on the townland in charge of the house of the man. The burden of this would fall on the tenants of the gentleman who tried to reconcile these parties—very small tenants and poor men, and if they paid this assessment they would not be able to pay their rents. In addition, the domain land of the gentleman was also largely assessed. Now, there was the man who had exerted himself to the very utmost of his power to prevent this crime made to suffer for it. In a parish in Westmeath, in consequence of an exemption of Protestants from a similar tax, a meeting was held, and a resolution passed by the Catholics, condemning the invidious distinction as one only calculated to excite and sustain religious animosities, and tend to promote disorder; and the meeting protested against the assumption that Catholics were not as loyal as Protestants, and declared that they were as loyal. In the raising of such a tax there was a departure from strict impartiality; and if this Committee were appointed, he would suggest that the inquiry should be extended to the mode in which these assessments were levied, and whether there had been any partiality in the levying of them. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland had borne testimony to the general tranquillity of Ireland. He could say for his own county—of King's County—that peace did prevail, except in regard to the very small portion where intruders came from the county of Westmeath. All borderers were troublesome. He should not have addressed the House if the inquiry had been confined to the county of Westmeath. He should have left that duty to the hon. Member for the county of Westmeath. But in the name of the King's County he must protest against this proposal. He objected to legislation following legislation. There was also an Act in full force—an Act supported by the entire power of the British Government—giving perhaps necessary, but unconstitutional, powers to the Government of Ireland. These powers would continue in force until August next, and he felt that the present measure to follow upon this inquiry would not lessen the evil, and that measures of a different kind must be resorted to to eradicate, from time to time, the spirit which prevailed, unhappily, in small portions only of Ireland.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Serjeant Sherlock.)

MR. G. E. BROWNE said, he regretted, that the first time he had the honour to address the House, that the subject of debate was one of so unpleasant a nature and relating to Ireland. He would not occupy the time of the House but for a very brief period, whilst he endeavoured to show that this Select Committee, as moved for by the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland, was inexpedient and unnecessary. Now, if there was not at present a Peace Preservation Act in operation in that country then there might be some grounds to apply for a Select Committee to inquire into the present state of the county of Westmeath and portions of the adjoining counties. But with that Act in full force, he could not see the necessity of adopting so unusual a course. He was at a loss to know, if those counties were so disorganized or in such a state as the noble Marquess had described, why the local authorities were unable to contend that the Peace Preservation Act was ineffective. He believed if this Committee was appointed its labours would be fruitless and abortive, and might have an effect that none of them desired—of irritating the minds of the people and estranging them still further from the Government of this country. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government had shown his disposition to deal fairly and justly towards Ireland, as proved by the Land Act of last Session, and the Church question of the Session before, and he had no doubt the people felt grateful, and fully appreciated his efforts in their behalf. He would only say that there was no one deprecated and deplored so much as he did the unfortunate existence of those secret combinations so detrimental to the advancement of the peace and prosperity of that country, and he was grieved to have heard from the noble Marquess that the county of Westmeath was as he had described it; but he rejoiced to have heard him say that the other portions of Ireland were in a peaceable state. But he (Mr. Browne) could not approve of the remedy the noble Marquess proposed when he considered that the Irish Executive was invested with ample power to meet and suppress the evils complained of. He should, therefore, support the Amendment.

MR. W. H. GREGORY said, the debate showed that there were, to use the words of a famous statesman, three courses in that case open to the Government. They might either take the course recommended by the hon. and learned Gentleman below him (Mr. Sergeant Sherlock), and also by the hon. Member who had just sat down, and that was to do nothing; or else the course recommended by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) who had suggested that the Government should at once act on their own responsibility; and then there was a third course, the one actually adopted by the Government—namely, to ask for an inquiry previously to legislating. As to the remarks that had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend below him, he must say that he had listened to them with surprise. How could he think that we could longer endure the state of things now going on in a part of Ireland, which was a scandal and disgrace to civilization? Why, within 12 hours of the Chamber in which they were assembled there existed a reign of terror, where the evil passions of vindictive men were the only law that was recognized; where secret tribunals issued their decrees, which were executed in the open face of day with as great a certainty as the certainty of impunity. It was perfectly impossible to acquiesce in such a state of things, which was only equalled by the condition of Southern Italy a few years ago, and by that of Greece at the present moment. The hon. and learned Gentleman affected to say that these outrages were not to be dealt with because they were not agrarian. He believed himself that in a great number of cases in Westmeath these outrages were not agrarian. They occurred in connection with all the varied business transacted in daily life. A man employed a herd or a shepherd and dismissed him for neglect; the secret edict went forth, and the shepherd's successor was instantly shot. The station-master at Mullingar dismissed a railway porter for his neglect of duty, and that station-master was shot. The company which owned a great railway traversing that district dismissed the guard of a train, and because the chairman and directors could not be met and shot down at noon-day, stones were repeatedly placed at night in the way of the mail train to upset it and wreak that most dastardly kind of revenge. That was the real state of the case: a law of terror, and not only that, but threatening letters falling—as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had described notices to quit as doing—like snow-flakes on every house in a county for many miles round. What if, in certain districts, murders had for a time ceased! But why was that? Because the whole county was so paralyzed with terror that no man durst do a single thing against the will of those secret tribunals. The contrivers and perpetrators of those outrages were perfectly well known to the police and the constabulary, but they durst not lay a hand on them because there would be no evidence forthcoming. When an hon. Member below him attempted to stop repressive measures in circumstances like those it should be borne in mind that that was not a landlord's question; it was essentially the question of the poor man and the peasant. The landlord might retire to London or to Dublin, and be safe from the assassin; if he chose to remain in the country he could go out and take his "constitutional" with a couple of agreeable constables; or if he liked to take an airing in his car, he could do it accompanied by the same officials with their rifles cocked and ready for action. How very different was the poor man's position. When he infringed any of the decrees of that secret tribunal, he knew that if he went to market, he knew his steps were watched; if he was lucky enough to return home safe, there was not a night on which he did not lie on his bed in fear and trembling lest his door might be burst open and himself placed on his knees and shot dead like a dog before the eyes of his wife and family. That was the state of things, and there was no palliation for it, no excuse. Years ago there was such a thing as the wild justice of revenge. When flagitious acts were committed by owners of land, driving people forth on the wide world, doomed to starvation and death, then, no doubt, in the last extremity of despair, men executed a bloody vengeance that could not, perhaps, be much wondered at, though it could not be defended. But those days had passed away; legislation had taken care that those acts of landlord injustice should not continue to be perpetrated, and there was now the fullest reparation for them. Therefore let them hear no more that nothing could be done. Something ought unquestionably to be done to put down a state of things disgraceful to a civilized nation. Then came the second point, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire said — “Oh, you should have come down at once and we would, in the most generous manner, have given you with open hands and open hearts any powers you liked to ask for.” Now, he was sorry to say he was old enough to recollect certain transactions of the year 1846, when a great Minister came down to that House when Ireland was convulsed by outrage, and asked for additional powers to repress the evil. What then did the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the allies he borrowed from the other side do? They said that Sir Robert Peel was a man not fit to be intrusted with those unconstitutional powers, and they drove from Office the man who, above all others, was the most scrupulously constitutional Minister that ever ruled over this country. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was a good master of combinations. Were they so sure that if the Government had come down at once and asked for extra powers they might not have had a declamation equally strong and vigorous as that of that evening, inveighing against the Government for venturing to ask for powers which ought to be denied any Ministry? Would not the right hon. Gentleman opposite have turned to Gentlemen below the Gangway, and asked them whether they were prepared on the mere ipse dixit of a young Secretary for Ireland to violate the liberty of the subject, and accede to that most extraordinary request? Then there only remained one other course—namely, the one submitted to them by the Government, and he should support it. He believed it was necessary to examine witnesses, necessary to convince the House and the country that the state of things which he had described existed; and then, when the Government were enabled to justify the powers they asked for by evidence which had been properly tested and sifted, he was convinced that the House would readily grant them such powers as would enable them to redeem Ireland from the disgrace and loss of character from which she suffered at present. He did not believe that party spirit, however strong it might be, would induce any Gentleman, no matter on what side of the House he sat, to tamper with assassination.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Mr. Speaker, I ask myself if it is possible, after the speech which the hon. Gentleman has just addressed to the House, that we can on any ground fail to proceed at once to put down this system of terrorism and intimidation which he has described to us. The hon. Gentleman has dared to say here that the police can put their hands on these assassins, and yet he has ventured to call upon this House to delay, and to leave these unhappy people who for more than a year have been living under the system of intimidation and terrorism, so to continue for the sake of having a Committee of Inquiry. He is willing to leave them to linger in this condition while we have an inquiry. The noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) has newly come into the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I am sorry to see that the beginning of his official experience in connection with that country has been so inauspicious and of so unsatisfactory a character. He is to be pitied in this matter; but he takes the office with all its responsibilities, and he finds that his first duty is to take the chesnuts from the fire which had grown too hot for his predecessor. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) has retired from his business, and left the noble Lord to do the most disagreeable part of it. It will, perhaps, be remembered that early in the Session of 1870 this very county of Westmeath was mentioned in connection with Meath and Mayo as one of the disturbed districts in which there was a dangerous and formidable amount of intimidation and terrorism. But let me ask the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) why he is afraid that we will not give the Government those powers that they may want for the repression of this state of things? When they came to Parliament for the Peace Preservation Act, did we not support them with both voice and vote, and did not we tell them that we would have given them even larger powers if they had asked for them, as we knew what the system of terror and horror which existed was? In this county of Westmeath there are people who, day by day, dare not stir from their homes without the defences which the hon. Gentleman has spoken of. There are husbands—gentlemen in the same position as yourselves—who never leave home without their wives expecting them to be brought back corpses. These things are happening every day, and the Government tell you to inquire! I say that this is a mockery and a folly. Even now the noble Lord tells you that he knows the remedy already—he does not come to ask for that, he knows what it is. There is no information to procure so far as the Government is concerned—they have it all in their possession already. The right hon. Gentleman who was Secretary for Ireland, the Attorney General for Ireland, and everybody who has been connected with that country, know that all these things exist, and that Westmeath cannot be dealt with by the Peace Preservation Act, because when you put the law in force, these things still exist in spite of it. Conspiracies exist and are carried on in open day, and the police know the men who are concerned in them and if the Habeas Corpus Act were to be suspended to-morrow, they would be able to put their hands on them in a moment. I tell you that it is a fact well known to the head of the Government and to the noble Lord that they could to-morrow, if they chose, put their hands on the perpetrators of these acts. I feel so strongly on this question that, if the Government would do something, I would not stand in their way. Rather than we should have a mean, cowardly, dishonourable giving-up of duties of Government, and that nothing should be done, I would even vote for this Committee. The Government has undertaken so much, has promised so much—although the noble Lord tells us that these hopes have never been held out. Why, it was only yesterday that I came across a speech which reminded me of the sort of hope they had held out. What said the right hon. Gentleman, whose voice I am sorry to say is at present silent in this House, but whom, I trust, we shall soon hear again? The right hon. Gentleman who was at the head of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright), speaking in January last of the legislation of the Government, told us, as he had done in former times, that there was no statesmanship in acts of force and repression, for that men the most clumsy and brutal could take such measures. What we wanted, he said, were men of higher genius, and he marked out the right hon. Gentleman; we wanted men of the highest patriotism, and no doubt he felt that he and those who were working with him were men of that class, and that these were the men to remedy the evils of Ireland. He said—

“All crime shall cease, and ancient frauds shall fail;

Returning Justice lift aloft her scale;

Peace o'er the realm her olive wand extend,

And white-robed Innocence from Heaven descend.”

This may appear the language of great exaggeration, but if we are able to banish agrarian crime, if we can unbar the prison doors, if we can reduce all excess of military force, if we can make Ireland as tranquil as England and Scotland now are, then, at least, we shall have done something to justify the wisdom and statesmanship of our time.”

Yet, at this very time, the same crimes are being enacted in Westmeath, the same dark conspiracy exists as then, and yet you come for no further powers. The right hon. Gentleman near me (Mr. Disraeli) asks why you do not come to Parliament for the necessary powers to enable you to deal with this terrible state of things. The reason, no doubt, is because the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has used such strong language with respect to the Habeas Corpus Act that he wants the House of Commons by a Committee to give him some sort of sanction for the measure he finds it necessary to ask for. When last year the right hon. Gentleman was asked—was urged, to apply to Parliament to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, he said he could not do so, that he would never do so except we were on the immediate verge of a civil war. In addressing his constituents in Lancashire, he distinguished between the policy of those with whom he was acting and that of those who sat on this side of the House. But now he has found that his remedial measures have failed; that his Peace Preservation Act has failed; that the men, women, and children whom he is bound to protect in this county in Ireland—for he is responsible for their protection, and every day and every hour that he does not bring forward measures for their efficient protection increases his responsibility—are in danger of their lives. I say, with a full sense of the difficulties of Government, and without wishing to taunt those who sit opposite, that when murder stalks abroad, when crime of that kind which makes every household a misery and a trouble to itself is prevalent, and when the Government merely comes down here and asks for a Committee, it is a Government which, if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to employ a word which he used with so much emphasis the other night—it is a Government which makes itself contemptible.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: If the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Previous Question just now (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) greatly underrated the gravity of the circumstances with which we have had to deal in a small district in Ireland, I think that the passion of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has led him grossly to exaggerate the condition of affairs. ["No, no!"] When I use these words I understate my conviction of the effect of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has taunted me with not having dared to propose to this House measures for the suppression of agrarian outrages in Ireland. Such taunts come strangely from a right hon. Gentleman who sat opposite to me this time last year, when it was my duty—from which I did not shrink—to propose measures more stringent, more effective, than any that have been proposed at any time within the memory of the present generation of public men—["Oh, oh!"]—more efficacious in their conception and in their result. The condition of things with which we have to deal is certainly singular, and therefore well deserving of the consideration of this House, and of Members of this House in whom we can place confidence. The Act of last year, not, I am happy to think, standing alone, but combined with the great remedial measures of that and of the previous year, has, as every person in Ireland knows, effected a marvellous change in the country for the better. [Laughter.] I hear a laugh from those hon. Members who have not had the opportunity, or have not taken the trouble, to ascertain the real state of the case for themselves; but I appeal to every fair man, of every creed and party in Ireland, as to whether what I say is not true, and whether the legislation of the Government, taken as a whole, including their measures for the preservation of peace and order, have not, in the short time that has elapsed, proved to be of the most remarkably satisfactory character. That is a fact acknowledged by every man, woman, and child in Ireland. Very different views are taken of this subject outside from what are held inside this House. I know that there are some hon. Members within these walls who hope for the failure of measures which come from their opponents—who long to see the failure of measures which have cost the Government and Parliament infinite thought and labour. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, there are minds, at all events, that catch at the first excuse for believing that failure has taken place. But this is not the case out-of-doors. It is perfectly well known in Ireland that we have succeeded beyond expectation, and almost beyond hope, in improving the condition of the country, and that at no time within memory has Ireland been so prosperous, so calm ["Oh, oh!"]—I know what I am speaking of—I repeat, so prosperous, so calm, so confident of the future, so contented, so loyal as she is at the present moment. But those measures having failed in a very small portion of the country, is it so extraordinary and so unreasonable that we should come to this House to ask it to appoint a Committee, consisting of some of its best, its most capable, its most trusted Members to examine into the causes of this exceptional and limited failure? If that Committee be appointed we shall be most happy to lay before them all the facts connected with the subject, and they will be enabled to say whether we have failed in any point in giving full effect to the powers which we possessed. Although I readily admit that the information so to be obtained will be of value to the Government, still I believe it will be of equal value to the House as enabling them to ascertain beyond dispute the facts and causes of this want of success, which, as I have said, has been limited and exceptional. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has alluded to the state of Ireland in 1852; but I say that any accusation that could be brought against the present Government at the present time would apply with double force to the Government of 1852, because I venture to say that the state of things in Ireland at that time was far worse than it is now. Sir, our standard of measurement has risen, I am proud to say, since those days. We do not pretend to be satisfied with the condition of certain districts in Ireland, or to tolerate the state of society that might have been tolerated in 1852. We have done our best to remedy some of the greatest and most admitted grievances of Ireland. We have kept the peace, at the same time, by introducing measures of an exceptional nature, no doubt, but which we thought were justified by the circumstances, and the wisdom of which has been proved by their success. We think that when we find existing a singular exception to that rule we are justified in asking the House to look into the matter in association with the Government. And if Members chosen by the House will look into the case free from the passionate partizanship of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down — ["No, no!"] — his passionate but genuine partizanship — and free from that more calculating partizanship which we heard from the Leader of the Opposition at an earlier period of the evening — if they will approach it in the spirit of Sir Joseph Napier, the then Attorney General on the opposite side of the House, who said he would think himself disgraced for ever if he were to use such a subject as a party question — then I believe that they will be able to render a service to the Government, and to the cause of peace and order in Ireland.

VISCOUNT SANDON really felt that the time had come when it was absolutely necessary for some English Member to speak out plainly his mind with regard to this constant intrusion of Irish subjects upon the very gravest hours of the Session. The House had freely spent a large amount of time in considering, with the greatest care and tenderness, the real grievances of Ireland, and no one on that side of the House had felt that the time had been lost, however much they might have regretted the measures which had been brought under their consideration. They one and all entirely and heartily discarded those feelings to which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. C. Fortescue) had allowed himself to give currency, when he expressed a supposition that any hon. Member on that side of the House rejoiced in the failure of measures honestly designed to conduce to the welfare of Ireland. But it was utterly impossible that they, as men of sense, could forget the bitter cry of distress which arose from the Irish Secretary when he rose to propose the measure the House was then considering. He could see that the noble Lord, with his faltering voice and downcast air, was deeply and solemnly affected by the task put into his hand. The House could see that it went to the heart of the noble Lord as an Irish proprietor, and pierced his very soul as a Member of Her Majesty's Government, to make such a proposition as he brought forward. And no wonder that with faltering lip and trembling tongue the noble Lord expressed the regret he felt in admitting that the country had had enough of hasty legislation for Ireland. Hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House had felt that, though, perhaps, they had not dared to mention it so tersely as the noble Lord had done; and now it was surely not totally unbecoming that hon. Members representing large commercial constituencies should appeal to Her Majesty's Government to consider whether they were not very seriously affecting the commercial stability of the country by bringing forward a sensational Motion for a Secret Committee, and then, after the lapse of only 48 hours, telling the House that nothing serious, grave, or tremendous was intended by the proposal that the Committee should be a secret one. This proposal had not come upon the House at any slight crisis in our national life. The Government must surely know the very critical nature of our relations with America; and was it not of the very deepest importance that the position which England holds imperially in Ireland should not be exaggerated in the eyes of America? It was no slight matter to enable American politicians, who seemed already to trade upon the supposed weakness of Ireland, to say they were right in treating Irish malcontents with the dignity and consideration recently shown to the released Fenian convicts, by receiving them with the highest honours of the State. Had not Her Majesty's Government themselves to blame somewhat for the exceptional state of things they now came forward in formâ pauperis and asked the House of Commons to redress? To what were they to trace this contempt for the law which prevailed in Ireland, and how could they suppose that the Irish people would imagine the English Government had any great respect for the decisions of its highest tribunals when they remembered that the very first act of the present Government, when it came into power, was to release from prison certain persons who were suffering the punishment of the highest crimes they could commit under the law? This sudden alarm in Ireland was surely explained when they remembered that only a very short time ago some of the greatest criminals known to the English law were liberated and sent across the Atlantic in a state almost of dignity. If such things were to be repeated, the Government could not surely expect to be respected long, either in Westmeath or King's County. If Her Majesty's Government, with their full knowledge of the facts, had put it to the House that the safety of Ireland required the immediate adoption of remedial measures, no hon. Members occupying seats on the side of the House on which he sat would have failed to support the action of the Government; but they felt it to be a very grave question that of turning the Committees of the House of Commons into Committees of public safety—mere Committees of detective police—who should not have the power to suggest remedies for the dreadful evils so feelingly described by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and so deeply deplored by the House, but who should simply collect information and leave the Government to apply some haphazard measure as a remedy. The Chief Secretary for Ireland made use, in the course of his speech, of the now hackneyed phrase "justice to Ireland," and he hoped the programme of the Irish Secretary would prove more powerful towards rendering that justice than some hon. Members supposed it would. He hoped, further, that the House of Commons would never allow that cry to become the instrument, even in the hands of the strongest Minister of the day, in order to induce or force the House of Commons to arrogate to itself the legitimate functions of the Executive Government, and to become a Committee of public safety, instead of acting the part of the trusted advisers of the Crown.

MR. AGAR-ELLIS said, he did not think Her Majesty's Government, in making the proposal before the House, had any desire to shirk any part of its legitimate responsibility; in fact, he did not think such a plan would be possible of execution, even if it were contemplated. He felt certain further, that, before the Government could take any decisive action in reference to the matter, they desired further information upon it; information they would be able to obtain through the agency of the Committee it was proposed to appoint. The learned Serjeant who moved the Previous Question (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) said he wanted no further legislation, but the course he proposed would defeat his own object; for if the Committee were refused, coercive legislation would proceed immediately, without further inquiry being made. Nobody on that side of the House pretended that the two great remedial measures for Ireland recently passed were final—that they would at once result in peace and prosperity being restored to that country. They were only links in a chain, and further measures were necessary before Ireland would be completely pacified. The Leader of the Opposition had talked of principles of morality; but it was hardly consistent with such principles when he said that his measures of 1852 would have been different if he had had 100 majority at his back.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, as an Irish Member, deeply regretted the measure which the Government had proposed for Ireland. He should vote against that Motion on grounds different from those that had been advanced from the opposite side of the House. He believed that the law, as it stood, was sufficient to meet every case of outrage in any county of Ireland. The Peace Preservation Act of last Session gave power to institute inquiries much more searching than any Committee appointed by that House could institute. If he was rightly informed, a Committee of the House could not inquire upon oath. They must, therefore, depend entirely upon the honour and the conscience of those who might be called before them to give evidence. The Peace Preservation Act enacted that if a felony, or even a misdemeanour, was committed in any proclaimed district in Ireland, the magistrates had the power to bring before them every person of that district who they believed could give evidence on that felony or misdemeanour; they could examine them upon oath, or commit them if they refused to be sworn. Now, that was a power no Committee could possess. Was the state of Westmeath worse now than it was 12 months ago? The noble Lord admitted that it was much improved. The noble Lord stated that from the year 1869 to February, 1871, seven murders had been committed in that part of Ireland to which he referred, and in five of these cases the parties were amenable, awaiting trial. The noble Lord referred to two murders, the perpetrators of which had not been arrested. But was that a case for coming to the House for extraordinary powers? He (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) remembered that last year seven murders were committed one morning in London. Then, in Sheffield, scenes of horror had occurred that had never disgraced Ireland. Yet no extraordinary powers were asked for on that occasion, a Commission only having been appointed which gave witnesses certificates of indemnity—Broadhead, who paid sums of £40 for the perpetration of murder, having received one. In Mayo, which was the worst county in Ireland a year ago, there was now no crime, and he believed time would work marvels in that respect. He knew personally that the people of Ireland were grateful for the remedial measures that had been recently passed with regard to that country; they felt now that they had something to be loyal for. He deeply regretted that the first official act of the noble Lord the new Chief Secretary should have been to ask for more repressive legislation.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not object to the Motion made by my right hon. and gallant Friend for the adjournment of the debate, but I wish to have an understanding that the debate shall close to-morrow evening. There is an important Motion that stands upon the Books for to-morrow evening, but that Motion is one which I do not think the House would deem it convenient to discuss at much length, because the President of the Poor Law Board will very shortly introduce a measure on the subject. I will not press for the withdrawal of that Motion; but, whether the hon. Member withdraws his Motion or not, I hope it will be understood that if this debate in which we are now engaged comes on at a convenient hour to-morrow evening, we shall finish it. It will lead to very great inconvenience to the public if that should not be the case, inasmuch as the next Government night has already been fixed for the consideration of a Bill of the highest importance.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he was not in a position to answer the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government as to the course to be taken on Tuesday; but from all he could gather from hon. Gentlemen who were sitting near him, the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Motion referred to could not make any arrangement at present. If any difficulty should arise from the course which his hon. Friend might choose to take, it would be solely attributable to the conduct of the Government in calling for this Committee to act for them instead of acting for themselves.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

Tuesday, 28th February, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Royal Assent—Princess Louise's Annuity [34 Vict. c. 1]; Juries Act (1870) Amendment [34 Vict. c. 2]; Provisional Order Bills (Committees) [34 Vict. c. 3].

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.—QUESTION.

LORD HOUGHTON rose to put a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, respecting the relation between the Colonies and the Imperial Legislature as to the legality of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Their Lordships would recollect that last year when the matter was brought before them, Ceylon was the only one of our dependencies where such marriages had been made legal, all the rest of our numerous Colonies being governed by the law of this country. Colonial Legislatures had frequently chafed against this restriction; and great inconvenience had frequently arisen, and great complaints made of the difficulties in which this state of things had placed them; and he would ask whether, during the Recess, the noble Earl had received any communications from such bodies on the subject, what answer he had given to them, and whether he would lay the Papers on the Table? Their Lordships would see the important bearing of this on a question which had come before them last Session, and probably might again come before them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the only communication which had been received by Her Majesty's Government during the Recess was from the Colony of South Australia. The Legislature of South Australia had passed a Bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. When the Bill came over to this country he confessed he felt some doubt as to the course he should take with respect to it; but he finally felt himself bound to pursue the same course as was taken by his predecessors on three former occasions, when similar Bills were passed by the Legislature of South Australia, and to advise Her Majesty to disallow the Bill. He should have no objection to produce the letter of the Governor of South Australia, and his answer to it.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

ARMY—CLAIMS OF OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. KENNAWAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the proposed augmentation of the Army, the claims of officers to employment who have obtained Commissions through Sandhurst, and who, after serving Her Majesty in tropical climates have been compelled to go on half-pay in consequence of the disbanding of the West India Regiments, will be considered?

MR. CARDWELL replied that the claims of the officers to whom the hon. Gentleman referred had been and would be considered whenever occasion offered, both by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief and himself.

INDIA—FIELD ARTILLERY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any protest has been made to the Government by the Governor General, or by the Commander in Chief in India, against the reduction of the force of Field Artillery in that Country, which will be made by the proposed transfer of five Batteries of Horse Artillery from the Indian to the Imperial Establishment at home; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Letters or Telegrams he has received?

MR. GRANT DUFF: The only reply that I am in a position to give at present to my hon. and gallant Friend's Question is that, when the correspondence between the Home Government and the Government of India about the proposal of the Government of India with reference to the reduction of the artillery force in that country is completed, there will be no objection to lay it on the Table if my hon. and gallant Friend wishes to move for it.

IRELAND—POSTMASTERSHIP OF CARLOW.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Postmaster General, Whether Hugh Doyle has recently been appointed Postmaster of Carlow; whether he is aware that the said Hugh Doyle was in April 1867 convicted in the Court of Common Pleas of bribery and corrupt practices at the previous Election for the Borough of Carlow, fined in the penalty of £50, and his name removed in consequence from the List of Electors of that Borough; whether he is of opinion that such an appointment is likely to be in any way beneficial to that department of the public service; whether it is not the rule or universal practice that Postmasterships, the salaries attached to which amount to £100 a-year and upwards, are filled by the promotion of deserving and experienced clerks or other officers of the department, without interference of Treasury or Parliamentary influence; and, whether there is any reason for excepting that Post Office from the operation of the rule or practice above mentioned?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied that it was the ordinary, but not the invariable rule that the postmasterships worth above £100 a-year in Ireland were filled up in the manner described by the Question of the hon. Member. When the value of the postmasterships was about the limit of £100 per annum, it was a matter of consideration whether it should be given, according to the ordinary rule, by competitions, in the same manner as the larger postmasterships were obtained, by gentlemen already in the service of the Department, or whether it should be left to be filled up in the ordinary manner by the Treasury. In the present case, when the vacancy was expected, a strong representation was made to his predecessor in Office in favour of a gentleman who appeared to have had a remarkable claim to the appointment in question. After making inquiries he decided that the appointment in question was one which might very fairly, and without doing any injury to the public service or defeating the claim of any servant of the Department, be left to the disposal of the Treasury, and it was so left accordingly, with the intention that the gentleman to whom he had referred should obtain the situation. Afterwards, he was sorry to say, in consequence of the confusion incidental to the change of Office when the vacancy was officially reported, the recommendation of his predecessor in Office in favour of the peculiarly qualified person was overlooked, and Mr. Hugh Doyle was appointed. He believed that the facts stated in the hon. Member's Question were correct, and those circumstances having been brought to the knowledge of the Postmaster General, it was decided that Mr. Hugh Doyle was an unfit person to hold the office, and his appointment was cancelled accordingly.

MR. BRUEN inquired the name of the gentleman to whom the appointment had been promised?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not recollect the gentleman's name, but hoped that the hon. Member would become acquainted with it when he attained the appointment.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—DECAY OF THE STONE WORK.—QUESTIONS.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been called to the rapid decay which has taken place during the winter of the stone of which the Houses of Parliament are constructed; and whether it is proposed to take any measures with respect to it?

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the external portions of the Palace reported on by Professors Faraday and Murchison in 1860, as having been up to that time preserved from decay by the indurating composition invented by M. Szerelmy, continue to resist the tendency to exfoliation of the surface of the stone observable in other parts of the building?

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that it could not be doubted that, unfortunately, a certain quantity of defective stone was used in the construction of the Houses of Parliament. Moreover, in large works of this kind, where some of the stones were highly carved, some pieces probably got broken, and here and there the broken pieces were put in in a very defective and improper manner, and as time wore on these defects became apparent, the bits of stone fell off, and created considerable alarm in respect to the stability of the building. That alarm was, however, entirely unfounded, and there was nothing at all which really affected the general character of the stability of the stone work of which the Houses were constructed. Some years ago the subject was carefully considered, and experiments were made with various processes to endeavour to preserve those stones which had exhibited signs of decay; but he was sorry to say that a sufficiently accurate record was not kept of these steps to enable them to judge satisfactorily of the effects produced. Not one, however, of those efforts had proved altogether successful. Of the many attempts, that of M. Szerelmy was, undoubtedly, proved to be the best; but still it was not one which could be relied upon for the permanent preservation of the defective stones. What had been done last year was to make an application of all the processes, under the superintendence of a competent chemist, and in the course of the spring it was intended to treat all the defective stones with that process which the chemist might, on the whole, think would be most efficacious. If it were found that some of the stones were greatly eaten into, it would be necessary that they should be cut out and new stones introduced; and in that manner, by constant attention to their repair, and at a comparatively small expense in each year, there was no doubt the outside of the building could be preserved for many centuries to come.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN asked, Whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been called to the fact that it was portions of the solid masonry which was giving way?

MR. AYRTON said, he was quite aware that some of the stones had been considerably eaten into by decay, and the face of these stones would have to be cut out and new faces introduced.

POOR LAW—METROPOLIS—SMALL POX AT STOKE NEWINGTON.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he has noticed a statement in "The Times" of the 23rd instant, and signed by Robert Brett, surgeon, Stoke Newington Green, containing a description of several families in the parishes of St.

Mr. Ayrton

Augustine and St. Chad, Haggerstone, in a terrible state of want and destitution, and suffering from small pox; whether he has taken, or intends to take, any steps to ascertain the truth of that statement; and, whether the authorities of those parishes are fully and adequately performing their duties under the existing Poor Law in respect of those families so suffering, as stated?

MR. GOSCHEN replied, that his attention had been called to the matter, and that he had taken steps to ascertain the truth of the statement in question by communicating with the gentleman who had written the letter, and with the relieving officer of the parish. No doubt the locality was in a terrible state of suffering, and when the horrors of small pox in any household was considered it could easily be imagined what they must be in the densely crowded dwellings of the poor. With regard to the destitution, Mr. Brett in his letter admitted that no blame attached to the parochial authorities. One of the families which was visited almost daily by the relieving officer, was in receipt of 10s. a-week for medical comforts and sustenance, besides what was derived from other charitable sources. The relieving officer offered 20s. to a nurse to attend to the children of the family without success. The great difficulty, he might add, was not to find money, but to find nurses. He was bound to state, in justice to the authorities, that Mr. Brett, in his communication, stated that such was the extraordinary feeling they were almost glad to find still existing among the poorer classes with regard to parochial relief, that many of the families concealed from the relieving officers the fact that small pox existed in their houses, though they had to pay private medical men small sums for their visits and medicine. Mr. Brett said—

"I have heard of the authorities going from house to house to find out cases, and being told there were none a few moments after the doctor had left."

The hon. Baronet would see the extreme difficulty which local authorities had in dealing with these questions; but all that could be done had been done by them in the way of providing not only provisions, but clothing, bedding, fuel, and other necessaries.

ARMY PROMOTION.—QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will lay upon the Table a classified Return for the 1st day of January 1871, of the officers of the several branches of the Army—Artillery, Engineers, Cavalry, and Infantry, showing the ranks in which they would be placed if their promotion were regulated on the conditions and by the length of service fixed for the Staff Corps of India,—viz., in the rank of Subaltern under 12 years, in that of Captain after 12 years, of Major after 20 years, of Lieutenant Colonel after 26 years, of Colonel after 31 years, and in receipt of Colonel's allowances after 38 years' service; similar Return of the officers of these several arms, showing the numbers in each of their respective ranks of Colonels in the receipt of Colonel's allowances, of Colonel, Lieutenant Colonel, Major, Captain, and Subaltern; and, similar Return for the 1st day of January, 1864.

MR. CARDWELL was understood to say that if the Returns were moved for, he would have no objection to lay them on the Table of the House.

EDUCATION—SCHOOL GRANTS UNDER THE NEW CODE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will state the grounds on which it is proposed under the new Code to abolish the Grant in respect of the attendance of infants under four years of age; whether it is intended to enforce; and, if so, how, the conditions as to cubic space (Clause 17, sub-section C), and as to the provision of assistant and pupil teachers (Clause 32, sub-section C), with regard to infants in schools under the age of four; and, whether as the standards of examination under the new Code are all raised by one grade, so that standard 1 of 1871 is the standard 2 of 1870, and so in succession, and as under Clause 29 no scholar may be presented a second time for examination under the same standard, it is intended to require children who have passed, e.g. standard 1 of 1870, to be presented for examination under standard 2 of 1871, which represents standard 3 of former years?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that the ground on which it was proposed to abolish the grants in respect of the attendance of children under four years of age was that the Department considered the public money ought to be given for instruction, and not for care-taking. They had found in a great many cases very small children were sent to school to be taken care of while their mothers went to work. The conditions in the Act referred to in the second part of the Question of the hon. Member would be enforced in the following manner:—The condition as to the quantity of cubic space to be allowed to each pupil would apply to children of all ages; for instance, a school certified to hold 100 scholars receiving instruction would not receive the added grant if it had, in addition to this number, 40 infants under four years of age, because such infants, though they would not get instruction, would require air. With regard to the assistant and pupil teachers, they would only be calculated in proportion to the number of children over four years of age, who might be in the schools, for the reason that it would only be such children who would receive instruction. The last Question of the hon. Gentleman enabled him to remove a complete misapprehension. It was supposed that, as the Department had abolished the old standard 1, and put in the place of it standard 2 of the old Code, those who were examined under standard 1 of last year would now be obliged to submit to examination under standard 2 of the new Code. This was not so. The pupils would be examined this year under standard 1, which corresponded with standard 2 of the former Code. As standard 1 of last year was practically no longer required, the Department had, under the new arrangement, framed a scheme up to a seventh standard, but the children examined under standards 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of last year would be examined under the same standards, nominally, of the new Code, though really the standards would be higher.

INDIA APPEALS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL FORESTER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, as in almost every suit between the Natives of India and the Indian Government the Natives of India are debarred from having their appeal tried by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in consequence of the Government of India setting up what is termed the "political plea," and that the Secretary of State for India in Council, being defendants in the suit, sit in judgment and decide their own cause with closed doors in the India Office, it is the intention of the Government to refer the subject of the administration of justice to the Committee that is appointed to consider the affairs of India?

MR. GLADSTONE said, in answering the Question he must endeavour to define between the reason which the hon. and gallant Gentleman gave in the earlier part of the Question and the conclusion he suggested in the latter. He was informed by the officials at the India Office that the phrase "political plea" was not known to them, nor did it appear that Natives of India were by its means generally debarred from having their appeals tried by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in cases where they had claims upon the Government property, but that, on the contrary, a very considerable proportion of the arrears of business which the Judicial Committee had to get through consisted of cases in which Natives of India were claimants against the Government. What happened was that in certain cases it was the duty of the Indian Government to plead that the steps they had taken in the assumption of property were of a public and not of a private character. That was a plea which was made in any country, but he was not aware that it was exempted from the jurisdiction of the Courts; it was an allegation which had to be tried by the Courts of Justice when it came before them. This was the information he had received from the India Office, and, however the case might be, it was not the intention of the Government to propose that the Question should be referred to the Committee on Indian affairs recently appointed, for the reason that that Committee would have its hands quite full with the business already before it. He did not in the least degree intend, when saying this, to imply that the subject-matter of the Question was unimportant or unfit to be considered or discussed either in the Indian Department or in that House. All he meant was that in the view of the Government it would not be expedient to refer it to the Committee appointed to consider the affairs of India.

General Forester

ARMY—ENGLISH OFFICERS WITH THE PRUSSIAN AND FRENCH ARMIES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT asked the Secretary of State for War, How many officers of Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers have been officially accredited to either the Prussian or French Armies, with a view to obtaining professional information?

MR. CARDWELL said, the Prussian Government felt obliged to decline receiving officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers whom Her Majesty's Government desired to attach to their Army before Paris; General Walker and Captain Hozier being already accredited to it. General Claremont, Colonel Riley, Royal Artillery, and Colonel Fielding, of the Guards, were accredited to the French Government.

PEDLARS' CERTIFICATES.—QUESTION.

MR. C. S. READ asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the wholesale manner in which the Police of some districts have granted certificates to Pedlars under the Act of last Session, and whether he will lay on the Table a Return of the number of Certificates so issued?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that his attention had been called to the wholesale manner in which the certificates had been granted by the police in defiance of what seemed to him to be the plain provisions of the law. The duty of granting these certificates was entrusted to the police, in order that it might be discharged with care and vigilance; but they had, in some instances, interpreted a night's lodging to mean "residence," and had given certificates to tramps of whom they knew nothing, except that they had happened to lodge a night in a town. In many other cases they had given certificates to convicted felons, though the Act laid it down that no person who had been convicted, even of misdemeanour, should be allowed to obtain a certificate. It might, therefore, be well to send round a circular to the heads of the police calling their attention to the facts in order to remedy the abuse. Another matter which would require the attention of the Government was the abuse of the certificates for purposes of mendicancy. It might be very proper so to alter the law that the practice of mendicancy should be followed by forfeiture of the certificate; and to empower the police to refuse licences in cases where they had reason to believe they were sought for purposes of mendicancy. If the hon. Gentleman would move for the Papers referred to in his Question they would be laid on the Table.

MR. EYKYN asked, If the right hon. Gentleman would give instructions for the withdrawal of such licences as had been granted to convicted felons?

MR. BRUCE: I cannot give any directions that are not within the limit of the law; but I may remind my hon. Friend that the licences are renewable annually, and that they ought not to be renewed in the case of persons proved to have committed felony before obtaining them. A conviction of felony, after the granting of a licence, necessarily involved its withdrawal.

LOCAL TAXATION.—RESOLUTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES, in rising to move the following Resolution:—

“That inasmuch as many of the existing and contemplated charges on the Local Rates are for National purposes, and that it is neither just nor politic that such charges should be levied exclusively from one description of property (viz., houses and land), this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to inquire forthwith into the incidence of Imperial as well as Local Taxation, and take such steps as shall insure that every description of property shall equitably contribute to all National burdens,” said, that though this was not the first time he had ventured to call the attention of the House to the subject of local taxation, yet he freely admitted that on each successive occasion on which he had brought that matter under the attention of the House, he had only become more embarrassed with the gravity of the subject and with the difficulty and responsibility that attached to anyone who attempted to grapple with so large and so complicated a question; and he did not feel on the present occasion more confident, inasmuch as he was unable to add much fresh matter or argument to what he had on previous occasions adduced. He felt, also, that the facts and the arguments which he had already adduced had never been impugned either in or out of the House. It was therefore unnecessary for him to defend them; it would be futile for him to waste the time of the House in repeating them. Though he was painfully sensible of his inability to do justice to that important subject, yet he felt very sanguine with regard to the result, and strong with regard to the merits of the case. He rejoiced to think that that question now stood in a very different position from that which it occupied three or four years ago. At that time they had to contend with a vast deal of indifference and ignorance with reference to that question; but now he thought the popular attention had been aroused; the public had begun to investigate the matter and demand inquiry; and that was all he wanted. No Government could afford any longer to dally with that question, or evade it by false issues. It was futile for them to disarm us with petty excuses or vague generalities. The supporters of that movement contended for a great principle, and they asked the Government to deal with that principle in a comprehensive and statesmanlike manner. He thought he might most forcibly illustrate the magnitude and importance of that subject by comparing the different amounts of wealth levied and expended in one year by the Imperial and the local taxation. He might be allowed to preface that comparison, by reminding the House that the total estimated annual income of England and Wales at the present time amounted, in round numbers, to £700,000,000; that £300,000,000 of that amount was assessed to the income tax; that £100,000,000 was the amount of the rateable value of the real property in this country; and that that £100,000,000 bore the whole of our local taxation. In other words, £6 out of every £7 of the annual aggregate income of the country escaped local burdens, and contributed nothing towards the relief of the poor, and the various other national burdens. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board told the House last Session that the amount raised by local taxation in the United Kingdom was £30,000,000, and so far as he (Sir Massey Lopes) had been able to make an investigation—for the right hon. Gentleman had not given them any figures—he did not believe that that amount was at all exaggerated. But in the observations he was about to make, he would deal only with the local taxation, which was levied in England and Wales; and for this reason—because he was far more conversant with those details. He hoped that other Members who were far more conversant with the local burdens of Scotland and Ireland would endeavour to ventilate their own grievances. Our own local taxation, according to the Return for 1868, amounted to £16,800,000, or, in round numbers, to £17,000,000. But he submitted that those figures did not comprise the whole amount now levied by local taxation. In the first place, he might remind the right hon. Gentleman that the poor rates had very much increased since 1868. In the second place, he did not see in those Returns any figures which represented the amount raised for sanitary and sewerage regulations. He did not see any amount for turnpikes; nor did he see—of course, in the Return for 1868 it could not be—any amount for education. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that for education alone a threepenny rate on £100,000,000 would amount to £1,250,000; and a sixpenny rate for education—he believed we should not do our education for much less—would amount to £2,500,000. He thought he might say, without exaggeration, that the amount raised by local taxation in England and Wales was, in round figures, £20,000,000. He could vouch for the correctness of that statement. Well, if so, one-seventh of the annual income of England and Wales discharged all the obligations of local taxation—one-third only of that which paid income tax; but 82 per cent of the annual aggregate income value of the country was exempt altogether from local taxation. In other words, one-fifth of the total annual income of real property was paid every year in local burdens—or every five years they paid in local burdens the whole amount of the aggregate income of real property; and exactly one-eighth of its value in poor rate assessment alone. If his statements were correct—and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to prove they were not—then the exceptional exactions to which the owners of real property were subjected were monstrous, intolerable, and almost incredible. He would now endeavour briefly to compare the amount raised by local taxation with the amount annually raised by Imperial taxation. The estimate of Imperial taxation for 1870-1 was £67,000,000. If you deducted from that £27,000,000, for the interest of the National Debt, you had £40,000,000 for defraying the expenses of the Army and Navy, for the Civil Service, and for all the purposes of modern government. You had that £40,000,000 of Imperial taxation as against £30,000,000 of local taxation. But the comparison did not end there. Imperial taxation was simple, it was intelligible, it was annually decreasing, and was being annually revised. Local taxation, on the contrary, was a chaos—to use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) a “confusion worse confounded”—a state of things which, as Lord Dundreary said, “no fellow could understand.” It was annually increasing, and the basis on which it was levied had not been altered for 300 years. That was not all. The public at large had no reason whatever to complain of Imperial taxation. It was said, and he believed it, that it was equitably imposed, systematically collected, and economically expended. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who held the purse-strings, was generally supposed to be a close-fisted Gentleman, and he was responsible to the House and to the nation for Imperial taxation. But local taxation was unjustly levied—it was the most oppressive part of our public burdens—it was unsystematically collected—and, moreover, the number of rating authorities might almost be called Legion, and there was little or no responsibility among them. Further, one did not know for what purposes local taxation was raised, nor in what proportionate amounts it was expended. The poor, the labouring classes, had no reason to complain of our Imperial taxation; but the dissatisfaction and discontent with regard to local taxation were keenly felt. More than that, in proportion to their means, the poorer classes had to bear a vastly larger share of our local burdens than the more opulent classes. Then, the Imperial taxation, towards which every class of the community and every description of property contributed, was annually decreasing; local taxation—towards which only one class of the community and one description of property contributed—was annually increasing. Moreover, certain privileges that had formerly been conferred on the owners of real property, in consideration of the exceptional burdens they were called on to bear, had been removed, and there had been imposed on them a multitude of new and exceptional burdens, for which they had received no corresponding or compensating advantages. Since 1840 Parliament had annually passed an Exemption Act, and what was its object? To exempt personal property from the payment of what was legally due from it; but they had actually placed the burden thus withdrawn from personal property as an additional load on real property. Since 1846, when the repeal of the Corn Laws was carried, £51,000,000 of Imperial taxation had been remitted, while £31,000,000 had been imposed, leaving a balance of £20,000,000 on the side of remission. Well, what relief had been given to local taxation? Not a single iota. On the contrary, while all other interests had had remission, real property had been actually burdened in reverse proportion to their remissions. He was doubtful whether Sir Robert Peel had not remitted a small portion of their prosecution expenses since that time; but he challenged the right hon. Gentleman opposite to name anything else. Well, then, he complained not only that they had no remissions, but that new charges for new objects—for the benefit of the common weal and not for exclusive benefit of the class from whom you levy them, had been imposed on the owners of real property; that Parliament was victimizing one class for the benefit of the community, and imposing national obligations and responsibilities exclusively on one description of property. That was most unjust. Now, why this palpable injustice, this glowing and glaring anomaly? It had not been a sudden operation, for then it would have met with serious and successful resistance. The operation had been slow, gradual, and insidious; it had begun with permissive legislation, and then, when the owners of real property had inserted the thin end of the wedge, the Government drove it home, and made the legislation compulsory. All Governments, without exception, when they succeeded to office, had courted popularity by trying to reduce taxation, by a cry for retrenchment. That programme had not always been very honest; but it had been very specious and very plausible. It tickled the masses, and was a capital electioneering cry. But the eclat consequent on any reduction of local taxation would be comparatively small, and yet the benefit to the working classes would have been equally great. To effect their object, and gain popularity, all Governments had reduced Imperial taxation by gradually transferring strictly national objects to local purposes, and thus it was that real property (lands and houses) had come to bear the burden of carrying out most of the social and moral reforms and improvements of the 19th century. If we had reduced local taxation in the same degree as Imperial, it was the poorer classes alone, or for the most part, that would have felt the benefit. Now, what was the difference between a rate and a tax to those who paid it? It was a distinction without a difference. The word "rate" was a synonym for the word "tax." Both were arbitrary—both were compulsory. Why, then, salve and gloss them over by calling them rates? Because it tended to divert public attention. Rates were encroaching things; they were adhesive; they stuck; they had a tendency to crystallize and become separate property; they became rent-charges in perpetuity; and if those concerned did not adopt the motto principiis obsta, they might depend upon it these charges would gradually increase. He had compared the amount levied for Imperial taxation with the amount raised for local burdens; he would make but one other comparison. He would take Spain or Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, or Belgium, and he could assure the House that the whole amount raised in any of those second-rate kingdoms for Imperial purposes did not reach £14,000,000, or about half what this country expended in local taxation. He would now analyze and classify this large sum of £20,000,000, and, for the sake of perspicuity, divide it into parts—namely, £11,800,000, or, in round numbers, £12,000,000, raised for Imperial purposes, and £8,000,000 for local purposes. The distinction was essential, because, in the first place, the £12,000,000 were raised for the benefit of the whole community, but the £8,000,000 was raised for the benefit only of those who paid them, and who resided in the locality where they were raised. In the next place, the object of the £12,000,000 was universal; the levy direct and compulsory; and, in the third place, it was made absolute and arbitrary by Parliament. But the purpose of the £8,000,000 was local; the object limited; the levy voluntary; it was indirect, and, what was of more importance, it was controlled by local decision. He did not conceive that the owners of real property had any claim on the Imperial Exchequer for the £8,000,000, and therefore he should not further allude to it; his observations would only refer to the £12,000,000, the amount levied for national purposes; and with respect to this portion of the charge he would show to what extent it had increased. To show the increased and increasing amount of that portion of our local burdens, connected and unconnected with the Poor Law expenditure, he would compare the first year for which we had any reliable statistics, 1776, with the last year. The total amount in 1776 was £1,720,000; in 1870 it was £11,744,000. The item for poor charges being £1,556,000 in 1776, and £7,673,000 in 1870; for other purposes, £164,000 in 1776, and £4,100,000 in 1870. If they took a later date the result was this—In 1839 the total amount was £6,161,000, or an increase of 109 per cent; the amount of poor was £2,550,000, or an increase of 86 per cent; of other charges an increase of £2,616,000, or 174 per cent. Let them take the 10 years since 1859. The increase in the whole amount was £3,666,000, or 45 per cent; on the poor alone the increase was £2,115,000, or 38 per cent; and for other purposes of £1,500,000, or 57 per cent. Within the three last years the increase for the poor alone was £1,233,000. He might remind the House that in 1867-8—when the chief addition took place—there was an increase of more than £1,000,000 for the poor alone. It might indeed be said, perhaps, that in 1869 there occurred a decrease; but it should also be remembered that in that year wheat fell 10s. a quarter. There were 8,500 more paupers on the 1st July this year than there were on the 1st July last year, and they were increasing so rapidly that one in every 20 of our population was a pauper. In the year 1834, when the Poor Law was established, only one-tenth of the amount levied under it was expended for purposes not connected with the poor; last year one-third was so expended. He wished, then, to impress on the House that to call the £12,000,000 to which he was referring money levied for the relief of the poor was a misnomer; it was a misappropriation; it was collecting money under false pretences. Although incorporated in the Poor Law assessment, one-third of that £12,000,000 was expended in purposes which were wholly unconnected with the poor. He had deemed it to be his duty to analyze the expenditure of the £12,000,000, and he would endeavour to particularize it under three heads. There was, in the first place, £7,500,000 of the amount levied under the poor rate assessment expended solely for the use of the poor; secondly, there was £1,000,000 levied under the poor rate assessment, but expended for purposes unconnected with the support of the poor; while there was, lastly, £3,300,000 annually collected by means of the county rate, and which was likewise expended for purposes unconnected with the poor. Now, he would take four or five charges under each of those heads. Taking first the sum of £7,500,000, which was really expended in the relief of the poor, he found that the item for in and out-door maintenance was £5,224,000—and he would beg the House to bear in mind that of that amount only £1,546,000 was spent in in-door, the whole of the remainder being expended on out-door maintenance. Now, he should like to know why in England so large a sum was expended on out-door maintenance; while in Ireland, which was a much poorer country, scarcely anything was laid out under that head? The next charge was a sum of £711,000 for the maintenance of lunatics; after that came a charge of £805,000 for the salaries, rations, and superannuation allowances of Poor Law officers; and then there was a further sum of £718,000, which came under the head of common charges. Now, he did not intend to dwell on the first and largest charge—that for in and outdoor maintenance. What he wished to impress on the House was the enormous increase of new impositions. He agreed in toto with the statement which had been made by that eminent Whig statesman Sir George Lewis—whose loss that House would never cease to regret—to the effect that all income ought to contribute to the maintenance of the poor. Nor must the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, in 1850, be forgotten, in which it was set forth that—

“The relief of the poor was a national object, that every description of property ought to contribute towards their relief, and that the Act of Elizabeth contemplated such a contribution according to the ability of every inhabitant of the country.”

He would only ask in addition to that, whether, after all, a poor rate was not a police rate; whether, if there were not a poor rate, there would be any protection for either person or property? A poor rate, in his opinion, was as essential to internal defence against the dangerous classes as our Army and Navy were for the purpose of external defence; and for both descriptions of defence it was, he contended, equally the duty of the Government to provide. He would, in the next place, advert to the charge of £711,000 for the maintenance of lunatics—a charge against which he strongly protested. Beside the sum which he had just mentioned, £310,000 had last year been raised by means of the county rate for the purpose of building lunatic asylums; while there was a further charge of £49,000 for the cost of casual lunatic paupers; so that the actual amount paid under the head of which he was speaking was £1,070,000. Now, lunacy was a malady which was, unfortunately, increasing, while the cost of treatment was also rapidly becoming greater. In 1851 the number of lunatics was only 21,000, or 23 in every 1,000 paupers, while in 1869 it was 45,000, or 44 in every 1,000 paupers, the increase in the ratio borne by the number of lunatics to the number of paupers being 91 per cent. The cost, he might add, of our lunatics, which in 1862 was £482,000, had advanced in 1869 to £711,000, so that in a period of seven years it had increased by a sum of £229,000, or 47 per cent. The cost of a sane pauper was, it appeared, £9 15s. per annum; that of an insane pauper, £26, exclusive of the charge for buildings. Now, he maintained that lunacy was a national calamity, and that it ought to be made a national charge and responsibility. It was a dispensation of Providence which was not confined to any class, and which was not attributable to any special cause.

It was no special creation of land or houses. It was most unjust, therefore, in his opinion, that the charge for the support of lunatics should be levied only on one description of property. He had the highest authority for saying the charge ought to be a national charge. In the discussions on the Irish Church Bill two years ago, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government laid it down as an axiom that the Church property was national property, and that as national property it ought to be applied to national uses, adding that the surplus ought to be devoted to the relief of irretrievable suffering and calamity, lunatic asylums and hospitals being particularized. He would read the right hon. Gentleman's own words on 15th of July, 1869—

“What are the obligations in respect of the relief of distress to which land or real property are commonly, by the laws of civilized Christian countries, held to be subject? They are these—You are bound to deal with the destitute and to meet the wants of the destitute, as far as necessity can be said to exist, but not beyond. . . . There is no law, either in Ireland or in any other country, which declares that persons of unsound mind generally shall have a right to receive that treatment which their peculiar state of mind requires. The Poor Law imposes no such obligation. The Poor Law obliges you to relieve the destitution of a lunatic, but no more. [‘Yes, yes!’] Well, the laws in force in this country compel you to relieve lunatics only as you relieve other persons, and to prevent them from doing mischief; but it does not require you to apply to their case the difficult and costly processes to which recourse is had in those most benevolent institutions, the lunatic asylums. . . . And for this plain reason—that a legal provision must be raised from classes of society which go down to the verge of destitution themselves, and you would inflict injustice if you trusted to the law solely for the relief of this kind of calamity.”—[8 Hansard, cxcvii. 1907.]

He desired no better testimony than that which he had just quoted. He with confidence claimed the vote of the Prime Minister, so far at least as lunatic asylums were concerned, and he was sure no one in that House or out of it would, when appealed to, decline or ignore the duty of paying his quota towards the relief of a malady which had no respect for persons. He now came to the next item of charge, that for the salaries, rations, and superannuation allowances of Poor Law officers. There were at least 14,000 Poor Law officers, and their cost was rapidly increasing. The Poor Law Board authorized the superannuations of some of those, without offering to contribute to the cost. They, however, now admitted the principle of contribution. They now paid the whole of the auditors, the salaries of the schoolmasters, and half the salaries of the medical men. Why should they not pay half the salary of the master and matron, of the chaplain and the relieving officer? One good reason why they should do so was that they exercised the most arbitrary power over these officials, appointing and dismissing them, and regulating their salaries and their superannuations; and it was quite out of the power of any Board of Guardians to give a sixpence to any of their officials without the leave and licence of the Poor Law Board. If the salaries of these officials were paid by the State, it would not only be a relief to the ratepayers, but their remuneration would be more uniform, and this would be a great advantage. No officials were so badly paid as Poor Law medical officers, whose salaries were scarcely sufficient to provide the drugs they were obliged to dispense; and the right hon. Gentleman might fairly be asked to go further than he now did. The fourth item to which he would advert was that of establishment charges, consisting of building, repairs, printing, drugs, and clothing. All these expenses were incurred on the requisition of the Poor Law Inspectors. He was told sometimes that it was necessary to have local control in order to keep down expenditure; but it would also be desirable to have a little more control over the expenditure imposed upon the Poor Law Unions by the Government. Perhaps, to gain a reputation for zeal and energy at Whitehall, the Inspectors were inclined sometimes to recommend improvements and alterations which the local authorities thought unnecessary. However, if the Government paid one-half of these establishment charges, he felt sure the money would not be expended by the locality improperly or unnecessarily. Before last year, since which time there had been a considerable addition to the hospitals and fever infirmaries of the country, £9,000,000 had actually been expended for Union houses alone—all paid for by the ratepayers. He based his claim for additional assistance towards Poor Law expenditure upon these grounds. Of late years we had become more humane and charitable in administering the old law of Elizabeth. We sympathized more with the privations and necessities of our fellow-men, and, rejoicing at this change, he was willing and anxious to pay his fair quota towards it. But what right had the owners and the representatives of personal property in this House to take any credit for this improvement? What sacrifices had they made to obtain it? They had been philanthropic and generous at the expense of the owners of real property. Justice ought to precede generosity. They had not contributed one fraction towards the improvements effected in the administration of the Poor Law. Hon. Gentlemen sheltered themselves under the antiquated Act of Elizabeth, which, as they said, imposed upon real property alone the burden of maintaining the whole of the poor of the country. But when that Act was framed there was little property in this country except realty, which then bore not only all the local, but all the Imperial taxes; so that if the argument were now good for one, it was good for the other class of taxation. Since the time of Elizabeth, capital had been accumulated by the labour of the poor, pauperism had thus been created or fostered, and now those chiefly responsible tried to evade their due responsibility. In those days agriculture employed nearly the whole of the labouring population; now it employed a comparatively small proportion—only 1-14th per cent. Why, then, impose these heavy burdens upon land when the whole conditions of employment were changed? The Imperial Government had given one year's pay to the widows and orphans of the poor men who went down in the Captain. At the year's end these widows and orphans must go to the Union; the owners of real property would alone have to maintain them. The brave sailors sacrificed their lives for the whole country, and not for one class; but the representatives of personal property ignored their responsibility. The same was true of the widows and orphans of soldiers and sailors killed in action, as well as discharged soldiers and sailors who, when no longer of use, were turned over to the Union, the owners of real property alone having to maintain them. In the case of commissioned or non-commissioned officers killed in action, provision was made for their widows and orphans, and to make a distinction between them and the men under them was impolitic and unjust. The Secretary of State for War would have very little difficulty in getting the recruits he wanted, if the men were sure that if anything happened to them the State would take charge of those they left behind them. He now came to the sums levied from the rates for purposes unconnected with the poor. These were the registration of births and marriages, a charge imposed upon real property in 1838, amounting last year to £77,000; the charge for vaccinations, imposed in 1841, and amounting last year to £64,000; and Parliamentary registration, a charge imposed in 1845, and amounting to £71,000. These three objects were certainly national. Everyone was equally interested in taking measures to abate that terrible scourge of small-pox, which was creating a regular panic, and destroying thousands. Neither rank nor wealth conferred any immunity from this malady—it was no respecter of persons. And, lastly, there was the item of £660,000 for Highway Boards created in 1865. That was the amount raised by the Highway Boards, and there was, besides, £920,000 raised by poor rate assessment for the maintenance of parish roads, and £1,000,000 for turnpike tolls. Turnpikes were being gradually absorbed, and upwards of £2,500,000 was raised last year for the maintenance of roads which used to be called the Queen's highways, and should, therefore, be paid for by all the Queen's subjects. He should like to know why capitalists rode over them without paying, whilst the poor man who walked over them was made to contribute to their maintenance? Any and every man could indict a road out of repair, why was not any and every man equally liable for maintenance? Turnpike roads were constructed for national and Imperial purposes. The mails went over them, and they were the means of communication for troops; but now they had, to a great extent, been superseded by railways. But the responsibility of maintaining them had not only been cast upon the land, but the tolls had been taken away. A tax was levied on railways in proportion to the number of first-class and second-class passengers, and he wanted to know why the amount thus levied on railways ought not to be handed over to mitigate the enormous increase of impost inflicted upon the land for the maintenance of highways? He would now advert to the third and last head—the charge of £3,300,000 levied under the county rate assessment, but for purposes totally unconnected with the relief of the poor. These county rate charges were all imposed for national objects. Their name was legion—their objects were universal. They all came under one category—their general and especial object was the protection of life and property, without any distinction of persons or property. The monied millionaire, the wealthy capitalist, required even more protection than the poor peasant, the mechanic, or the shopkeeper, and yet they contributed comparatively nothing out of their superfluity towards these objects. He held in his hand a Return moved for by Lord Henniker in 1867, showing the total amount levied in that year by county rates, giving the proportion that was under the control of the magistrates, and that which was strictly statutory. The total amount levied was £1,744,000. The portion which was statutory, over which the magistrates had no control, was £1,461,000. The portion over which they had undoubted control was only £283,000; so that 82 per cent was statutory, and only 18 per cent was under the discretion of the magistrates. Many Petitions had been presented to that House from magistrates in quarter sessions, asking the House to take this matter into consideration, and to transfer the cost of many of these Imperial objects to the national Exchequer. Now, with respect to the charges on county rates—the charge for the rural police in counties in 1869 was £719,000; for lock-up houses, £35,000; for the conveyance of prisoners, £19,000; making a total of £773,000. The Government allowance was only £147,000; so that instead of one-fourth, which the Government proposed to give, it only contributed one-fifth. They gave nothing towards police stations, and many miscellaneous payments which it was necessary to make, and yet the Home Secretary obliged the magistrates to send up plans of the stations to be submitted to his Inspectors. He was kind enough to authorize the construction of police stations; but he contributed not one iota towards them. The police expenditure had doubled the county expenditure in every county in England and Wales since its establishment. In Devonshire the charge for the police alone exceeded all other county charges by £5,000. The police expenditure was compulsory, the control of the magistrates over it being merely nominal. It was true that they appointed the chief constables; but they had no power to dismiss those officers, who were amenable to the Home Secretary, the magistrates having simply a limited and very small discretion with respect to the salary. The Home Secretary said there was a maximum and a minimum to go by, and gave the magistrates a discretion between the two. It was ground for complaint, too, that the police, besides being employed in their proper duties, were used by the Government for other and national purposes. Only recently the Home Secretary had ordered the chief constables to employ the police to give notices in connection with the Reserve force, and the War Office used the police as recruiting sergeants, to tell the public what were the conditions of enlistment. Moreover, by the Bill of last year, the Home Secretary imposed on the police the responsibility of giving licences and certificates to pedlars. These were novelties; but he submitted that they might be very bad precedents. At all events, they were additional reasons why the Government should contribute a larger quota towards the police expenditure. He would now remind the House of an order which was sent to the clerks of the peace a short time ago, stating that if they did not follow the recommendations laid down with regard to expenditure, if they did not increase the police, the Government would stop the contribution of one-fourth which was now given. They were, therefore, obliged to comply with whatever demand the Inspectors of the Home Secretary might make. This was considered a great hardship. He maintained that the police would be a more effective force if under one organization and one central authority, and he wished the Government to adopt the same course which they did in Ireland—take upon them the whole responsibility of the police and pay them. He thought that was a fair demand to make, and there was this additional reason for it—there were so many different jurisdictions that many offenders escaped by passing over the margin of a county or borough. Now, with regard to the second matter to which he wished to call the attention of the House—prisons and the administration of justice. Surely the maintenance of order and justice are commonweal purposes. Why should the counties pay for the maintenance of prisoners before conviction? Why should real property alone pay for the erection and maintenance of prisons, reformatories, &c.? There was expended by the counties last year the sum of £664,000 for these purposes, and the allowance received by the Government was £204,000, leaving a balance against the counties of £460,000. In Devonshire the average paid under this head for the last three years, exclusive of any Government allowance, was £3,600, and he asked why should the owners and occupiers of real property be so taxed for the maintenance of prisons and the administration of justice? Surely, the maintenance of order and justice concerned other classes of the community quite as much as those connected with land. There were more offences against personal property than real, and that was a reason why personal property should pay its proportion of the expense. With respect to prisons, under the Prisons Act of 1867, all the rules were made by the Secretary of State. The visiting justices had no control over them. Their duty was laid down, and the only control they had was with regard to salaries and convicts. When Inspectors were sent down they were often very capricious in their requirements; and, if any remonstrance or complaint was made, the answer was—"We will withdraw what we are giving for the maintenance of prisoners after conviction." For the maintenance of prisoners before conviction the county paid the whole of the charge. He would now say a word or two with regard to the Militia, towards which the public attention was now so much directed. The Militia was considered a local and constitutional force. It was a national force. He did not admit the word "local," for during the Crimean War the Militia were allowed to volunteer for foreign service, and many of them were taken out of the country. Therefore, the local character was gone. And what were they doing now? The only link with regard to locality which still existed they were now taking away, by depriving the Lords Lieutenant of the power of granting commissions. He would ask why were the owners of real property to provide barracks for the Militia? They might as well be asked to provide for the fortifications in course of construction at Plymouth and Portsmouth. The county might determine to erect barracks—might determine to borrow a large sum at 4 per cent—but they were not allowed to receive one atom more than they had hitherto received of the public money for the Militia. Another item to which he wished to call the attention of the House was that of £64,000 for coroners. Now, he asked whether coroners ought not to be considered a part of the administration of justice? Of what use were coroners? That in case of untimely or sudden death they should inquire into the matter. That was necessary for the protection of life and property—of life more especially. It was a national charge, and ought to be transferred to the national Exchequer, along with all other charges for the administration of justice. Besides these expenses, the charges for building gaols, lunatic asylums, &c., amounted to £2,500,000, and were becoming heavier and heavier every year. Not only had the old anomalies in taxation been continued, but new ones had been introduced and fresh impositions were continuously being added. We are told that the expenses of Parliamentary Elections and the erection of militia barracks are to be added to the rates. Sanitary and sewage regulations were looming in the distance, as well as the maintenance of all turnpike roads. We complain that there is the same basis of assessable property now as when real property was the only property of the country. It was fair and just three centuries ago, when there was no capital or accumulated wealth, but not adapted to present times and circumstances. The present system of levying local burdens was full of anomalies, incongruities, and inconsistencies. There was no settled, no complete, and no consistent plan. It was the effect and result of conditions which had all been altered. There was no uniformity; deductions varied in every Union according to the caprice of assessment committees. Though the conditions of national wealth had entirely changed, the conditions under which local rates were levied remained unchanged. The incidence of Imperial burdens was periodically revised; he asked that the same might be done by local burdens. He contended that this was a poor man's question, and asked why the owners of exempted wealth were not and should not be made as liable to those local burdens as the owners of real property? The effect and object of these changes was to obtain good government, and that was a commonweal purpose. He wished to know, for instance, why the fundholder did not pay his share? Did not the security of the fundholder depend on the stability of the Government and the various institutions which surrounded it? Was not the mortgagee as morally bound to pay his share of these local burdens as the reputed owner of real property? The mortgagor had to pay his share of the local burdens, and he also paid upon the whole of his net income, without deduction; whilst the mortgagee received his net income from the reputed owner of the property, paid no regular burdens, and received his income without any deduction whatever. Shareholders of railway companies paid local burdens as real property holders; they also paid legacy duty as holders of personal property, and received their dividends, less the income tax; but debenture holders paid no local burdens, and received their income without deduction. This was a great anomaly. Then let them look at the case of the shipping interest, which entailed a vast expenditure, both with regard to our civil and military establishments, because it required protection both at home and abroad. It formerly paid towards our local burdens, and ought to do so. It tended very much to increase pauperism, especially in our large towns. But recently, like many others, it had become a privileged and exempted interest. Contrast, on the other hand, the case of other classes of the community—for instance, the clergy. The clergyman was almost as severely dealt with as any man. He was only a locum tenens. He had no property in his tithes. Some years ago a bargain was made with him, and it was compounded for, and he was paid a regular sum. Whatever the improvement of property might be, his property could not increase in value; but his local burdens were increasing rapidly. Everyone knew what he was to be rated at, and he was rated to the very utmost; and what was harder still was, that although his property could never increase, his population and duty increased; and although he might be obliged to employ a curate at £100 a-year, he was obliged to pay upon the whole of his income; and if he found it necessary to apply to Queen Anne's Bounty for assistance to enable him to re-build his house, that amount was not allowed to be deducted. He would take another class, and had good authority for what he was going to say about the mercantile and manufacturing class. The case of mercantile communities was ably dealt with by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) in 1869. He made a most able and honest speech, but he would quote his words. He said—

"The principal wealth of our large towns is the commercial, manufacturing, and trading capital, and yet it is exactly this capital which does not contribute, except incidentally, to local taxation. I maintain that the classes who possess this property do not contribute their fair share towards the rates levied to support in sickness, accident, or poverty those without whose labour their wealth would never have been created. They do not contribute upon their capital, because their capital, consisting chiefly of personalty, is, as a rule, exempted from liability. After much inquiry into this subject, I find that, broadly speaking, the percentage of his income that a man pays to the poor rates is often in the inverse ratio to the amount of his income. The wealthier he is the smaller the percentage he pays. Take the case of a man doing a large business with only a moderately large office and warehouse. He only pays on the rent of his office or warehouse, whatever his profits may be. I know the case of merchants who have made the calculation, and find that their rates vary from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 per cent on their incomes, while the average percentage of the rates of the porters in their employ amounts to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on their incomes. In other words the labourers pay from twice to seven times as much in proportion to their incomes, as do their employers."—[See 3 Hansard, cxvii. 431.]

He agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rathbone) who advocated contributions in aid from the Exchequer, and would ask why was £100 or £1,000 a-year derived from personal property less valuable to the man who owned it than £1,000 a-year derived from lands and houses? The man whose income was derived from personal property had frequently no deductions to submit to, while the deductions made upon the income derived from real property were often very considerable. Talk of free trade! the present system was a system of protection to personal property. What reason, then, and what excuse was there that all these fresh impositions of late years should have been placed upon real property? He knew the answer he should get was that we must have local control and local administration in order to keep down expenditure; but if that were the object and the only object in view he could only say that it had signally failed. He himself was an advocate for local administration and local control; but he liked the reality and not the shadow, and he maintained that the term self-government, as applied to the control of the magistrates and the Poor Law Guardians with reference to the amounts they had to dispose of, was a delusion and a mockery. He contended that magistrates were merely the instruments of the Legislature and the Home Office. They were called upon to levy and raise large sums of money over which they had little or no control, while the Poor Law Guardians had just as little, for the President of the Poor Law Board had absolute control over them. Those Guardians sacrificed much time and money, and obtained very small results so far as keeping down the expenditure was concerned. Local rates might be locally administered; but they were administered under Imperial supervision, for the Home Office and the Poor Law Board were centralizing everything. Their Inspectors were hard taskmasters, and compelled them to make brick without supplying them with straw. The passing of the Law of Settlement and the Union Chargeability Act had destroyed the interest which had formerly proved such an incentive to good local administration and local control. Before the passing of those measures he had had the honour of presiding over a country Union. There were many unemployed who applied to them for relief, and the Guardians never broke up without providing them with work. No doubt it was their interest to do so; but that sort of thing did not occur now, because the Acts he had mentioned had destroyed local interests. What was everybody's interest was nobody's interest. He did not find fault with those Acts, for they might be very good ones in some respects; but he simply stated what had been the effect of them on this point. He had often heard another reason advanced why these exceptional rates had been imposed, and it was that, though the rates had alarmingly increased, the rateable property had increased in the same proportion. But how had that been the case? Had it not been from the investment of the personal property of the landowners and occupiers? Rent was divisible into two parts—there were the natural rent and the artificial rent. The natural rent was the natural produce of the soil, without the money invested in it for improvements; and the artificial rent was the rent obtained from the soil by the investment of capital. But what right was there to tax the personal property or capital, invested in the soil for improvements, at a higher rate than any other personal property was taxed? It was argued that if property was increased the rates ought to be increased also; but he would not admit that land had increased in value [“Oh, oh!”], or, at least, though land in the immediate neighbourhood of large towns had increased in value, the general value of land throughout England had only increased to a very small extent. What had increased in value was house property, and that was what had brought up the rates. In 1867 the proportion of rates upon land was £55,000,000, and of rates upon houses £75,000,000, and during the last 14 years the increase of rates upon land had been £16,000,000, or 15 per cent, and upon houses £28,000,000, or 58 per cent. In the same time there had been an increase of 77 per cent upon professional incomes and personal property. What had been the result of these exceptional taxes upon capital employed, either in agriculture or in the erection of houses? They had simply been a great bar and a heavy discouragement to the investment of capital in either of those interests. Such exceptional rates and taxes tended to paralyze those industries and to alienate capital from either of them. They were taxes upon energy and enterprise, because the investment of capital in either houses or land increased one's rating liability. It was the smallness of the amount of capital invested in land which prevented the resources of the land from being properly developed. Legislation had made it penal to invest capital in land, because capital avoided heavy exactions and exceptional imposts, and being a most sensitive and delicate thing to deal with, it was easily driven abroad. Capital invested in houses or land was put under certain disabilities and disadvantages, such as an exceptional income tax of 12 per cent, and it was thus sentenced to transportation, so that it might do in other countries what it ought to be encouraged to do in this in the way of developing national resources. If a man could get 5 per cent interest on good investments abroad, it was not to be expected that he would invest his money at 2½ per cent at home. But this was, above all, a poor man's question. What was it which improved or deteriorated the condition of the poor man? The amount of capital which was either withdrawn, or which was used in the building of houses or in improving the cultivation of land. Increase of capital so employed meant to the poor man more home-grown food and at a cheaper rate; a greater demand for labour and better wages; less pauperism, and less rates. But if capital were diminished and withdrawn it had a precisely opposite effect, for it led to less home-grown food, a less demand for labour, less wages, more pauperism, and consequently higher rates. Then as to the discouragement to invest money in building, it was impossible to exaggerate the sad and serious consequences which flowed from large families being herded together, as they were at this moment in this great metropolis and in all the large towns of the country. It was a disgrace to us as a nation to see the alleys, courts, and cellars in some parts of London, in which large families were huddled together promiscuously. Was it a matter for wonder, under the circumstances, that immorality, drunkenness, and every species of vice should flourish? Such circumstances could only tend to demoralize the mind and to debilitate the body. In the men the effect was loss of physical power, disease, and untimely death, and in the women it was almost worse—loss of moral and social character; while the effect on the children, as had been truly said, was that they were bred without decency and brought up without shame. Those were the results of the miserable accommodation for the working classes in the large towns of this country; and 50 per cent of the rural population was still crowding into these towns. And now one word as to the conduct of the Government in reference to this subject. He had no desire to reproach them, for he knew they had much to do; but they had given a promise of which he felt bound to remind them. In 1869 he moved for a Royal Commission upon Taxation—for he always felt, and still maintained, that that was the best and most impartial tribunal for the investigation of this question. He had nothing to say against Parliamentary Committees; but it was impossible to keep party out of them. He regretted very much that Commission was not granted; but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) objected to it on the ground that the Government admitted the grievance and were prepared to deal with it without loss of time; but if they appointed a Commission legislation would be indefinitely postponed. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, promised to deal with this matter after the Irish Church question had been settled. But what progress had since been made? The Irish Church had been legislated for, and Irish land also; but this question of taxation, instead of making progress, had retrograded. He would not say that the right hon. Gentleman had added insult to injury; but he had added injury to injustice, for only last Session, instead of relieving the ratepayers from their burdens, he had inflicted upon them another rate—the education rate—and still more rates were now contemplated for Parliamentary election expenses, for turnpikes, and for improved sanitary measures. In the same year—the right hon. Gentleman having previously refused a Commission, it was announced in the Queen's Speech that two Bills on the subject, one of them for revising the incidence of rating, had been prepared; but neither of them had yet seen the light. The right hon. Gentleman gave them a Local Taxation Committee that year; but the Committee was so limited in its scope as not to touch the vital question at all. The only matter which that Committee had to deal with was to consider whether it would not be expedient for owners and occupiers to divide the payment of rates. But what remedy was there in that? What boon would such a division afford? There were to be the same charges upon the same persons as were interested before. The right hon. Gentleman was simply shuffling the same old cards, and he only carried the Report of the Committee by his own casting vote as Chairman. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal did not advance the question one atom—it was specious and plausible, but very insidious, for he knew that the owners and occupiers were united upon this question, and that when united they were very strong; but he thought he might throw a bone of contention among them and so divide them. He tried to set them by the ears—he adopted the motto Divide et impera. It had been said that agriculturists were not very intelligent; but surely they were not such asses as to suppose that such a proposition as that would do them any good. His hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. S. Read) had illustrated the proposal most admirably by saying that it was putting the same burden upon the same donkey, but dividing it into two different parts on the sapient animal's back, so as to induce the donkey to believe that it was very much relieved. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that, partly for convenience and partly from tradition, the main portion of local burdens had been put upon real property, while personal property had borne the main part of Imperial taxation. That course might be convenient; but, as for tradition, did antiquity save the Irish Church, or church rates, which was the oldest of all rates? It was evident that tradition was not of much avail in these matters. But he (Sir Massey Lopes) protested against the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that the balance was evenly adjusted between the taxes paid by personal property, and those borne by real property. He admitted that real property did not pay either probate or legacy duty, and only a mild succession duty, yet it paid other heavy taxes, one of them being the land tax, which was formerly imposed upon personal property as well, though personal property had since managed to shuffle out of it. He maintained, and was prepared to prove, that real property paid quite as much of Imperial taxation as personal property, or, at all events, there was not 1 per cent of difference between them; while it paid, at least, 8 per cent more of local taxation than personal property paid. In conclusion, he ventured to think that every thoughtful, sensible man would admit that our present system of local taxation was unsound; that it was wholly opposed to all principles of justice, common sense, and equality; that it was full of anomalous inconsistencies and injustices. The owners of real property asked for no favour and for no exemptions. All they asked for was an investigation, and if it were then found that they were not paying their fair quota of taxation they would be quite ready to do so; but if, on the other hand, they were found to be paying too much, they asked in all fairness to have the excess remitted. This was no party question; both sides of the House were equally interested in it; and it was not a question between town and country, for it concerned both alike. They had realized the truth of the maxim laid down by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in 1853, that the exemption of one man, of one property, or of one class, meant the undue taxation of another. Income from every source ought to be the measure of a man's ability to pay, and should form the basis of all compulsory contributions towards national taxes. Parliament had admitted this principle in the case of the income tax, and they asked that the principle should be extended for the fulfilment of not only all national, but of all Christian duties. Their guiding principles during the last half-century had been those of justice and equality. The House had abolished exemptions and prescriptions, removed anomalies and abuses, and abolished all class and individual interests. He called upon them to extend those principles impartially to every class of the community and to every description of property. He asked the House and the right hon. Gentleman to extend the area of assessment, and enlarge the basis of assessment for national purposes; to reform, revise, and re-adjust upon more equitable principles the system of local taxation. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. PELL, in seconding the Motion, said, that if any justification were required for the course his hon. Friend was pursuing, it might be found in the concluding paragraph of the Report of the Local Taxation Committee of last year. It was in the following words:—

“That your Committee are of opinion that the inquiry on which they have been engaged forms only one branch of the general question of local taxation, and that other considerations, besides those which have been submitted to their investigation, should be previously taken into account in any general measure giving effect to the above recommendations.”

This was his apology for trespassing on the time of the House. The subject was one of considerable magnitude. As far back as 1846 it began to attract the attention of the officers of the Poor Law Board, and surely it was entitled to their increased attention now. Year after year additions were being made—first on one head and then on another—to the already large amount of local taxation. Although his hon. Friend had well nigh exhausted the subject, there was one point to which he wished briefly to advert—namely, the supposed advantage enjoyed by real property with reference to succession duty. It was, no doubt, true, that the rates of succession duty were low, and, therefore, somewhat in favour of the landowners; but it must not be forgotten that the charges on real property, mortgages, &c., were very considerable, and that, consequently, the amount of real property benefited, so to speak, by the succession duty, was greatly reduced. For example, if a man died possessed of real property worth £40,000, and there were charges on it to the extent of £30,000, only £10,000 of real property would come under these favourable conditions with reference to succession duty, the remaining £30,000 being charged immediately at the rates laid down for legacy duty, and, he believed, probate duty. With regard to house property there was another curious anomaly. Take the case, for instance, of a wealthy man who died possessed of a considerable amount of property in ground rents. As far as the ground rents were concerned he would only have to pay succession duty; but when a leaseholder died owning one of these houses he not only paid succession duty, but for some inconceivable reason probate duty also. Therefore he had not so much advantage in regard to houses as the public were apt to imagine. It was obvious that possessors of visible means could be more easily taxed than others whose property could not be readily localized; and the nation at large could not be satisfied that the former paid all they should do until it had been ascertained whether those who ought to contribute to Imperial taxation did their duty in that respect. A remark made last year by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) forcibly indicated the attitude assumed by a certain portion of the community with reference to real property. He said that he (Mr. W. M. Torrens) made a remark to a noble Lord that those who had large visible properties should take heed how they moved, adding that the Devil was looking over the walls of large properties. He did not wish to retort; but could not refrain from asking whether the Father of all Evil was always absent from the councils of those who made up their returns under Schedule "D?" From the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, it appeared that 40 per cent of the persons assessed under "D" had understated their income to the extent of 130 per cent, the loss to the revenue under "D" being in the year 1864-5 no less than £57,250,000. The Commissioners very truly remarked—

"The exemption of one man means extra taxation of another, so that if Schedule D gave its due quota to the revenue we might be relieved of many an unpleasant impost."

They added—

"It must be borne in mind that on lands and houses, on dividends, and on salaries and pensions of public officers, the tax is levied nearly to the utmost farthing."

The class to which he belonged, occupiers of property, was subject to very exceptional conditions in the assessment of their property; and he used the word "exceptional" because different systems prevailed in Scotland and in Ireland. As a Member of the Local Taxation Committee, he elicited that in Scotland a tenant may fearlessly, at the commencement of his lease, raise the annual value of the property by improvements, and, according to the law and the practice, the assessment would not be raised until the rent was raised on the termination of the lease. How much of the improvement of Scotch agriculture was due to this practice? He further ascertained that in Ireland the valuation lasted for 14 years, that recent improvements, except buildings, were not assessed to the tenant, and that there were exemptions in favour of draining, agricultural buildings, and reclamations which were not allowed in England. Here, if a man took a farm at a fixed rent, and, by the application of capital, raised the annual value of the land, as soon as the fact came to the knowledge of the assessment committee, his assessment was raised, so that he was fined for making improvements and the assessment assumed a penal form. In his Political Economy, Ricardo said—

"It must be acknowledged, however, that in the actual state of the poor rates a much larger amount falls on the farmer than on the manufacturer, in proportion to their respective profits; the farmer being rated according to the actual productions which he obtains, the manufacturer only according to the value of the buildings in which he works, without any regard to the value of the machinery, labour, or stock which he may employ."

This was high authority in support of the view he took; and what he had said with reference to the occupation of land and the improvement of the soil applied to a very great extent to money spent in building houses for the poor and to works of that nature. He thought he might fairly ask, now that we had such a strong Government, that the question should be no longer dealt with in detail. The supporters of this Motion ought not to be put off with a Bill which did not contain the principles for which they contended; and if full justice could not be done, at any rate, the Government ought to give some of their time, energy, and ability to the consideration of this important question. Country people felt the pressure of the rates more than townspeople, for in the towns rates were wrapped up in rent; and when a landlord levied a distress for rent, the proceeding was all the more obnoxious because rates were substantially included in the rent for which the seizure was made. In the East of London he had known persons in receipt of charitable relief who stood on the books as owing £1 in rates, and this was the class which suffered from the special imposition of rates upon real property. He hoped the Government would do their best to pass a Bill which would not deal with a small part of the question, as last year's did, but which would redress the inequalities and wrongs complained of. He begged to second the Motion before the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL ORACROFT - AMCOTTS said, the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) deserved the thanks of owners of real property, and especially those of the agricultural class, for the clear, able, and fearless manner in which he had brought this most important question under the notice of Parliament; and he was perfectly right in stating that there was great discontent among the agricultural classes at the evasion by the owners of personal property of their duty in respect of the payment of rates for objects which were nominally local, but which in reality were national. At the present day agriculturists did not complain of having to compete with the whole world in agriculture, for they were doing so successfully; but they complained that local rates, which were large many years ago, had not been diminished, but had been enormously increased. Let each county tell its own tale of enormous lunatic asylums costing tens of thousands, of prisons costing as much, and of military storehouses, for which the counties received a miserable modicum in the shape of interest; and let each tell, as it soon would be able to do, of rates for educational purposes, of rates for highways consequent on the abolition of turnpikes, and of rates properly levied for election purposes. He was told that to make personal property contribute to these rates was, in reality, revolution; but we were not afraid of revolutions in this country, for we had had several peaceful revolutions within the last 40 years. He maintained, however, that it was no revolution at all to call in personal property to the aid of real property; indeed, it was nothing new in law; for the liability of stock-in-trade and other property of that character to be rated to the relief of the poor was at one time recognized, and especially by one of the clauses of the 14 Charles II., commonly called the Settlement Act. They could not deny that the old landmarks were fast fading away, and they lived under new and altered circumstances. What was expedient, politic, and just, 260 or 300 years ago, he maintained, was inexpedient, impolitic, and unjust in 1871. The truth was, when these taxes were first imposed on land there was very little money and a great deal of land. Now there was a great deal of money and very little land, and he held it to be both just and politic that personal property should be made to contribute to those rates which at present fell almost entirely on real property.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH observed that if he were to follow his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes), who had in a manner identified himself with this Motion, and who had introduced the subject with great ability, through the whole of his observations, there were some points on which he might be unable to agree with him; but he was able entirely to approve of the terms of the Motion he had made. It was now three years since his hon. Friend first brought forward the question, and he then had, as a Member of the Government, taken part in the debate. The subject had made great progress since that time; but he could not say that, taking all circumstances into consideration, he was prepared to go much farther than he then stated. He would rather see some practical proposal for dealing with the question on a certain definite basis, and proceeding on the precedents before them in regard to the taxation of the country than plunge into an inquiry of indefinite extent, which must necessarily consume an enormous amount of time. When they considered the variety of important subjects that must necessarily engage the attention of the Government for some time to come, it seemed to him that probably their children's children's time would arrive before the balance would be fairly struck between local and Imperial taxation. Without going into various smaller matters, there were two flagrant and important instances of inequality as regarded local burdens, from which the landed interest now suffered—the cost of the police and of lunatic asylums. As to the police, the Home Office might as well be nominally, as it was in reality, the controlling power of the police; and even if the control of the police were nominally retained in the counties and the boroughs, he saw no reason why the Treasury should not raise their contribution to the cost from one-fourth to one-half, or even two-thirds of the amount. If the present contributions were doubled, it would be an addition to the Vote by Parliament of £300,000 a-year. A similar contribution would provide for one-half of the lunatics in asylums. The obligations laid on parishes in recent times to maintain the lunatic poor in a most expensive manner did not arise in any way out of the old constitutional liability of the land to support the indigent poor. It was an obligation which the humanity of the age required to be undertaken. It had been felt, long since, that this was a burden too heavy for the parish to bear, and therefore the cost of the lunatic poor had, long before the passing of the Union Chargeability Act, been made a Union charge. There seemed nothing contrary to analogy to what had already been done, or to the justice of the case, and it would be a great relief to ratepayers if one-half, at least, of that burden were borne by the Vote in Parliament. Then there might be an extension of the sum paid through the Poor Law Board in aid of the establishment charges of paupers in workhouses. The present Government could raise no objection to that proposal, considering the gigantic strides made last year in favour of a general charge on the whole metropolis. That was a very serious and important change. He did not object to it, and the principle would carry the Government very far, if they were so minded, to extend the very infinitesimal relief now given in aid of local expenditure, and he should cheerfully accord to them any increased portion of central authority they might desire to have for that contribution. He was not afraid of the tyrannizing power of the Poor Law Board so long as it was paid for by contributions of this description. In saying these few words his object was to guard himself, whilst supporting this Motion, from being supposed to desire that this great question should be ripped up, and should pass through years of inquiry.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he had referred at some length to this question a few years ago when he made a Motion in regard to the succession duty, and he must say the terms of the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) were perfectly fair. He sought for inquiry, but did not seek to prejudge the question by the terms of his Motion. The hon. Baronet said he was not afraid of inquiry, and neither was he (Mr. W. Fowler) afraid of it; he should, therefore, have great pleasure in supporting the Motion. But to show how very differently this matter struck different minds, he would read to the House a few lines spoken by no less a person than Mr. Cobden, in 1845, upon this question, when he said that, great as he considered the grievance of the protecting system; mighty as was the grievance of the Corn Laws, the question of taxation presented a blacker record against the landowner than even the Corn Laws. He therefore warned them against the ripping-up of that question. The hon. Baronet did not take Mr. Cobden's warning, and he accepted the hon. Baronet's challenge. That was not a party question, but an Imperial one; and their desire should be to do justice to all classes of the community. He wished they were oftener engaged upon plans for getting rid of rates than for re-distributing them among different classes; but while the country spent more than £100,000,000 a-year on drinks he did not see much chance of their rates diminishing, but rather of their increasing. They had not to consider whether the landlord paid so much, or the tenant so much—the question was, whether the land itself paid more or less than it ought to pay. The hon. Baronet hardly laid stress enough on the different characters of the various kinds of property he had to deal with. There were many crises in a country in which its real property would retain or even increase its value, while some kinds of personal property might entirely disappear. If we had a war with America vast amounts of personal property would vanish as it were in a moment, while real estate would remain almost unaffected in value. The hon. Baronet said the rates were so heavy that a man was not inclined to lay out his capital on land; but a still greater discouragement to the application of capital to the land arose from the character of our laws as to land. The plan of tying up land in strict settlement operated as a greater discouragement of that kind than any rates in the world. If a man was only tenant for life, and subject to all the charges the hon. Baronet had spoken of, how was he to lay out money on the property? He must have a very large surplus income if, as tenant for life, he was to lay out money on cottages that would not pay; whereas if he was an owner in fee simple he could sell part of the estate to improve the rest, or borrow money upon the property. Again, a tenant from year to year had not the inducement he ought to have to expend capital on land; and the reason why rents were higher in Scotland than in England for the same qualities of land, was because the Scotch farmers had the security of leases for what they laid out. The Chandos clause, he believed, had more influence in checking the flow of capital to land than even the local taxation to which it was liable. But his chief ground for supporting that Motion for inquiry consisted in the enormous anomalies connected with our taxation. He took the succession duty as an illustration. The Act imposing it was very remarkable, and he gave its author credit for it as far as it went; but it charged the tenant-in-fee no more than the life-tenant, although the property of the former, taking one case with another, was worth at least double that of the latter. That was a gigantic anomaly in itself, and one involving great injustice. Again, nothing could be more monstrous than the state of the law in reference to the probate duty. On the vast estate spreading around or near that House there was an immense number of leasehold houses of the greatest possible value. All those leaseholds, though heavily taxed for local purposes, paid probate duty, but the reversion paid no additional taxes whatever. Another great anomaly was the mode of assessment. If they assessed a farm, they assessed it at a rate approaching in amount to the whole of the profit made from it; but if a great factory was assessed, it was not assessed in relation to the profit derived from it, nor in general to an amount approaching that profit. There was a want of any kind of principle in the mode of assessment. The case of the railways, again, was one of the greatest injustice in the whole range of our taxation. They taxed a railway locally, and not merely on the agricultural value of the land, but as a profitable trade; and when the shareholder died they made him pay probate and legacy duty, he having also been subject to the carriage duty. The railway debentureholder was to all intents and purposes in the same position as a shareholder, inasmuch as his property was in law personal estate, but he had not to pay a farthing of local taxation, while the railway shareholder paid in an aggravated form. One railway company paid £80,000 a-year of local taxation—equal to a dividend of one-half per cent per annum on its shares. There were many poor people interested in railway companies, as well as rich, and it was the duty of the Government to look into that whole question. There were many of those charges which the hon. Baronet admitted ought to be paid for locally; but the difficulty remained that a man might be living in a neighbourhood, and might get all the benefit of its administration, and of the money spent out of local taxes, but because his property was mere personalty he did not pay. He thought there ought to be a very marked difference between the taxation of realty and personalty; but our system was so full of anomalies that it was high time to consider the whole matter. The man who lived near a public road paid for its maintenance, although he might not possess a vehicle of any kind; while the man who lived perhaps at a distance, but whose heavy carts rendered frequent repairs necessary, paid nothing towards it. This was one result of the abolition of turnpikes. A man complained of having to unbutton his pocket to pay the tolls when they existed, but when they were being swept away no one appeared to remember that a man who, perhaps, did not use the road would have to unbutton his pocket to pay the rate. It was an easy matter for Parliament to lay expenses of this kind upon the rates, but in doing so an injustice was frequently committed. For his own part he did not shrink from the results of this inquiry, whatever they might be. He believed that the future of the landed proprietors in this country was in their own hands, and that they might prosper if they chose. If they got rid of those antiquated laws and customs which discouraged the application of capital to the land, the increase of wealth to the owners of land would be such that even these heavy local taxes would seem as nothing to them. He hoped the Government would see their way to inquire carefully into this whole question and to ascertain whether or not an injustice existed. If the existence of such an injustice was established, hon. Members on the other side of the House might rely upon him, and those who sat near him, to support them in their efforts for its removal. Having pointed out the serious anomalies that existed in our local taxation he should give the Motion his hearty support.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he had heard with satisfaction the views of the

hon. Member who had just sat down with reference to the subject of the abolition of turnpikes, to which he had always been opposed. He wished to say one word in regard to some remarks which had been made as to the employment of the police in the protection of game. He had had some experience at quarter sessions as to the employment of the police, and he could say that their employment in the protection of game had been so very exceptional as scarcely to be worthy of notice. He could confidently assert that by far the greater majority of cases in which the police were engaged related to the protection of property of very poor people. The mass of the cases which had come before him had been robberies and breaches of the peace. In regard to the comparison which had been made between personal and real property, and the liability of personal property being destroyed, why, the answer to that was that if such property ceased to exist it would cease to be rated. Nobody contended for rating property except according to its value. He thought it quite time that some Motion of this kind should be brought forward to check that unfortunate custom of paying for everything out of the county rates. The word "rates" seemed to excite a totally different feeling from the word "tax" in the public mind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would shudder at the possibility of putting on 1*d.* or 2*d.* on the income tax, and would think that by doing so the stability of the country would be shaken; but an additional 2*d.* or 3*d.* to the county rates was thought nothing of. For instance, last year an education rate, imposing an unascertained burden upon the ratepayers, received the sanction of that House; and during the present year it was proposed to throw the election expenses upon them. In his opinion, it had become far more important to guard the rates than the taxes. He also desired to protest against dealing with this case by merely shifting the burdens from the owners to the occupiers. It was his lot to represent a county, which, particularly in the Welsh part of it, contained a great number of small holders, and it would be no relief to have the rates shifted from the owner to the occupier. Suppose a man was both owner and occupier. To tell such a man that he was to be relieved was like telling a man who had formerly paid five shillings that now he was to pay two half-crowns—one out of the right-hand pocket and one out of the left. He wished to make a remark also as to the very expensive machinery employed in collecting rates. He rejoiced that magistrates had been relieved from the odium that had at one time attached to them, in consequence of its being supposed that it was they who imposed the rates; because it was now ascertained that the magistrates were only responsible for 18 or 20 per cent of the rates, the remainder being imposed by statutes over which they had no control. The rate was collected by a very circuitous process. A class of Commissioners came down; they had no interest in the country, but their position as Inspectors and their feelings as such were all enlisted on the side of increased expenditure. There was no controlling power. It was a saying of Sidney Smith, that every man would be a good Samaritan if he had only the oil and the 2*d.*, and a great many of them would be good Samaritans if it were not for the want of the oil and the 2*d.* They should remember that there was a very artificial distinction between the poor and the rich. He believed a poorer class of men did not exist than the poorer class of ratepayers. He thought it was a remark of Sir Robert Peel, which he had heard quoted in this House by Sir James Graham, that there was not a more miserable class of persons than where the fustian ended and the broad cloth began. He had had the honour, on two occasions, to call attention to the case of the Board of Commissioners of Lunacy. Now, what was that Board? To whom were they responsible? Were they under the control of the Home Office? They did not seem to be under the control of the Poor Law Commissioners. All their action was in the direction of great expense; and he, for one, was not able to perceive any great benefit derived from them in the matter with which they were connected. Without pledging himself to all the details in the statement of the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), he still concurred in his Motion. Whatever might be said in regard to local expenses and local management, responsibility for the expenditure should rest where it ought to rest—on those who had the control over it. It should not rest on those who had no control.

Mr. Scourfield

MR. J. WHITE said, the hon. Baronet had discussed a most important question in such an admirable spirit that he disarmed criticism as to that part of his speech with which he (Mr. White) did not concur. The hon. Baronet told the House that he wanted a Select Committee, and that that Committee was to investigate and report, regardless of consequences—that was to say, the hon. Baronet was quite prepared to accept its decision, whether it proved that the owners of real property would be benefitted by the present system being continued, or damaged by any recommended alteration. His (Mr. White's) main object in speaking was to refer to the Imperial taxation. They had had Committees on every imaginable subject, and there had hardly been anything that had not been deemed worthy to engage the attention of a Committee of that House, except that most important subject which involved so many interests, and which it fell peculiarly to a household-suffrage Parliament to consider—namely, the incidence of taxation, and what means should be devised for its being equitably assessed. The hon. Baronet had dealt at very great length with that portion of his subject which related to local taxation; but, seeing that the local taxation of the country amounted only to 16s. per head of the population, and that the Imperial taxation amounted to 49s. 3d. per head of the population, it was evident that the most important part of the subject related to the Imperial taxation. There was much more dissatisfaction prevailing with regard to Imperial than with regard to local taxation. He could not help believing that there was a bitter feeling in the popular mind as to the inequality of our taxation. It was not believed that everyone contributed to the cost of the Government in proportion to the revenue which he enjoyed under its protection, and that furnished an argument for the Committee which had now been moved for. He thought that such a Committee would knock away and get rid of a vast amount of popular delusion and current misconception which obtained as much among the upper as among the lower classes in reference to taxation. There were some who believed that the lower classes, owing to the late remissions of taxation, did not pay their proportion to the general fund; while, on the other hand, it was alleged by those who had looked into the subject carefully, that the working classes still paid a very much larger proportion than they ought to pay. He (Mr. White) had arrived at the same conclusion. Even with the diminished duties they were now paying upon sugar and tea, he found that, for the year ending the 31st of March last, the vast sum of £38,300,000 was derived from the custom and excise duties on the six articles mainly consumed by the working classes—namely, sugar, tea, coffee, malt, spirits, and tobacco; that total of £38,300,000 was £11,500,000 more than the whole amount of the interest on the National Debt; and, from that fact, he considered it obvious that the working classes still paid a greater proportion of the taxation than ought to be their fair share. There were a great many points on which he should like information. If a Select Committee were appointed, he should like to know how it came to pass that the succession duty, which was introduced in 1853, had not yielded the sum that was then expected from it. The right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister then told the House of Commons that he quite counted on deriving £2,000,000 per annum from that duty. His estimate was thought ludicrously low, and Lord Cairns, and other great authorities, averred that £4,000,000 would be obtainable from it. But the average sum which had been derived from that tax during the last 16 years was only £620,000 per annum. It was a puzzle to him to know how the Government of the day, with all the information before them, had made such a mis-estimate of the proceeds of the succession duty. It might be that this small average arose from the vast charges and incumbrances with which landed property was generally burdened; and, if this were so, the time must soon come when an Encumbered Estates Court for England would be as beneficial as it had proved in Ireland. Another anomaly requiring explanation was to be found in connection with the house duty. This duty contributed £987,000 in the year 1866, of which sum—according to the detailed Return for that year—the county of Radnor paid £175, Merioneth £329, and Rutland only £473. The house duty paid on farmhouses also presented some curious discrepancies calling for explanation. This particular duty of 6*d.* in the pound of rental, realized in the year 1866 a total sum of but £13,940 17*s.* 6*d.*, of which the county of Anglesea contributed 10*s.*, Cardigan rose to the sum of £1, Pembroke gave £2 12*s.* 6*d.*, Westmoreland £4 12*s.* 6*d.*, Cornwall £9 8*s.*, and Cumberland £14 2*s.* With regard to the probate duty the present Prime Minister told the House 17 years ago, that the long-continued and anomalous exemption of landed property from probate duty ought to be considered at a very early day, notwithstanding which declaration, after this lapse of years, that which many people believe to be a very glaring injustice was still in existence.

MR. C. S. READ thought that the present system of local government was a very bad one. We had the evils of centralization without its benefits. Within the last 35 years we had entirely revolutionized our system of parochial taxation. We had abolished every parochial officer, some of those offices having existed since the days of King Alfred. He would begin with the overseer. The overseer was virtually put aside under the new Poor Law, but the new guardian was the guardian of the parish till we got the Union Chargeability Act, and now he was no longer guardian of the parish, but of the Union. We still had in some districts the parochial surveyor, but his death warrant was signed by the Home Secretary, and the new waywarden, if he understood rightly, would not be the waywarden of the parish, but simply the waywarden of the highway district. Then there was the old parish constable, who was always to be found, but was never of any use when he was found. We had in exchange for him the rural policeman, who, though he might be some good when he was found, was never to be found when he was wanted. The only parochial officer who was not abolished was the parson, and he had received notice to quit from the junior Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), and it only required some "bold" man to endorse this and carry it into effect. He would not say whether all this was for weal or woe, but for what purpose was it? To make local taxation more uniform, and to increase Government responsibility and Government power. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon that we had come to a perfect chaos. We had got a regular system of patchwork. Parliament was constantly creating some new Board, with some great central authority in London; there was no order, no system, and one district was constantly overlapping another. There was one area for the Poor Law, another for highways, another for justices, another for taxes, another for education, and we were going to have another for election expenses. Sometimes we had two Boards pretending to have authority over the same matter; but very generally, when there was any particular nuisance to be abated, each put in a plea that it had no authority. He feared we were gradually drifting into the centralization of France, where, if he was informed rightly, they could not repair a parish pump without a correspondence with the Minister at Paris. In America they managed things differently, and there the system of local administration was better carried out. The House had heard, and no doubt would hear again in the course of the debate, that with larger contributions from the Imperial Exchequer, we should have lavish local expenditure. But the Government had the power to interfere and dictate now, and he, for one, should be very glad, provided they only paid, if they were to increase their authority. But now we had Cabinet Ministers presiding over great central Departments; we had Inspectors without end, Commissioners, Commissions, Government officials, and all sorts of secretaries, and there was the extraordinary mania of bringing everything to London. His hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire was of opinion that the parochial education of Scotland, which was the very best in the world, was about to be interfered with, if not destroyed, in order to bring it into that muddled vortex, the Privy Council in London. Therefore, with all this increase of Government influence we had the loss of local power, and did not get any more pay on that account. The Government contributed last year only 1-26th of the poor and county rate. Taking the poor rate as far as regarded the relief of in-door paupers, the President of the Poor Law Board was omnipotent. He directed the diet, clothing, discipline, and even punishment of the paupers; and although he believed the metropolitan guardians were sometimes a little obstreperous, he did not know an instance in the counties in which the orders of the Poor Law authorities had been disobeyed, except one, when the Inspector told the guardians that they had better paper their board-room instead of colouring it. With regard to out-door relief, he endorsed everything that had been said by the hon. Member for South Devon. The authority of the guardians was limited to whether an old woman should have 2s. 6d. or 3s., and whether the doctor's salary should be £30 or 30 guineas. As for the quarter sessions, it was a solemn farce. The idea of the ratepayers was that the magistrates there were very big men, who had ample power to do just as they pleased, and inflict upon them all sorts of burdens. But what were they but the humble and obedient servants of the Home Secretary? The Home Secretary told them exactly what to do, and if they did not do it he would not give them the Government allowance. His hon. Friend had mentioned the case of lunatic asylums. The way in which they were managed was incredible and perplexing. First of all, there were the magistrates in quarter sessions, who were not elected by the ratepayers; they appointed a visiting committee which had their own clerk, who sent out orders to the Unions as to the contributions they were to make. Anyone would imagine that the visiting committee had very large powers; they had no power at all, except to spend what the Commissioners of Lunacy told them, and these gentlemen were constantly coming down, airing their different crotchets, putting the counties to some new expense every year, and though he admitted there were more cures than there used to be, the relapses, also, were very much more numerous than before. The fact was, the paupers were so well off in the asylums, so luxuriously fed and housed, that when they got back to the hard usage and poor fare of their cottages, the malady returned with redoubled force. It was most pleasant and instructive to see how one Government Department helped another. There was in Prince's Street, Westminster, an offshoot of the Privy Council which caused farmers in the country an immense deal of annoyance and expense. Those gentlemen found that they could not insist upon the counties appointing veterinary surgeons as cattle inspectors, some wishing, wrongly he thought, to employ a rural police. But down came the Home Secretary and said—"You shall not employ the police for such a purpose," and thus if one Department failed another immediately stepped in and carried out the orders. He was going now to make a quotation—a thing which he hoped he should never do again—from the greatest of living philosophers, Mr. John Stuart Mill. He did it with fear and trembling, because other gentlemen who had followed Mr. Mill's recent writings would in all probability say that what seemed to him unanswerable had been entirely disproved by some recent essay. The quotation consisted of two lines taken from his Political Economy—

"A peculiar tax on the income of any class, not balanced by taxes on other classes, is a violation of justice and amounts to partial confiscation."

Apply that doctrine to local rates. First, with regard to real property, there were dockyards, barracks, custom houses, Royal domains, mines, woodlands, &c., forming a long list of exemptions from local taxation. Then there was the immense and greatly increasing mass of personalty, whose proper local burden was cast upon a portion of the realty of the country. His hon. Friend had told the House plainly what real property was rated to. He would not go over the ground again, but would just mention that only last night his noble Friend Lord Kimberley introduced in the House of Lords a most excellent measure for regulating the diet and lodging of vagrants. Now, what in the world had real property to do with vagrants, that it should be saddled with the cost of their diet and lodging? Assuredly, vagrants were not likely to run away with household fixtures, or to take away any portion of the soil. He should fancy that personal property would be much more likely to be pilfered, injured, or destroyed by them. Had hon. Gentlemen contrasted the rates raised from real property with the burden of the income tax? Last year the Revenue raised by property and income tax was 1-60th of the property assessed. The revenue raised by rates was one-fifth, according to his hon. Friend; he would put it at one-sixth. Local taxation was a second crushing income tax, falling frequently upon persons and properties least able to bear it. The House had been told that the heavy burdens upon land were counterbalanced by its exemption from Imperial taxes, but Mr. Cobden's warning was uttered when the land had special privileges and could bear special burdens. Land, escaped in a measure, legacy and probate duty. But take the case of two men, aged 21, one of whom was left an estate valued at £10,000, from which he derived an income of £300 a-year, and the other, £10,000 in cash. The latter would pay £100 legacy duty and £200 probate, making £300, while the former would, if his estate were clear, pay only 50 guineas for succession duty. That might be said to be a gross case of inequality, leaving £250 to the debit of the man who inherited the cash. But, assuming that the first man paid rates to the moderate amount of 2s. 9d. in the pound, upon his assessment of £300, he would, in 30 years, pay £1,200, so that, instead of paying £250 less, he would have paid £950 more than the other to whom the cash was bequeathed. But, suppose he improved his estate, and borrowed £2,000 to improve it with, he would then have to pay 4 per cent for the money, and 2s. 9d. in the pound on the annual value of these improvements as long as he lived. Take the case of the farmers. In spite of all the promises made when free trade was passed, they had not been relieved from one single burden. Almost all their exemptions had, indeed, been taken away, such as the taxes on shepherds' dogs, and riding horses, and fire insurance. Last year the last rag of protection was swept away in the shape of the 1s. duty on corn, and the farmers were then called upon to pay 10s. a-piece for their crow guns. He had heard it said that the farmers enjoyed an immunity from income tax because they paid under Schedule B on half their rent and tithes. That was done because it was known they hated trouble, and would rather pay a good round sum than keep accounts. He believed that in Scotland, where rents were high, the farmers paid on one-third of their rent; while in Ireland, where the rents were extremely low, they paid, for some Hibernian reason, the same as in Scotland. Take the case of arable land in England. If the farmer paid 35s. an acre for rent and tithes, 10 per cent on £8 10s., supposing that to be his capital, would be 17s. Half his rent would be 17s. 6d., and upon that he would be charged property tax. Notwithstanding Mr. Mechi's agricultural romances, as he might call them, about the profits of farming, he (Mr. Read) had never been able to make 10 per cent for two consecutive years on the money he employed in agriculture, and if he had had to pay income tax on his profits during the last three years, he should have paid considerably less than nothing. One thing was certain, that if this alteration were made the farmers would be obliged to keep better accounts. Agriculturists were at present exempt from the duty on cart-horses. Any such impost, if attempted to be levied, would be a tax on the motive power employed in agriculture, and if cart-horses were taxed it would be impossible to resist the inference that the motive power employed in manufactures ought to be taxed as well. Mr. Cobden said that—"It would be impossible, and if it were possible it would be most unjust, to retain the malt tax after the Corn Laws were repealed."

His hon. Friend, who came from a cider producing district, had said nothing about the malt tax, but the growers of barley felt the pressure of this tax very heavily. They had sold this year their barley at 32s. a quarter, and it was taxed 22s. by the revenue officer directly it went out of their possession. Some Lincolnshire gentlemen contended that the malt tax was no great burden; but he only wished the Government would put a tax of 60 per cent on woollen yarn, the produce of the county of Lincoln. He should like to know whether the Lincolnshire sheep-farmers would then be able to get as much money for their wool. Look at the transfer of the hop duty from the hop grower to the manufacturer. The result had been that the grower had pocketed almost all the duty, and had sold his hops at the same rate as if he had had to pay the duty. A fair inquiry would show how the malt duty and local taxation pressed upon the agricultural interest, and he sincerely hoped Her Majesty's Government, after his hon. Friend's Motion had been so generally supported on both sides of the House, would grant the request contained in the Resolution.

MR. CHADWICK said, that having given considerable attention to this subject, he had arrived at an opposite conclusion to the hon. Member (Sir Massey Lopes). Many of his statements would not be borne out upon investigation; but if the hon. Baronet, leaving out the declaratory words of his Motion, had moved for a Committee of Inquiry into the incidence of Imperial and local taxation, and the best means to insure a proper adjustment of the same, he would have been supported by the Members on his (the Ministerial) side of the House, irrespective of their connection with commerce or land. The hon. Gentleman had quoted Mr. Dudley Baxter's paper read before the Statistical Society; but his calculations had by no means been accepted by the members of the society. They were totally unsupported, and he regarded the paper as belonging to the romance of statistics.

MR. LIDDELL said, he did not recollect any former occasion on which a subject had been debated for so long a time with so much unanimity as to the expediency of adopting a particular course. He hoped the Government would grant a Committee of Inquiry in compliance with the evident wish of both sides of the House. He grounded, however, his 'anticipation that the Government might refuse the inquiry demanded, upon a remark which on Monday night fell from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that the Motion might as well be let alone, because, as the right hon. Gentleman hinted, the Government were prepared to bring in a Bill upon the question. With all deference to Her Majesty's Government, whether a Bill was ready or not, that was no reason why an inquiry should not take place. The question was one which, in his opinion, was hardly ripe for legislation. His hon. Friend who made the present Motion (Sir Massey Lopes), and those who thought with him, made allegations which went to the root of the whole principle of our financial policy, and how, he would ask, were these allegations to be disposed of except by careful investigation before a Committee? While supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend, he was aware that there were difficulties to contend with in reaching exempted property arising from the limited terms of the statute of Elizabeth, the only one existing on the subject, and from the limited construction which custom had put upon that statute. The Courts held that, in order to be rateable, property must combine certain qualifications. It must be visible, productive, and situate within the parish. The moment they wanted to rate personalty, even if they succeeded in laying hold of it, they met the greater and insuperable difficulty of allocating the produce. This was the great difficulty that arose in dealing with personal property for the purposes of parochial taxation. But these were questions which they wanted to discuss. They wanted to meet this difficulty, and he could see no means of doing it except by an exhaustive inquiry before a Committee. This was a reason, and a strong reason, in favour of the Motion of his hon. Friend. He would venture also to express an opinion that they must proceed with great caution. For his own part, he was not prepared to go so far, or anything like so far, as his hon. Friend. He was rather, he must confess, alarmed at the possible consequences of carrying this matter to its legitimate issue for rating purposes. One of the first things that met the eye when they came to deal with personal property was stock-in-trade. Farm stock had never, since the early part of the reign of Queen Anne, in 1706, been held by the Courts liable to rating. Stock-in-trade on the other hand was liable under the general law and was only exempted by an Act annually renewed; but if they declared that stock-in-trade was liable to rates, why should they continue the exemption of farm stock? And if farm stock were taxed, there would be an interference with the profits of the farmer which must immediately re-act on rents. These were matters that must not escape notice; and, therefore, he said, let them be very cautious how they proceeded in this matter. Their objects were very deep-rooted, and they went to the whole basis of our financial system. He had heard this question discussed out-of-doors with great ability, and he never heard an answer attempted to be given to the simple question, why real property, houses and land only, should be subjected to the whole weight of local taxation? He hoped it would receive an answer that evening. They went further. There was no mistake so great and so mischievous in finance as to tax one industry at the expense of another, because the inevitable effect would be that they artificially stimulated and encouraged the untaxed industry and proportionately prevented the application of capital to the taxed industry. These were broad accusations against our system of finance, and he wanted to find out how those errors and injustices were allowed to exist. There was another word of caution which he would like to utter. His hon. Friend (Mr. O. S. Read) who spoke earlier in the debate looked with natural dread at the increase of central authority. Now, he was very much afraid that if they set themselves to work to include personalty within the area of rating—in fact, to levy a parochial income tax, because it would be nothing else—the same machine that was employed to collect the Imperial income tax would be employed to collect the other tax, and the Treasury would not be justified in advancing sums of money in aid of rates without exercising a supervision over the expenditure of them. But, then, were they to have a representative of the Poor Law Board sitting in every Union in the kingdom? Because he was very much afraid that their cherished principles of self-government would be assailed, and a vast increase of central authority would ensue. He was quite sure of this—that if they wished to extend rating to all the property in the kingdom, they might do it; but they would lose a large amount of the power to govern themselves. He was very much afraid also that, unless they proceeded with great caution in promoting an exact uniformity and equality, they might do a very great injustice to a class of incomes which they ought to treat very tenderly—the industrial incomes. They had been told that there ought to be a graduated income tax; but the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had always set himself against that principle. But it appeared to him (Mr. Liddell) that unless they were very careful they would be doing injustice in attempting to obtain uniformity and equity. Therefore, let them be cautious in what they did. Let them take care that in seeking to remove one sort of injustice they did not create another; that in trying to remove one evil they did not produce a worse. What he thought they ought to seek, and what was the most easy and practical mode of dealing with the question, was a classification of rates. He hoped that the Government Bill would deal with the question—what portion of the rates was applicable to national purposes as distinguished from the purely local purposes. It appeared to him, upon the best and most careful consideration he could give to this most difficult subject, that this was the direction in which relief might be given in the most unobjectionable manner. If they came to a rate-in-aid the Government would require a supervision; but the principle was already acted upon with regard to the maintenance of the police. So that it was not a new principle; it was a practical principle, the application of which could be fairly and properly controlled by the central authority. There was one other point to which he would like to allude. It struck him as one of the most remarkable features in the debate, that the hon. Baronet had said it was a poor man's question; and the statement was received with something like ironical observations by the Treasury Bench. He (Mr. Liddell) said it was essentially a poor man's question; because, travelling into the large towns of the kingdom, the ratepayer was found in the poor occupier of the poor houses, and the remarkable circumstance was this—that the poorer the parish, and the nearer the inhabitants of the parish were to the verge of pauperism, the higher were the rates and the less the means which they had to meet the demands made upon them. His hon. Friend was then justified in saying that it was a poor man's question, and it was in that light that he (Mr. Liddell) wished to look upon it. He did not venture to advise the Government; but he hoped that they would not attempt to shirk this question. It had been discussed throughout the length and breadth of the land with great ability, with great intelligence, and with clear-sighted views, it had assumed an imposing aspect, not by declamation, not by hustings speeches, but in the calm intelligence of the people of England brought to bear on it, and it would be not only unwise, but it might even be dangerous for Parliament to attempt to trifle with it.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had properly pointed out that upon a certain portion of the Motion of the hon. Baronet considerable unanimity prevailed, the feeling on both sides of the House being that the Government should take steps to insure "that every description of property shall equitably contribute to all National burdens." In that portion of the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Government coincided. The second point in the hon. Baronet's Motion was, that it was the duty of the Government to inquire forthwith into the incidence of Imperial as well as Local taxation. The hon. Baronet had not moved for a Committee; he said it was the duty of the Government to inquire. He (Mr. Goschen) would reply that the Government recognized that duty, and if there had been more delay than had been agreeable to the House in communicating to it every statement and every figure that could throw light on the subject, it had been because the inquiry had been most intricate, and that the Government had been most anxious that the results should be perfectly accurate. At this moment, they had statements showing with regard to every tax how it was divided between various sorts of property and various classes of taxpayers. The Government had collected from foreign countries the information to which he alluded last year. The work was not one that could be performed in a day. The Government said that instead of appointing a Royal Commission, they would do the work themselves; and he submitted that the Government had redeemed its pledge, and would lay before the House the whole of the information they had promised to procure. The question before the House was this—Did the country wish the Government to speak or to act? Did the House wish the Government to inquire or to legislate? The Government believed that it was their duty to legislate on the subject; and accordingly hon. Members in the House were aware that in the gracious Speech from the Throne it was announced that the re-adjustment of local burdens was one of the matters with which the Government were willing to deal during the present Session. Did the House wish the Ministerial measure to be deferred till further inquiry should be made? Or did they wish the Government to take the course which, in obedience to the feelings of the country and their own convictions, they felt it their duty to take—namely, to deal at once with the subject of local rating, and see whether they could not, by a comprehensive measure, inaugurate a new era in the country in the history of this vexed question? That was the ambition and the plan of the Government. Liberal Members would judge whether, in their attempts at legislation, the Government had been afraid to legislate in a comprehensive manner. Was it the wish of the House that further inquiries should be prosecuted, and further facts elicited by the appointment of a Committee, which was to consume the Session in inquiry, instead of allowing the Government to remedy at once some of the grievances which they were prepared to acknowledge? He might claim to be not an opponent, but a competitor of the hon. Baronet who had introduced this Motion. Whether the hon. Baronet or he himself, in the first instance, called the attention of the House to this subject he did not remember; but it was one in which he took as deep an interest as the hon. Baronet did. To him, therefore, it would, he confessed, be a disappointment if the House, instead of allowing the Government to produce their Bill on local rating, should relegate the duty to a Committee upstairs. What would be the position of the question before a Committee? Did the House really wish that all matters connected with local and Imperial finance should be decided by a Committee, where the absence of one or two Members might cause the entire difference as to whether the decision was given in one direction or in the other? Select Committees were constituted by choosing 11 Members from one side of the House and 10 from the other; and though the 11 Members might represent the overwhelming opinion of the House, they might be outvoted by the accidental absence of two of their number, and financial doctrines might be laid down at which the Liberal party would stand aghast. There were many arguments against such a composition of Committees and in favour of a larger representation of the majority of the House; but, generally, did hon. Members wish the question of the share of taxation which ought to be borne by land, houses, and other sorts of property to be decided in the first instance by a Committee up-stairs? The Mover of the Resolution had made a most able speech; and he tendered to the hon. Baronet his most hearty congratulations. He wished also to apologize for having indulged in merriment when the hon. Baronet said that the high rating of land had alienated capital from the soil. It was "a penal tax;" and the hon. Baronet was afraid that capitalists might be prevented by it from seeking an investment in land in this country, and that capital was driven abroad. Now, was that the experience of hon. Members with regard to the purchase of land? ["Yes!"] Against such an opinion he would place the experience of anyone who had ever tried to buy a piece of land. [An hon. Member: To farm it.] Well, but did farmers pay the rates, or owners? Was it industry or property which paid them? If the farmer paid the rates, they fell on his personal property, and must be deducted from any estimate of rates borne by owners. This fallacy underlay the whole of the hon. Baronet's arguments. He said it was not politic that local charges should be levied exclusively on one description of property; but he really meant two—houses and land. [Sir MASSEY LOPES: Real property.] But were houses and land one description of property, and would hon. Members opposite contend that the same principles applied to both? Several hon. Gentlemen had quoted Ricardo and Mill. They would find in those authorities that taxes on a house differed entirely from taxes on land. A house involved far more capital than improvements on land; and in proportion as this was so, taxes fell more heavily on houses than on land. He disputed the proposition that the rate on houses and the rate on land were the same; for the land remained, and houses decayed. He could produce an excellent witness in proof of the truth of that assertion—namely, the hon. Baronet himself, who, in bringing forward his Motion last year, admitted that the occupiers paid a considerable portion of the local rates; but did the hon. Baronet make any deduction on that account when he came to speak of the rate on the owners? The hon. Baronet had naturally confined himself principally to the question of land, but the Government must also consider the question of houses, before legislating on the subject. It might be true that the owners of property had to bear more than their fair share of taxation, and it might be true that the occupiers of houses were also paying more than their fair share; and the Government was bound to examine closely what was the position of the various classes of ratepayers, of owners of property, of farmers, of occupiers of houses, of ground landlords, and others; and, looking into their cases, especially to ascertain what their real grievances were, and not to allow themselves to be carried away by the arguments of the hon. Baronet, who argued that the burdens on land were intolerable, and in support of his proposition quoted the vast amount of rates with which land had nothing to do, but which were imposed on the occupiers of houses. He did not wish at that hour of the evening to follow the hon. Baronet through all his interesting details; but while he congratulated him on all that he had said, he congratulated him still more on what he had left unsaid. The hon. Baronet had given certain years as examples; but he had omitted all reference to other years equally in point, and which would have shown a very different result. The hon. Baronet spoke of the local taxation of the country as amounting to £30,000,000, and quoted him (Mr. Goschen) as the authority for that statement; but what he said was that the local expenditure for local purposes was £30,000,000, and of that sum £16,500,000 or £17,000,000 only was raised by rates, the remainder being raised by such as fees, dues, tolls, and from various other sources. He should, therefore, be sorry for the House to be under the impression that as regards rates the sum raised was £30,000,000. That would be a totally delusive notion. The hon. Baronet said that last year the amount of expenditure on poor relief had fallen, in consequence of the decrease in the price of corn. Certainly that was the case, because in the year before it had increased in consequence of the increase in the price of corn. With respect to the poor rates, he rejoiced to say that it seemed that the turning point had arrived, and, unless the House should take the dangerous step of supplementing the poor rates by a grant from the Consolidated Fund, there might be some hope of the poor rates being reduced. But he was quite sure that no step was more certain to increase our expenditure in poor relief than if they were to open the floodgates of the Consolidated Fund, for such a course would damage not only their Poor Laws, but also injuriously affect many other institutions of the country. [A laugh.] He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman was laughing at his argument; if so, he was sorry, because he was certain that greatest possible danger lurked in the administration of our Poor Laws. He had been rejoiced to hear that night from the hon. Baronet, and from two hon. Members opposite connected with agriculture, and most competent to speak on this question, that they were opposed to a large administration of out-door relief. It amounted to £3,500,000 out of the total of £7,500,000 expended in poor relief, and it was fully time that attention was called to the great increase that had taken place in it; but the House must remember that it was administered without any central authority, and that the Poor Law Board continually felt it to be their duty to repress that expenditure as far as lay in their power, though it was often a difficult task in the face of the opposition of Boards of Guardians. If, however, the House would support the Government in opposing the dangerous tendency to give out-door relief, he hoped that a serious reduction might be made in this expenditure. Surely that was a better course than that they should continue to look more and more to the Consolidated Fund, and increase the aggregate which was raised year after year by the tax collectors of the country. Several hon. Members had spoken of the odious character of tax collectors; and he perfectly concurred with those who said it would be infinitely easier to raise money locally than Imperially. He thought that the House would commit a grave political error were it to add to the amount of the sums annually voted by that House. Many countries had been in danger from the condition of their national finances, but none, to his knowledge, from that of their local finances. Before the Assessed Taxes Act passed, the rate-collectors of London used to find it necessary to take out 5,000 or 6,000 summonses against defaulters. That never created any public excitement; but if, instead of being the collectors of local rates, they had been the collectors of Imperial taxes, it might have been a source of political danger. The proper way of dealing with this question was to determine what were local charges, and, if it appeared that the present mode of raising local taxation was unfair then to see that it was remedied. There was, however, no logic in saying that because the present system of raising money might be inequitable, therefore the local expenditure should be made a national charge. Considering that the Government contemplated introducing a Bill upon this subject, he was really fighting the question with his hands tied, for he surely could not be expected to anticipate the introduction of that measure by fully explaining the views of the Government on the subject. But he was happy in being able to state that some of those who had addressed the House had warmly endorsed some of the provisions of the proposed Government measure, which actually embodied the suggestions they had made. The hon. Baronet, in placing an analysis of local taxation before the House, first raised the £16,000,000 to £20,000,000, and having done that he divided it into two parts, one of £12,000,000 for Imperial purposes, and the other of £8,000,000 for local requirements, and he took the years 1776 and 1839, and compared them with the year 1869. But, why did he do so?

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he took 1776 because it was the only year which afforded trustworthy statistics at that period.

MR. GOSCHEN remarked that the hon. Baronet had not stated why he had chosen the year 1839.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, because he thought it would best elucidate his argument by taking 30 years and then 10 years, showing the increase in 30 years and also the increase in 10 years.

MR. GOSCHEN said, no doubt it was a very convenient way of dealing with the subject by decades, because a few years forward or backward would make the results perfectly different. But if the hon. Baronet had taken the year 1829, or, still better, 1819, what a beautiful year it would have been; and if he had taken 50, 40, 30, or 20 years, he would have found many years when the poor rates were as high as now, and when they were borne by property not worth half its present value. And he would further have found that land had, in the progress of time, been gradually relieved from rates which would have staggered the House by their magnitude; and that, in fact, landed property at the earlier period of the century was infinitely more heavily burdened than now; and if he had pursued his inquiry a little further he would have discovered whether it was in the agricultural or in the urban counties that the greatest increase in rates had taken place. The hon. Baronet had referred to Militia storehouses and registration of births and deaths.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, there were 100 Militia storehouses in his own county (Devonshire).

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would come presently to the case of Devonshire, and a very interesting county it was. He was about, when he was interrupted, to refer to these small additions to the county rate, in comparison with the concessions which the landed proprietors in counties received from Sir Robert Peel in 1846, in anticipation of losses which they never sustained; and, as the hon. Baronet had placed those items before the House, he (Mr. Goschen) would place before it other items. It was true, as had been stated by him, that, compared with some years, there had been an increase of £8,000,000 in the rates up to that time. There were years when they were £10,000,000 and even £12,000,000, but he would take them at a time when they were £8,000,000, when the local rates were not so numerous, and to a considerable extent of a different character. There was the old historical poor rate which was a great blot upon the country. There was the sewers rate, dating so far back as Henry VIII., and there was the county rate, of which the hon. Baronet so much complained; but side by side with these there had grown up rates of which no notice had been taken that night, borough rates, local improvement rates, and sanitary rates in towns. The first dated from 1836, but did not come into force to any extent till 1841. Then in 1848 and 1858 the Public Health Act and Local Government Acts were passed, under which various sums were raised in boroughs and towns, and it was a remarkable fact that, of the £8,000,000 increase referred to by the hon. Baronet, £5,000,000 were due to town rates, raised in the small towns as well as in the large and improving cities of the Empire. ["Hear, hear!"] He was delighted to find they were agreed on those points, because he was not opposed to the House dealing with local taxation. In fact, the Government were prepared to deal with it, and there was a Bill ready upon the subject to be introduced directly the business of the House would allow it to be done. It was necessary, however, that the House should thoroughly understand where the shoe pinched. It would not do to lump all the rates together, and exclaim against their increase all over the country. Let the House ascertain what it was that caused an increase of rates, and supply a remedy where the grievance was the greatest. Let all interests be fairly considered; but let them discriminate between them, and see where the greatest grievance lay. The increase of £5,000,000 had occurred in the towns, but when the hon. Baronet spoke of charging some of the expenditure for local purposes upon the Consolidated Fund, he spoke of taxes connected with the county rate which fell upon the owner of land. ["No, no!"] The hon. Baronet continually used the words "owner of land."

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he used the words "real property" when speaking of land, and he never intended to draw any distinction between houses and land.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Baronet was perfectly right not to draw any distinction between houses and land; if he had done so he would have found his argument soon fail him. If the taxation upon real property were divided into two portions it would be found that the rates had increased infinitely more upon houses than upon land. ["Hear, hear!"] He rejoiced that where he expected difference of opinion he had found unanimity. He was glad to find it admitted that the case of houses was infinitely stronger than the case of land. That was a point which he would beg hon. Members to bear in mind. He had still £3,000,000 more of increased taxation to account for. Was that to be traced to increased burdens on the owners of land? In towns these rates were generally paid by the occupiers, and when the hon. Baronet said the interests of the occupier and the owner were identical, he (Mr. Goschen) should like to know the views of the London ratepayers on that point. In the case of land, it would make comparatively little difference whether the owner or the occupier paid the duty in the long run. He said "in the long run" and not "in the short run," because there was most certainly a time when it would make a great difference to the farmers whether they had to pay in the first instance or not. And the hon. Member had, indeed, been delightfully candid upon the point. He said—"If you separate the farmers from the owners of land we shall not be able to oppose you as we do now." Now, he had to account for £8,000,000. Of this amount, £5,000,000 were due to the borough rates and improvements in towns, £2,000,000 of which were due to the metropolis alone. The next item was an increase of £2,000,000 in the poor rate; but had that rise fallen upon the houses or upon land? Out of that £2,000,000, £1,600,000 was due to 150 urban Unions, and the balance only of £400,000 was due to the 500 rural Unions in the country. The lion's share, therefore, evidently fell upon the unfortunate towns. No doubt these towns had, as regards general rates, their improvements by way of compensation, and the greater portion of these rates had been deliberately incurred; but this circumstance did not affect the fact that they bore the burden. He had thus accounted for £7,000,000 out of the £8,000,000, and had £1,000,000 still left to account for. Of that £1,000,000, £500,000 was due to the rural police. And he would now ask whether hon. Gentlemen opposite agreed with the hon. Baronet who had brought forward this Motion, in believing that it would be better if the direction of the police were taken out of the hands of the local authorities? There might be arguments in favour of such a change; but he believed that, if deliberately proposed, it would not receive the sanction of Parliament. He believed three-fourths of the hon. Gentlemen opposite would vote against relieving the counties and municipalities from the responsibility at present resting upon them. Moreover, did hon. Members think that if this were done the county magistrates would occupy their present position? What, too, would become of the quarter sessions? And though the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. C. S. Read) had spoken in no very handsome terms of quarter sessions, still they were a part of our local administration, and would have to be reviewed when our system of local administration came to be reviewed. Well, there remained now but £500,000 to account for, and this was due to the same class of modern rates to which he had before alluded. He could easily run through the several items that produced it; but he did not wish to weary the House upon that point. He would only adduce, for the sake of example, the Burial Boards as one of the items of urban expenditure accounting for this

£500,000. He hoped he had now shown the House that there was nothing vague in this increase of rates, but that it could be traced to certain definite causes chiefly connected with the large towns. Now, according to the Returns moved for by a right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt), it appeared that the average rate in England and Wales was 3*s.* 4*d.* If they divided the country into urban and rural districts—if they took the 150 urban Unions, and the 500 rural Unions, they would find this result—The average rate of the towns was 4*s.*, whereas the average rate of the rural districts was only 2*s.* 9½*d.*, showing that the former exceeded the latter by no less a sum than 1*s.* 2½*d.*, or 44 per cent. These were facts that could not be denied. He would state another fact. There was an increase in the number of paupers, which was due, no doubt, to the towns and not to the country, in great measure because the law of settlement had increased the number of paupers in towns as compared with that of the country. The legislation of this class had been fair and just, but still the fact remained. Now, they had been told that evening something about the effect of Imperial taxation upon real property. That was also a matter upon which Government had made inquiry, and the results were remarkable in many ways. The hon. Baronet asked that they should make each class of property contribute equitably towards national burdens, but equitably did not mean equally. He thought that if the hon. Baronet would look to foreign countries, or examine the history of his own, he would find that at no time had it been held that the taxes upon land were the same as upon other kinds of property. Many countries of Europe derived their chief taxation from the land, and it was thereby burdened with a weight of taxation quite unknown in this country. Now, putting land and houses together, what did they contribute towards the Imperial taxation of the country? In England they contributed 10½ per cent; in France, 29 per cent; in Prussia, 15 per cent; Holland, 22 per cent; Belgium, 37 per cent; Austria, 26 per cent; and Hungary, 38 per cent. He did not wish to push this argument beyond its legitimate conclusion, nor did he desire to overstate his case, for what the Government were anxious to do was to inform the House of the incidence of Imperial and local taxation. Neither did he wish to argue in a controversial manner, and if he had been betrayed into doing so he was exceedingly sorry. What he intended to do was simply to show how the land lay; and the general conclusion at which he had arrived was that the land of this country, as regarded Imperial taxation, lay in an exceedingly comfortable state. He wished next to ask the House how much did they think that land, exclusive of houses, paid towards Imperial taxation in the United Kingdom, as regarded both amount and percentage? With respect to amount, land by itself paid only £3,000,000 out of the £65,000,000 of taxation, and the percentage was $5\frac{1}{2}$. [An hon. MEMBER: Land and buildings?] Those figures applied to land as separated from houses, and were taken from the schedules of the income tax. They should be submitted to the House in order that they might receive all the investigation of which they were capable, for the Government had been anxious to exhaust this subject as far as possible, and they had tried to do so in a conscientious manner. He would now state the percentages paid by land only towards the total amount raised by Imperial taxation. The amount paid by land alone in England was $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; in Holland land alone paid 9 per cent; in Austria, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; in France, $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; in Belgium, $20\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; and in Hungary, $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. What did these facts prove? They proved that, as regarded Imperial taxation, land in this country was in an infinitely better position than land in any other European State. In every other country the Imperial burdens upon land were greater than in England, and the figures contained in the Report which he would present to the House would show that, putting together both Imperial and local taxation, the rate in England would not exceed by more than 2 per cent the amount paid in France and other European countries. There was thus a slight increase if land and houses were put together; but taking the case of land alone the advantage was very much in favour of England. He could also give the House the rate in the pound which represented the burden on land for Imperial purposes in this country and elsewhere respectively, and at the same time he would place before the House the rate in the pound of the burdens on land at various dates in the present century. In 1826 the rate on real property for Imperial and local taxation was 4s. 4d. in the pound; in 1843 it was 3s. 7d.; in 1851, 3s. 4d.; in 1862, 3s. 6d.; in 1869, 3s. 3d.; and in 1870, 3s. 2d. The aggregate rate in the pound on real property had been decreasing since 1826. The conclusion which was forced on him by these figures was that great care must be taken to ascertain the actual facts most accurately before legislating. These were doubtless questions which required to be dealt with, and the House ought not to shrink from facing them, for there was much that was amiss and ought to be put right. The House, however, ought not to commit the error of running away with the idea that the sum and substance of this matter was that the burdens placed upon land in the way of taxation were excessive. It was an open question as to what views hon. Members might hold on the subject, whether the land ought to pay an equal proportion to other property or a greater; but, as a matter of fact, comparing land in this country with land in other European States, the case, as regarded England, was not at all desperate, while the price which land would fetch in this country was a proof that the burden was not quite so intolerable as some hon. Members opposite might lead the House to suppose. The hon. Baronet had spoken of Devonshire, and the case might be illustrated by that county, which was a simple agricultural one. The average rate in that county was 4s. 8d. in 1803, in 1815 it was 3s., and in 1826 it was 3s. 2½d., and those sums included the poor rate, the county rate, the church rate, and the highway rate. The figure for Devonshire at the present time for all rates was 3s. 3d.; therefore that county now stood almost exactly in the same position as in 1826. The hon. Baronet had spoken of the sums he paid, and contended that there had been a fictitious rise in the rateable value. But what were the actual amounts expended? In 1815 the expenditure in Devonshire was £285,000; in 1868, including all the rates, it was £332,000, an increase which ought not to frighten the hon. Baronet. He found this remarkable fact in going through the counties of England, that wherever there was a large town in a county the rate in that town was higher than the rate of the county itself. He had not heard either of the hon. Members for Plymouth address the House, but how did the case of that town stand? The average rate of Devonshire was 3*s.* 3*d.*, while the rate in Plymouth was 8*s.* 10*d.*, in Stoke Damerel it was 6*s.* 4½*d.*, and in Stonehouse it was 5*s.* What, then, was the remedy proposed? The hon. Baronet practically suggested that Plymouth should remain almost in her present position, but that to all the rural Unions in which the rates were seriously increased grants should be made out of the Consolidated Fund. His argument as to the many purposes dealt with by means of the county rate practically led him to that. That was surely not the way in which to approach the subject; for it would shake the foundations of the whole local administration of this country. The hon. Baronet would not be supported by his party in the remedies which he proposed. They might vote for an inquiry, or for a Committee; or they might say that the Government ought to pay certain indefinite charges; but he was sure those who sat on the front Opposition Bench would resist, as the Government resisted, any general onslaught on the Consolidated Fund, by which means an injustice would be created in attempting to remedy a grievance. If such charges were to be put on the Consolidated Fund, what was to be the position of Scotland and Ireland? There were no able-bodied poor, to speak of, in Ireland, and relief was not given to able-bodied persons in Scotland; therefore, it would be unjust to those countries to make any such contribution from the Consolidated Fund, and any attempt to meet this grievance, by simply granting a certain proportion of aid as compared with the expenditure, would really do much injustice. There were, however, other considerations that he should like to point out to the House as regarded the poor rate. In many counties pauperism was actually hereditary, and throughout the whole of this century those counties had been amongst the highest rated on account of the administration of the Poor Law. One of these counties was Sussex, in which the rate at one time was 8*s.* 7½*d.* in the pound. In many counties wages were low and the poor rates were high, while in others wages were higher and the poor rates were lower. Were those counties in which wages were high to contribute towards the

Consolidated Fund, in order that there might be a reduction of the poor rates in those counties where wages were low? He did not wish to place before the House the list of peccant counties in this respect; but, singularly enough, they were, with only one exception, all situated in the South of England. If a line were drawn across the country from East to West, from Monmouth to the Wash, there would be found below it all but one of those counties in which the rates were above the average, while many northern counties were distinguished by the lightness of their pauperism. Once more he wished to call the attention of the House to the difference between the rates for pauperism and the charges for town improvements. It was rather a disgrace to a county to have the poor rate very high, for that state of things was often due to social causes or to faulty administration; but, on the other hand, high rates for improvements were frequently much to the credit of a borough. The House must distinguish between those rates which were hereditary burdens on account of Poor Law administration and those rates which were adopted to make sanitary or other improvements. As regards the hereditary burdens, the hon. Baronet had said they almost became a rent-charge on the owners of land, but they had been so from the beginning of the century. Most of the great estates in this country had been bequeathed and inherited, or bought and sold, subject to those identical rates which, according to the statistics of Mr. Dudley Baxter, had so greatly increased the burden on property. Was that burden to be transferred from the land on which it had long been a rent-charge and added to the general taxation of the country, which was already high enough? If all the charges which had been mentioned were imposed upon the Consolidated Fund, how was the money to be raised? It might be answered by means of the income tax. Now, what did Mr. John Stuart Mill, one of the greatest political economists of the day, say in reference to taxing the increase of rental?—

“In most countries of Europe the right to taxation, as exigency might require, an indefinite portion of the rent of land has never been allowed to slumber. In several parts of the Continent the land tax forms a large proportion of the public revenues, and has always been confessedly liable to be raised or lowered without reference to other taxes. In England the land tax has not varied since the early part of the last century."

He also said—

"The same remarks obviously apply to those local taxes of the peculiar pressure of which on landed property so much has been said by the remnant of the Protectionists. As much of these burdens as is of old standing ought to be regarded as a prescriptive deduction or reservation, for public purposes, of a portion of the rent. And any recent additions have either been incurred for the benefit of the owners of landed property, or occasioned by their fault, in neither case giving them any just ground of complaint."

Was it, then, to be held that the House should remove what the hon. Baronet called the old burdens? Was it right to decide by a Rule of Three sum how much of these burdens should be transferred from what had been called a rent-charge on the land? He hoped these considerations would guide the House in determining the proper course of legislation on this subject. The Government had been asked for information. Well, he had already attempted to give some information; but the House should have in print, and in a more perfect form than he could present them in the course of a speech, delivered at a late hour of the evening, all the details with regard to the incidence of Imperial and local taxation. The House should not be called upon to vote on the Bill which the Government intended to introduce before it was in full possession of all the facts of the case. Before he sat down he must repeat the question he put to the House at the commencement of his remarks—"What are you desirous of doing?" Was it necessary to go on inquiring, or should the Government lay on the Table a Bill providing what they believed to be the best means of remedying those grievances which were acknowledged to exist? The Government had an immense work to perform, and he trusted they would receive the co-operation of the House. He hoped hon. Members would not vote for the Resolution proposed by the hon. Baronet, as such a vote would amount to the expression of an opinion that the Government ought not to act without further inquiry. If, on the contrary, they voted for the Previous Question they would be supporting the Government in its view that the matter was quite ripe for settlement. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Previous Question.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had waited with some anxiety to learn in what manner Her Majesty's Government intended to meet the Motion which had been brought forward in so comprehensive and able a manner by his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes). After listening to the long speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, he confessed he was in nearly as much difficulty with regard to the intention of the Government as he had been before the right hon. Gentleman spoke. In some respects this had been a really remarkable debate. Many speeches had been delivered, all of them, with a single exception, in support of the Motion. The exception was the brief speech of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Chadwick), who said one thing only—namely, that he did not like the statistics of Mr. Dudley Baxter. Next came the speech of the President of the Poor Law Board. When the right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon had achieved a great triumph, that he had gained his object, and that the Government were going to support his views and his proposal. The right hon. Gentleman began by declaring that he was a rival of the hon. Baronet, but, inconsistently enough, concluded by saying that if the proposal were carried out, a severe blow would be struck at the whole local administration of England. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had already made inquiry into the subject, and that on an early day he intended to bring forward a Bill embodying the results of his inquiries. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman had gone a little further, he (Sir John Pakington) should have felt disposed to counsel his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon to rest content with what seemed to be a great triumph. But the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to speak in a very different strain, dwelling at great length on the Poor Law, which, though doubtless important, formed a part only of this subject. He was very sorry to find that the right hon. Gentleman went on to revive the old bygone differences between town and country, which he (Sir John Pakington) had hoped had been buried for ever. In the whole course of his speech, however, the right hon. Gentleman had given no distinct answer to the one simple proposition involved in the Resolution—namely—

The Government ought to express a distinct opinion on that point. From the speech just delivered he could not extract any disavowal or disapprobation of this proposition by the right hon. Gentleman. The real question at issue was whether it was just and fair that £17,000,000 or £20,000,000 should be levied exclusively on one class of property. As his hon. Friend the Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) had remarked, this question had taken a fast hold on the public mind. It was not a party question, and he might remind the House that on that very evening he had presented a Petition in favour of the Motion from the quarter sessions of the county of Worcester, the adoption of which Petition had been moved by a Conservative and seconded by a Whig. This question could not be lightly disposed of, for there was in the country a deep sense of injustice based on the feeling that taxation was unfairly and unequally distributed. The statement of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon was that the income of England was from £650,000,000 to £700,000,000 per annum, and that the greater amount of local taxation fell upon £100,000,000 only. Were the Government disposed to dispute that proposition? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) shook his head; but why did he not deny the proposition? [Mr. Goschen: I did.] He did not disprove it. He (Sir John Pakington) was now dealing with round sums, and not going into small fractions; but he believed that, if accurately stated, the amount was £118,000,000. He did not know whether that was what the right hon. Gentleman relied upon. But while the income tax was derived from £300,000,000, the immense amount of local taxation was derived from about £100,000,000. [Mr. Goschen explained that he said that a great portion of local taxation was not upon real property at all, but was paid by the occupiers.] He was sure the hon. Baronet would not be diverted from the object he had in view by such an equivocation. He did not mean to use the phrase offensively. Of course, burdens did fall in part upon the owner and in part upon the occupier, but he believed they fell much more largely upon the owner. There was, however, no real distinction in interest between the owner and the occupier. The ground of complaint was this—that this mass of taxation did fall upon one particular class of property, which was known by the name of real property. The hon. Baronet rather understated his own case than overstated it in regard to the repayments by the Government for the police, and also for the maintenance of prisoners, for the Government did not maintain prisoners who were awaiting trial. What made it urgent that the question should be approached with a view to a settlement was that this local taxation was rapidly increasing, and that additional burdens were being imposed year by year. Lately all over England the maintenance of the turnpike roads had been thrown upon the ratepayers. In the county with which he was connected he did not exaggerate the amount of that tax when he stated that it would add some 5*d.* or 6*d.* in the pound to the local burdens already borne. The education measure of the Government of last year, to which he did not object, would be another addition to local burdens. But was the education of the people one of mere local advantage? No; it affected the whole welfare of the country, and was a burden which ought to be borne by the whole of the country. Again, the Secretary of State for War was going to propose that the ratepayers should, in the first instance, bear extra expenses in regard to the Militia; but when the amount would be repaid it was impossible to say. What was the practical result of this state of things? Why, a feeling of great dissatisfaction, which was increasing throughout the country. The point raised by the hon. Baronet was that this system of local taxation constituted a great burden on the poor. The poor were suffering from these burdens. The increasing amount paid from year to year by the landed interest practically exercised a prejudicial effect on improvements in agriculture, and prevented those investments of capital which would otherwise take place. He would remind the House that the increase in the value of land during the last 30 years had not been in proportion to the increase of the burdens thrown upon it, for the county rates had increased from £850,000 to £2,500,000 to £3,000,000. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Poor Law Board could show that real property was bearing less than its fair share of taxation, he for one would be willing to reduce the balance. He should be glad of a decision by the House as to whether they did or did not recognize the principle involved in the Motion—which he trusted the hon. Baronet would press to a Division.

MR. RATHBONE said, he rose to protest against a dangerous fallacy evidently entertained by present, past, and future Chancellors of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had said that he had known many countries in danger from increasing Imperial taxation, but he had never known any country in danger from increasing local taxation. But could any country have been in greater danger, both physical and pecuniary, than this country was previous to the passing of the new Poor Law? Were we not then in danger of seeing the whole income of the land swallowed up by the increase and mismanagement of local taxation? And was there not, even now, a great danger from the increase and mismanagement of our local taxation? On the other side of the Atlantic the same danger was to be found. Twenty years ago, in New York, the taxation was dangerous, being equal to five-eighths per cent, not of the income, but of the capital of the city; and not only the real property, but every kind of capital subject to income and property tax; and that taxation had now risen to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the capital. It was not necessary that we should have recourse to the Consolidated Fund, in order to meet the inequalities which existed in taxation. It would be possible for any able financier to find a way in which all property in this country might fairly bear its share of the burden. Indeed, he would go further and say that if it were judiciously managed not by taking a certain proportion of every expenditure, however profuse, but by taking definite sums contingent on good management, an arrangement might be made which would relieve the present burdens, and at the same time lessen the wasteful expenditure which was now going on. He hoped, from one part of the speech of his right hon. Friend, that he was about to give them such a measure as would practically remedy the inequalities which had been pointed out in our local taxation. He hoped he was not wrong in interpreting his speech; and he was sure no one would have more reason to rejoice than his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), who had done so much to bring about this reform.

MR. G. BENTINCK: I should not trouble the House with any remarks on this question, but having been in direct communication with my own constituents more recently perhaps than any other hon. Member in this House, I feel it my duty not to let the question pass without making one or two observations upon it. There was one remark which fell from the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) which bears on the view I take of the question. He deprecated any further allusion to the comparative interests of town and country. Now, I am not surprised at that, and probably his view on that point arose from some slight twinge of conscience called up by a recollection of what passed on that (the Ministerial) Bench at the end of the year 1852. But if he imagines that the proceedings of the Government then in power—and which was more especially supposed to protect the interests of the rural districts, are now forgotten, all I can say is that he is very much mistaken. I have to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board on his very remarkable announcement as to the extraordinary amount of renovated energy exhibited by the Government on this occasion. He has said that the Government prefer to act rather than to speak, and to trust to their own measures rather than to the action of a Committee. I confess that when I heard those words I was astounded. It seems so marvellous a change to be brought about in the minds of so many distinguished men in the short space of 24 hours, that it is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of Parliament. I will not follow my hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) through any of the figures of his most admirable speech; but I may say that during the time I was down in my own county this question was almost the only subject I heard discussed there. The minds of all men seemed to be drawn almost exclusively to this subject; but they always asked one question. They are aware of the existence of the evil; but as sensible men they want to trace out the cause, and they ask—"How comes it that year after year there has been an additional pressure of taxation on the rural districts of the country?" That fact is indisputable, and it is also indisputable that those districts are under-represented in Parliament, and that, I suppose, is an obvious reason for their being over-taxed. But these agricultural gentlemen go still further, and they say—"Not only are we deserted by both Government and Opposition when any measure is brought forward affecting our interests, but we never see the phalanx of Members representing the rural districts banded together to fight our battle. We read that they go out into the Lobbies, as Liberals or Conservatives, if anybody is able to explain the meaning of those terms; but we never read of their advocating the interests of the rural districts." When I heard this my mind reverted to many Friends in this House, for whom I have the greatest possible regard; but I confess with pain that I could not say much in their defence, and I can only express the hope that for the future, instead of following the Whips on either side into the Lobby, without having any intelligible principle or policy to guide them, they will be found advocating the interests of those who sent them to this House. I believe that if the intelligence were to reach the rural districts to-morrow that from some unforeseen cause the present Government had been removed from Office, and by no human possibility could ever return to it again, and that, on the other hand, there was some insuperable objection to their places being taken by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House above the Gangway, I really believe that information would be received with satisfaction. In this discordant state of things it becomes more incumbent on the representatives of the rural districts to stick together and fight the battle of their constituents. What is the result of those unfortunate combats which take place for the retention or obtaining of that (the Ministerial) Bench? I will not go so far as to say that there is no confidence left in either party; but the result of recent legislation has been to place the real government in the hands of Gentlemen opposite sitting below the Gangway. They are the real Government of the country. I see the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) shakes his head in denial; but in spite of his extreme modesty—being one of the most prominent and eminent and able Members in that quarter of the House—I submit to him that he holds a very high position indeed. Now, has any measure been brought forward for many years past emanating from that quarter of the House which has not been carried? And how have they been carried? They have been extracted with some little difficulty, though not a great deal, from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) was in Office, they were got from him without any trouble at all. Knowing, then, the seat of power in this House, I was glad to hear that the hon. Member for Brighton agreed with me on one or two points in reference to this question. He said pauperism was increased by improper incidence of taxation. I agree in that, and I believe that a complete revision of our system of taxation would tend to decrease pauperism. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Poor Law Board seems to have had a preconceived idea that we could not deal with this subject without touching the Consolidated Fund. I do not think there is any occasion for that; and when the proper time comes I shall be able to show the right hon. Gentleman many descriptions of property which at present pay no taxes. A comparison of the cost of the transfer of money and of land from one hand to another will suggest an inquiry as to why the percentage is so much higher in the one case than in the other, and will show that we can easily find an immense amount of untaxed property in this country, and a means of reducing the taxation on every other description of property.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid, Sir, that I am not able to sustain the lofty flight of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in the very entertaining speech he has just delivered. And after the able argument of my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Goschen) I do not intend to enter into the subject of the Motion of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes); but I wish to explain, in a very few words, and as exactly as I can, the reason for the course which the Government has taken with regard to it. My right hon. Friend stated, in one portion of his speech, that he felt himself to be a competitor of the hon. Baronet; and he has been taken to task for that expression, and charged with inconsistency for using such language and yet not acceding to the Motion. But my right hon. Friend is a competitor of the hon. Baronet in respect to the objects which he has in view. He dissents and differs from him in respect to the Motion that he proposes, and the means of attaining them, and there is a perfect consistency between these two propositions. Let us look at the Motion as it is actually framed, for it is very important. It contains the following series of propositions:—

“That, inasmuch as many of the existing and contemplated charges on the Local Rates are for National purposes, and that it is neither just nor politic that such charges should be levied exclusively from one description of property (viz. houses and land), this House is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to inquire forthwith into the incidence of Imperial as well as Local Taxation, and take such steps as shall ensure that every description of property shall equitably contribute to all National burdens.”

The last of those propositions is entirely true. It is our duty to “take such steps as shall ensure that every description of property shall equitably contribute to all National burdens” as far as our human infirmity and incapacity will admit. But although that is true, it is a truism, and does not contain any of the salt or pith of the hon. Baronet’s Motion, and I think the hon. Baronet would be little anxious to procure the acceptance of that truism by the House and to abandon the rest of his Resolution. It is impossible for us to accede to the other propositions it embraces, and for these simple reasons—They are propositions of an abstract nature, which it would be useless and inconvenient for the House to affirm, because they might form the subject of dispute, even although we might be agreed as to the practical mode of dealing with the matter to which they relate. Why are we to be called on to assert that many of the existing charges on the local rates are for national purposes? That raises a very large subject of debate, on which we might employ ourselves very unprofitably for a great length of time. The hon. Baronet, ably as he has argued it, has failed to make out his case; but, at the same time, why is it necessary for us to be entangled in discussions upon such propositions, when it may be that we are agreed on the practical mode of dealing with the question? Then the hon. Baronet says that these rates are levied exclusively from one description of property; and, with very scant courtesy, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) treated as an equivocation the mode of referring to that point adopted by my right hon. Friend—a licence of language, as I think, scarcely within the limits of courtesy. But whether it be equivocation in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman I know not, and—it may be owing to our inferior intelligence on this side of the House—I must own it appears to me that the proposition of my right hon. Friend is a broad and substantive one, and I should be prepared, with my very unequal means, to enter at the proper time into controversy upon it with the right hon. Gentleman. I deny that, for the purpose of this argument, houses and land are one description of property. And why? Because of the division of the rate between the owner and the occupier. When you are dealing with land in the rural districts, that division is of very little consequence, because you may say, and truly say, that both the owner and the occupier belong to the same class, and have the same interest, and as a portion of the rate falls on the owner and another on the occupier, both portions are laid on the same description of property. But when you come into the towns, the division of the rate between the owner and the occupier has a very different effect, and the separation between houses and land is most marked. There it is ridiculous to speak of all occupiers, who belong to every class, who have every description of property, and who pay out of every description of property, although they may pay in respect of their houses, as being in the same category as the owners of land in reference to this question. It is not a matter of equivocation, but clear and undoubted fact, that the occupiers in town, so far as the rate falls upon them, as it mainly does, do not pay in respect of land or real property at all, and that circumstance wholly destroys the justice of the proposition that houses and land are to be regarded as one description of property. We cannot, therefore agree to commit ourselves to that assertion. But the hon. Baronet says it is not just that such charges should be so levied. Why commit us to that proposition? It depends upon another complicated investigation. Assuming it to be true, for the moment, that in the rural districts these taxes are levied from one description of property, before you venture to assert that it is not just that they should be so levied, you must investigate the question whether they receive a compensation in many remarkable or important remissions and exemptions in respect of Imperial taxation. I am not now asking the hon. Baronet to concur in our way of looking at these propositions; but why should he ask us to commit ourselves in the mass to these very disputable opinions, which, after all, do not practically determine the case, and must still leave it an open question for us to say in what manner we will approach this subject of local taxation, which we, as well as he, admit to be a question presenting grievances and anomalies requiring legislative remedy. Then he goes on to say that it is the duty of the Government to inquire forthwith into the incidence of Imperial, as well as local, taxation. I must own it was with some surprise that I found that the hon. Baronet concluded by making a Motion which has this for what I may call its main proposition, in the same speech in which he found fault with the Government for postponing, and by postponement evading practical proceedings in regard to local taxation. What is the position of the Government? We have endeavoured to avoid going to issue with the hon. Baronet, and, therefore, have been content with moving the Previous Question. But still we are at issue with the hon. Baronet, because it appears that he intends to divide the House; and the right hon. Member for Droitwich, rising from the front Bench opposite—as to which the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) has given us some interesting information—says he cannot recommend the hon. Baronet to withdraw his Motion. How, then, do we stand? In the Speech from the Throne we announced that we had a measure prepared on the subject of local taxation. The hon. Member for West Norfolk very properly pointed to the measure as one upon which issue might be joined. If we can agree on that measure we can go forward to legislation; if we differ we shall at least know on what we differ; and it is our purpose to submit that measure to the House on the earliest day that the state of Public Business will permit, in conformity with our rule of introducing our measures on the earliest day that we can present them with a fair prospect of carrying them on to their ulterior stage. That is our case. And what is the case of the hon. Baronet? It is that it is our duty to inquire forthwith into the incidence of Imperial and of local taxation. His proposal, therefore, is not a progressive, but a retrograde one. He does not even point to a Committee of this House. He takes us back to the very threshold of the question. He will not allow us even to introduce the measure which we have announced in the Speech from the Throne. I do not say whether or not it is in accordance with Parliamentary usage so to treat the intention of the Government announced in that form; but the hon. Baronet, the friend of the rural interests and the enemy of the abuses of local taxation, thinks that it is the duty of the Government not to act, but to inquire. Under these circumstances we require very little apology for saying that we are more faithful to the spirit of the engagement into which we have entered than the hon. Baronet wishes us to be. We engaged to examine carefully into the question, and, as a Government, to make our proposals when they were ripe for presentation to the House. Those proposals are now ripe, and we desire to lay them before the House, and we cannot accept the great boon which the Baronet has offered us by receding from the position that we have attained, and by again proceeding from the beginning and entering upon an inquiry that would be perfectly vague and undefined—a matter that lies in the future, whereas our inquiries lie in the past, not the future, and we are now prepared to act.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that the Select Committee on Business of the House consist of 21 Members.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on the Business of the House do consist of Twenty-one Members."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. J. LOWTHER moved the adjournment of the debate on the ground of the lateness of the hour.

MR. GLADSTONE hoped the House would proceed at once with the business of appointing the Committee.

MR. G. BENTINCK observed that yesterday evening, while there was no Amendment on the Paper, the right hon. Gentleman stated he would not proceed with his Motion after 12 o'clock; but now, after Notice had been given of an Amendment to be proposed, he wished to go on with his proposal after that hour.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. James Lowther,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DISRAELI and The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, agreed to.

On Motion, "That Sir GEORGE GREY be one other Member of the said Committee,"

MR. HORSMAN asked what was the principle on which the selection of the Committee proceeded? He had always understood that a Committee should be of a judicial character, and should be a fair representation of the various parties in the House. Of the 21 Members of the Committee, 13 either were now or had been in Office. As regarded the Conservative side, half the Members were chosen from below the Gangway; while on the Liberal side all the 11 Members sat behind the Treasury Bench, and not one below the Gangway. He protested that this was not a proper mode of dealing with the question.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that Ireland was not properly represented. There was not a single Irish Member on the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was taken by surprise by the right hon. Gentleman insisting on proceeding at that hour. Many hon. Members had left the House on the ground of the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman, in distinct language, as to what would be considered a reasonable hour. The Government had found occasion more than once to reconsider their determination, and he must insist that this was a matter which ought not now to be proceeded with.

MR. WHITE pointed out that there was not the name of any metropolitan Member on the Committee.

MR. MELLY protested against the attempt to draw a distinction between Members who sat above and those who sat below the Gangway. It was assumed that the former were supporters of the Government. That was not strictly correct. The reason why he did not sit below the Gangway was that there was no room there.

MR. GLADSTONE hoped that the hon. Member (Mr. J. Lowther) would not persevere in his opposition. What he had said as to bringing on this business was that he would not bring it on at an inconvenient hour. In this instance the business was simply the selection of hon. Gentlemen to form a Select Committee—a very simple business. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Horsman) had been less than fair as respected the composition of the Committee, for the Government had endeavoured to do the best they could with the very limited choice at their disposal. The ancient practice of the House with respect to the representation of the majority and minority of the House was to select 11 Members from the majority and 10 from the minority; but it could not be expected that the proportion should be the same when there was so great a disproportion of Members on either side. Putting aside the official Members, practically the Government had the selection of nine names only, while the Opposition had their ten. If it was an objection to the selection of the Committee that there was no Member from Ireland upon it, the same objection applied to the omission of any Member from Scotland, or of the metropolis.

MR. HORSMAN explained that when he spoke of the official element on the Committee he referred to Members who had been in office from 10 to 20 years, his contention being that the tendency of that element was to curtail the opportunities for debate.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would withdraw his Motion.

*Then Sir GEORGE GREY, agreed to.

Other Members of the Committee agreed to.

CITATION AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL—[BILL 1.]—SECOND READING.

(Mr. Anderson, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Miller, Mr. Armitstead.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ANDERSON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to remedy a grievance arising from the present mode of serving summonses in proceedings in civil actions in Scotland. By the Act of the Scottish Parliament of 1540, entitled "The order of summoning of all persons in civil actions," it was enacted that if the officer gave six knocks on the door of the party cited, and failed to obtain entrance, and then affixed the summons to the gate or door, that was a lawful and sufficient citation. The service was often executed by putting the summons into the keyhole — which was termed a "lock-hole citation" — obviously a mode by which many accidents rendered it very probable that the summons would never reach the person for whom it was intended: indeed, it had become a very common practice in such cases so to arrange matters that there should be somebody not far off at the time who would take the summons out of the keyhole soon after it was put there; so that there was, in reality, no service at all, and the party was sometimes arrested, or had his goods seized, before he knew anything at all of the matter. The Bill abolished this mode of citation, with one exception, which arose out of the necessity of the case. Where the summons or citation was a summons of removal from any house or premises, and the person to be cited could not be found, or refused admission to his place of dwelling, so that he could not be served, a copy of the summons might be affixed to some conspicuous part of the premises from which removal was sought, and an intimation of such affixing was to be sent to the defender's last known place of residence. The abuse of the process was chiefly experienced in respect of the citations issued by the Small Debts Courts. The decrees of these Small Debts Courts were final and without appeal; but, if the decree was given in the absence of the defender, the law provided a process of re-hearing. Unfortunately, however, the re-hearing depended upon such conditions as often rendered it practically impossible to the defender. In the Small Debts Courts of the justices of the peace, before the defender could get a re-hearing, he must consign the whole amount claimed by the pursuer — a thing which a poor man was frequently unable to do. A decree, therefore, even when given in absence, was almost always practically final. A great deal of injustice was thus often inflicted. The class which was affected by this process was a very numerous one, as was shown by the fact that in the Small Debts Courts of the city of Glasgow in one year there were about 40,000 small debt litigations. Another object of the Bill was to provide against the fraudulent concealment of persons in order to avoid citations in bankruptcy, or to allow a period of prescription to be completed. In that case the Court might order the summons to be advertized in one or more of the local newspapers, and an intimation thereof to be sent to the defender's last known place of address, which should constitute a legal and valid citation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Anderson.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the measure dealt with a very technical legal matter; but as on the back of it there appeared the name not only of the last speaker, but that of the right hon. and learned Member for Glasgow University (Mr. Gordon), he presumed its provisions had received his consideration and approval as a lawyer. He would not therefore oppose its second reading, although he wished to guard himself against being supposed to admit the expediency or the necessity of its provisions. He was not aware of the existence of the great evils mentioned in the Preamble as attending citation. Several of the clauses appeared to him at present to be wholly unnecessary, while others, as they now stood, would require careful consideration in Committee.

MR. GORDON said, a document would be laid on the Table of the House in a few days which would show that certain recommendations, pointing in the direction taken by this Bill, had been made by a Commission with reference to key-hole citation—a practice which had given rise to great injustice, especially taken in connection with the rule of the Justices of the Peace Court, denying the defendant a re-hearing unless he consigned the very sum which might have been wrongfully charged against him. He was not very cognizant of the peculiar forms that prevailed in regard to those small matters of citation in the inferior Courts; but the details of the Bill could, if necessary, be adjusted in Committee; and he had no doubt whatever that its principle ought to be sanctioned by the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 28th March.

BURIALS BILL—[Bill 7.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Hadfield, Mr. M^r Arthur.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the House would recollect that last Session he introduced a Bill on this subject early in February. It came on for the second reading on the 23rd of March, and was carried, after a long discussion, by a large majority. A Motion was afterwards made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for referring it to a Select Committee—a mode of proceeding to which he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) objected, thinking that if the Bill was once shunted to a Parliamentary siding, there would be great difficulty in getting back again on to the main line, so as to be able to pass it through the House that year. His opposition was, however, overborne, and the Bill was referred to a Select Committee. The Bill came back from the Committee on the 10th of May, and he was bound to confess that it came back a much better Bill than it went in. He had to thank hon. Members for the great pains they had taken in investigating the subject. The principal alterations made were due to a compromise which had been made. The compromise was far from one-sided; but it was not satisfactory to certain hon. Members. When the Bill was returned from the Committee it was re-committed; but, owing either to the greater interest of other subjects, or because this subject was in itself uninviting, its progress was rather remarkable; it was down on the Order Book 13 times; it was actually reached three times; the House divided on it five times; but with all that labour they only got through six lines and a half of the measure. One evening, though it was called on at the comparatively early hour of 11, an hon. Member, whose liveliness sometimes increased as the night advanced, was somehow seized with such an uncontrollable desire to go to bed that he moved to report Progress three or four different times, and considerable delay was the consequence. This treatment he protested against. Such tactics, though they might retard, could never ultimately prevent the passing of a just measure, neither did they redound greatly to the credit of those who resorted to them: he was glad, therefore, that this year the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot), with a courage more in unison with his profession and antecedents, had come forward to meet the Bill with a direct negative, instead of seeking to get rid of it by the slow and ignoble process of the effluxion of time. A Member who introduced a measure of this kind was bound to do two things. First, he was bound to show that the state of the law which he sought to alter involved a grievance demanding a remedy; and secondly, that the legislation he proposed would remove it. By the common law of England, every parishioner, whatever his religious opinions might be, was entitled to interment in the parish churchyard. But then the canon law stepped in and prohibited the use of any religious service at such interment in three cases—namely, in the cases of suicides, those of excommunicated persons, and those of unbaptized persons, whether the omission of the rite of baptism had arisen from accident, as through the sudden death of an infant, or from the conscientious scruples of the parson himself, or of his friends, or from any other cause. If the rite of baptism had been performed, whether by a clergyman of the Established Church, by a Dissenting minister, or by a layman, or even by a woman, the clergyman of the parish was compelled to read over the body of the deceased—whatever might have been his antecedents, his mode of life, his religious opinions, or the wishes of his surviving friends—the burial service of the Church of England—a service which, eminently beautiful as it was, was in many cases altogether inapplicable and unsuitable. They might, for instance, have the anomaly of a clergyman devoting the soul of an heretical sinner to eternal punishment on the first day of the week, and on any seventh committing his body to the grave “in the sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life.” Again, a Dissenting minister was in no case allowed to officiate in a parish churchyard. So that if a Dissenter died in a rural parish the minister who had instructed him in life, soothed his dying moments, and, it might be, consoled his sorrowing relatives, was stopped at the churchyard and not allowed to enter, except in the capacity of a private mourner. One might have thought that every humane man, whatever his own religious opinions, would be only too anxious that poor people in those supremely trying circumstances should have the benefit of such religious consolation as really went home to their hearts, and not be expected to submit to a service which, however excellent in itself, became a hollow mockery when addressed to unwilling ears. The scenes to which that state of the law had led were disgraceful not only to any Christian, but to any civilized country. Last year he had referred to a number of instances in which scandals of that kind had occurred. When he moved the second reading of the Bill of last year he referred to a number of such cases, and more than a dozen had occurred since. He had referred for instance, to the case of the Rev. Mr. Henniker, who rather than read the service over the body of a Dissenter who had been baptized by a Dissenter, actually kept the body unburied for 14 days in the church. The rev. gentleman entirely set at nought his Bishop's exhortatory letter; and the body was at last buried, without his assent, by the curate, who, Mr. Henniker, having locked himself up in the church with the vestments, had to perform the service without his surplice. Many other cases of hardship and indignity were inflicted on Dissenters under the existing law, but few worse than the one in which a clergyman who, finding at the commencement of a funeral ceremony that one coffin contained the bodies of two infants, one of which had and the other had not been baptized, caused the coffin to be opened and the unbaptized child removed from it, and had it thrown like a dead dog into the grave, while he read the service over the body of the other. Last year, when he stated these cases, he gave the fullest particulars in order that his statements might be tested; but, though a perfect torrent of ecclesiastical invective had been poured out upon his head, no attempt had been made to disprove the narrative of facts he laid before the House. He would, upon this occasion, add only one case out of many. At Swilland, a small village near Ipswich, an old man, a Dissenter, of most exemplary life, died; his relatives proposed to bury his corpse in the parish churchyard; but the rector intimated that he considered himself bound in law—the deceased not having been baptized, not to admit the corpse into the church. Under these circumstances, the relatives engaged an eminent Nonconformist minister to perform the last rites to the deceased. This was thus done—the corpse was carried into the churchyard, followed by the family, while the services were performed by the minister standing with his congregation just outside the churchyard hedge. But it was against the law, not against the clergy, that he complained. In Ireland, where such a provision was not nearly so necessary as in England—indeed, before that law was introduced a clergyman in Ireland was at liberty, if he chose, to allow a Roman Catholic priest or a Dissenting minister to officiate in his parish churchyard—a law analogous to that which he wished to see enacted was in force. He wanted to see the law equalized in the whole of the three kingdoms. In Wales, particularly, the present law weighed with peculiar severity, because not only were the majority of the people Dissenters, but they lived in rural parishes, where they had not the advantage of cemeteries containing ground both consecrated and unconsecrated. In the Principality, therefore, this Bill was most urgently wanted. The Bill by which he proposed to remedy these evils was in many respects similar to the one of last year, the points of dissimilarity occurring in places where points had been conceded to the opponents of the measure introduced last Session. The first four sections of the Bill were nearly the same as those in the original Bill. The 1st section provided that any person or persons having the charge of or being responsible for the burial of a deceased person may give notice in writing, to the incumbent or officiating minister of the ecclesiastical district, of the intention that a burial shall take place in the churchyard without the rites of the Established Church, and either with or without any other religious service. Then it was provided that the time proposed for the burial must be stated in the notice, and to be subject to variation within a limited time; and the next section directed that, if no such variation took place, the burial should take place in accordance with the original notice. Then came that most important provision in the 4th clause—

“That no person shall officiate at any such religious service who is not a minister or member of some religious body having a registered place for public worship.”

That was new. Next, it was provided that all services were to be conducted decently and solemnly, and that all services were to be religious. The accustomed burial fees were reserved to the incumbent, so that no question could possibly arise as to the Bill depriving the incumbents of any pecuniary payment to which they were entitled. The 8th section merely referred to registration. From the 9th to the end the Bill was entirely new. The 9th section provided that graveyards, wholly or in part unconsecrated, might be provided in any parish by private benefaction, with the approval of the Secretary of State. The 12th section was the material one in the new Bill, and it contained the exceptions. It excepted from the operation of the Act these cases—First of all, cemeteries containing consecrated and unconsecrated ground, established or provided in any parish under any Acts for providing public cemeteries; secondly, any churchyard or graveyard in any parish or district for which such cemeteries had been provided; thirdly—and he thought this was a clause of very wide operation—any churchyard provided entirely by private benefaction within a period of 50 years before the passing of the Bill, and attached to a church erected in a parish or district formed within the same period, whenever the donor or donors, or their representatives, should signify in writing to the Secretary of State a desire that such churchyard should be exempted from the operation of the Act. The fourth exception applied to the churchyard of any parish in which a graveyard had been provided in the manner previously mentioned in the Bill; the fifth to the consecrated portion of any graveyard provided under this Act; and the sixth to any burial ground given after the passing of the Act for the express purpose of having burial service performed therein according to the rite of any religious community. Hon. Members would see at once that this was a very different Bill from that which was considered last year. He did not say that it was a perfect Bill; but he did think it was an honest attempt to settle a vexed question in a fair manner. He would now turn to the objections which had been made against the Bill. The first was the old argument about vested interests. He was told that he was interfering with the freehold of the pastor; that the fee simple of the church belonged to the pastor. People spoke of the churchyard as if it belonged to the pastor in the same sense in which his living, or his parsonage, or his bed belonged to him; as if it was a sort of thing over which he had a right of personal occupation, and which he had a right to enjoy by himself, and for himself, to the exclusion of every other person. The answer to that objection was obvious. It was true that, as the law required the fee simple to be vested in somebody, it was vested in the parson, certainly not for his own benefit, but as a trustee for his parishioners. That constituted the difference between parish churchyards—which were national property—and churchyards belonging to private chapels. That being a public trust, of course, the Legislature could deal with it as it liked. But, coupled with this dry legal estate, the clergyman possessed the barren—he had almost said the odious—privilege of asserting a right over a man's dead body, which he could not assert over his living soul. He did think that was a privilege which every right-minded man would be only too glad to be relieved from. The second argument against the Bill was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. S. Walpole), and he trusted that the alterations which had been made in the Bill would have removed some of his objections. His argument was this—that if the Bill, as it stood, passed into law, you would have not only ordinary Dissenters, but Spiritualists, Materialists, Secularists, Shakers, Jumpers, and Mormons—persons of all sects and kinds coming into the churchyard and desecrating it, without there being any power to deal with them. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) did not think that was so. It was certainly not so as the Bill now stood, because the 6th section expressly provided that the service should be a religious service. But he thought he was entitled to put the question on a higher ground, to make a demand of hon. Members opposite. A similar law to this had been in operation in Ireland for a great many years. He had given a great many instances in which the present law had led in this country to scenes of the most discreditable kind. Let hon. Gentlemen opposite point out one instance in which their fears had been realized in Ireland, and then he would argue the point with them; but until they did that, he thought he had a right to say he would not enter into a mere hypothetical controversy, or combat shadows which were the creatures of their imagination. The third objection, which was most strongly pressed last year, was that, by this Bill, he was trying to get in the thin end of the wedge. He was told that, in attacking the churchyard, he was really attacking the Church; and that this Bill was nothing more nor less than a Bill for the disestablishment and disendowment of the English Church, under the thin cover of a measure to amend the burial laws. His hon. Friend the Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) put this objection graphically and pathetically. He said—"Suppose this Bill were to pass, and suppose that a funeral were to take place under it, and suppose it were to rain, and suppose the people following in the procession took shelter in the doorway of the church. Then if the parson did not wish to be a churlish fellow, Dissenters would then be admitted into the church, and if they were once admitted, neither Queen, Lords, nor Commons would ever get them out again." Those were not the actual words of the hon. Member; but that was the substance of his argument. His answer was, that if Dissenters got into the church, they would not get there by the operation of this Bill. They would get there by the act of the parson, who would not be bound to admit them. No doubt there would be a great deal to be said on the question of the disestablishment and disendowment of the English Church when the time came; but, at present, that question was not before the House in any way—and there was nothing more unsatisfactory than to attempt to meet one question by raising another issue. In the meantime, let him tell hon. Members opposite, that he did not think they would make their citadel any stronger by defending an untenable outwork. Indeed, he believed the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) was right when, in the admirable speech which he made at the beginning of the Session, he stated his belief that if the House passed the University Tests Bill, and gave the Dissenters a fair Burial Bill, it would remove the strongest grievances which Dissenters had against the Church of England. He would quote an observation which he heard only the other day, as having been made by a gentleman who was a staunch opponent of the Established Church. He was asked whether he approved of his Bill. He was good enough to say that he thought it a just one; but he added—"I hope it will not pass into law." "Why not?" he was asked. "Because," he replied, "if that Bill passes into law, it will cut away one of the strongest grievances which Dissenters have against the Church." No doubt if, on the one side, there was a strong feeling in favour of this measure, there was also a strong feeling against it in certain quarters, and the compact appearance of the Benches opposite at that early hour of the day proved how strong that feeling was. He thought that the opposition to this Bill was another proof how men's minds might be blinded to the interests of justice and humanity by theological animosities; but it could not be denied that theological differences had enough to answer for in this country. They had stood for years in the way of just and useful legislation. For years they had hung like a dead weight on all our efforts to improve the education of the poor. Even now they barred the access of at least half our fellow-citizens to the emoluments and degrees of our Universities. But if there be a spot on earth from which these baneful influences should be expelled, it was that spot around which in every parish were centred our dearest memories of the past, and our most blessed hopes of the future. He had attended funerals of both Churchmen and Dissenters, and seen clergymen of the Church of England and Dissenters walking side by side, agreeing to forget the dogmas that divided them in the hopes which united them. He must say that, from that simple sight, he learnt a lesson of Christian charity which he could not have extracted from the whole of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England put together. It was in that spirit of Christian charity that he asked the House to approach his Bill, and should that Bill pass into law—as he hoped and trusted it would—he was sure that no Member who followed him into the Lobby would ever regret that, by his vote to-day, he had helped to confer on thousands of poor men and women in England and Wales a boon which would be all the more precious because it would be felt at a time when the wounds of sorrow were still fresh, and when, therefore, the consolations of religion were at once most needed and most welcome.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

COLONEL BARTTELOT rose to move an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. His duty seemed to him clear. He believed that the Bill would, if passed into law, be a most mischievous Bill, and instead of bringing peace would bring discontent. It would bring to many now happy parishes a state of things which did not now exist. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had referred to some cases of grievance inflicted by clergymen under the existing law; but it did not follow that therefore the whole of our clergymen were oppressive. It was not because the churchyard was the freehold of the clergyman that he objected to the Bill, but because it was the burial ground of the Church, and the Bill would infringe on the rights and privileges of the congregation. He knew that many of the Dissenting ministers were equally honourable with the clergymen of the Established Church; but were there not also many political Dissenters who would avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill to go to the churchyard for the purpose of creating disturbance? The hon. and learned Gentleman said that if the Bill were passed it would not have any tendency to destroy the Church of England; but if a Dissenting minister were allowed by law to enter a churchyard for the purpose of burying a Dissenter, would he not soon begin to think that he had an equal right to enter the sacred edifice for the purpose of marrying or baptizing a Dissenter? He admitted that when the Bill was last year referred to a Committee he hoped that some compromise might have been proposed; but, in point of fact, it came back virtually the same Bill, in the opinion of all Churchmen, because it still provided for the same method of burial originally proposed, and he still hoped that some compromise might be effected. It had been asked—Would you bury a Dissenter like a dog? No. Let Dissenters be decently buried in graveyards of the Established Church, but let the religious service have been first conducted according to the views of the body to which the deceased belonged, and in their own place of worship. If this were done, there would be no cause for the disturbances in churchyards, which would inevitably attend the working of the present Bill. He understood that the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) was about to bring in a Bill to amend the burial laws by providing for the opening of additional graveyards in localities where they were needed (there being no real grievance in the towns)—it was only in some few country parishes that the difficulty arose—and he thought such a Bill would remedy any difficulties having an actual and tangible existence. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. STOPFORD-SACKVILLE, in seconding the Motion, said, he had not heard in the speech of the hon. Member for Denbighshire any argument or any grievance that he had not urged or mentioned on the last occasion, when he brought in a similar Bill, with the exception of a case in Suffolk, when a Dissenting minister had delivered a harangue outside a churchyard, the purport of which was that consecrated was no better than unconsecrated ground. Why, then, were Dissenters so anxious to take possession of the parish churchyards? The real complaint of the authors of this measure was that the canon law did not allow a clergyman to perform the burial service over an unbaptized person; but the Bill, so far as he knew, did not attempt to remedy this so-called grievance. Everyone must regret these perpetual religious controversies, and long for the millennium prophesied by the hon. Member for Bristol on the first night of the Session, and he should have rejoiced if the Bill which came down from the Select Committee of last year had been such as he could support. It was in but few cases that any grievance was likely to arise under the existing law, and they were diminishing year by year, because, in most instances, a burial ground was attached to the Dissenters' chapels, and owing to the gradual filling-up of the old churchyards the number of cemeteries was constantly increasing. It was only in districts where the population was sparse that a difficulty was likely to arise, and, as a rule,

Dissenters were found most numerous among the town populations. It did not seem that there was any very strong sentiment out-of-doors in favour of the measure, seeing that, while there were 289 Petitions against it in the last Session, there were only 78 in its favour. It had been said that at the grave all religious differences ought to be forgotten; but still the feelings of the survivors ought to be consulted; and, to use the language of a right hon. Gentleman the other night, there was no reason why a feeling of charity for the dead should interfere with equity for the living. It had also been asserted that churchyards were national property; but they did not stand on a different footing from the churches. Admission to the churches was the right of every man on the simple condition of the performance of Divine service by a minister of the Church of England. In like manner Dissenters were permitted to be buried in the churchyards on the condition that the service of the Church of England was performed over their bodies by a clergyman of the Church of England. When the payment of church rates was enforced there might have been some foundation for the claim of the Dissenters to equal rights in the churchyard; but since those rates had been abolished the expense of maintaining the fabrics of the churches and the churchyards was thrown entirely upon the members of the Church of England, and the argument in favour of the rights of Dissenters over such places fell to the ground. If this Bill were passed, how would it be possible for the clergyman to exercise the control he at present possessed over the tombstones in the churchyard? At present, as Sir Henry Jenner Fust had laid down, the clergyman had power to prevent the erection of any tombstone in the churchyard on which was placed any inscription contrary to the doctrines of the Established Church; but in the event of this measure becoming law the inconsistency would arise that, while retaining that power, the clergyman would have to stand by while a Dissenting minister preached doctrines utterly irreconcilable with those of the Church of England. It had been said that the system proposed to be established in the Bill had worked well in Ireland; but he (Mr. Stopford-Sackville) protested against the legislation for Ireland being accepted as a precedent for legislation in this country. Many strange things were done for Ireland which no one would ever think of proposing for England. Ireland was a country which few people understood, and he rather thought that even the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) did not thoroughly understand it, or why had he moved for a Select Committee the other evening, to enlighten him as to the state of Westmeath? If Dissenters were to be admitted into the churchyards they ought to stand, in respect of rituals, upon the same footing as the Churchmen, who were bound to use a definite form of words in their burial service. They knew the disadvantages of extempore speaking; even a practised orator, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, had had to apologize for an expression which had dropped from him in a speech in this House on the expenditure of the Duchy of Lancaster; how likely, then, was it that Ministers, in their unprepared service, might use expressions they would afterwards regret. But the Church of England had denominational rights as well as the Non-conformists, and it would be a great blow to those rights were Dissenting ministers to be permitted to perform a service in her churchyards which was inconsistent with her doctrines. Too often, he regretted to say, the churches were closed on weekdays against worshippers; but, at least, in the churchyard Christian mourners might weep and pray. Let them not disturb that sacred seclusion; but, as the extravagance of Ritualism had been suppressed, let them likewise restrain the eccentricities of Nonconformity, and not allow the churchyards to be the scenes of unseemly contention. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) had given notice of his intention to introduce a Bill on the subject of burials, which he hoped might be such as to command the support of that side of the House. For his own part, if there was any doubt as to the right of all parishioners to be buried in their parish churchyard, he was ready to pass a declaratory Act on the subject, as also to relieve the clergyman from the necessity of reading the Church service where the relations of the deceased objected. He would also aid in the establishment of central cemeteries where there was any deficiency of burial grounds in rural districts; but he could not support the measure now before the House, but must take part in the defensive warfare now being waged on behalf of the denominational rights of the Church of England.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

MR. RICHARD: I am sorry the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Barttelot) has felt it his duty to oppose the second reading of this Bill. I do not for one instant call in question the perfectly conscientious motives by which he is prompted to take that course, nor have we any reason to complain of the spirit in which he has discharged what he acknowledges is a painful duty. It appears to me that what we ask for under this measure is not a very large concession to the rights of conscience and the claims of Christian charity. And certainly after what took place during the last Session of Parliament, I did hope that we might have been spared another conflict on this subject. For not only was there a full discussion, conducted with much ability and in an excellent spirit on both sides, which ended in a vote in favour of the Bill of two to one, but it was referred to a Select Committee, on which I had the honour to serve, and by which every line and almost every word was carefully considered. And when I remind the House that among those who represented the opposite side were one of the Members for the University of Oxford (Mr. Mowbray), the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross), the hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), and, above all, the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope), himself a whole host as a defender of the faith—it will be readily understood that the views and the interests of the Church of England were maintained with no want either of ability or tenacity. But while those hon. Gentlemen did, as everyone expected they should, hold their own earnestly and resolutely, I have pleasure in acknowledging, with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), that they met us in the discussion in a kind, candid, conciliatory temper, and with an honest disposition, as it seemed to me, to find a practical solution for the difficulty, and to relieve a grievance which on all hands was acknowledged to exist. I regretted, therefore, when the Bill came back to the House, to see the determination of some Gentlemen opposite, though not the Members of the Committee, to defeat it at any cost. May I be permitted to remind the House once more that there are two classes of persons for whom we seek relief under this Bill? There is one class who are absolutely denied all rights of Christian burial in the parochial churchyards. The House is aware that there is a numerous and highly respectable body of Christians in this country who do not think it right to administer baptism to infants, or to any but such as are of an age to make an intelligent profession of their personal faith. Among the names that adorn the annals of this body, there are some who are held in honour by men of all Churches for their genius and piety, and their devotion to the cause of religious truth—such men as John Bunyan, and Robert Hall, and John Foster the celebrated essayist, and Drs. Carey and Marshman, who had the high distinction of translating the Sacred Scriptures into the language of some 200,000,000 of the inhabitants of India. But when a child of any member of this community dies, if there is no other burial place accessible, they have to take the body to the churchyard, where it must be laid in the ground without any religious service whatever. There are some of the clergy of the Church of England themselves who feel strongly on this part of the subject. But there is another and a much larger class for whom we plead under this measure, including all the Nonconformists of this country, of whatever names, who are forbidden to have their dead buried in the churchyards by their own ministers, and with their own form of religious service. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are apt to say that this is a very small grievance. I dare say to them it is no grievance, because they do not suffer it; but those who wear the shoe must be allowed to judge where, and to what extent, it pinches. But if they were, by a little effort of the imagination, to reverse the case, and to put themselves in our position, I think they would find that it is by no means an insignificant grievance. Let them imagine that, when a near relative of theirs dies, instead of having him buried by their own clergyman—the religious instructor and adviser of them and their family, perhaps their intimate personal friend, who has been with them at every critical moment of their lives, sorrowing with them in their sorrows and sympathizing in their joys; who has bent with them at the death-bed of the departed, administering to him the last consolations of religion, and afterwards mingled his tears with theirs over the coffin—instead, I say, of having the service of such an one, they were obliged to have recourse to some Dissenting minister, who may be an entire stranger to them, or who may be a person whom they cannot respect, and towards whom they may feel strong antipathy. And let them further conceive that the service performed by this individual is not that which they love—the beautiful service appointed for the occasion in their Liturgy, but something else, which, though substantially unexceptionable, is not what they are accustomed to, what they prefer, and what is most in harmony with their own religious views and feelings and tastes. I ask them, if they were compelled to submit to this, would they not feel it to be a serious grievance, from which they would come to us to ask for relief? Well, then, do unto others as ye would they should do unto you. But what are the objections to this measure? Well, the one serious objection I have heard is this—that if Nonconformist ministers were admitted to perform a funeral service in the churchyard, they would take advantage of that right to do or say something that would be offensive to the clergyman or to Churchmen generally. Well, I believe a more chimerical apprehension than that never troubled any man's brain. Do hon. Gentlemen really imagine that when men are gathered around the grave of a deceased friend, when every mind is solemn and every heart is sad, they would seize that moment to launch forth into theological or ecclesiastical controversy, or to indulge in bitter sectarian allusions? Why, they must think Dissenting ministers to be devoid of all decent feeling and of all common sense. They say that sometimes now unbecoming scenes take place in churchyards. No doubt that arises from the existing state of the law. If scenes of agitation and excitement, little in accordance with the decorum and reverence due to the occasion, do now occur, it is because some indiscreet or over-zealous clergyman takes advantage of his position to deal a blow on the yet bleeding wounds of those already smitten by the hand of death, that the indignation of the bystanders is stirred. Let them remove such provocations as these out of the way, and I will answer for it, that funeral services will be performed with all Christian solemnity and decorum. But we are sometimes told, why do not Dissenters provide cemeteries and graveyards of their own. This was put pointedly by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Amendment. Why, said he, should a man who has been baptized at a chapel, and been married at a chapel, and attended religious worship at a chapel all his life, want to be buried in our churchyard? Well, in the first place, it is not your churchyard. It is as much our churchyard as it is yours. On this point I can cite an authority which you yourselves will not gainsay—that of Gibson, a former Bishop of London, and an eminent writer on these questions. He says that by the ancient law of England,

[“Hear, hear!”] Very well; but if every parishioner has and always had, a right to be buried in the churchyard, what entitles you to call it your churchyard? But there is another reason why, very often, Dissenters may wish to be buried in this churchyard—you may call it if you please, a sentimental reason, but it is one that springs from a feeling that is deep in our common human nature, the desire that men have to be buried with their kindred, or in the beautiful language of the oldest and best of books, to be gathered to their fathers. There is, however, another reason why Dissenters do not have cemeteries or graveyards of their own, and that is, because they cannot get them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) said last year that almost all over the country the Dissenters had graveyards attached to their chapels. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that he is mistaken. There are thousands of Nonconformist chapels which have no graveyards, and that because it is impossible to get them. At any rate, I can answer for that part of the country with which I am more immediately connected—the Principality of Wales. The fact of the case was that in Wales the members of the Church of England, for such the landowners are generally—sometimes, no doubt, from the condition on which they hold their own estates, which forbid their alienating any part by sale; but in other cases, I fear, from a mere arbitrary use of the rights of property as owners of the soil—refuse to the Nonconformists a bit of God’s earth in which to bury their own dead with their own rites. They are thus driven to the churchyards, and when they get there you shake your canon law in their faces, and say to them—“You Baptists, if you bring your children to be buried here, you must be content to bury them with the burial of a dog, without one word of Christian faith and hope being uttered over their graves; and you other Nonconformists, if you are to bury your dead here they must be buried by our minister, and with our service, and you shall not be allowed to open your own lips.” Hon. Gentlemen opposite are the best judges of what is most wise and expedient for them to do in the interests of their own Church. But I think, if I were a member of the Church of England, I should try to promote the passing of this Bill with both hands. You must be aware that the tie which binds many millions of the people of this country to your Church is, for various reasons, very much loosened. But there is one tie which nearly all men feel more or less. The staunchest Dissenter, the most inveterate Radical, is not wholly insensible to the halo of veneration and sacredness which gathers around the old churchyard, where and among others their own forefathers. But you are doing all you can to sever that tie. Hon. Gentlemen can hardly be aware how much these exclusive and invidious privileges to which they so tenaciously cling, and the scenes of scandal and outrage to which the rigid enforcement of these privileges lead, tend to alienate and embitter the minds of multitudes as regards their Church. I think, therefore, that not merely for the sake of the rights of conscience which we urge, and the claims of Christian charity which you agree with us ought to be cultivated, but for the interests of your own Church, it would be well for you to let this Bill pass into law.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE congratulated his hon. and learned Friend on the tone in which he had introduced the measure, and the hon. Member who had just sat down, both upon his candid and considerate speech, and upon his having joined the Ritualists in the Church of England, inasmuch as he wore at his button-hole the badge of one of those black-letter saints' days, which had moved the indignation of even so staunch a Churchman as the hon. Member for East Surrey. (The hon. Member wore the emblem of St. David.) While admitting that the Bill was as little objectionable—thanks to the good feeling of the Select Committee of the preceding year—as it could be made upon the basis on which it rested, he should support the Amendment. The basis upon which the whole turned was the admissibility of an alien service into the churchyard. The Bill strove to give this permission with safeguards and limitations; but, as he contended, the former were nugatory and the latter insufficient. Two arguments for the principle of this admissibility had been urged on the other side of the House. The first was the grievance that no religious service could be said by a minister of the Church of England over the grave of an unbaptized person, while the service was said over men who had disgraced their baptism by an ungodly and scandalous life. This argument he would meet with the assertion that whether it were a grievance or not, the Bill in no way reached it; and, on the other hand, that it had been effectively met elsewhere, for—as he was not allowed to state last year—the Royal Commission, which had sat for three years working laboriously at the rubrics of the Prayer Book, had adopted the suggestion that the clergyman might, limited by a certain discretionary power vested in the Bishop, read an abridged and selected service over the grave of an unbaptized person, or of one whose life had occasioned grief to pious and honest people, without his being actually unworthy of some religious service. This suggestion was contained in the fourth Report of the Ritual Commission, of which he had the honour of being a Member; and it would meet the objection, while the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite did not attempt to touch it. When the Church of England refused to read the customary service for the dead over the body of an unbaptized person it only acted consistently with its doctrines and ceremonies, which made the rite of baptism the condition antecedent to participation in the actual office of burial. His hon. and learned Friend had argued that there were special scandals peculiarly inherent in the rigid adherence to these doctrines—scandals committed by hot and wrong-headed Churchmen; but, in using that argument, his hon. and learned Friend resorted to the same short list of instances which he had recited a year before. This iteration, however, did not tend to strengthen his contention now, for the hot dinner of yesterday was apt to become a cold and unpalatable luncheon on the morrow. Besides—as last year, so now—his hon. and learned Friend ignored the possibility of similar heat and wrong-headedness on the part of his Nonconformist protégés. This omission put upon him (Mr. Beresford Hope) the necessity of repeating his instance of last year, and of reminding the House that one rev. gentleman, a Nonconformist, who had the honour of being one of his hon. and learned Friend's constituents had, in that character, shortly after the General Election, expressed from the pulpit the pious wish to turn the head of the other Member for Denbighshire into a football. But he begged his hon. and learned Friend's pardon. One new case had been produced by him during the present year from the county of Suffolk, where a clergyman allowed the service to be performed outside the churchyard by a deputy minister, Mr. Eleazar Jones, and everyone went away happy, an event which furnished so pretty a picture that it read like one of Virgil's eclogues or Shenstone's idylls. His hon. and learned Friend dwelt with serene confidence upon the words of the 5th clause, providing that a religious service should be "conducted in a decent and solemn manner." He took him at his word, and tested the report of Mr. Eleazar Jones's general discourse, as read by himself, in the light of this proviso. He appealed to all who had heard it when he said that it certainly was not conducting the service in a decent, solemn manner for the Rev. Eleazar Jones to attack the distinctive tenets of the Church, close by the churchyard, in any but the tenderest terms; and if, by the Bill, Rev. Eleazar Jones got inside the wall of the churchyard, only ill blood and ill feeling would be engendered by the operation of the measure; for it was not to be supposed that the words which Mr. Eleazar Jones thought decent and solemn on the outside of the gate would in his eyes become indecent and irreverent within the inclosure. It was, he repeated, on the showing of the hon. and learned Member himself, solely due to the moderation of the clergyman of the parish that a riot did not occur on the occasion of Mr. Eleazar Jones delivering, under the pretence of a funeral oration over a deceased Dissenter's body, that bitter denunciation of the Church of England. If we were to have an infinite number of Eleazar Joneses delivering such discourses inside a churchyard, and almost within the church itself, the measure would prove one of the most fruitful of mischief which ever had passed Parliament, for the House must note that there was a safeguard in the case of any clergyman, however intemperate, which did not exist in the case of the Dissenter. A clergyman of the Church of England could not utter over the grave one word which was not in the burial service; but in the case of a Nonconformist minister performing a burial service in a churchyard that safeguard did not exist. He was left to his own unchecked definition of decency and solemnity. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Richard) also dwelt upon the burial service being conducted in a decent and solemn manner; and probably Mr. Eleazar Jones thought he performed the burial service in a decent manner when almost within the walls of one of our churches he vented his Philippic against the Church, under the pretence of making a funeral oration. He (Mr. B. Hope) saw no safeguard in this Bill against any delegate from some free-thinking sect of native or foreign growth delivering an oration over the grave of one of his fellow-members in one of our churchyards. Any of those sects might register a so-called place of worship and appoint a spokesman, and then there would be nothing in the Bill to prevent that person from coming to any churchyard and holding a so-called religious service which would irritate not only the clergyman, but any Dissenting minister of the parish who valued the Gospel. When Hardy died one of his fellow-conspirators delivered what was virtually a political oration over his grave in the cemetery where he was buried; and, under this Bill, similar orations might be delivered in any of our churchyards. He need not refer to the frequency of funeral orations abroad. They had, indeed, become such a drug that the consistent freethinker, St. Beauve, forbade any over his remains. The supporters of this Bill exaggerated the very grievance which they pretended to be desirous of abolishing. He was ready to go to any extent in making the acquisition of land for burial grounds for all kinds of people as easy, as cheap, and as general as possible, whether they were to be denominational or for the whole community. Dissenters had the power of saying their burial service in the house of the deceased, which, he believed, was usual in Scotland. They had the power of carrying the body to any place of worship of their own, where prayers might be said and hymns sung, and such exhortations might be delivered as would comfort and cheer the survivors. Finally he would re-affirm by statute, in the strongest possible language, the common-law right of any parishioner to burial in the parish graveyard irrespective of service. As to the grievance in the form of the Church service, he was the most advanced reformer of all, for he had taken his part in proposing its remedy. After all, there would only remain a fragment of grievance which the supporters of the Bill sought to remove; but this could not be granted without causing scandals much greater than those of which the other side alleged the existence. That grievance was, in fact, the assertion that there was not, in many cases, a cemetery near enough for the burial of Dissenters, where the service of their own denomination might be read. For his part, as he said already, he should be quite ready to support any reasonable proposition for redressing it. Members on his side of the House had been conjured to pass the Bill on the plea that the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) had said that, if this and another measure were passed, there would no longer be any

Mr. Beresford Hope

Dissenters' grievance; but if there was a Member for Bristol there was also a Member for Bradford, and his declarations were very different. Now that men's minds were inflamed and excited by the proclaimed campaign against the Church of England Churchmen could not but look with dread and suspicion at proposals which might be considered comparatively innocent and harmless at a time when public opinion was in a less distempered frame. It was the sight of the serried ranks led by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall)—an army who were pointing their guns against the Church of England, that compelled her adherents to throw up earthworks, and look to her defences. On these grounds he must vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. M'CLURE said, he regretted that the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot) had considered it to be his duty to offer opposition to the passing of this moderate, reasonable, and just measure; as in Ireland they had formerly suffered from similar restrictions, he would venture to say a word or two of their experience there. Many of the clergy of the late Established Church, appointed guardians of the graveyard in times when no other fit and responsible party could be entrusted with its charge, rightly recognizing their position as trustees for the public of the parish burying ground, considered that it was no dereliction of their duty to admit ministers of other denominations attending funerals of deceased members of their communion to perform the service most congenial to the feelings of surviving relatives—that, indeed, frequently was the wish of the deceased expressed upon their dying beds. But some imagined they would better maintain the dignity of their Church, as established by law, by taking a different course; they shut the gates of the churchyard on the funeral procession when accompanied by Nonconformist clergymen; the assembled friends and relatives were obliged to lay the coffin on the roadside, that they might hear their own minister read of the Resurrection and another life, and from his lips a word of exhortation. After that they were permitted to enter the churchyard, and in solemn silence to deposit the remains in their last resting-place. It had sometimes happened that when permission had been asked, and no reply given—possibly in the absence of the rector—as the gates were left open it was believed that no objection would be made; but when the coffin had been lowered into the grave, then an interdict had been served. He had heard, when a Wesleyan minister had been engaged to conduct religious exercises, the rector and curate interfered and insisted upon performing the service, although the relatives not only protested, but left the place until the service was concluded. It might be that those who took this stand thought they were doing good service to the Church, upholding its exclusive claims and right to dictate to others how they should bury their dead; but the true friends of the Church deeply regretted it. At that trying time, when relatives were sorrowing for the loss they had sustained, their feelings were highly sensitive, and when, under deep emotion, they desired to pay all respect and honour to the memory of the deceased, they were wounded and aggrieved by what they felt an act of assumption and intolerance, and an insult to the memory of the departed. He had known a large assembled party—the great proportion of whom had been upholders of that Church as an imagined bulwark of civil and religious liberty—depart from the churchyard with very different feelings from those with which they had approached it. They no longer looked upon that Church as the guardian of religious liberty. They had come to the conclusion that the exclusive rights and privileges claimed for that Church were inconsistent with the true spirit of Protestant liberty and forbearance. The ascendancy of that Church had passed away and was now a matter of history; yet some of those vexatious restrictions remained. He must bear his testimony that he had attended hundreds of funerals in parish churchyards, and elsewhere, where the service had been performed by Nonconformist ministers, and he never heard a single word that could give reasonable offence to any Episcopalians. He had never heard a single complaint of any act or speech unbecoming the occasion, and he believed it to be the fact that not one instance could be found. He trusted that this very moderate measure would be passed by this House. He had no hesitation in saying that right, justice, and true policy demanded that it should become law.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, hon. Members, no doubt, would congratulate themselves that, unlike the hon. Member who had just addressed the House (Mr. M'Clure), they had not had the practical, though painful, experience of having attended hundreds of funerals in the course of their lives; and they might further say that looking to the course of recent Irish legislation in respect to the Church, it was not to Ireland that side of the House was likely to look for any example they should follow in this case. He would remind the House that legislation with regard to this subject stood upon a different footing in England and in Ireland. It had always been the practice, almost from time immemorial, for Roman Catholics and Presbyterians to enjoy the privilege of making use of the parish churchyard in Ireland; and, so late as 1824, an Act was passed to enable the Anglican clergyman to permit the minister of any other Church or congregation to perform the burial service at the grave of one of his own congregation in the parish churchyard. The members of those two Churches in Ireland had been in the habit of performing the funeral service in the house of the deceased, or in the chapels belonging to their persuasion; but when the Act was passed, they began by degrees to conduct their funeral services—sometimes by permission, and at other times without permission—not as they had been accustomed to do, but in the churchyard where the burial took place; and it was in consequence of that change of practice that some of the clergymen in Ireland—whether wisely or not he would not stop to inquire—refused the permission which by the law of 1824 they were permitted to give, and it was in consequence of that refusal that the second Act, to which allusion had been made, was passed. In England the Roman Catholics and Nonconformists had never been in the habit of making use of the churchyard; and if they had been, and had been in the habit of reading the burial service at their homes or in their chapels, there would have been practically no difficulty whatever in removing any grievance supposed to exist—because he believed those who sat on his side of the House were willing that funerals of Dissenters should be performed in the churchyards if those who were connected with them were content to have their services performed either at home or in their chapels. He was a member of the Select Committee of last year, and he was willing to bear his testimony to the care and attention bestowed on the provisions of the Bill, and to the willingness of its supporters to come to a unanimous decision upon them; but there was the most determined resolution that no other services than those of the Church of England should be used in the churchyards of this country. That, he considered, was the principle for which they were now contending. He believed the demand now made to be a blow aimed at the existence of the Established Church, and as such he was there to resist it; and he could not but think that the course pursued by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), who was a member of the Select Committee, had opened the eyes of many hon. Members upon the subject. It was now said that the Baptists and Nonconformists had a grievance so long as the present law existed—that with regard to Baptists they ought to be buried without any inquiry by the clergyman as to their baptism, and to bury the corpse as a matter of course; but with regard to ordinary Dissenters, it was said the Church of England had no right to refuse them burial in the churchyards, because they were not the churchyards belonging exclusively to the Established Church, but to all the people of the country; and that so far from their being the freehold of the clergyman, he was but a mere conduit pipe for conveying the use of the churchyard for the benefit of the parishioners. He admitted that it was the right of every Dissenter to be buried in the churchyard of his parish; but then it should be remembered they must use the churchyards according to the rites of the Church of England, and not according to the peculiar rites of that sect of religion to which the deceased belonged. If he could not trust in all cases to the discretion of the clergy of the Established Church, what was there in the conduct of the ministers of other denominations that they should be prepared to place implicit confidence in them, and that the services should be so performed as that disturbances at funerals would be comparatively few? There were parts of the country, he feared, where, if burials took place in parish churchyards according to the rites of the Roman Catholic religion, they would lead to riots and disturbances; and they must bear in mind if they allowed burials according to the rites of Nonconformists in parish churchyards, they could not exclude Roman Catholics. The Bill went far beyond what was required for the removal of the grievance said to exist, because it not only included the old parish churchyards, but every churchyard that had been consecrated up to this time. No one would venture to deny that the land which had been given for churches in modern times had been given for the purposes of the Church of England alone, and that the members of the Church had the same right to that land as the Nonconformists or Roman Catholics had to the land on which their own places of worship were built. When they spoke of invading the rights of conscience, by keeping those churchyards for the exclusive use of the Church of England, they proposed by this remedy to invade the rights of conscience in a far greater degree by passing this Bill. The same arguments that were advanced in support of this Bill were equally applicable to the performance in our churches of services that were not services of the Church of England. The Bill, in fact, was one further step towards destroying the Church of England, and seizing its property. The remedy proposed was not required. All that was required was that all difficulties to the acquisition of land for burial grounds should be removed. That was, in fact, never a religious but a political grievance, and in proof of that hon. Members had only to turn to those calm and temperate speeches with which Sir Morton Peto always introduced the subject to that House. He should give the Bill his constant opposition so long as it remained in its present shape.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, it was not his intention to oppose the Bill. He believed the Nonconformists had a grievance which, with proper safeguards, might be remedied, and he suggested it would be better that burial yards should be provided, to be paid for and supported by a rate. He denied that the landlords in Wales refused to let Nonconformists have land for religious purposes.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, there were practical grievances and sentimental grievances, and what they had to consider was, whether what was now complained of was a practical or a sentimental grievance. No one was more ready to remove practical grievances than he was, because when relieved it gave satisfaction; but with regard to sentimental grievances, he did not believe it was of the slightest use to pay any attention to them—if you removed one, another instantly sprung up in its place. Now, it seemed to him that this grievance belonged to the sentimental rather than to the practical. If he were asked for a definition, he should say that Joseph thrown into the pit had a real grievance; but the displeasure caused to Haman by the sight of Mordecai was a sentimental grievance: and he asked himself the question, when a grievance was brought before the House, whether it belonged to the Josephean or the Hamanite class. Now, he believed this grievance belonged to the Hamanite class. He had given the best consideration he could to this Bill, and his conclusion was that he could not follow the hon. and learned Gentleman into the Lobby.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, that as a firm and attached member of the Church of England, he considered that Church would act wisely if, instead of fighting about fragments of privileges, they would turn their attention to the best way of consolidating the Church by getting rid of those irritating fragments which did no good, but which only tended to foster and keep up that spirit which he, as a Churchman, was anxious to see allayed.

MR. COLLINS said, that as to the complaint of the delay which had occurred last year in forwarding this Bill through the House, he would recommend the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and all amateur legislators to get their Bills read a second time, and then fix the Committee for a Wednesday, instead of attempting to get into Committee on Tuesdays or Fridays, when there was small chance of its coming on at all; or, that if it did, it would be at some early hour in the morning. He did not like this Bill, and he did not suppose anyone in the House liked it, because compromises were always unsatisfactory; but, although the Bill was bad, it might have been worse. It was an improvement on any other Bill which had been produced to give relief to the sentiments or consciences of Nonconformists, and he believed that in Committee it might be so altered by inserting a compulsory enactment for the provision of alternative graveyards that the Act itself would come into operation in only a few places. Churchmen disliked the Bill and believed that it would lead to excite bitterness of feeling amongst the rural population, and therefore they would be ready to provide alternative graveyards. For this reason, and because he was assured that Nonconformists wished to meet Churchmen fairly in the matter, he would not oppose the second reading.

MR. M'ARTHUR instanced the good effects which had been produced in Ireland by the measure which had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Monsell), and argued that similar happy results might be expected from passing the Bill before the House. He knew an instance of a clergyman of the Established Church having refused to read the burial service over a Nonconformist because he had made a vow never to bury a Dissenter. The consequence was that the friends of the deceased took the body away and buried it in a Dissenting burial ground several miles off.

MR. CAWLEY said, he fully sympathized with the hon. Member (Mr. Richard) in his desire to promote good feeling between Nonconformists and members of the Church of England; but he did not believe that this measure would have that effect. The hon. Member, and others who had preceded him, had brought forward instances of alleged grievances of the Dissenters; but they had confounded abuses of the law with the law itself. He wished to draw attention to the real state of the question. The system introduced in 1852 for providing cemeteries by means of burial boards had proved most successful. There were 333 of those boards in operation in the most populous portion of the kingdom, and he believed that if the powers of the Burials Acts were extended, so that greater facilities were given for providing graveyards under similar circumstances, the present grievance would be got rid of. In the cemeteries formed under those Acts, the ground was divided into consecrated and unconsecrated. The former was appropriated to burials conducted according to the rites of the Church of England, and the latter was used by the Nonconformists. It was his intention to ask leave to bring in a Bill with the object of further extending those powers. He could not understand why Parliament should be asked to apply to one part of the country a principle different from that which was adopted in the rest of the kingdom. The question was not whether the clergyman should be relieved from the obligation to perform the service; but whether a churchyard, in the immediate vicinity of the church, should be open to the performance of any so-called religious ceremony. With regard to the main body of Nonconformists, the more closely Churchmen could be associated with them the better; but it was impossible to frame a clause which, under the term "religious service," should not admit of anything which anybody chose to describe as such. Anybody worshipping a Superior Being was performing a religious service. ["No, no!"] The law recognized as religious services the ceremonies which took place in India; and it was evident that no language which they could employ would exclude any kind of service in this country. As an instance of what might occur, he would mention the fact that a short time since a Socialist was buried in the Rochdale cemetery, when another Socialist delivered an oration over the grave in advocacy of the peculiar doctrines of that body. He was sure that the hon. Members who supported this Bill would object to such proceedings as strongly as those who opposed it. One of the clauses of the Bill provided that a minister or member of a religious body having a registered place for public worship might officiate; and whatever opinion might be formed as to the abstract meaning of the term "religious service," it was certain that when a Court of Law came to consider this clause, anything consistent with the tenets of any sect holding its meetings in a place registered for worship would be held to be religious worship.

MR. BRUCE said, he would, in the first place, congratulate the House on the generous spirit in which the debate had been conducted on both sides. He thought he saw in the courtesy which had been manifested a proof of the desire on the part both of Churchmen and Dissenters to obliterate causes of dissension.

Mr. Collins

He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Dalrymple) in thinking that this was not a question as between Church and Dissent, for he was sure that if Churchmen out of the House were asked whether they would make the concession now sought the immense majority would be found in its favour. Speaking with all respect of the clergy of the Church of England, he was bound to say that, upon polemical questions, they were not always the truest representatives of the opinions of its members. The main principles of this Bill might be considered as being two in number. One was that a person might be buried, if his friends choose, without any religious service being performed over him; and in that alteration of the existing law there was universal concurrence. But the really important principle was that, under certain safeguards, funeral services might be performed in the burial grounds of the Established Church by persons other than clergymen of the Church. The hon. and gallant Member who had moved the rejection of the Bill (Colonel Bartelot) was mistaken in supposing that in suggesting last year that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, he expected that that principle would be excluded. On the contrary, his object was to maintain that principle, but to surround it with every possible safeguard. His experience of the labours of the Committee confirmed his opinion that many objections to the Bill as it was then introduced might be removed by careful consideration. His anticipations had been realized. The representatives of both sides of the House had laboured heartily with this object, and had inserted several important provisions. It was required that ample notice should be given to the incumbent of the intention that a burial should take place in the churchyard without the rites of the Established Church, and either with or without any other religious service; and in order that the different services might not clash, power was given to the incumbent to vary the time stated in the notice within certain limits. The utmost care was taken that the services should be of a religious character, and that no services should be performed by any person who was not a member of a recognized religious body. Furthermore, numerous exceptions to the application of the Act were introduced, where other provision than that supplied by the parish churchyard had been or should hereafter be provided. While, however, he admitted that these provisions would not give absolute security against the performance of services not strictly religious, he dismissed as chimerical the idea that persons would register themselves as religious bodies, for the purpose of having an opportunity of delivering funeral orations over their deceased friends. It was not in accordance with the feelings and habits of the people of this country that irreligious or offensive discourses should be pronounced on these solemn occasions; and in that lay the great security. In order to find such an instance, one hon. Member had been obliged to go back half a century; and as to the occurrence at Rochdale, mentioned by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), he could only say that under this Bill it would still be illegal to deliver political addresses in churchyards. Everything, in short, was done by the Select Committee to minimize the danger. An attempt had been made to show that this Bill, if passed, would lead to further concessions, and that if Dissenting ministers were once admitted to the churchyard they would seek the right of entering the church itself. It was sufficient to point out in reply that the Bill did not go to such an extent. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire himself had not ventured to make such a proposition, and it was quite unnecessary to fight with shadows while they had realities to deal with. The Act which had been referred to as having been introduced by the present Postmaster General substituted for a permissive a compulsory law in this matter in Ireland. That Act had worked without disturbance or dissatisfaction; yet surely no one would say that party heat or religious animosity were less strong in Ireland than on this side the Channel. Surely, then, if the principle had worked so well there, equally beneficial results might be anticipated from similar legislation for England. But it was quite as much in the interests of the Church as of religious freedom that he supported this Bill.

tary was mistaken in supposing that the Members who opposed this Bill opposed it as representing clergymen; they opposed it as representing the preponderating body of the laity of the Church of England. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said that he adhered to the principle of the measure, which was to give any Dissenting minister the right to read over a grave such services as he might think fit; but the right hon. Gentleman did not say how he reconciled that principle with the maintenance of an Established Church. He (Lord John Manners) opposed the Bill for the very reason that its principle was in direct antagonism to an Established Church; because it was essential to an Established Church that the services in the church and also in the churchyard should be according to forms prescribed by law. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Richard) asked those who opposed this measure to put themselves into the position occupied by those who supported it; and he (Lord John Manners) could say that he had applied that test to himself, and he could with a clear conscience oppose it. In Scotland, he was a Dissenter; but he had never supported the measure to abolish what was somewhat erroneously termed church rates in Scotland. The Episcopal Dissenters in Scotland did not complain of the disabilities arising from their dissenting from the Church established by law there. Therefore, he was quite in a position to accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman. They had been assured that by the labours of the Select Committee of last year every security was afforded that the principle of the measure would be so carried out as not to militate against the peace and good-feeling of the community; but he defied the right hon. Gentleman to point out how the 5th clause could ever be brought into operation. Who was to be judge of what was solemn and decent? But supposing the clause to be put in force, what would happen? Why Dissenting ministers would be dragged from one Court to another, and judicial decisions would be sought as to what were solemn services, and whether the provisions of the law had been violated or not. He believed that the alleged grievance of Dissenters not being able to obtain burying grounds was infinitesimally small; and on the showing of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil, was confined to Wales—indeed, no sooner had that hon. Member declared it to exist there, than the statement was contradicted by another Welsh Member. The hon. Baronet below the Gangway (Sir Thomas Lloyd) gave a most positive and emphatic denial to the statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard). The grievance really only existed in an almost inappreciable degree at the present moment, and very shortly would disappear altogether; and therefore there was no need to pass a measure that would be a violation of the essential principle of an Established Church.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN thought that it would be necessary to define the expression “consecrated burial grounds;” because several denominations consecrated their burial grounds. He thought that there was no fear that the measure would give rise to Catholic funeral processions, for he, during a long residence in a city containing 200,000 Catholics, had never seen such a procession. The argument about the “thin end of the wedge” had often been used, and the consequence of the rejection of a measure on that ground had generally been, that the other end of the wedge had been used in smashing down the obstacle.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he could not understand why Dissenters should not provide burial grounds for themselves as well as chapels. Again, if a gentleman built a church, and gave land for a burial ground, would it not be hard that others should have a right to perform services there for which it had never been intended? If the Bill had been limited to churchyards which had been acquired by the spending of parish moneys, that fact would have gone far to disarm his objection to it.

MR. MORLEY wished to say that he had received a communication from Archdeacon Allen, in which the rev. gentleman said that he felt that Dissenters had a right to be laid by their forefathers in the churchyard with decent rites pleasing to their surviving relatives; but he thought that the clergyman should have the right to decline performing services over persons whom he could not recognize as Christians or fellow-worshippers. As to ulterior measures which were feared, surely the Church would be stronger to oppose them after this act of justice had been done. The Bill was full of guarantees and securities; and in Committee they would be quite ready to consider any further guarantees that might be proposed—for the supporters of the Bill were as anxious as Churchmen could be to secure the proper and decent performance of funerals in burial grounds.

EARL PERCY said, that these so-called guarantees and securities were worth nothing at all. If there were any one thing more than another could strengthen his dislike to the measure, it would be the way in which hon. Members opposite uniformly avoided meeting the objection, that if this concession was made to Nonconformists with respect to the churchyards it would soon be impossible to keep them out of the churches. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman who had brought in the Bill had any ulterior object in view; but this he did know—that many persons supported it in order that they might obtain the same footing in the churches which this Bill would give them in the churchyards. They had been told that it was idle to suppose that there would be irreligious services in the churchyards if this Bill should pass. He did not know what the legal interpretation of irreligious services might be; but he should like to hear what would prevent the infidel or the heretic from holding their services in our churchyards. If the Bill had been confined to admitting Dissenters to burial without service in the churchyards, he should have been glad to make the concession, though he did not acknowledge any right of the kind on their part; but he opposed it because they demanded to have a religious service of their own. He might not feel astonished that Dissenters did not appreciate the feeling with respect to consecrated ground; but he should not have expected to hear from Churchmen that consecrated ground was ground set apart for the use of the Established Church. He always understood that consecrated ground was what in olden times was called "God's acre"—that is, ground set apart for the baptized to lie in, that they might be separated in death, as in life, from the rest of mankind. He should have thought that one body of Nonconformists, at all events, would have agreed with him in that—the Roman Catholics. Where did

Roman Catholics admit the burials of Protestants in their churchyards? And if they claimed to have more of Christian truth than the other sects of Christendom, they ought to prove it by doing as they would be done by. This question had hitherto been discussed upon secular grounds, but there was also the religious aspect of the question, which was a much more important one, although that might not be the proper place in which to treat of it. But he must be allowed to say that this measure was not only unjust in the extreme, but also excessively irreligious.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rejoiced in the speech of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley), and, whilst he did not abandon the ground that the Bill constituted an attack upon the Established Church, he claimed, as a member of the Church, and for the Church, the same rights for his denomination as was possessed by every other denomination over the property which belonged to them, the same right in burial grounds of the Church for Churchmen as the Wesleyans and every other denomination had over the burial grounds attached to their chapels. The Home Secretary had promised that everything would be conceded to the members of the Church if they would only yield to the principle of the measure—that is, if they would give up their right to their property; but the hon. Member for Dublin (Sir Dominic Corrigan) followed him, and said that he had never seen a Roman Catholic funeral procession. He also seemed to rejoice in the prospect of using the thick end of the wedge for the overthrow of the Established Church, and almost admitted that this measure might be considered as the thin edge of it. The hon. Member, of course, could not have seen or heard of the funeral procession of M'Manus, or of others of that kind. In Poland and in France funeral processions had been the occasion of most dangerous political manifestations. The Home Secretary said that he was quite certain that there would never be any irreligious service in the churchyards, but promoted the present Bill, whereby such services would not be forbidden by law. The Bill would remove the legal protection against this; and what were they to have instead? what were they to do? were they in every parish to establish a vigilance committee? It was in this way that affairs were managed in the United States, whilst arbitrary control was the regulating power in despotic States; but in free England we had rested our security upon the protection of the law, and he disputed the right of the Government to deprive them of that protection, and to leave them without any legal definition of what was to be considered a solemn and decent performance of religious services. They were about to cast aside the only definition of what was solemn and decent, which the authorized service in the Church prayer-book supplied, and to supply them with none other. He believed that this was an attempt to introduce the thin edge of the wedge to deprive—members of the Church of England of their property in churchyards; and if this were done, and those who were now intruders were in that capacity to be admitted up to and all around, how could the church doors be kept closed against these recognized and authorized intruders? They were perfectly ready to meet the difficulties of the Nonconformists; but the Church of England claimed the same rights in their property that the Dissenters had in theirs. They, indeed, would not part with it willingly, though it might be taken from them. He lamented that Nonconformists had been led to attack the property of the members of the Church of England, whilst, for themselves, they vindicated such rights most strenuously. This was a narrow-minded position. He should, with a clear conscience, vote against the Bill.

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS, WILLS, &c. (MIDDLESEX) BILL—[BILL 36.] (Mr. George Gregory, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Goldney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. G. B. GREGORY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to abolish the Office for the registration of deeds, &c., in the county of Middlesex. The present Registration Office, he said, consisted of two Registrars—the office of the third being at this moment vacant—who were appointed by the Lord Chancellor and the Chief Justices of the Supreme Courts, a deputy registrar, and minor official. It was contemplated at the time when the Office was established that the funds which would be received would be sufficient to defray the expenses of it; but, in fact, the amount had risen far beyond what was contemplated. The income amounted in 1866 to £12,500, out of which the Office expenses amounted to £3,100 odd. The balance was divided among the Registrars, the actual share of each being, in 1866, £2,368. These Registrars were, in fact, absolute ciphers, and their duties were entirely carried on by the deputy registrar. So much was this the case, that the present Chief Justice had refused to fill up the third and vacant appointment. Moreover, so far from the Office proving beneficial, it had proved the very reverse—it embarrassed rather than facilitated the transfer of real property. Land in Middlesex had become so much subdivided that a search had become absolutely impracticable, and it was almost impossible to identify property when the name of the owner was found in the registers. All legal practitioners were desirous that the abolition of the Office should take place at once and entirely. Its abolition had been strongly recommended also by the Commissioners on Land Transfer, who declared the Office to be simply a source of trouble and expense to the vendors and purchasers of property. He proposed by the Bill that deeds and wills executed after January 1, 1871, should cease to be registered; but it was necessary that the Office should be kept going for searches affecting titles commencing before that date. He proposed that the fees receivable in future from the Office should be paid into the Consolidated Fund. According to an estimate taken he found that these fees would amount to £1,100 a-year, which would provide ample funds for carrying on the duties of the Office. He was prepared to give the Registrars compensation for the abolition of their office to the extent of three-fourths of the fees—not which they had received, but which they were entitled to receive—for the Registrars had, in fact, exacted fees which they were not legally entitled to exact, according to the construction of the Act of Parliament. He hoped to have an opportunity of suggesting a scheme for facilitating the transfer of land during the present Session; but the present Bill was a fitting remedy for the evils of which he had complained.

MR. LEEMAN said, that having experience of a similar system of registration in Yorkshire, he could not understand how the registration of deeds in Middlesex should have been permitted to fall into the state described. The registration in Yorkshire, which he believed was very similar to that in Middlesex, worked well, and to the full satisfaction of the landed proprietors of the three Ridings. Property in the large towns of Yorkshire—for instance, in Leeds and Bradford, was as much subdivided as in Middlesex, and no difficulty had been experienced in the working of the registers. The proper remedy for the abuses complained of was the reformation, not the abolition of the system. If this Bill was passed there was danger that it would be taken as a precedent, and that the registers of Yorkshire would be abolished too, and he protested against that being done. The hon. Gentleman had given an answer to his own Motion in his concluding remarks, that before the present Session was ended a general Bill would be introduced for the consideration of the whole question of land transfer. He objected to such legislation being proposed by a private Member, for surely it was the duty of the Government to undertake a matter of such importance. At present, in Yorkshire nobody could mortgage his property without the fact being within reach of the public, which gave the most perfect security to property.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that the necessity of searching these registers for notices of mortgages was an evil which the two counties of Middlesex and York had inflicted on the whole community. The registration had been instituted to enable the citizens of London to ascertain that the titles of property on which they lent money were unencumbered; and the people of Yorkshire, who were interested in similar matters, finding that the plan worked well in Middlesex, adopted a similar plan for themselves. But it was for no benefit of the general community that these registrations took place, and great difficulties had arisen through them—to such an extent that many persons refused to incur the expense and inconvenience caused by making the necessary searches, and preferred to run a risk instead. The present Bill was a step in the right direction, giving greater freedom of action in the transfer of property. If the Middlesex plan of registration had been a good one, it would have been followed in other counties; but it had not been so followed, and instead of doing good it had done a great deal of harm.

MR. COLLINS said, he did not care what course was taken with regard to the registration of deeds in Middlesex, but he had a strong objection to passing a Bill of this kind, if it was intended to serve as a precedent for a similar measure in regard to the registration of deeds in Yorkshire. The present system was a great safeguard, and enabled many persons to lend money when otherwise they would refuse to do so.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL stated that the Government intended to deal with the subject of the transfer of land, with a view to the simplification of the process. A Bill in reference to the matter was introduced in the House of Lords last Session; but the Government were unable to proceed with it at that time. However, if there should be any reasonable prospect of carrying the Bill in the present Session, it would be brought in again—at all events, it would be introduced, if not in this Session, at an early period in the next. The object of the Bill was to establish a new registry in accordance with the recommendations of the Land Transfer Commission of last year, with the view of simplifying the proof of titles, and of making as easy and cheap as possible the transfer of land. That Commission reported against the Middlesex Registry, and therefore, that system in its present shape, must be regarded as doomed; but it would be expedient not to abolish the existing system until something was prepared to be substituted in its place. The Bill of the Government would establish a registry for the whole of the kingdom, and the House would have an opportunity, upon the introduction of that Bill, of considering whether the Middlesex Registry should not be absorbed in the general registry. If the present registry were abolished before another was substituted for it, the officers must be compensated; whereas, if its abolition were delayed until a new registry was proposed in its place, the services of the officers might be utilized. He thought the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would do well to be satisfied with the assurance that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. At any rate, he could not assent to the second reading of the measure except upon the understanding that it should not be further proceeded with during this Session.

MR. JESSEL thought it desirable that the Bill should be read a second time, for though, to his great credit the Lord Chief Justice had not filled up a sinecure office in connection with the Middlesex Registry, because he thought that it would not be to the public advantage to do so, there would be no security for the future against an appointment to such an office being made, unless the sanction of the House was given to the second reading of the present measure. In that case no one would afterwards venture to fill up the sinecure. Both branches of the legal profession were unanimous in condemning the existing Middlesex Registry.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, that he would take the second reading on the understanding that the Committee should be fixed for a distant day.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday 28th June.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

Thursday, 2nd March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL.—Committee—Report
—Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation (16).

PAUPER INMATES DISCHARGE AND REGULATION BILL.—(No. 18.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Certain paupers may be detained in the workhouse for limited periods).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that at present a pauper could discharge himself from the workhouse on giving reasonable notice. It had been found desirable to give Poor Law Guardians larger and more definite powers over inmates who were in the habit of leaving the workhouse in the morning and returning at night. Such powers would, no doubt, require to be exercised with due discretion.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Discharge and detention of casual paupers).

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that there were cases in which vagrants entered the workhouse for the night, but did not ask for or require food.

This clause seemed to prevent such persons leaving the house at an early hour of the morning.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that vagrants who entered the work-house under such circumstances would have no right to demand their discharge; but it would be in the discretion of the guardians to permit them to leave without performing any task.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he regarded the clause as one of the most useful in the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Guardians to provide proper casual wards, and failing to do so not to be entitled to repayment from Parliamentary grants).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that by this clause the Poor Law Board would have power to require the erection of separate cells for vagrants. Now, he agreed in the desirability of giving the Board power to insist on suitable wards and furniture, and in large towns separate cells might be desirable; but it would be preposterous to cast on rural Unions so enormous an expense as would be involved in the erection of them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY explained that the clause gave general powers, and that the Poor Law Board, as far as he understood, had no intention of requiring in all cases the erection of separate cells. It was desirable in many cases to have distinct rooms, so that the honest wayfarer might be separated from the worst class of tramps; and he thought there was no fear of this general power being abused.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY regarded this as a question of giving the central authority power of increasing the rates ad libitum. In the case of large towns there was no fear of injustice, for these could always make themselves heard, and would certainly make any Minister who imposed any oppressive burden repent of his imprudence; but rural Unions might suffer a great deal of injustice. Moreover, the President or Secretary of the Poor Law Board did not take the trouble to look into insignificant cases, leaving them to the Inspectors; and to give Inspectors powers of imposing heavy taxation was to give them a considerable power of oppression. He should support his noble Friend if he divided against the clause.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND hoped his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) would not divide the House, for he could not conceive that the Board would ever oblige rural Unions to erect a cell for every separate vagrant. As he understood the clause, its object was simply to enable the Board to insist on proper wards being provided for vagrants.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON consented to reserve the point till a future stage. In the interim, he would consider whether words might not be introduced into the clause to meet the object he had in view.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY reminded the noble Earl that it would be impossible to make a distinction between rural and urban Unions, as the former in some cases were visited by a large number of tramps. The object of the Bill was not to increase the expense of vagrancy, but to diminish it, for which purpose it was essential to give the Poor Law Board the power of insuring uniform treatment throughout the country.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d on Tuesday next.

EAST INDIA FINANCE.—QUESTION.

LORD LYVEDEN asked the noble Duke the Secretary of State for India, If he intended to move for a Select Committee on East Indian Finance? The noble Lord said that in putting the Question he desired to make a few observations on the subject. Last Session, as President of the East India Association, a body composed of gentlemen who had been in India or were in some way connected with it, and had continued to circulate information upon it, he was asked to move for the appointment of a Committee of their Lordships on the subject; but he replied that he did not think that the best mode of dealing with the subject. He thought that a Commission on India would be better; but that such a step might appear an affront to the Governor General, and Lord Mayo, as far as he had been able to observe, had fulfilled his duties with great ability and public advantage. More recently there had been a rumour that if a Committee were moved for in the House of Commons the Government would not object, and there was afterwards a proposal from the Government for a Joint Committee of both Houses. This proposition, however, had been abandoned, on the ground that their Lordships were not entitled to inquire into the subject of Indian finance. If not, what were their Lordships to inquire into? He had never heard of a more extraordinary objection. Their Lordships were often reproached with idleness; but this enforced idleness arose from a want of business whereon to exercise industry. Surely there was no question which they were better fitted for dealing with than Indian finance? Indian finance stood upon an entirely different footing from English finance. The objection to their altering Money Bills—namely, that taxes should only be imposed by the representatives of the people—did not apply to Indian finance, which was not regulated by the Imperial Parliament at all. If, moreover, India was indirectly represented in Parliament, it was in this House rather than in the other. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had on two occasions submitted to their Lordships, with great ability and usefulness, the Indian Budget—a step which obviously was no less open to objection than the consideration of the subject by a Committee. In the House of Commons there was at present a great dearth of Indian authorities—Sir Stafford Northcote being absent, and there being very few Gentlemen Members of that House who had been at the India Office or who had applied themselves to Indian affairs; whereas in this House there were on the opposite side two noble Lords who had been Secretaries of State for India, the Earl of Derby and the Marquess of Salisbury, as well as two on the Ministerial side, Viscount Halifax and the noble Duke himself (the Duke of Argyll). Above all, there was Lord Lawrence, than whom no man could be better fitted to deal with such a subject; yet he was to be excluded on account of the fanciful notion that it would infringe the privileges of the House of Commons. That a man could be as useful as a witness as a member of the Committee he denied, for there was a great difference between the presence on the Committee of a well-informed man, who could examine the witnesses, and the examination of that man as a witness by Gentlemen not conversant with the subject. It cast a ridicule on our institutions that so desirable a measure as the appointment of a Joint Committee should be set aside through political pedantry, on the ground that their Lordships were not to interfere with the finances of any part of the Empire. Considering the number of noble Lords who might usefully apply themselves to a subject of so much difficulty—which even a statesman of such grasp of mind as Lord Ellenborough had confessed his inability to master—he would ask the noble Duke, whether it was not advisable to appoint a separate Committee in this House, a step which need not be regarded as at all antagonistic to the Commons' Committee?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in reply, said the suggestion of a Committee had not emanated from Her Majesty's Government, for they saw nothing special in the state of Indian finance to call for inquiry; but during last Session, in a discussion on the subject, the Government intimated that if any considerable section of the House desired an inquiry, they would not stand in the way of it. This Session a considerable number of Members, not entirely satisfied by an early day being given to the Indian Financial Statement, still wished for a Committee, and the Government had accordingly to consider how the inquiry could be best carried on. A Joint Committee of both Houses was suggested not by himself, but by the other Members of the Government. He entirely approved it—for it was a mistake to suppose that there was any jealousy on the part of the India Office on the subject—and communicated personally with several Members of both Houses. He was glad to find that the idea met with general approval, and that some of the most distinguished Members of this House acquainted with Indian finance were willing to serve on the Committee. Such a step, however, required the general consent of all parties; and, on the matter being discussed in the House of Commons, it did not appear to meet with general acquiescence. The proposal of a Joint Committee had, consequently, been withdrawn. He did not think an inquiry was very urgent, and thought the appointment of a Committee of their Lordships, contemporaneously with the Commons' Committee, would have an appearance of jealousy and antagonism. He entirely concurred with his noble Friend that it was a total mistake to regard this House as being in the same position with regard to Indian as to Home finance. The House of Commons represented the taxpayers of this country, but not the taxpayers of India, and their Lordships were as much entitled as the House of Commons to deal, if necessary, with Indian finance. Should any suggestion emanate from the Commons' Committee, of which the Government or their Lordships might doubt the propriety, it would be their Lordships' duty to institute a full inquiry before passing any measure founded upon it.

DULWICH COLLEGE.—COMMISSIONERS OF ENDOWED SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY inquired, with regard to Dulwich College and the Commissioners of Endowed Schools, 1st, Whether the Governors of Dulwich College gave notice to the Endowed Schools Commissioners of their intention to propose a scheme under the powers reserved to them for that purpose, and whether they have not failed hitherto to bring forward any such scheme; 2dly, Whether the Endowed Schools Commissioners are themselves preparing a scheme, and, if so, when it is likely to be made public?

LORD LYTTTELTON, as President of the Commission, replied that Dulwich College was one of those foundations, the Governors of which, under the Endowed Schools Act, were allowed a certain period—in this case 12 months—within which they might prepare a scheme for the government of the school, the powers of the Commissioners being meanwhile suspended. If that privilege was acted upon, and a scheme drawn up and submitted to the Commissioners, from which they dissented, the Commissioners would prepare another, and both would be submitted to the Education Department of the Privy Council. Notice had to be given of such an intention within two months of the passing of the Act—namely, 2nd of August, 1869. The Governors of Dulwich College gave the notice with regard to the lower school, but they had not prepared a scheme. This did not imply any blame, as it was common for Governing Bodies to give notice in order to secure their position, that they might act upon it if they thought it desirable. It was a matter, moreover, of little importance, as both the Commissioners and the Education Department were bound to give due consideration to all schemes or suggestions from whatever quarter they proceeded. It now devolved on the Commissioners to prepare a scheme; but a dozen Commissions would have found plenty of work, and there being only one it was obliged to proceed by districts. Its duration was limited to three or four years, but a much longer period would be necessary to complete the work, and the renewal of the Commission would rest with Parliament. Dulwich College, as one of the very largest endowments, did not come under the rule of the Commissioners to deal with particular districts in turn, and he admitted the desirableness of its being dealt with as early as possible. He trusted that the Commissioners would very soon be able to do so.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till

ARMY (SYSTEM OF RETIREMENT).

QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is not a Report made by actuaries upon the cost of carrying out the recommendations in detail contained in the Report of the Committee upon Army (System of Retirement), July 1867; and, if so, whether he will lay such Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, a Report upon the subject was laid before Parliament in 1868, and a further Report was made at a later period, which has not been presented; but the actuaries in form me that its substance, in a much improved form, is to be found in their evidence before the Committee on Ordnance Retirements last year, which has been laid upon the Table.

ARMY—BRONZE FIELD GUNS. QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the manufacture of new Bronze Field Guns, adopted last year by the War Department, has lately been abandoned, and on what grounds?

SIR HENRY STORKS replied that the manufacture of bronze guns had been temporarily suspended in consequence of certain defects in the casting of these weapons, the causes of which defects were being investigated by a Committee, but had not yet been ascertained. In the meantime, wrought-iron guns with steel tubes were being manufactured.

MR. OSBORNE: Are they muzzle or breech-loaders?

SIR HENRY STORKS: They are muzzle-loaders.

ARMY EDUCATION—SONS OF MILITIA OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in carrying out the proposed more intimate relations between the Regular Forces and the Militia, he will grant to the sons of officers of the Militia the same educational advantages as are now enjoyed by the sons of officers of the Army and Navy, in the form of a reduced rate of charge at the public military academies?

MR. CARDWELL: The permanent Staff of the Militia now enjoy the advantages referred to. How far it may be possible to extend them to Militia officers who are not also officers of the Army is a question which it would be premature to decide. Those who are also Army officers will be in the enjoyment of them as Army officers.

ARMY—VOLUNTEERS IN THE MILITIA. QUESTION.

MR. SIMONDS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that in some cases the same men are returned on the effective strength of both Militia and Volunteer regiments; and, if he is, whether he has any objection to obtain a Return showing the number of such men?

MR. CARDWELL: It is contrary to regulation that any man should belong to both forces, and the Inspector General of Reserve Forces is not aware of any such case. If he was, he would at once order the man's discharge from the Volunteer Force.

IRELAND—FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee on Irish Fisheries of 1867, as well as those contained in the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for 1869, and the recommendations of the Commissioners dated the 13th of August 1870, recently published for the improvement of that branch of industry?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the recommendations contained in the Reports referred to by the hon. Member had been under the consideration of the Irish Government. The last Report, that of the 13th of August, 1870, had only just been issued, and therefore there had not yet been time to give it the attention which it deserved. There was one point in connection with the subject now under the consideration of the Law Officers of Ireland, and when they gave their opinion upon, it was his intention to communicate with the Treasury, to ascertain whether any further assistance should be given to the Irish fisheries.

EDUCATION—BUILDING GRANTS TO SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. HICK asked the Vice President of the Council, Why it is made a condition in new schools that, in order to be entitled to a building grant, they should not exceed twenty feet in width; and, since it is found both inconvenient and difficult to comply with such condition, whether he would be disposed to modify it?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied that the condition referred to was determined upon by the Council after very considerable inquiry, and was the result of all the knowledge which they had acquired by means of their Inspectors. The width fixed upon was the same as that adopted for the practising schools used in the training colleges. Under these circumstances, he could not hold out any hope that the condition would be modified, for two reasons—first, as building grants were now coming to an end, there would be scarcely time to make any alteration in the condition; and, secondly, as it was believed that it was an advantage to have schools of the width indicated in the hon. Member's Question, the Council, who paid so much per square foot, could not undertake to pay public money for space which they regarded as being unnecessary.

EDUCATION—ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS. QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Vice President of the Council, What will be the necessary durations of the morning and afternoon meetings of an elementary school, seeing that the instruction in religious subjects is to be given at the beginning or end, or at the beginning and end of each meeting; and that attendance at a morning or afternoon meeting may not be reckoned for any scholar who has been under instruction in secular subjects less than two hours; why a pupil teacher may not teach for more than five hours each day; and, whether this rule applies to half-time schools; and, if so, whether he has considered that in half-time schools the effect may be that the pupil teachers will be withdrawn while some of the children are still at school?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply to the first Question, said, the Education Department would not attempt to fix the duration of the attendance at the schools, provided that the condition was complied with to give at each meeting two hours for secular instruction. The managers must decide for themselves at what time they would open the schools, and how much time they would appropriate to religious instruction. In reply to the second Question, he begged to state that the reason why the Education Department had said that pupil teachers were not to be employed in teaching more than five hours daily was because they thought that time, in addition to the two hours the pupil teachers had to study themselves, was as much as could be expected from boys of that age. He was obliged to the noble Lord for calling his attention to the half-time schools, and he would consider whether a supplementary Minute could be issued on the subject.

CHINA — DESTRUCTION OF CONSULAR BUILDINGS AT SHANGHAI.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether accounts have been received of the destruction of the Consular Buildings and part of the Records at Shanghai; whether the Fire Insurance Policy had been allowed to run out; and, what will be the pecuniary loss to the British Territory in consequence?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Reports have been received both from Her Majesty's Consul at Shanghai and from the Acting Judge of the Supreme Court, announcing the total destruction, on the 24th of December, by fire, of the Consulate, a part of which was also used for the purposes of the Supreme Court. The fire is believed to have been purely accidental, and to have resulted from too close proximity of the beams of the flooring to a fireplace. The building was one of the earliest in the settlement. Owing to the rapidity with which the fire spread, only a few of the more important consular records—such as registers of births, marriages, and deaths, Board of Trade accounts, ships' registers, and other records connected with shipping—could be saved. The title-deeds and registers connected with the tenure of property in the settlement were also saved. A large portion of the records of the Court, a considerable part of the library, and all the records of causes heard since 1865 were saved. The iron safe belonging to the Court, and containing wills and other valuable documents, was extracted from the ruins, and its contents, though damaged, are legible. Most of the furniture of the Consulate and Court and the rest of the books and archives were destroyed. The latter were not of any real importance. Little damage was done to any part of the new buildings in course of construction. Arrangements have been made for carrying on the work of the Consulate and the Supreme Court. The policy of insurance on the buildings expired on the 15th of December, in consequence of instructions issued at the request of the Treasury, who decided in the beginning of last year to discontinue the insurance of Government property in China and Japan. No estimate of the pecuniary loss incurred has been received at the Foreign Office.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH GUIDE. QUESTION.

MR. BROGDEN asked the Postmaster General, If it is intended to publish a List of Telegraph Offices in the United Kingdom, showing the hours that each office is open for the receipt and transmission of Messages, with other information necessary for the guidance of the public, in the British Postal Guide or in any other form?

MR. MONSELL: The publication of a Telegraph Guide giving information of the kind referred to by my hon. Friend formed part of the original scheme. It has not been thought advisable up to the present time to issue it, as the additions which we have made to the system from week to week during the past year have been so numerous that a Guide published at the commencement of each quarter would have become inconveniently inaccurate at a very early period of that quarter. Now, however, the system is fast advancing towards completion, and it will shortly be possible to issue the Guide.

LICENSING BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can give the House any assurance that he will be able to introduce his Bill on the Licensing of Houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors before Easter?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that it was the present intention of the Government to introduce the Bill before Easter, and there was nothing in the state of Public Business to lead him to suppose that the intention would not be carried into effect.

STAMP DUTIES—MAGISTRATES' ORDERS.—QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is in consequence of instructions issued to the Clerks of the Peace for Counties "That Magistrates' Orders for the payment of penalties, according to the Stamp Act 1870 (33 and 34 Vic. c. 97), are to be held liable to a stamp," so that if the defaulter does not pay the county will be rendered liable to the above charge?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, no such instructions had been issued either from the Home Office or the Treasury, and he thought it highly improbable that they had been issued from any other Department of the Government.

WESTMEATH, &c. UNLAWFUL COMBINATIONS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [27th February], "That the Question then proposed,

'That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Westmeath and certain parts adjoining, of Meath and King's County, the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and confederacy existing therein, and the best means of suppressing the same,'—(The Marquess of Hartington),

Previous Question again proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Serjeant Sherlock.)

Debate resumed.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: Sir—Up to the moment at which I rise to address you, I have entertained a hope—not to say an expectation—that in the interval which has elapsed since I moved the adjournment of the debate on the subject now under consideration, Her Majesty's Government might have been induced to re-consider their course with regard to the Motion of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and to withdraw it. I am quite sure that I speak the sentiments of many hon. Members of this House, by no means confined to party, when I say that if Her Majesty's Government had found it within the sphere of their duty to take the course which I have indictated, their decision would have met with the approbation of a very large body of hon. Members in this House, and with that of a still larger body of persons outside its walls. I think, further, that the Government would have been able to do this with a strict regard to their own dignity, and to the interests of the nation. But the House not having received any such intimation, I shall proceed very briefly to state the views which I entertain not only with regard to the Motion itself, but with regard to the circumstances on which it is founded. I must first express the very deep regret—the disappointment, the surprise—with which I heard the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland give Notice of the Motion now before the House. That feeling of surprise was by no means confined to myself; I have a confident belief that there are very few Members, except those enjoying the strictest confidence of Her Majesty's Government, who were not taken equally by surprise with myself. The circumstances under which the Motion has been brought before us are very peculiar. It was made within 10 days of the time when Her Majesty's Government—in possession of all the facts and all the details connected with the atrocious outrages which have been committed in Westmeath, and knowing the difficulty, and their means of grappling with it—had advised Her Majesty in her gracious Speech from the Throne to use expressions with regard to Ireland calculated, to say the very least, to dispel from the minds of everyone the notion that within 10 days this House would be called upon to suspend the laws of the country in order to deal with a state of things only incidentally alluded to in the Speech. It may be that I entertain strong views; but my opinion is, that it was the duty of the Government, if they intended to enact very stringent laws with regard to Ireland—and especially if it was their intention to suspend the Constitution—it was their duty to inform the country in the usual manner by means of the Queen's Speech. I will not impute any improper motives to Her Majesty's Government; indeed, as my wish is to assist them to withdraw their Motion, I shall endeavour to avoid saying anything likely to place an additional obstacle in the way of their doing so; but I repeat it was the duty of the Government to follow the usual forms and precedents, and to notice so serious an infringement of the law and Constitution in the Speech from the Throne. So far from imputing improper motives, I think I see a not altogether unnatural reason why the Government, which has, during the last two years, been prophesying that the remedial measures they had themselves propounded would bring about a speedy amendment in the condition of Ireland, should have felt some hesitation in stating, through the medium of the very first subsequent Queen's Speech, that their anticipations had not been realized. But, Sir, let me say, in passing, that having listened to the speeches of the noble Lord the present Chief Secretary for Ireland and of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chichester Fortescue), I am not quite sure what the exact present state of Ireland really is. They are the only two Members of the Government who have addressed the House on the subject, and they are by no means agreed in the views they take of the condition of the sister country. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade having taken an active, intelligent, and able part in the discussions on the remedial measures which have been brought forward in the last two Sessions, entertains, perhaps, an exaggerated opinion of the benefits likely to accrue to Ireland from those measures: and I think, therefore, that a little exaggeration may be pardoned. What does he say? He used these words—"It is perfectly well known in Ireland that we have succeeded beyond expectation"—and some interruption having occurred, he added—

"I know what I am speaking of. At no time within memory has Ireland been so prosperous, so calm, so confident of the future, so contented, so loyal as she is at the present moment."

And this he attributes to the remedial measures brought in and passed by the present Government. I am not going to dispute that point, and I only hope it may be so, notwithstanding the rather disconcerting remarks with which the right hon. Gentleman accompanied the statement, and to which I shall hereafter more particularly refer: but I may be allowed to doubt the accuracy of the statement, and whether any prosperity that may exist in Ireland is yet to be attributed to those measures. I am fortified in this opinion by the speech of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland. With the candour which, from long and intimate acquaintance with him, I know to distinguish my noble Friend in private life, he is unwilling to attribute any improvement in the state of Ireland to causes which he does not really believe to be the real ones. The noble Lord said—

“I do not wish the House for one moment to believe that I attribute this great improvement—for a great improvement it is—to that course of remedial legislation which it has been the pride of this side of the House to initiate during the two last Sessions of Parliament. I am aware that we have had in operation during the present winter the Peace Preservation Act, which conferred on the Government powers considerably exceeding those ordinarily in the hands of the Government; but I claim for the Government the credit of having used both the ordinary and the extraordinary powers which have been placed in their hands with vigour, firmness, and decision. . . . We have in every disaffected part of the country prosecuted the most vigorous searches for fire-arms, which have resulted in a large number of them having been taken from the hands of the disloyal and criminal classes. The constabulary force has been augmented in every disturbed district; experienced detectives have been employed; . . . constant patrols have been established wherever, in the opinion of the constabulary, they could be of advantage, and the Attorney General and the Crown Solicitor have been instructed personally to undertake every case. . . . At no time within the recollection of any Member of this House have the powers of the law been more vigorously, and at the same time more impartially, executed.”

And then the noble Lord, fearing that his observations should be considered to apply to Westmeath alone, added these words, “and all these measures have been still more strictly carried out in the county of Westmeath.” After hearing these two opinions as to the causes of the altered state of things in Ireland, I think I am justified in entertaining some doubts as to what that state is, and to what it is to be attributed. But, be that as it may, there can be no doubt that amid all this tranquillity, whether brought about by the remedial measures alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, or by the measures of repression enumerated by the noble Lord the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, there exists a state of things which the noble Lord himself avows to be perfectly intolerable. There is in Ireland a small tract of country—I may almost term it a fortress of Ribandism, which sets the Government at defiance, and its garrison carries murder and rapine uncontrolled through a whole district. This fortress is more successful than those of Metz, Strasburg, or Belfort. In them the French were able to resist the Prussian arms for a few months; but this garrison has set the whole power of the Government at defiance, and that not for a few months, but for a whole year; and I believe that, at the moment at which I am addressing you, this garrison is in triumphant possession of their fortress, and is still setting at defiance the whole force of the Empire. Under these circumstances the Government come to Parliament—as I think they are perfectly justified in doing—for additional assistance. My right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire who sits beside me, and I believe every Member of the House, is ready to give to Her Majesty's Government every increased power which they could ask. But, on the other hand, so far as we are concerned, we are determined to oblige the Government if we can to adopt such energetic measures to repress these crimes as the gravity of the case requires. We do not differ from Her Majesty's Government as to the necessity of their having the power of repressing these crimes; but we differ from them with regard to the mode in which they have determined to proceed. It seems to us that the method they have adopted is the wrong one. It may have been my particular bad fortune, but I can say, with the greatest possible truth, that from the moment my noble Friend introduced this Resolution to the House, I have not met a single individual, either in the House or out of it, who does not look upon the course of Her Majesty's Government with regret—I had almost said, with reprobation. I am not sure that I quite understood my noble Friend with regard to the alterations he proposes to make in the Resolution before the House. But, first of all, let me say that I believe there is no necessity whatever for a preliminary inquiry by a Committee of this House. As to precedents, the Government have a precedent of their own in what occurred last year. Last year, without any preliminary inquiry, they proposed to this House the enactment of the Peace Preservation Act, and it was agreed to by the House without their insisting on a previous investigation. That was a measure which in England would be looked upon as unconstitutional, and they proposed it for all Ireland, and not merely for one district. I know it may be said that that Act was a mitigation of a former Act which had been formerly passed by this House. But surely, in point of principle, it is the same. Before the House proceeded to continue, even in a mitigated form, an Act which was about to expire, surely it was of as much consequence that the House should have some information, as it was that it should have information before the Constitution was originally suspended. I do not think that my noble Friend succeeded in convincing the House—at any rate he did not succeed in convincing me—that this Committee was rendered necessary by any one of the reasons which he adduced in support of his Motion. My noble Friend said the Government wanted information. Now, what information could the Government want? I speak from a very small official experience of the Government of Ireland. I was there for a very short time; but that short experience enables me to say that the Government are always in possession of information which it is not in the power of any Committee of this House to obtain. They have means at their disposal which insure to them perfect and accurate knowledge of everything that occurs in every part of Ireland. How is it possible for any Committee of this House to obtain information which the Government cannot obtain? My noble Friend said that he thought some magistrates of Ireland would, if a Committee were appointed, come forward to give information. Why, does my noble Friend mean to state to the House that the magistrates of Ireland are not doing their duty? If they are not doing their duty take them off the Bench at once, to whatever party they belong. I will not stand up for any magistrate, though he belongs to my own political party, who, in such circumstances as these, refuses to assist the Government by all the information in his power. Does the noble Lord require information as to the nature of the transactions with which we have to deal? That can hardly be. The whole organization of Ribandism is perfectly known to the Government; at any rate, it is the fault of the Government if they do not know it. More than that—it is known to others out of the Government. I very much doubt whether any of the Members of this House, who have read the publications of the day, can be ignorant of the terror which that conspiracy inspires, or of the atrocities of which it is guilty. In my opinion, all of us have sufficient information to grapple with the difficulty. But, more than that—I say it with some little confidence—I cannot say it for a certainty—but my belief is, that the Government know even the individuals of whom the organization is composed. I believe that all that the Government requires is additional power to grapple with those individuals, and to crush out crime. I say that it was the duty of my noble Friend, or of the head of Her Majesty's Government, to ask for powers to deal with those individuals—to take those powers and to execute them. I do not mean to argue that, under certain circumstances, there would be anything singular, unusual, or unconstitutional in a Government applying to the House for a Committee of Inquiry, as a preliminary to legislation; but, I can see no possible excuse for such a proposal on the present occasion, when it can result in nothing more than delay in obtaining an increase of those special executive powers, which the House granted last year in no stinted measure, when it consented to the Peace Preservation Act. In regard to the Resolution, I have said that I do not quite understand the manner in which my noble Friend proposes to deal with this Resolution. There are words in it which imply that Her Majesty's Government intend to make use of this Committee to relieve themselves of the responsibility which naturally attaches to them. The noble Lord disclaims such intention. I will accept any disclaimer on this, or on any other subject, that the noble Lord may make—I am acquainted with him well enough to know that he would not willingly deceive the House on this or on any other subject; but he must excuse me when I say that the country generally—naturally and justifiably—will attribute to these words the meaning they carry on their surface, and will regard this Resolution as an attempt on the part of Her Majesty's Government to shirk the responsibility which attaches to them. This Resolution justifies all the imputations which we have heard made—that one of the objects of the Government, in moving for this Committee, was to get rid of the responsibility that attached to them—a responsibility which may possibly be painful to them because, in the discharge of their duties, they would have to contradict and falsify

a number of prophecies which they have made with regard to the future condition of Ireland. I think my noble Friend said that he was prepared to modify that part of the Resolution to which I refer. If I stood alone in my opposition, I would say "No!" to the Resolution as long as the words I have referred to are contained in it. Those words justify every imputation that has been brought against the Government. There is nothing too strong to say with regard to those words. I say they are wrong in principle, and more than that, if they are allowed to remain they will form a precedent for any other Government which wishes to shuffle off its responsibility, and throw that responsibility upon the House of Commons, instead of fulfilling its duty. I do not pretend to know what course the House of Commons will take, but, at any rate, those words ought to be struck out of the Resolution. I wish to impress this on the Government: I cannot disguise from myself that the Government are placed in a very difficult position. They have taken a step which I think they must regret. I cannot help believing that they regret it. Everybody else does. Their best friends do, and my object is still to entreat them to re-consider the step which they have taken; there is yet time to withdraw this Resolution. I wish to impress upon my right hon. Friends opposite what importance is to be attached to the course which they are about to take. I wish to ask them whether the adoption of this Resolution would not place the House in a rather humiliating position? Is it not, to begin with, humiliating to see the Government applying for exceptional powers for a small district of country, which, at the most, can only be said to be one county among the 32 counties, I think, in Ireland? But if it is humiliating to ask for extraordinary powers to deal with one county, is it not an additional humiliation to put into the Speaker's hand a Resolution in which the Government not only ask for additional powers, but admit that they do not know how to deal with the case, and call upon Parliament to advise them how to act? This Resolution, which is so humiliating, will be read, not only by the people of this country, but by the world at large. What must be the opinion of foreign nations at such a transaction? I have been careful to say nothing to add to the difficulties of their position. I would implore them to re-consider the course they have taken. I am quite positive that a reconsideration of this subject would afford gratification to a much larger party than the Government think. The withdrawal of the Resolution would enable us to appear before the world, and especially before Ireland, with a united front determined to put down crime. It would prevent any misunderstanding which, I think, it is quite possible there may be, if unfortunately we shall be driven into two different Lobbies on the Resolution before the House. That is a consideration which I press strongly upon the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. If we present a united front we shall be able to put down crime much more efficaciously than if we have party divisions, and I implore my right hon. Friend not to undertake the responsibility of causing party divisions on a matter of such great importance. Before I sit down I may be allowed to make a reference, as I said I would in the early part of my observations, to the speech of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman, in expressing his opinions, which he did in a very fair manner and which he was perfectly justified in doing, seeing the active part he has taken in the legislation with respect to Ireland, accompanied his remarks with a most uncourteous and improper accusation against hon. Gentlemen on this side, when he attributed to us that we took pleasure in the failure of the Irish policy of the Government. No doubt, we carry on our party conflicts in this House always with a good deal of excitement, sometimes with more acrimony than on calm consideration we might think justified. But it is the positive duty of Members sitting on this side to criticize the acts of the Government, and it often happens that we are obliged to express ourselves in language which might not be considered over courteous. In the case now before the House we may be allowed to entertain a doubt whether the legislation with respect to Ireland has been so successful as my right hon. Friend declares it to have been. Assuredly we may be allowed, in a mode usual to the Members of this House, to give utterance to this conviction in monosyllabic expressions without being taunted by my right hon. Friend with a feeling of positive pleasure at the failure of the measures of Her Majesty's Government. We have no such feeling. I can only say for myself—I have said it before, and I repeat it now—that the pacification and tranquillization of Ireland must be to me, as I believe it to be to every Member of this House, of the greatest possible importance. We may differ about the way in which it should be done, we may think that certain measures have not been quite successful; but this I will say, that whatever Government is in power, whether that of my right hon. Friend who sits opposite, or that of my right hon. Friend who sits beside me, or that of a Minister more lucky than either, whoever shall succeed in bringing tranquillity to Ireland, the result will be hailed in no party spirit, but with an united expression of pleasure and delight from Members on both sides of the House. I should feel that a debt of gratitude was owing to that Minister, a debt not exceeded by that due to any person that ever held the reins of government in this country. I thank the House for the kindness with which it has heard me, and I again entreat my right hon. Friend to withdraw from the position which he has so unfortunately taken up.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is undoubtedly refreshing in a debate of this kind, so warmly coloured in certain cases by the infusion of the language of party, to listen to my right hon. Friend (Colonel Wilson-Patten) who, in the speech that he has made, has exhibited that temperance of tone, and that uprightness of intention, from which we all know he would be the last man to depart. Therefore any recommendation coming from him is entitled to the most respectful and candid consideration. The recommendation, however, which he has now made to us is one which unhappily is too much at variance with our sense of public duty, and with what we consider to be our knowledge of facts, for us to adopt. But, following my right hon. Friend immediately, I will endeavour to lay clearly before the House the reasons upon which that decision is founded. I have said that in previous portions of this debate, its language has been highly coloured by the imputations and feelings of party. With respect to the speech of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) where he described murder as "stalking abroad," and Government as "becoming contemptible," to him it may appear that forcible language means forcible ideas, but to me it appears that language so heated, and so little in proportion to the nature of the case as that which he employed, cannot possibly raise in those who are the objects of it, anger and excitement, but rather creates a sentiment of regret when they find a Gentleman who has been, and may again be, responsible for the home police and government of this country, given to allow his feelings to attain such a sway over his judgment in dealing with a case in which the strict maintenance of a calm temper is so desirable. When I come to the speech which followed that of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), the speech of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), I must employ different language of description. The right hon. Gentleman delivered—and it was very natural that he should—a speech, of which the obvious intention was partly to dispose of the question at issue, and partly to turn it to account in illustration of the errors of our Irish policy and of the wisdom of his own. I do not complain of the right hon. Gentleman. I think it was almost a necessity for the right hon. Gentleman to do so. The right hon. Gentleman says, and says truly, that we stand at issue upon the most vital questions—that he, and those who act with him, and we, and those who have honoured us with their confidence, stand at issue upon the most vital questions as to Ireland before the country and before the world. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman on that point. Nay, I am going to compliment the right hon. Gentleman in certain respects upon the moderation of his language, for he has toned it down immensely since 1868. He told us, indeed, that our Act had "legalized confiscation, and consecrated sacrilege." Well, Sir, but these are very moderate expressions from a right hon. Gentleman who, when he had originally to describe, as a responsible Minister, the measure which we proposed with regard to the Church of Ireland, was not satisfied with "confiscation" and with "sacrilege," but could find the true exposition of his ideas in nothing but "foreign conquest," and told us deliberately from his place that the consequences of that measure would be more formidable and destructive than those of foreign conquest. Therefore, I am very glad that we have got down to expressions so moderate and judicial as that we have "legalized confiscation, and consecrated sacrilege." Well, Sir, we are not ashamed of the measure the right hon. Gentleman has thus described; we abide by it as a politic and wise measure, as a just and therefore a Christian measure. Then the right hon. Gentleman told us in his speech—"You have condoned high treason." Neither are we ashamed of the steps we have taken in that respect. What we have done is this—we have acted upon the principle which we have invariably recommended to every other country in Europe—we have acted upon the principle which every truly civilized country in the 19th century has never hesitated to act upon—and that is, that a political crime, when it has ceased to be dangerous, and when suffering has been undergone, should be treated with the utmost leniency. Well, the right hon. Gentleman went on to offer remarks which I will presently notice; but let me now refer to the basis upon which my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) placed this measure, and in which I desire to identify myself with him. My noble Friend stated that the condition of things which prevailed in the county of Westmeath ought not to be, and in the view of the Government could not be, endured; that we must apply some remedy to that state of things; that we intended to lay the facts of the case before a Committee, and to invite its assistance in the full establishment and elucidation of those facts; and that then we should, on our own responsibility, propose what we thought the best and most suitable remedy, even if that remedy should require us to proceed further than we proceeded last year in the restraint and limitation of personal liberty, and of the ordinary rights of the Constitution. These were the plain statements of my noble Friend in the early part of his speech, and which formed the basis of the rest. Then it is supposed that my noble Friend went on to announce fundamental alterations in the nature of his proposal, and that these alterations were two. In the first place, that as his Motion had been framed, he asked the House, through its Committee, to take upon itself the responsibility of advising Her Majesty's Government with regard to this state of things. I would point out that the speech of my noble Friend at any rate contained an antidote to that misapprehension; because he did state at the very outset that the Government desired to take—as it is their absolute duty to take—the whole responsibility of proposing the necessary remedies. With regard to that point of the case I believe we are at the present moment involved in a technical and formal difficulty. The hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) has proposed what is called "the Previous Question." The effect of that Motion would be, at all events, to prevent my noble Friend from removing from his Motion those words which he has declared were intended exclusively for the purpose of giving scope and breadth to the examination of witnesses; because we think that the witnesses ought not to content themselves with merely describing the existing evils, but that they should also be encouraged to express their opinions upon the whole state of the case, upon the sufficiency of the present remedies, and upon the nature of any others that might be substituted for them. Those opinions of witnesses, in our view, are parts of the facts of the case. But my noble Friend, understanding that there will be no difference of opinion upon that subject, is perfectly ready to remove words which, in his view, will then be mere surplusage, and therefore I trust that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the King's County will withdraw his Amendment—at all events for the time—in order that, consistently with the rules of the House, the Motion of my noble Friend may be amended in that respect. As respects, therefore, one of these leading propositions, the change which has been made by my noble Friend is willingly and freely made to meet the desire which has been expressed; but so far as the intentions of the Government are concerned it implies no alteration whatsoever. The other change made by my noble Friend is that which has reference to the secrecy of the proceedings of the proposed Committee. On that point I will enter into the question of precedents by-and-by; but I wish now simply to define that which he has declared on the part of the Government. The intention of the Government is to bring, as far as lies in their power, the whole of the facts of the case under the view of the Committee; and, so far as their own officers are concerned, there can be no difficulty whatever in taking them before an open Committee—that is to say, a Committee open to the whole world, and whose proceedings are conducted with the intention of publishing the evidence which may be obtained. But the Government anticipate if not as an absolute certainty, yet as highly probable, that the Committee may reach a point where valuable evidence might be got from persons who are accurately informed with respect to the subject of the inquiry, but who still would not venture to give evidence unless they were protected against its publication. That is the nature of the dilemma which appears to me to have been overlooked by many hon. Gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House; and what I wish to be understood is that, while we are willing to give up the proposal that the Committee should sit with doors closed, the key of our proceedings should be found in this—that if we find we cannot obtain the evidence which is necessary to the full elucidation and establishment of the facts of the case without the protection of secrecy, we shall have no hesitation in making it an Instruction to move the Committee to send its Chairman to the House to ask for powers by which that secrecy may be secured. [A laugh.] I am sorry if there be any hon. Gentleman who thinks that a full investigation of the case ought to be surrendered for fear of any supposed odium that may attach to evidence given in secret to Members of this House sitting in Secret Committee; but there can be no mistake about this—that, if we should find it necessary for the full elucidation of the facts to restrain the publication of certain evidence, or even entirely to exclude other Members of the House from the committee-room, we shall deem it our duty to ask for the powers which may be required to attain that object. So much for the nature of our proposal; and let us now look for a moment at the state of the case. My right hon. Friend who has just spoken (Colonel Wilson-Patten) seems to have great difficulty in understanding what is the condition of Ireland according to the view of the Government. He said—"I am not quite satisfied as to what state that country is in."

Perhaps I am stating the case rather too favourably, for I think he said—"I think I am justified in entertaining some doubts as to what that state is, and to what it is to be attributed." But to me it appears that the two statements made on the part of the Government to which he has referred are perfectly consistent one with another. My noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland described the vast improvement which had been effected in the state of the country. "But," he said, "I am not going to claim exclusively for our legislation of a remedial and beneficial character," to which he afterwards referred, "the merit of having effected the great improvements in the social condition of Ireland," of which he was speaking. "I admit that the stringent powers which have been placed in the hands of the Government under the Peace Preservation Act are of the utmost value, and thus it is that two processes have been in operation together to produce the same result." The fact is—that the Peace Preservation Act has enabled the Government to repress the outward signs of discontent, while the beneficial legislation of Parliament has gone to the hearts of the people with its healing and soothing influence, and is performing for the distant, as well as the immediate future, that permanent work which it was its main object to accomplish. ["Oh!"] That statement is met with jeers by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and it is no wonder that when such a statement of opinion is so met by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade should have been led the other night to comment on the apparent unwillingness which exists on the other side of the House to admit that the measures of the last two Sessions should prove to be beneficial in their operation on the condition of Ireland. I do not claim their approval of those measures; but I do claim, on my own part, and on the part of the Government, as well as of the vast majority of the Members of this House, whose character is completely locked up in the legislation of last year and the year before, the right of holding and expressing the view of its action to which I have just given utterance. The main point, I may add, on which my right hon. Friend who has just spoken (Colonel Wilson-Patten) appears to join issue with us is this. He assumes, in the first place, that we have it in our minds to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, and he asks us, therefore, not to go through the intermediate process of a Committee, saying that he is perfectly ready to support us in proposing the suspension of that Act. Now, with all respect to my right hon. Friend, who tells us he knows all about the state of things in Westmeath himself, the willingness to support us in such a policy, which he announces not only for himself, but for those who sit near him, cannot free the Government from their own conviction of that which duty demands. And let me, before I go further, say a word with respect to this question of the state of Westmeath—because we have heard much in the course of this discussion about the failure of our policy in Ireland. Now, my right hon. Friend who has just sat down, at all events, does not seem to share in that view, for he tells us that, with respect to 31 counties, there was no such allegation to make; while, as to the consequences of our policy, we never expected that they would be fully developed in the short period of two years. We are, however, perfectly satisfied with the state of those 31 counties as an answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, when he endeavours to set up against the measures which we have passed that policy which he has recommended—a policy of feeble tampering with landlords, and of all sorts of endowments for all sorts of religions. “But then,” says the right hon. Gentleman, “how ridiculous, how humiliating it is that you should come to this House to find the means of governing a county.” I do not at all see that the course which we ask the House to adopt is open to that charge. It appears to me that if in a particular locality any evils present themselves in the condition of its society, so deep and inveterate in their character, that the existing powers, in the opinion of the Government, are inadequate for the suppression of them, the natural and legitimate course to pursue is to come to Parliament. We have found it necessary to come to Parliament for the purpose of dealing with particular individuals, but we did not ask for a Committee in that case because the facts were patent, while in the present instance they are not; and that being so, we do not think it exactly in conformity with the true action of a

Constitutional Government to ask the House to grant, without inquiry, fresh powers further infringing on the liberty of the subject. [“Oh!”] I hope I may be allowed to comment on the tone which has pervaded the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite on this subject, and I own I am astonished at the manner—I will not say the levity, though that word has been used in this debate—in which they seem to contemplate the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in reference to the suppression of ordinary crime. [“Oh!”] I mean by ordinary crime, crime as against individuals as distinguished from offences against the State—a distinction which is perfectly well understood; and I contend it is the duty of the Government not to arrive at such a conclusion, as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in the case of ordinary crime, until it has investigated and probed to the very bottom the whole of the facts, and, moreover, until it has placed Parliament in possession of all those facts in a manner far more effective than such information can possibly be conveyed in any speech. My right hon. Friend who spoke last has, I may observe, fallen into one of the most extraordinary errors of statement that have ever saluted my ears. He says—“The powers which you are going to ask for are the same as those which we have heretofore granted.” Now, in the first place, my right hon. Friend does not know what powers we are going to ask for. We have not said that in our opinion the Habeas Corpus Act ought to be suspended. If no other effective remedy can be found we must not stop short of that; but we will not even trust ourselves to come to the conclusion that a step so serious as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act is necessary, until the evidence before us is far more effectually sifted. But, beyond that, my right hon. Friend is entirely in error. Powers to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland have never been given in reference to ordinary crime. The case is entirely new. It is a case, I grant, far more grave than in former instances in one respect, because we are dealing with a chronic evil; and because it is an innovation to ask for the suspension of the liberty of the subject with a view to the suppression of ordinary crime. I am afraid this 19th century, for whatever else it may be distinguished, is not remarkable for that firm intellectual grasp of the first principles of political liberty which was so great a characteristic of our forefathers. Am I to be told by my right hon. Friend, one of the fairest and most moderate men in the House, that a Bill such as he invites us to introduce—

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I did not recommend the suspension at all.

MR. GLADSTONE: At all events my right hon. Friend stated that he was perfectly willing to vote for it.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN: I said I was perfectly ready to give the Government additional powers.

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend used the words—"powers which the House granted last year in no stinted measure." What does he mean by that expression? Does he mean the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act? It is because we do think the liberty of the subject something more than the shadow of a name, and it is because we do attach some sanctity to personal and private rights, that we are not willing to put before the House of Commons any request which might ultimately involve an invasion of those rights, until we have also put the grounds of that request under the scrutiny and review of the House of Commons itself. The case is totally different from other cases of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, even if we had made up our minds, and we have not, that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was justified by the facts before us. It is easy, comparatively, to do what we did in 1866. In that year numbers of foreigners came into the country; large seizures of arms were made; multitudes of facts of a positive character that could be stated, in a clear and distinct form, were at our command; they were stated; and the House of Commons acted upon them. But that is not the character of the present situation. "Murder stalking abroad!" It is all very well to use this exaggerated language in the heat of debate; but what said my noble Friend? He stated that there had been four murders, and four attempts at murder, in Westmeath and its immediate neighbourhood. Is that a reason, taken by itself, against the proposal of the Government? I put this question to the House with the utmost seriousness and earnestness—because the right hon. Gentleman, with a lofty estimate of human nature, did not hesitate to say that the self-love of the First Minister was the basis of the present proposal. Sir, the self-love of the First Minister wants no consolation. The First Minister is perfectly satisfied with the results of recent legislation in Ireland. But I want to point out the state of this case with reference to the character of the proposal that we now make. What we have now got to exhibit is not a set of positive facts shown in statistics that would warrant any proposal for another and further invasion of personal liberty. The four murders, and four attempts at murder, which are the statistical facts of the case, combined especially with the great decrease of other agrarian outrages, do not justify any such proposals as have received the sanction of the opposite Bench. ["Oh!"] I mean, of course, in the judgment of the Government. I am not endeavouring to cheat hon. Gentlemen opposite out of their liberty of judgment, but I am saying that, in our view, these figures of murder, and attempts at murder, do not justify a general invasion of the private and personal liberties of the inhabitants of this portion of Ireland. Then, what is the nature of the case that we want to produce? We want to show not the acts which are done, but the acts which are not done. We want to show the invasion of private liberty in detail. We want to show the form which the transactions of private life take as between man and man. Hon. Gentlemen opposite think it is easy to come to this House and report these things as we have received them from the officers of constabulary, and then ask the House of Commons to interfere with the Constitution. In our opinion it is not so easy: it is a case which must be established precept upon precept, line upon line; and the House of Commons, in our judgment, would forfeit its duty, would betray its character as a truly popular representative Assembly, if, upon the mere statement of a Minister, with regard, not to statistical facts on which he might, perhaps, fairly claim their confidence, but to allegations necessarily general, they were willing to accept his statement in a manner so implicit as to place the liberty of every inhabitant in an Irish county at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant. My right hon. Friend (Colonel Wilson-Patten) says that our

means of obtaining information are much larger than those of a Committee. I entirely differ from my right hon. Friend. We have means of obtaining information which a Committee has not. But all that information will pass from us to the Committee. On the other hand, a Committee has means of obtaining information which we have not, and that in two senses. We cannot, by any authority of our own, summon before us the inhabitants of Westmeath, receive their testimony, and cross-examine them upon the subject marked for inquiry. It is in the power of a Committee to do so. It is in the power of a Government to do it through the medium of a Committee. My right hon. Friend says we have the information which magistrates can give. I ask him, does he think the information of a magistrate, conveyed in secret to the constabulary, and by the constabulary to the Lord Lieutenant, and by the Lord Lieutenant to the Cabinet, is entitled to the same weight with this House, in considering the necessity for new legislation, as it would have if that magistrate had appeared before a Committee of this House, impartially constituted, and consisting of the ablest and most judicious of our Members, bringing to bear upon the question all the lights that their minds can supply, with the representatives of Ireland, and of popular principles in Ireland, sitting near to cross-examine him? We contend that the information, even if we could get the same information as to the range of facts, would be of totally different weight and authority, if it were thus gathered by the Government in their secret chambers, from that which it would possess where it had passed under the review and scrutiny of a Committee of this House. And now with regard to precedents. Here, again, my right hon. Friend is under an entire misapprehension. He thinks we have twitted hon. Gentlemen opposite. We have done nothing of the kind, unless by "twitting" my right hon. Friend means a reference to precedents. We merely referred to authority. I think it is a principle which Conservatives will not wholly condemn, and which Liberals will be well satisfied to pursue—I mean that of inquiry on the lines traced out by former usage, instead of putting so extravagant a confidence in their own judgment as to throw overboard everything done by their predecessors. Now, the precedents in this case are important. I will mention that of 1852. And here I cannot help "twitting" not my right hon. Friend, but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) for his condemnation of his own conduct, and, above all, for the grounds on which he bases that condemnation. The case was this—In 1852 some portions of Louth, Armagh, and Monaghan were in a dreadful condition. Life and property were insecure. The right hon. Gentleman, then a Minister of the Crown, says he did not adopt what would have been the proper course, because his Government was weak in this House. Sir, a more astounding confession never was made by a Minister of this country. What! If there is a riot in Palace Yard or Trafalgar Square, is a Minister, weak in this House, to vary one hair's breadth from the course that is necessary for the security of life and property because of the unsatisfactory state of his majority? If the defences of the country are weak, and the number of troops insufficient, is a Government to make it an apology for departing from the first principles of duty that they sit upon this Bench, that they want to sit upon this Bench, and therefore cannot propose measures which, in their opinion, principle justifies, and the safety of the country demands? That, and nothing else than that, is the declaration in which the right hon. Gentleman has handed down to posterity his opinion of his own conduct in 1852. Sir, I do not take so severe a view of the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not understand that on that occasion he made no recommendation to the Committee; but I am willing to assume that there was good cause for it. It seems to me that there was nothing improper in the course then taken—that of inviting the assistance of the House by means of a Committee moved for by an important Member of the Government. The presumption was that that Member of the Government would conduct the proceedings before the Committee, as I have no doubt he did with much ability, and the proposal was, as I contend, a perfectly normal one. It was not the proceeding of a minority. There was a majority in this House as well as a minority, and the majority declared their assent and approval to the appointment of the Committee. I do not know, therefore, why it should be supposed that nothing but a depraved and fastidious self-love has set the present Government upon taking this method of proceeding. I am not afraid of going even further back. Now, with regard to secrecy. There are many modes in which Parliament effects this object. Parliament sometimes requires absolute secrecy, sometimes it imposes partial secrecy. I am not entitled to speak on this subject with authority; but I believe, in the first place, the distinction between a Secret and a non-Secret Committee consists absolutely and solely in this—Members of Parliament are entitled to enter the committee-room if it is not a Secret Committee; they are not entitled to enter if it is a Secret Committee. But I also presume that a Member of Parliament entering a Committee-room, where the investigation was of a nature involving risk to the lives of witnesses if their evidence were divulged, would go beyond his rights, and incur a very heavy responsibility, were he to take upon himself without authority to publish the nature of that evidence. Another course is occasionally taken by this House, and that is, by withholding or suppressing the evidence it has taken, reserving it for the use of the Committee alone, or not publishing it at all. There is another course we have sometimes taken—that of suppressing evidence after it was taken. In 1837-8 I was a member of a Secret Committee upon West India apprenticeship, and, unless my memory greatly deceives me, portions of the evidence, with names, places, and dates in blank, were printed for the use of the Committee; but this evidence was never printed for the use of the House at all. All that, when the matter ceases to be a party question, is settled by the practical common sense of the members of the Committee. Now, do not let hon. Gentlemen be astonished if I go back to the precedents of what are called “bad times.” I shall boldly appeal to the precedents of 1812 and 1817, and I ask the House, if those times were bad, not to make these times worse. It may be said these were bad times, and therefore we will take no notice of what was then done. That would be to me the most left-handed method of reasoning it is possible to adopt. If the years I have named were bad times, why were they bad times? It was because the House of Commons was too subservient, and the Ministers were not sufficiently confiding; because there did not exist that freedom of communication, and that union of action in matters affecting popular liberty, which there ought to have been between the Ministers and this House. Yet in those times, when the Government of Lord Liverpool had strong proposals to make, involving the invasion of personal liberty, they would not do so without laying the evidence on which they relied before a Committee of the House. If, then, the Members of the present House of Commons distinguish themselves from the Members of the House in those days, it ought to be by showing themselves to be not less, but more ready to take on themselves the responsibility of forming a practical judgment in a case of this kind, and, if necessary, of checking, as representatives of the people, the statements and allegations which the Government may think it their duty to bring forward. The precedents I have referred to not only warrant the proposition of a Committee, but a fortiori require that such a course should be taken by the Government, and that they should ask the countenance and approval of the House. Some people will, perhaps, say it is a deplorable fact that after your remedial policy you now ask for stronger powers than you possessed before, or, at least, confess that the weaker powers have failed. I, for one, am not prepared to allow, and my Colleagues have at no time asserted, that the state of Westmeath at this moment, taken all in all, is worse than it has been in many former years. We do not found ourselves on that allegation. I will not even for myself presume to say that it is worse than it was 12 months ago. But we do say that the state of Ireland, and of the Government of Ireland, is, and has been—I am speaking of the Executive Government necessarily—in many respects defective, and even deplorable. The Government have been obliged to wink at a state of crime or intimidation which, in well-governed countries, is intolerable. What we think is this—in proposing remedial legislation we conceive that we come under new obligations as guardians of public order, and owe a more strict and solemn duty to public order than when there were great causes of grievance on the statute book. It is not so much because we assert that the state of Westmeath is now worse than in former times that we propose a Committee of Inquiry; but it is because we think that the state of Westmeath is a disgrace to a civilized country, that we are of opinion its condition demands the attention of Parliament. We have received by telegram a statement from the foreman of the grand jury assembled at Mullingar. I do not know whether the words are his, or those of the grand jury; but it appears that they support the allegation in the Motion with respect to the existence of an unlawful combination and confederacy—they do so from their own experience, and from the evidence coming before them in cases now brought forward at the assizes. Our duty will be to lay before the Committee all the evidence we can obtain bearing on the case. I have received from a Member of this House a letter written to him by a large landed proprietor in Westmeath, referring to a conversation he had with another landed proprietor, in the course of which they both expressed opinions as to the evils existing, and of the remedy that might be adopted for their prevention; but to the question whether the statement could with safety be made public, the answer was that in the opinion of the writer it could not. Therefore, evidence of that kind might be had if the tendering of it did not entail personal danger. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has asked—What is the Committee to do? If the words in which we have framed our Motion are justly open to censure or criticism, I admit that we might have indicated more clearly and distinctly the purposes to which the attention of the Committee would be directed. As to the question—What is the Committee to do? I will answer that question in two words—because I want to draw a broad distinction between the collection and elucidation of facts, and the responsible duty of making recommendations founded on those facts. In the collection and elucidation of facts we have exhausted the means properly in our hands as an Executive Government; and we believe we might obtain valuable aid from the House of Commons; and we think that the House of Commons, through the Irish representatives, will prove a salutary check on our proceedings. We think that the powers which this House possesses can be exercised in a perfectly salutary way as a check on our proceedings, by testing and scrutinizing our facts, and it is for this reason that we ask for the assistance of a Committee. But let us consider what these facts are. There can be no difficulty in perceiving what kind of facts it will be our duty to bring before the consideration of the Committee. First of all, there will be all that class of negative evidence which will go to establish what we believe to exist—namely, an extensive system of terrorism, supported, in case of need, by personal violence. But, independently of that, there is another matter which we should wish to examine by aid of the Committee, and that is, how have the Government used the powers given them under the Peace Preservation Act? Seeing that Parliament last year intrusted us with large stringent powers, and seeing that we declare that still more stringent powers are required in reference to the state of Westmeath, is it not right that the House of Commons should inquire whether or not we have neglected properly to use the powers given us? My hon. Friend the Member for Cork County (Mr. Downing), in the most frank manner, raised an issue, which I admit to be the true issue on this occasion—for I think that on the other side the House an entirely false issue has been raised. My hon. Friend asked whether the Government have fully used the powers given by the Peace Preservation Act? How is it possible for us not to listen to the appeal involved in the question of my hon. Friend? Are you to take for granted that we have done all that we ought to have done? Is our conduct such as to induce an implicit belief that we have put in force the powers of the Peace Preservation Act of last year? I must say that there is another question which it is important for us to examine, and which it is very difficult for the Executive to examine adequately. It is the helplessness and inaction of society in Westmeath. Now, why is government easy in this country? Not, God knows, from want of criminal elements amongst the population, but from the vigorous and healthy tone of social life, which makes men of whatever class an ally of the law. Unfortunately, that is not the case in Ireland; nor do I venture to blame those to whom that observation would apply. But, supposing we do arrive at the conclusion that powers beyond the ordinary limits of the Constitution are required by the condition of Westmeath, there is another most important question lying in perspective which no party imputations, and no party cheering, can in the slightest degree help to solve. When you say you are ready to vote for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, does that mean that you are ready to vote for it until Ribandism has ceased to mark the county of Westmeath? Are we to enter into a race of obstinacy and perseverance with these criminals? Is it to be renewed from time to time? Are we to continue, from time to time, to teach all other members of society to rely entirely upon our innovations upon the Constitution—never to look to themselves—never to assist the law? Sir, I must say a graver subject than this cannot possibly be opened. It is one of those subjects not only as respects the proposal now to be made, but as respects what is to follow that proposal, with reference to which duty not only permits, but requires us, to exchange counsels and advise with the freely-elected representatives of England. There is no want of employment for the Committee, even if it were merely to consider the evidence supplied by the constabulary; a scrutiny by Members of Parliament into the mere question of the efficiency of the constabulary as agents of the Administration would be a most efficient aid and check to the operations of the Government on this point. I admit that if my hon. Friend (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) were the only man in this House who challenged us to show that we have used the powers conferred by the Peace Preservation Act, I would say—as it is impossible to give him within the compass of a speech such an answer as would convince him that we have—that we wish to begin our proceedings with the fullest exposition of the facts we possess, and to add to them by inviting all who can assist us to give us all the information in their power. And we would do this in order to get his vote, because we know him to be a man who can withstand popular disapprobation, and overcome popular misapprehension, as he showed last year in connection with the Land Bill, and in order to obtain that union of sentiment to which my hon. Friend adverted. For that very purpose it is that we want to begin our proceedings by a full exhibition of the facts of which we are in possession, by subjecting them to scrutiny, and inviting other information. That being the case, we lay our proposal, as a deliberate proposal adopted by us under circumstances of great gravity, before this House. We are convinced that it is impossible for the House to refuse us the assistance we ask. We have acted on the best investigation of the case we can make; we have acted in conformity with the precedents which former times afford us, modifying our strict adherence to precedent only so as to adapt our procedure to a more largely extended state of popular representation. Acting, as we do in this case, upon the immediate elementary obligations of a Government, at all hazards to secure personal peace and freedom in the transactions of life, we submit our proposal to the House, and we are confident it will receive the approval of its reflective and deliberate judgment.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he could not refrain from addressing the House, for the explanations afforded by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the necessity for a Committee were eminently unsatisfactory. Unfortunately, he did not hear the first part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown; but, judging from what he did hear, and from the speeches of the late and present Secretary for Ireland, he was totally unable to perceive what purpose was to be effected, or what evidence was to be derived from the appointment of a Committee which the Government were not able to obtain for themselves without such appointment. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, it was true, had suggested the possibility that if the Committee was a secret one a certain amount of valuable evidence might be obtained from persons who might otherwise withhold it. If that were so, and the Government could demonstrate that by means of a Secret Committee, and by that means alone, evidence could be obtained, and power could be placed in their hands sufficient to enable them to cope with the evils which unquestionably existed, he had no hesitation in saying that they would receive the support of every hon. Gentleman on that (the Opposition) side of the House. But the Government had made out no such case. On the contrary, so little importance did the Government attach to this evidence that the noble Marquess the Chief Secretary expressed his opinion that it mattered little whether the Committee was secret or not. He maintained that, so far as they had heard, there was nothing to justify the House in believing that the appointment of such a Committee was necessary for the suppression of the evils which now existed; and he was confirmed in that view by the fact that the Government themselves must already be in possession of evidence of the strongest possible character. It had been said that it would be no part of the duty of the Committee to suggest a remedy. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had studiously avoided telling the House whether the Government were prepared with a remedy or not. What he wanted to know was whether the Government were prepared with a remedy, or were they not so prepared? If they were, why not tell it to the House at once, and proceed to the application of remedial measures? If not, the Government had clearly abrogated the functions and duty of a Government in a manner which deserved the condemnation of the House and of the country. The Government had declared to that House that in one portion of Ireland the state of the country was such as to be absolutely intolerable; they had given harrowing descriptions of outrages which were stated to be of daily occurrence; they had stated that a reign of terror existed universally in that part of the country; and yet, one hon. Member (Mr. W. H. Gregory), a warm and consistent supporter of the Government, had told the House that the police at this moment could lay their hands upon some of the authors of the murders which horrified the country, if they had but authority to do so. In spite of assertions like this Her Majesty's Government had no other remedy to propose than simply a recommendation for a long and protracted, and, to the people chiefly concerned, probably, a most perilous delay. When he listened to the statement made by the Chief Secretary the other night, and when he read accounts of the murders and outrages which had been perpetrated within the last few days, he was tempted to ask—"Whence come all this miserable vacillation, and by whom are these hesitating, faltering councils directed?" The Chief Secretary, in proposing the Motion, performed his task in a manner most unlike him; his manner evidently showed that the task he had undertaken was most uncongenial to him. To shirk responsibility was foreign to the character of his noble Friend. Why did not the Government come forward like men and frankly avow that, in spite of all their remedial measures, they were still unable to cope with the difficulties of Ireland, and upon this head demand the assistance that would be so readily given by the House? It was true that by that course they might have laid themselves open to taunts on both sides of the House, but that should have been no bar to taking a straightforward course. He certainly should vote against the proposition of the Government—he should do so in the hope of compelling them to revise their policy. If they would do that he could promise them that, instead of exposing themselves to that ridicule and contempt which their present proposal had universally met with, they would receive the cordial support of every man of honour and intelligence throughout the country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I am very glad that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has risen thus early and definitely explained the views of the Ministry upon this important subject; because, whatever doubts hon. Gentlemen who sit near me may have had as to the course which we ought to pursue with regard to the policy indicated by my noble Friend the Chief Secretary, we can have no doubt now. I think the House will agree with me that almost everyone who has spoken on this question—even including my noble Friend the Chief Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. W. H. Gregory)—admits that this Motion is a great mistake. I am bound to say that, having listened to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, it is impossible not to give way to a feeling of sympathy for the Government on being obliged to come forward to make a Motion of this kind. I can understand a weak Government shrinking from responsibility in the midst of such a dilemma as that in which the Government finds itself, and concealing itself under such a Motion as this; but this is a Government which, above all others, has placarded its efficiency, particularly as regards Ireland; and I cannot help thinking it must be in a fair way to understand that it has signally failed to bring about that which, by the most extravagant legislation, it too fondly hoped to accomplish. I am bound to say, with my hon. Friend opposite, that I listened to the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland with a great deal of pleasure, for it was the speech of an honest man—it was the speech of a man who was saying that which he did not quite feel to be right. So honest was it that he convinced me that he did not approve the policy he was recommended to advocate. I understand that the Government intend to insist on this secret investigation; but I would say let them withdraw it. This is not the first time, even within the past week, that they have had to withdraw from a position they had taken up. A week ago there was a strong position taken up by the Government in favour of a Joint Committee upon Indian affairs; but so strong was the opposition of the House to such a defective scheme that they were practically beaten, and they had to withdraw from it. A few days ago they recommended this Secret Committee for Ireland, and I had since understood that the proposal was to be withdrawn; but now I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that it is not withdrawn. I would ask—I would implore somebody on the Treasury Bench to get up and say, in a plain, unmistakeable manner—not with a cloud of words, which it is really entertaining to listen to, but which fail to convey to the House what the Government mean to do—I would ask someone on the Treasury Bench to get up and state what the Government mean to do in this matter. I can well understand how my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland should have made use of these words—that he spoke with “feelings of dismal dismay.” [An hon. MEMBER: Painful dismay.] I accept the correction; but it might have been “dismal dismay,” seeing that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire told him to pluck up his courage and not be downhearted. But, after my noble Friend sat down, I was surprised to hear what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary. He directly, in words, contradicted the statement made by my noble Friend. Actually, after the speech of “painful dismay,” and “the most difficult position” and “the intolerable state of things” in which my noble Friend found himself, up got the late Chief Secretary, and speaking in a whirlwind of official passion, which carried away nobody but himself—what did he say? The late Chief Secretary for Ireland said—

Well, now, if that is a true picture of the state of Ireland, in God's name why come down here and insult our patience by asking for such an inquiry as this? Why do you placard Ireland at the bar of public opinion, and hold her up to the scorn of Europe as rife with assassination and murder? What did my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland say was the object of this inquiry? His language was very different from that of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister founded himself entirely upon precedents. He said—“We are disposed to take our stand on the precedents of 1812, 1817, and 1818.” He said—“We want the House of Commons to act as a check upon us.” [An hon. MEMBER: The Irish Members.] Yes, we want Irish Members to exercise a salutary check upon us. Why, everybody in the country is trying to goad on the Government to show some spirit in its proceedings. But why did my noble Friend ask for this inquiry? He said—“We don't want to evade responsibility; we do not even ask the Committee for a remedy; we merely ask the Committee to inquire into the best means of suppressing this state of things.” Now, really, I pity the position in which my noble Friend the Chief Secretary finds himself when he has to make statements of this kind. He says he does not seek to evade responsibility, but merely that the Committee should consider the best means of suppressing this state of things in Westmeath. I think those words are now proposed by the Prime Minister to be omitted; but I do not think that at all alters the position of the case. Sir, I am one of those who think that the Motion is altogether a mistake—it is a bad Motion and ought to be resisted, particularly by Irish Members. I can hardly conceive that one hon. Member from Ireland would dare to go into the same Lobby with the Prime Minister. My noble Friend the Chief Secretary says, “We want to check Ri-

bandism in Westmeath, Meath, and in parts of the King's County; but we do not want to fetter our action by any rigid line." Now, no doubt, he is perfectly right there, because anyone who has had any connection with Ireland knows that Ribandism is not confined exclusively to Meath, Westmeath, or the King's County. It has ramifications, as I know of my own knowledge, through various parts of Ireland—in fact, when I was in Ireland almost the only Province of Ireland comparatively free of Ribandism was Connaught. In Sligo there was the slightest taint of disaffection; but with that exception the Province of Connaught was almost entirely free from Ribandism. My noble Friend truly described the origin and organization of this most terrible society. Anyone who takes the trouble to read the Report of the Committee of 1832 will obtain a complete account of Ribandism, and Whiteboyism—another class of illegal societies. They are fully described there. But what surprised me in the statement of my noble Friend the Chief Secretary was when he alluded to the return of crimes committed in Ireland to justify this Motion. He says the number of agrarian crimes in January, 1870, amounted to 321; and the number of agrarian crimes in January, 1871, amounted only to 35. But surely that would hardly justify the Government in coming down and asking a Committee of this nature. What was the state of Ireland in 1837, at the time of Lord Melbourne's Government? Will the House believe it—such was the state of Ireland that, in the year 1837, the number of murders committed were 722—an average of nearly two a-day. In the county of Tipperary alone there were 124. Could the state of affairs be more formidable? What did the Government then do? They did not come down and ask for a Committee of Inquiry: but they proceeded to act—as I think they were justified in doing. I will take the county of Westmeath, the centre and hotbed of Ribandism. It contains a purely agricultural population. It is 30 miles long, and 40 wide. The population is of a very limited character. In that county there are 128 local magistrates. Do not tell me that if they were disposed to do their duty we should not need this inquiry. I do not blame them, because I know the terrorism that is exercised over them. But with a constabulary in Ireland amounting to nearly 13,000, costing this country nearly £1,000,000, including the expense of the stipendiary magistrates, it does appear extraordinary that the Government cannot blot out this taint from the county of Westmeath. I cannot help thinking there must be some under-current—some division in the Government in regard to this Motion. I am quite satisfied my noble Friend did not, of his own mind and determination, bring it forward. It certainly comes from some other source. I do not know how far the Vice Lieutenant of the county of Westmeath—a very great Radical by-the-by, and recently made a Peer, as a sop, I suppose, to the Liberal party—gave advice to the Government on the subject; but there must be some under-current or division in the Government in relation to it which has not yet been explained to the House. Now I want to point out to the House the position we are in, because the policy of the Government not only on this question, but on a great many others that come before us, exhibits a series of contradictions, of compromises, Commissions, and Committees that really are most perplexing. I have been in this House for now a quarter of a century, but never recollect a Government conducted on such principles before. Last year, as everybody admitted, was a Session of compromises; this year we have nothing but Commissions and Committees to inquire into different matters. Look at the contradiction in which the Government have exposed themselves in regard to the Church government of Ireland. Last year the Prime Minister, upon the plea of complete religious equality, and for the full development of civil and religious liberty, came down to the House and disestablished the Protestant Church of Ireland. This year that same Minister, under Royal authority, supports the spirituality of the Pope, who condemned as heresy these same principles of civil and religious liberty which the Minister takes as his guiding star in the conduct of affairs with regard to the Protestant Church of Ireland. I can recommend that point with confidence to the digestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid). But mind—I do not ask him to write me a letter. Well, now I will take the other point. Take the Irish Land Bill. Just consider the position of Ireland with regard to the Land Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. O. Fortescue), on his re-election the other day, told his constituents that he hoped the landlords of Ireland were beginning to understand the effect of the measure; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), in a speech to his constituents, said it was merely a compromise, to be followed by other enactments. God help the Irish landlords say I; and if you want to know what the effect of the Irish Land Bill is, you can read in a few lines the opinion of one of the staunchest supporters of Her Majesty's Government. I hold in my hand the opinion recently given by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), whom I know of old when I was in Ireland as a most energetic and vigorous agitator. The other day he went to his constituents to speak to them about this very Bill, and what did he say? He said—

“That the day the Queen's sign-manual was attached to the Bill converting its provisions into absolute law, property to the amount of over £70,000,000 sterling passed by that stroke of the pen from one side of the ledger to the other. The property which, the day before the Bill was signed by the Queen, was the property of the landlords of Ireland, became the day following—nay, the very instant the Bill was signed—the property of the tenantry of Ireland.”

Is that a just act of legislation? Will that bring peace to Ireland? And now this year we have a Governmental policy of Committees and Commissions. We may, and I think we shall, have a very stormy Session—indeed, I think, the Government are preparing for it by shunting as much as possible of Public Business into Commissions and Committees. But of all the Commissions I ever heard of that which they proposed the other day was the most extraordinary. A first-class man-of-war with 500 souls on board foundered at sea. [“Question!”] It is the Question, as I shall show my hon. Friend below me. I am showing how the policy of the Government is a policy of Commissions and Committees. Last year their policy was one of contradictions and compromises, and we are asked this year to take everything into consideration through the agency of Commissions and Committees. A first-class man-of-war, with 500 souls on board, founders at sea. The Government shelters itself behind the responsibility of subordinates, and it appoints a Commission for the purpose—of what?—for the purpose of doing that which is the necessary effect of a Commission—namely, of “smothering the truth and of obstructing investigation and true inquiry.” Those are not my words—they are the words of a man who has stood high in the estimation of this House. They are the words of Sir George Cornwall Lewis. However, I am not going to pursue this further. I merely refer to it to show that we are drifting into that policy of Commissions and Committees which I believe to be very objectionable, and to which I am sure the good sense of the House must be opposed. But, having said that, I want to say a word or two about Ireland—with which I had the honour of being connected officially as Chief Secretary longer than any man in this House, and, I believe, with one exception, than any man in this country. I want to ask the House and the country why is it that Ireland still presents such an anomaly to the world as it does? Ireland, blessed with a fertile soil, with very great advantages, capable of vast industrial development—why is it that she should present such an anomaly to the world? Why is it that she should be discontented and be rent by factions and disturbances as she is? For 70 years Parliaments and Governments have been endeavouring to deal with that country by all the contrivances they could propose, but they have never been able to eradicate the evils that exist. We had hoped when the present Government came into power two years ago that they would propose measures for the good of Ireland. They did propose two; but the one, in my opinion, rendered half of Ireland disaffected, while the other dissatisfied the whole of the population. The Land Bill unquestionably had that effect; and when it is calmly and fairly considered now, it cannot be said to be a measure beneficial to Ireland. But I would now refer to the expression which fell from the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. In alluding to what I have already quoted, he said that Ireland was confident in the future, that she was loyal, and that she was contented. I am bound to say I cannot think that Ireland is contented. I cannot think she is satisfied. I do not think your policy—the policy of this country for 70 years—has been what it should be for Ireland; and I would recommend a plan which might, perhaps, be preferable. I want to make a suggestion to the House and to the country. Why should not the House of Commons give an estate in Ireland to the Prince of Wales? Why should not the heir to the Crown go to Ireland occasionally? The Irish people know nothing whatever of Royalty—nothing whatever of the influence of the Crown; and, I am bound to say, I think it would produce a most beneficial result if steps were taken for giving effect to a proposal of that kind. Now, Sir, I will not detain the House any more. I am obliged to hon. Members for having listened so patiently to what I have said, and I will merely refer once more to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue)—a statement which I heard with pain. He said there were some Members within these walls who hope to see the failure of the measures which the Government propose. Now, I am not one of those. I do not wish to see the measures proposed by the Government, and passed, fail. I hope to see the anticipations and apprehensions which I might have formed dispelled; but I do not want to see those measures fail in carrying out beneficial results for the welfare of Ireland. In common with every man who considers the state of Ireland, I do want to see Ireland contented; I do want to see her satisfied—and I feel convinced that you must adopt another policy from that which the Government have been pursuing for the last two years to attain such a result; and I do think—I do in my conscience believe—that if some such suggestion as I have thrown out as regards inviting a member of the Royal Family from time to time to visit Ireland were carried into execution—I do think it would recommend itself to the favourable judgment of this country, and I do believe that, more than anything else, more than all your Commissions, and your Secret Committees, and your crude acts of legislation, it would have the effect of enlisting in favour of Imperial interests the kindly sympathies and the generous hearts of the Irish people.

MR. O'REILLY said, that it was with very great regret that he found himself constrained to oppose the proposal of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland for the appointment of this Committee, as useless and as creating an evil precedent. He regarded it as useless, because he believed that it would not obtain any valuable evidence or any evidence that would bear weight. Those who had evidence of importance to give would give it without going before a Committee, and the only further evidence that would be obtained by hearing the witnesses in private would be stories of individual intimidation which must be worthless unless they were sifted. The justices of the peace and grand jurors of Westmeath would no more shrink from giving their evidence in public than they had shrunk from making in public the statements they had already made. Evidence, moreover, which was intended to lead to legislation which would command the confidence of the country and of right-thinking men in Ireland should be evidence which Parliament could weigh, and to which they could point as a justification for any cause which might subsequently be taken. In the case of political crimes, apprehended invasion, or open insurrection, the Government might be in possession of information which it was not desirable to disclose, because this would be giving information to the common enemy. But when the inquiry had direct reference to legislation which might affect the liberty of the subject, similar reasons could not be advanced for giving the evidence in private; for it was not merely the House of Commons, but the community which would be affected by the legislation, that it was necessary to convince. He had not shrunk from supporting measures of exceptional severity towards Ireland when these were proposed upon the responsibility of the Government, but he should shrink from supporting any measures resting upon evidence which could not be publicly adduced. According to the forms of the House, moreover, this evidence, though given in secret, would be without the sanction of an oath. As to the Riband organization in Westmeath, he had known that county for 25 years, and he had never known it free from the curse of Ribandism; and he admitted that when so much had been done to remove every cause of complaint in Ireland that strong measures of repression were justifiable in the case of exceptional crimes. But it was too much to expect that recent legislation would all at once eradicate an evil of ancient growth. For the county in which he himself resided, and for other counties with which he was connected, he could say that the legislation of the last two Sessions, and especially the Land Bill, had done much to promote and spread a feeling of trust in the justice of Parliament, and also a feeling of mutual confidence and content, which had already produced much good, and would produce more, in the repression of crime.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he would not attempt to follow the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) in his endeavours to suggest means for conciliating the sister island; but he fully concurred with him, and with the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), in deprecating some expressions which, unfortunately, though, doubtless, unintentionally, fell from the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman said that there were many Members of the House who desired the failure of the measures proposed by Government with reference to Ireland. He believed that for those words there existed no justification whatever. For his own part, strongly as he had been opposed to the "remedial measures" of the last two Sessions, the moment they became law he wished as heartily as any Member of the Government could do that those effects which the Government anticipated might follow from them; and that sentiment, he believed, was shared by every Member upon that side of the House. He confessed that the course taken by the Government upon this question had much astonished him. He came down expecting that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary, in moving for this Committee, would have taken credit for the general success of their remedial measures, and would have told them that the greater part of Ireland was free from crime, and enjoying progressive prosperity; but that they desired to have their hands strengthened for dealing with one exceptional plague spot. Instead of this, the Government proposed to divest themselves of all responsibility, and to cast this on the shoulders of a Committee of the House. He had no wish to speak disrespectfully of Committees up-stairs; but they all knew what was meant by the action of a Select Committee. The inquiry, it was now understood, was not to be a secret inquiry. How could such an inquiry be expected in any way to strengthen the hands of the Government, when it was apparent that the evidence given by persons before the Committee, exposing the real state of things, might reach their own neighbourhood, in which their lives afterwards would not be worth an hour's purchase? He objected to a Committee, because he believed its action would be productive of delay. If the case was urgent—and the contents of the newspapers for the last two days were not re-assuring on that point—then action ought to be immediate, and the delay of weeks which must attend the action of a Committee was not a way in which the Government ought to meet the emergency. In giving a vote upon this question, he felt that he could not support the hon. Member who had moved the Previous Question, because by doing so he should be voting against all action in this matter. But when they came to the Motion itself, he thought the more dignified course for Members upon his side of the House would be to abstain from any action whatever in the matter, but to throw the responsibility entirely upon the Government. He believed the course the Government proposed to take was a wrong one; but, until those who sat on his side of the House could show a better plan, and undertake to carry it into execution—which was not likely in the present state of parties—they would best consult their own interests by not taking part in the vote on the question before the House.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was with unfeigned reluctance that so soon after his entrance into the House he was compelled to request the indulgence of hon. Members while explaining the reasons for the vote which, in justice to his constituents, he was about to give. The part of the country from which he came (Galway) had been truly described by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) as having never been tainted with Ribandism, or even with agrarian crime. Nevertheless, the people of that province took a deep interest in all that concerned other parts of the country. He thought it right, then, to state that Ribandism was not a crime of universal application in Ireland; it was a special and local blot very similar to the crimes which formerly occurred in Sheffield, and were known as Trades Union outrages. Many years ago Ribandism was regarded as a mode of revenging agrarian injuries; but recent legislation had worked a change in the light in which it was regarded by the people. No one who knew anything of the subject could doubt that the whole mind of Ireland had been changed by the legislation of the last two years. There was not a barrister practising at the criminal bar who was unaware of the fact that the heads of the Riband conspiracy were persons who were perfectly well known, and who had been conspirators all their lives. He believed that political conspiracy resembled dram drinking, and that those who had once indulged in it never ceased to require the excitement as long as they lived. The Riband conspiracy could not be put down until death put an end to those who were at the head of it. The information which he felt assured was in the possession of the Government must show that the authors and abettors of the conspiracy in Westmeath were as well known as the Members of the House of Commons, and he feared the Committee would find that persons of high station in that county went in such dread of their lives that they were in the habit of paying black mail in order to be free from the operations of the Riband conspiracy. Surely, if this were the case, the best way to attain the object in view would be for the Government to ask for power to at once seize those persons who were conspirators by nature and habit, and who would never cease to be so as long as they were at large. The Riband Society was a secret society; and if this Committee were appointed, he was certain it would supply a taunt against the Government which would be used in the future—its conclusions would not be acquiesced in, and its authority would be questioned. The Ribandmen would say—"Ours is a Secret Society, and the Government meets us by a Secret Committee." If the words about secrecy had not been virtually withdrawn, he could not have voted for the Government; but if the Government were of opinion that the facts of the case were not sufficiently elucidated, and if the proceedings of the Committee were, save under some very extraordinary circumstances, to be open to all Members of the House, and subsequently to the whole of the United Kingdom, he was prepared to give his support to the Government. It would, he believed, be found that this conspiracy was the work of a very few individuals. The society had ceased to be agrarian and had become perfectly intolerable, for it interfered with every relation of life. No man could discharge a servant in the county of Westmeath without feeling he was liable to be tried for his life by that horrible tribunal. Even the servants of the railway companies in minor situations could no longer discharge with impunity their duties to their employers. If it were necessary to show that Ireland was at heart sound and content with the legislation of the last two years, he would give his vote in favour of the appointment of the Committee. The inquiry would, he felt convinced, show that the Irish people in general were grateful for what had been done for them; and that if a foul blot still existed in one portion of the country, it arose from causes with regard to which the Legislature could not provide an immediate remedy. In consequence of a remark which fell from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, who dared any Irish Member to support the Motion for this Committee, he felt that if he did so silently his conduct might be misunderstood not only in the House, but also in the county he had the honour of representing. It was with pain that he addressed himself to a subject so disagreeable; but he trusted that on a future day his lot might be more happy, and that he might be able to convey to this country the grateful thanks of a people who had become united in the desire to promote peace, prosperity, and tranquillity in their island in union with this kingdom.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he rose to refer to an expression used on Tuesday evening by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said—

"Probably, most hon. Members know as well as I do what is the nature and object of a Riband Society. Originally it had something of a religious and political character about it. I believe it began as a Roman Catholic organization for the protection of its adherents against the Orange Society."

As a member of the Orange Society he could not sit still and listen to the no doubt unintentional misrepresentation by the noble Lord of the principles and character of that Society. A work published by the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis in 1836 showed that the Riband Society dated as far back as 1784, though it did not assume its present name until 1798; whereas the Orange Society was not founded till 1795—so that the noble Lord's statement was manifestly incorrect. The great objects of the Orange Society were very different from those of the Riband Society, and as the former might be unknown to many hon. Members he would read the following extract from the authorized rules and regulations of the Orange Institution:—

“The Institution is composed of Protestants, united, and resolved to the utmost of their power, to support and defend the rightful Sovereign, the Protestant religion, the laws of the realm, the legislative Union, and the Succession to the Throne in the House of Brunswick, being Protestant; and united, further, for the defence of their own persons and properties, and the maintenance of the public peace. It is exclusively an association of those who are attached to the religion of the Reformation, and will not admit into its brotherhood persons whom an intolerant spirit leads to persecute, injure, or upbraid any man on account of his religious opinions.”

So far, therefore, from the Riband Society being founded for self protection against the Orange Society, the latter was established for the protection of life, liberty, and religion long after the former existed. The Orange Society was still a bond of union between Great Britain and Ireland, its members being anxious to uphold the authority of the Crown and the maintenance of law and order. On the present occasion he should not venture to criticize the general policy of the Government. With much of that policy he concurred; with much of it he was totally at variance. He objected to the proposal for a Select Committee, and to the addition of the words indicating that it was to be a Secret Committee. He would put to the Government the question asked the other evening by the President of the Poor Law Board when speaking on the subject of local taxation—“Are we to go on inquiring, or shall the Government produce a Bill?” He admitted he had some doubt as to the course he should take in reference to the present proposal until he heard the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government; but the speech of the Prime Minister had convinced him that he was bound to give it his most uncompromising opposition. If a Secret Committee were appointed, the witnesses examined before it would be shot on their return to Ireland. The absence of certain persons would be marked—it would be well-known what they were absent for—and they would return doomed men. It had been asserted that a magistrate of Westmeath had paid black mail in order to avoid being shot, and that certain magistrates had declined an invitation to dine with the Lord Lieutenant, because they thought they could not safely leave their own residences. He did not give the latter statement on his own authority, but it was stated two days ago in The Dublin Evening Mail. If there were a necessity for doing anything, Her Majesty's Government, he hoped, would not hesitate to take immediate action, instead of shirking responsibility and throwing the odium of a coercive measure on the House of Commons.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN said, he regretted that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had left the House, for he had used language offensive to Irish Members by saying that not one of them would dare to go into the Lobby with the Government on this occasion. One Irish Member had already answered the challenge, and he (Sir Dominic Corrigan) would make a second; although he should have opposed the Motion had it been persevered in in its original form. The impression that this was to be a Secret Committee, such as had not sat for half a century, had gone abroad, and had been used as a means of exciting hostility against the Government. That misapprehension had now been removed. The words, also, that the Committee was to devise means for the suppression of the disturbances were to be omitted. Therefore, it would remain a mere Motion for a Committee to ascertain the truth. Could anybody object to such a Committee as that? His reasons for supporting the Motion were these—It was due to Ireland herself. There could be no question that murder stalked abroad, and God would not bless the country from which the cry of murder arose to heaven. It was due to the Government to grant the Committee, because they were really upon their trial in reference to their Irish policy, and it should be ascertained how far that policy had promoted the welfare of the country. He should vote for inquiry in defence of his countrymen, because he believed that the murders were the work of only a very few bad men among a population far less than that of Sheffield, scattered over a whole county. The county of Westmeath was the smallest in Ireland, and it was very thinly populated. Eloquent as the speech of the right hon. Member for Bucks was, it convinced him that he ought to vote for this Motion in its present form. The right hon. Gentleman had called the Land Bill "legalized confiscation;" but if that Bill had not been passed the dark pall of midnight murder would have covered the whole country; nights would have been spent in murdering landlords, and days in executing tenants. There would, indeed, have been a war of extermination between landlords and tenants. The right hon. Gentleman also called the Church Disestablishment Bill the "consecration of sacrilege;" but if that Bill had not been passed, there would have arisen a combination of 5,000,000 of Catholics and Nonconformists—intellect would have been combined with right, and such a combination must have ultimately prevailed. It had also been said that the Ministry had "condoned high treason;" but his only charge against them was that they had not let the prisoners out soon enough, for the agitation caused here and in America by their long detention had done far more harm than their earlier release would have done.

VISCOUNT ROYSTON said, he did not at all doubt that the Irish Members would be actuated by what they deemed best for their country; but he did not at all admit that the question was one which might be well discussed by other than Irish Members; he maintained that if other Members entertained opinions upon the subject, it was perfectly fair and just that they should express those opinions. The matter was one which did not affect Ireland alone. He quite concurred with his right hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten) that the feelings of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in bringing forward this Motion, were such as to command the respect of the House; but, without disregarding those feelings, they might still be allowed to dispute the policy of the Government as indicated by the Resolution. The noble Lord said that, in the opinion of the Government, a conspiracy existed, that it was an intolerable state of things, and that they were determined to apply a remedy. On his side the House there was the most perfect accord with the Government that they should apply a remedy for this deplorable state of things; but the noble Lord himself said the Government did not require the Committee to discover the remedy—that it was the duty of the Government to do this, and that they asked for the Committee to assist the Government by examining into the facts. Why, then, were they asked for a Committee at all? He quite agreed with the noble Lord that the evils now to be dealt with could not be best met by legislating in haste or in panic; but, at the same time, such a Committee as was now proposed could hardly finish its labours before the end of the Session, and, before the Committee reported, the Government would be unable to apply the remedy. The stern exigencies of the case described to them so forcibly by the Government would scarcely admit of such protracted delay. The noble Lord had told them they had had enough of hasty legislation. Was the noble Lord then referring to the Irish Church and the Irish Land Bill? ["No!"] Then, to what hasty legislation did he refer? [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: To the Coercion Bill, passed almost in a single day.] The Coercion Bill of last year certainly was not one for which his side of the House was responsible. The present proposition was that they should enter upon a prolonged discussion in Secret Committee before they could legislate for the benefit of Ireland; and he did not think that sufficient ground had been laid for granting the Committee, and they must themselves see that their present proposition was repugnant to the general feeling of the House. Hardly anybody but the hon. Member who had just sat down had said a word in its favour. The taunt of the President of the Board of Trade levelled against his side of the House, that they took pleasure in the failure of the legislation of the last two years, was unfounded and unjust. There was every disposition on that side to support the Government in upholding the authority of the law in Ireland; but the question was, was it necessary or right that a Committee of that House should investigate matters on which the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government admitted that they were perfectly well informed? [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] That was the impression conveyed by the remarks of the noble Lord; and, certainly, the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland in the county of Meath—which was not free from the vices that contaminated Westmeath—had, within the last 48 hours, declared that a terrible state of things existed—that the persons threatened with assassination might be few in number; but that men were lying in wait, watching, tiger-like, for their victims, and that no law could bring prosperity to a community so situated; and that though the persons threatened might be but few in number, no one could tell but what he was one. Such an opinion from such a quarter was pretty strong evidence that the Government were perfectly aware of the state of things that existed in those counties that were under the ban of Ribandism. The noble Lord the Chief Secretary had urged the appointment of the Committee for the sake of the Government themselves, for the sake of the House, and also in justice to the people of Ireland. Why should a Government so strong in Parliamentary support and administrative ability ask for such a Committee for its own sake? Then, as to appointing it for the sake of the House, the opinion of the House was manifestly against granting the Committee. Nor did he think it would be for the welfare of the people of Ireland to grant it. His belief was that the Committee so far from being for the welfare of Ireland, would cause great dissatisfaction there. It would be a dangerous thing to transport to this country to give evidence persons whose opinions would be pretty well known, and the people of Ireland ought not to be exposed to this risk. The Prime Minister assumed that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Wilson-Patten) had demanded the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. As far as his memory served him, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman made no mention of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, although he would not say that might not have been his meaning; but there had not been a general indication of opinion on his side that such a measure was necessary or even right. Other remedies might be used; and, certainly, the Government had great powers under the Act of last year. He wished that they would carry out fully those powers. He did not think that the precedents which had been quoted would justify the appointment of this Committee. The Committees in 1817 and 1818, for instance, were to investigate matters in reference to riots in England; and the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended not on account of treasonable acts of crime, as the right hon. Gentleman wished the House to believe, but in consequence of actions directed against the safety of private property and private life. Treasonable conspiracies, which attack property and life, demanded the strongest legislation the House could give; and if the state of Ireland was so frightful that the noble Lord, with feelings of painful dismay, asked for legislation with a view to secure the safety of its property and its people, then the Government would be justified in using whatever power they possessed to rescue that country from misery and despair, and it might depend upon support from the great body of hon. Gentlemen who sat on that side of the House. They did not wish to place the Government in a position of difficulty, for they were animated by one feeling of anxious and painful solicitude that the Government should be assisted in their present circumstances of difficulty.

MR. SYNAN said, that the argument of the Opposition appeared to be founded on the assumption that the Motion now before the House was an admission that the policy of the Government, in regard to their remedial measures for Ireland, had been a failure. He (Mr. Synan) emphatically denied that their policy had been a failure. He contended that if the measures of last Session had not been passed, the Prime Minister might now be asking the House to adopt those larger measures which the Opposition taunted the right hon. Gentleman for not adopting; and, instead of dealing with Meath and King's County, the House would have been urged to apply the proposed remedy to the whole population of Ireland. The policy of the Government had been a success. Instead of having, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) said, "legalized confiscation," the remedial measures of the Government had checked confiscation. They had also liberated conscience, and instead of "condoning treason" they had arrested treason. With regard to the Motion itself, he was uncertain in what form it was intended to be finally left to the House, but he would assume that the word "Secret" would be eliminated from it, and that the Committee would not be empowered to recommend any particular measures to be carried into effect. But in that case it would be a Motion for a mere open Committee of that House to inquire into the state of things in Westmeath; and it might well be asked, cui bono? What evidence did the Government think they were likely to be able to lay before an open Committee? Did they expect that the magistrates of Westmeath would care that any evidence they could give on the subject should be published to the world? If the two magistrates from whom the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had received letters were afraid to disclose their names, did they think it likely that they would be ready to give their evidence before an open Committee? Depend upon it that, if the Motion were agreed to, the Committee must either be a Secret Committee, or else its proceedings would be a mere sham. With regard to precedents, the Liberal party opposed the proposal made in 1818, on the ground that it was an unconstitutional attempt by the Government to transfer their responsibility to the House of Commons, but the Tories, having a majority, carried their point. It was curious to find the Liberal party in the present day copying the precedent set by their political opponents more than half a century ago. The facts stated by the noble Lord who moved for the appointment of this Committee, so far from justifying the Motion would afford the strongest grounds on which to base a proposal to repeal the Peace Preservation Act of last Session; for he said that, with the sole exception of Westmeath and the King's County, the people of Ireland were peaceful, prosperous, and progressing. And what did the exception amount to? To this simply—that, among a population of 120,000 persons, there had been four murders, and four attempts at murder, in the course of 14 months. Surely that was not sufficient to justify the House in granting a Committee of Inquiry. The Peace Preservation Act was a very stringent law; but the Peace Preservation Act, not being sufficiently powerful to put an end to agrarian crime in Westmeath, it now seemed that the Constitution must be suspended in order to effect a change for the better. If this was done, it would be the first occasion on which so extreme a course had been resorted to for the repression of that particular class of crime. He heartily denounced Ribbonism, but he considered Orangeism as bad; but to suspend the liberties of the people because of the influence of those societies would only exasperate all classes in Ireland. He could not support either of the courses that had been proposed—the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act or the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry; for the opinion of every right-minded man in Ireland was opposed to the recent proceedings in Westmeath, and the strength of public opinion, backing up the powers conferred by the existing law, would prove sufficient. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) in the course of the debate had complained that Government was intruding Irish subjects upon the gravest hours of the Session. This was just the view taken by the Home Government Association in Ireland, and he should like to know if the noble Lord approved generally of the policy avowed by that body. He (Mr. Synan) said that, at any rate, the Motion now before the House referred to a subject that ought not to be discussed there at all. On the whole, he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would either withdraw their Motion, or pass it in such terms that it would not be an insult to the Irish people, by threatening them with a suspension of the Constitution under which they lived.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, he thought that upon a crisis of this importance no man ought to vote against Her Majesty's Government unless he had good grounds for such a vote. On the main point, the granting of this Committee, he should feel bound to vote against, and should therefore vote also against the Motion for the Previous Question. On Thursday the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland gave Notice of his intention to ask for an appointment of a Committee, which, he said, was to be a secret one. It was only about 48 hours before he came down to the House again and said that the Committee was not to be secret.

He (Sir George Jenkinson) should like to know what good reasons Her Majesty's Government could adduce for so great a change in so short a time. He thought that such vacillation on the part of the Government was indecent. At the very moment that the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was congratulating the House on the absence of crime in Ireland, and on the contentment and loyalty in Ireland, a fresh murder was committed; not, indeed, in the county of Westmeath, but in the county of Limerick—a person was shot dead in his house within 30 yards of a police station; and on the next morning there was an announcement of another agrarian outrage in the county of Clare, on the estate of Lord Leconfield. This showed, he thought, that Ireland was not as contented and prosperous as was represented. His reasons for voting against the Motion were these—if the Committee were to be secret, it would very much prejudice the Government; and if it were not to be secret, he did not think they would get the evidence they professed to be desirous to have. As to the alternative which the Prime Minister put before the House that night, that secrecy was to be occasional—that the Committee could come before the House to make it secret whenever it chose for the purpose of getting the evidence of any particular witness—the effect of that would be that the witness who gave evidence in secret would be doomed to destruction on his return to Ireland. Such a provision as that would be less efficacious than making the Committee absolutely secret, or not secret at all. The objection he had to a Committee was that it involved delay, and that during the delay there would be more loss of life. In his opinion, immediate action was required; and if the Government would propose, on their own responsibility, such measures as would effectually put down those agrarian outrages, they would meet with support from hon. Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House. He denied that this question had been treated in a party sense. He believed the wish of hon. Members was bond fide to assist Her Majesty's Government in a way consistent with the rules of the House and conducive to the interests of the country. One hon. Member on the Conservative side had declared that he would not vote on this question; but he (Sir George Jenkinson) held that it would not be conformable to the dignity of a large party like the Conservative party to walk out of the House, and shirk voting on an important question like that before the House. Allusion had been made to the Administration of Lord Liverpool, and contrasting in a disadvantageous manner the epoch of 1818 with the present time. Considering his connection with Lord Liverpool, he might be permitted to say that Lord Liverpool's Administration contrasted favourably in some points with the Administration of the present day. The position which England held abroad during the Administration of Lord Liverpool contrasted favourably with the position which, he regretted to say, we now held in our relations with foreign countries. Again, although Lord Liverpool might have applied to Parliament for a Secret Committee to repress certain outrages in this country, he never attempted to do so after having released scores of treasonable rebels, and thereby causing the evil requiring to be remedied. He (Sir George Jenkinson) believed that the releasing of treasonable rebels on Her Majesty's Government taking office had lately had a great deal to do with the disturbed state of Ireland at the present time. The release of those criminals, he believed, had greatly encouraged other criminals. He believed that the Committee could do nothing for the Government that the Government could not do without it, and he should, therefore, vote against the Resolution.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, as representing a portion of a county affected by the Motion of the noble Lord, he would wish to say why he could not support the Motion. From many of the speeches which he had heard during the debate he gathered that many hon. Members seemed to think that the effect of legislation should be something magical, and that measures introduced and passed to remedy the oppression of centuries should, as if by enchantment, immediately produce peace and social order in Ireland. For his part, he viewed confidence, and especially political confidence, as a plant of slow growth; but he did feel that, in the measures of the past two years, would be found the germs of concord and amity in his country. The strength of the Riband conspiracy had ever been found to exist in the amount of sympathy or indifference with which it was regarded in any district, and there had not time elapsed for the masses to fully appreciate the effect of the recent measures. When they found that other modes of redress were afforded by law, and that its action should be no longer in the direction of redressing real or imaginary wrongs, but, as was stated by the hon. Member for Galway, to interfere with their own individual liberty, the people themselves, without any interference, would become their own defenders, and such action, as regarded Ribandism, would prove of more avail than 20 Coercion Bills. Last year, on the occasion of the introduction of the Peace Preservation Act by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. C. Fortescue), he opposed that Bill. Amongst other reasons for taking that course, he conceived that the measure, so well styled by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) as a measure of "agricultural equity," should have preceded any measure of coercion; but, whatever opinion might prevail as to the expediency of passing that Act, of one thing he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was assured, that it was a measure of unprecedented stringency, and he felt certain that if its provisions were carried out no Committee, such as the Motion demanded, could be considered necessary. By the confession of the Government it had failed but in one county in Ireland. Last year the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) mentioned that in the whole of Ireland at the time, there were but three counties which enjoyed a bad pre-eminence in crime—Meath, Westmeath, and Mayo—and that of these the county Mayo was by far the worst. How was the matter then? Mayo had become perfectly tranquil; and, whether hon. Members chose to attribute that fact to recent legislation, or to the Peace Preservation Act, one thing was certain, except in Westmeath tranquillity reigned in Ireland. When the Government took the unusual course of coming to that House for a Committee, in order that through its intervention other coercive measures might be originated, that House had a right to ask, and he, as an independent Member, had a right to inquire, had the Government exhausted the powers which they plainly possessed under the Act of last

Session? He had read that Act, and he found one section in it which, if it had been put in operation, would have afforded all the information which could be possibly furnished by the projected Committee; and, what was more important, would afford it under the sanction of an oath, which a Committee of that House had no power to administer. He would, with the permission of the House, read the 13th section, or a summary of it, and ask the learned Solicitor General for Ireland's attention to its provisions—

"Where in any proclaimed district it shall appear that any felony or misdemeanour was committed, any justice of the peace in such district, although no person may be charged before him with the commission of such offence, shall have full power and authority to summon to the police office, or to the place where the petty sessions for the district in which said felony or misdemeanour has been committed are usually held, any person within his jurisdiction who, he shall have reason to believe, is capable of giving material evidence concerning any such felony or misdemeanour, and to examine on oath such person, &c."

It then proceeds, in case of refusal, to impose penalties; thus plainly removing from the witness the imputation of being a voluntary witness, or, what is termed in Ireland, an informer. Would the hon. and learned Solicitor General say that this section had been acted on in Westmeath, if not by the local magistrates, by the resident magistrates, who were paid by the State, and were responsible to the Government? He thought an answer to this question should be given; and that the House should know, before they were required to grant new powers and to suspend the law, had the Law Officers of the Crown, who had in their hands the criminal administration of the country, seen that the magistrates had failed to obtain the information now sought to be obtained by this Committee? When the old Act had failed it would be time to come to the House for renewed powers; in his (Sir Patrick O'Brien's) opinion, not before. The hon. Baronet (Sir George Jenkinson), who had preceded him in that debate, had alluded to the release of the Fenian prisoners, and had complained that such release had led to the existing state of Westmeath. In his opinion, nothing could be more incorrect. Observations of that character were made in consequence of the ignorance which so generally prevailed regarding the Fenian and Riband organizations. They rarely, if ever, co-existed in a county. Where Ribandism prevailed there was no Fenianism, and vice versa. In the King's County there was neither society. There was one thing that could not be imputed to Fenianism, and that was a connection with assassination. [Mr. G. HARDY: Oh! oh!] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University did not permit him to finish his sentence. He meant assassination, affecting others; not members of the body, for breaking the oath of the confederacy. For his part, he thanked the Government for, even at a late period, releasing the political prisoners in deference to the strong feeling prevailing in Ireland on the subject. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), who always addressed that House with ability, he regretted to hear complaining of the political prisoners being allowed to go to America; but the noble Lord, perhaps, had never heard a French definition of expatriation—Cette autre mort qu'on appelle l'exil. It was, indeed, a punishment to those men to leave wife and child and all they held dear in their own country. He felt regret in being obliged, as a matter of duty, to vote that night against the Government; and that regret was increased by the fact that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland had charge of the Motion, and that it was the first Motion which, in his new official capacity, he had occasion to present to the House. He believed that the noble Lord was placed in that position by an unlucky accident, and that the policy which prompted the framing of that Motion was due to others, and not to the noble Lord. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had not forgotten the services to religious freedom in Ireland rendered by the family of Cavendish in past years, at a time when the profession of such opinions was neither fashionable nor profitable. In that House he had remarked the noble Lord, on almost every occasion, adopting and acting upon the traditions of his family, and he therefore regretted being obliged to vote against him upon that occasion.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, that the Prime Minister had begun his speech by observing that he was not ashamed of any of the Irish measures of the Government—a declaration which seemed to him to be rather a strange one from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman. But he heard the statement without surprise, because any man who could propose such measures was never likely to come to the frame of mind in which he would be ashamed of them. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that those measures were wise, just, and Christian; but, without discussing that point further, he could only say—"Heaven defend us from the wisdom, the justice, and the Christianity of the right hon. Gentleman." After appealing to the Goddess of Liberty—he (Mr. Bentinck) quite expected to hear him proceed to appeal to the Goddess of Reason—the right hon. Gentleman concluded that part of his speech by informing them that he attached the highest importance to the maintenance of private and personal rights—a truly wonderful confession from the lips of the Minister who had proposed the Irish Church Bill and the Irish Land Bill. His objections to the present Resolution were two. The object of it was to enable the Government to abdicate its functions. Now, he could conceive no greater misfortune that could befall the institutions of the country than that a Government should abnegate its duties. The other objection was that a Committee could furnish no information which the Executive was not already in a position to obtain. So that the sole end of its appointment would be to absolve the Ministry of all responsibility of action. Moreover, it sought to devolve that responsibility upon a Committee of that House, which was, and by its constitution must be, powerless to act in the matter. All their Committees almost invariably ended in nothing, and the one now proposed must—if it were possible—terminate still more futilely. It was called an exceptional Committee; whereas the state of things to be inquired into was, unfortunately, normal, rather than exceptional in Ireland. Now, a rough, but generally pretty accurate estimate of what was done or proposed in that House might be gathered from the view taken of it in the Lobbies, and in the present instance the opinion in that quarter was that the Government had proposed a Committee because, though they might have secured the assent of the House to a strong and direct act of repression, the result would have been to drive the Irish Liberal Members into a coalition with the Opposition on the first occasion that promised for the overthrow of the Administration.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

The Government were anxious to relieve themselves from the responsibility which properly belonged to them, by casting it upon the shoulders of others. If they could only find a Government with a straightforward policy, he believed that they would secure the favour of both sides of the House. It appeared to him that the proposal of the Government would have a most ruinous effect upon Ireland. He had seen a great deal of that country lately, and during his whole career in that House he had heard a great deal about Irish grievances. It was his opinion that Ireland had been more ill-used than any other country in Europe. She had certainly one grievance, though but one only, and if they could remedy that they would remove all existing difficulties in regard to Ireland. The real grievance of Ireland was that she had never been governed at all. Instead of that, she had been made the battle-ground of party politics in this country. And it had always been the question with the occupants of the front Benches—"What are we to do about the Irish vote?" And the view taken by the so-called great leaders on both sides was that no Government dare grapple with the condition of Ireland. The Irish were a generous but an excitable people; and what was to be expected from a nation that had been misgoverned for so many years? They had been made the dupes of agitators—men who had practised agitation for political or party purposes; and no man had more superinduced that agitation, or had done so for more mischievous purposes, than the right hon. Gentleman himself, the First Minister of the Crown. ["Oh, oh!"] He did not mean to say that those who had preceded him in office had not dealt with Ireland in a similar manner; but the last measures of the right hon. Gentleman had exceeded, on the score of agitation, anything he had ever seen or heard of. Did he not tell the Irish people, some years ago, that Ireland was to be governed by Irish ideas? Now, what was the meaning of governing Ireland by Irish ideas? What did those words naturally convey to the minds of the Irish people themselves? They simply meant the appropriation of the whole land and the Church property of Ireland. What did the right hon. Gentleman do by way of pacifying Ireland? He took a portion of the property of the Irish Church, and confiscated a portion of the property of the Irish landlords. But the Irish people claimed the whole, and not a portion of this property. The course taken by the right hon. Gentleman could only lead to increase the discontented and disturbed condition of Ireland. The fact was, that for years past they had no Executive Government at all. When it was a question of dealing with the Ribbonmen of Westmeath or with a Hyde Park mob there was the same want of energy—the same want of decision—and of power to govern which had been always evinced. We had now come to that state of things when the Government had not the courage to govern, and the Opposition had not the courage to oppose. The maintenance of the laws, under such circumstances, was impossible, and the violation of order was inevitable.

MR. OSBORNE: Sir, I must confess that when my hon. Friend, whom I am so happy to see among us again, rose to discuss this question, I did not expect he would throw any material light upon it. We all know he is one of those downright Englishmen whom it is very difficult for anybody to please, and that when he has poured the vials of his wrath on the leaders of both political parties, and has told us that Ireland is without any Government whatever, that is all the information we are likely to obtain from the county of Norfolk. I am more than disappointed at the course of this debate. When the First Minister of the Crown rose in his place early in the evening, I did expect we should have been put in possession of the precise nature of the question before us, and the object of calling upon the House to appoint a Select Committee. But, after listening attentively to that early speech, I must say I have been left in greater doubt than before. It appears to me that since the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to elucidate this point to the House, not only a moral but a material fog has settled down upon us. I defy anybody to tell me what is the precise question we are at present discussing. Whether is this a Secret Committee, a Select Committee, or what? As it appears to me, this Committee is not to be secret; it is not to be suggestive; and, as far as I can see, there is a great chance of its not being select. I carefully listened to every word that fell from the right hon. Gentleman. Rising as he did so early in the evening, there must be a difference of opinion in the Cabinet on this question. Well, the right hon. Gentleman informed us, as far as I could understand, that the main object of the Committee is to grant an Act of Indemnity to Ministers for the way they have employed the Peace Preservation Act. We have heard no other object assigned, and I regret that the First Minister, though he may have been confiding, was not more clear in his explanation. If it were wise in the right hon. Gentleman to alter the terms of the Motion for that Committee, and drop the secrecy portion of it—provided it is dropped, because it appears to me to have been revived again to-night—how much wiser would it have been to drop the Motion altogether! He must see by the tone of what I call his rabid supporters, that they are not well pleased with this move, and that what is apparently a whim of the First Minister alone, is not likely to land him in a conspicuous place in the favour of the Irish Members or of the Irish people. If the right hon. Gentleman intended to bring forward this Motion, I want to know why he put this passage into what is called the “most gracious Speech from the Throne,” though, as everybody knows, it is nothing but the speech of the First Minister—

“The condition of Ireland with reference to agrarian crime has, in general, afforded a gratifying contrast with the state of that island in the preceding winter; but there have been painful though very partial exceptions. To secure the best results for the great measures of the two last Sessions which have so recently passed into operation, and which involve such direct and pressing claims upon the attention of all classes of the community, a period of calm is to be desired; and I have thought it wise to refrain from suggesting to you at the present juncture the discussion of any political question likely to become the subject of new and serious controversy in that country.”

That was the Speech delivered from the Throne at the beginning of the Session, not so very long ago. What does the right hon. Gentleman do? He gets a new recruit, and a most able-bodied and able-minded recruit in the place of the Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, and forces that noble Lord to come down here, and “with painful dismay,” introduce a measure likely to lead to the most serious controversy in the country which he says requires so much calm. I must say that the dismay is not peculiar to him, but is shared by a great many supporters of Her Majesty's Government, who have the good of Ireland at heart, and who are adverse to dragging the question of the Westmeath Ribbonmen before the House, and plunging us into a debate where all the worst elements of party conflict are about to be developed. I protest against a proposal which revives such a conflict on such a question. I heard the two great measures of the two last Sessions, to which the majority of this House and of the country assented, stigmatized as measures of sacrilege and of confiscation. I cannot share that view. I rather name them as measures of justice and conciliation, too long deferred; and he must not only be a politician of sanguine heart, but of a softer head than usual, who expects that any measures whatever will lead to immediate results. If, however, we can even lay one stone in our life-time towards such a desirable consummation, we shall not have laboured in vain. I can sympathize with no observations which proceed from the standpoint of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. But it is because I was a supporter of the past that I am an opponent of the present policy of the Government. What is the situation? We have a strong Government, with a set of ardent supporters who were ready to vote anything the right hon. Gentleman proposed. His name was almost the only hustings cry they would condescend to use; and to be Gladstonian was to be successful. We now find this strong Government very much in the position of a weak woman, who, when she hesitates, is lost. This strong Government, crammed with information as to the state of things in Westmeath, with evidence ready, and not only evidence, but measures—remedies which they do not seek at your hands, and which they are ready to pass—ask you, nevertheless, for a Secret and Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister endeavours to apologize for the times of 1812 and 1818, when Lord Castlereagh, pursuing a bolder course than that of the right hon. Gentleman, though probably not so confiding, came down with his green bag to the House of Commons and produced his evidence at the Table. Instead of this the right hon. Gentleman calls for a Committee. And what is the Committee to do? It is to act very much the part of a Silent Friend. It is to produce a remedy. The truth must be spoken. This Committee is nothing more than a screen for Ministerial debility and executive incapacity. The First Minister is always very great upon the abstract question, and asked what are the elementary obligations of a Government—though he did not answer the question. Now, what are the elementary obligations of a Government? First of all, what is the use of a Cabinet at all? Why is it selected if, at the first critical moment, it runs under the ægis of a Select Committee of the House of Commons? This Cabinet has lately been whitewashed, it has been re-constructed, the cards have been re-shuffled, and the Cabinet comes back to the old military position of “as you were.” Let us look at the principle of selection exercised in the choice of this Cabinet—a principle which it is proposed to extend to the military commands. How successful it has been in this instance! We all know the right hon. Gentleman is rather exclusive in his Cabinet society. If he has a preference, what he does like best, I believe, is the selection chiefly of Whig marionettes of the most approved pattern—gentlemen who will recognize and reverence the official wires. How far does this Cabinet represent the opinions of the great Liberal majority in this House? How far does it represent or reconcile the feelings of the people of Ireland? Just look down the list. Here are 15 Gentlemen. There have been several turns of this political kaleidoscope, but somehow I have remarked that at every change you get back the old Whig combination. The fact is the Whigs are never happy unless they are in office. It is the old story — Naturam expellas furcâ, tamen usque recurret. And the consequence is that we have all the old family party back again, and, true to Whig antecedents, not satisfied with knocking their heads against walls in the ordinary course of nature, they must propose a special wall, in the shape of a Select Committee, in order to run their heads against that. I attribute the whole of this blunder to the constitution of the Cabinet. There are in it 14 or 15 respectable Gentlemen, more or less gifted; but what connection have they with, or what special knowledge have they of, what is called the sister kingdom? I have not a word to say against the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland, except that he has stumbled, as I believe, at the threshold of his new office. I am glad to see a man of his great rank and ability devoting himself to the service of the country, and accepting the thankless office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. But when I look through the long and dreary list of the Cabinet—of those Gentlemen who bow to the presiding genius, I cannot help thinking that it must be written in large letters over the doors of the Cabinet — “No Irish need apply.” There is but one man in the Cabinet who has any special knowledge of, or acquaintance with, Ireland—a man being Lord Lieutenant of Ireland gives him no special knowledge of Ireland, because he lives in the Castle of Dublin, and is a martyr to the reports of people who never stir out of it—there is but one man who has any special knowledge of Ireland, and that man is the right hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue). And what has the Prime Minister done with him? Directly the right hon. Member for Louth had any success in legislating for Ireland he was put on the treadmill of the Board of Trade; and so anxious is the Prime Minister to keep any Irishman from entering into the “Secret and Select Committee” of the Cabinet that a right hon. Gentleman who for years has possessed the confidence and gained the hearts of the Irish people, and who has been waiting in the ante-chambers of the Cabinet, is not admitted into it, but is relegated to the “Dead Letter Office.” This, Sir, is the sort of treatment that the Irish receive at the hands of the present popular and powerful Government, and yet you are surprised if these 14 Englishmen, sitting in Downing Street, desire to shift responsibility from their own shoulders and endeavour to lay it on a “Select and Secret Committee” up stairs. It is my good fortune to represent an Irish constituency—I consider it a special good fortune to do so—but I am not about to give my vote simply as an Irish Member. I give my vote as an individual Member of the House of Commons, who feels strongly that the course taken by the head of the Government is not only dangerous to the Ministry, but will also be attended with most evil consequences to this House, and to the country, if we get into the habit, whenever a Government is in danger, of listening to a "confiding" Minister, and of allowing an Administration to shuffle off responsibility on to a Select Committee. The only man that can upset the Government is he who formed it, and I can tell him that stronger Ministers than himself have been "run off the rails" by proceedings very like the one now in question. He may have many admirers and devoted followers in this House, but if he continues to press this vote on Parliament I feel satisfied that his popularity and power will come to a speedy termination.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Dowse): Sir, I am unwilling to interpose between the House and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire, who had risen at the same time); but, inasmuch as no Member has for some time addressed the House from the Treasury Bench, it appears to me not inopportune that a Member of the Government, intimately acquainted with the administration of the law in Ireland should now say a few words in reference to the Motion before the House. This, and not any desire to prevent the speech of the hon. Member for Cork, is my reason for rising at present. The House, I am sure, does not wish or expect that I should follow the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) through his amusing speech—delivered at the proper time, when the House was full, and in a fit state to enjoy with zest the pleasure which the hon. Member knows so well how to afford. It occurred to me in hearing that speech that the hon. Member is more conversant with Cabinet making than with Secret Committees; but that is not my forte; and I shall not follow him further than to say that I think he was very inconsistent in first twitting the hon. Member for West Norfolk with knowing very little about the matter, and then showing that he himself knew less. Nevertheless, the hon. Member made a very amusing speech. He displayed a happy facility in furbishing up such old phrases as "Whig marionettes," and "No Irish need apply." By the way, it would be impossible by his speech, if one did not see where he sat, to distinguish the hon. Gentleman from a Tory marionette, for I apprehend there are marionettes on both sides of the House. But the hon. Member said there was no Irishman in the Cabinet, and that assertion was made immediately after paying a tribute to the Government for passing two of the greatest measures in reference to Ireland that have been introduced during the last 200 years. ["Oh!"] The hon. Gentleman told the House that the Irish Church Bill and the Irish Land Bill were great successes. [Mr. OSBORNE: No!] Well, the hon. Member did not deny that they will be so when in course of time their beneficial effects shall be felt. Now, I ask, who passed those measures? I do not expect the hon. Member to answer me; my question is one of those rhetorical artifices not uncommon in this House. I say, the Cabinet, over the doors of which were inscribed, according to the hon. Gentleman—"No Irish need apply." He wants to persuade the House that the ex-Secretary for Ireland has ceased to be an Irishman because he has become President of the Board of Trade. So long as that right hon. Gentleman was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant he was an Irishman, and then "No Irish need apply" could not be written over the Cabinet; but he ceased to be an Irishman directly he was transferred to "the treadmill of the Board of Trade"—a treadmill on which, by the way, the hon. Member for Waterford would be very glad to walk himself. I shall take the liberty of telling the hon. Member for Waterford that if the "confiding" Minister would sentence him for 18 months to that treadmill, he would be, if not a grateful, at all events a silent Member. I should like to know what right he had to say that this Motion is the whim of the Prime Minister alone? What right has he to assert that the First Lord of the Treasury forces the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland to bring forward this Motion; and, if I may repeat the definition of an honest man given by the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), speak what he does not think? And then the hon. Member for Waterford passes compliments on the noble Lord, after having made him one of "the Whig marionettes," worked by wires in the hands of the Prime Minister! The hon. Member for Waterford said it was his good fortune to have an Irish seat, and it certainly is a good thing that there should be occasionally a refuge for the destitute. The hon. Member has gone round the political compass. Having gone to Dover, and found no rest for the sole of his foot, he took flight across the water, and like the dove, though in no other respect very dove-like, he at length found a resting-place in Waterford. The hon. Member is an Irishman pro re nata; he is an Irishman for the present, and will continue one—until the next General Election. Having said so much for the hon. Member, I promise him, if he gives me another opportunity, to be more liberal in my acknowledgments of his efforts for throwing light on the subject under debate. And now I come to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), who remarked upon the “extraordinary measures” promoted by the Government for the pacification of Ireland. Did the right hon. Baronet use the word “extraordinary” by way of praise or blame? [Sir ROBERT PEEL: Blame.] Blame! I have heard few things to exceed that. Did my eyes deceive me when, sitting on the back Benches as an outsider, I thought I recognized the stalwart form of the right hon. Baronet sitting behind the Government and voting for those “extraordinary measures” during the last two Sessions?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Never! I never voted for them. I never once gave a vote in favour of either of those two measures.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. DOWSE): Then, if the right hon. Baronet never once gave a vote in favour of the measures, why did not he record a vote against them? Why had he not the courage of his convictions? I hope the right hon. Baronet will hold in his hand the taper of remorse. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: Never!] The right hon. Baronet having sat behind the Treasury Benches as a supporter of the Ministry, and failed to make a single protest against the Bills he now designates as “extraordinary,” it is rather too much for him to come forward now, and, in the plenitude of his wondrous kindness to the Ministry—engendered probably by a fellow-feeling with his neighbour (Mr. Osborne)—constitute himself an impartial critic upon the home and foreign policy of the First Lord of the Treasury. I shall now pass by this pair of patriotic brethren and proceed to discuss the matter in hand. I shall assume it is admitted, on the basis of the statistics brought forward by the Chief Secretary, that exceptional crime has been committed, and is to be apprehended, in Westmeath, and the parts of Meath and the King's County contiguous thereto. In this state of facts, the Government had to consider what measures should be taken for the repression of crime and for the public safety; and they concluded that with a view of dealing with this exceptional crime the proper course was to put the Motion on the Paper which we are now discussing. Various objections, however, have been raised to the appointment of the Committee asked for by the Chief Secretary. The hon. Gentlemen opposite object to it on the ground that it does not go far enough. [“No, no!”] If hon. Gentlemen opposite will wait, they will see I do not misconstrue their objections. They object that the Motion does not go far enough, because it should not have stopped with a proposal for a Committee, but should have proceeded to state remedial measures at once. Some of my hon. Friends below the Gangway on this side of the House, on the other hand, object to the Committee on the ground that it goes too far—because, they say, it is not required, and that there is no necessity for either legislation or inquiry. And the remarkable thing is that these hon. Gentlemen will be found in the same Lobby with the hon. Gentlemen opposite; so that if it is not misery in this instance which makes people acquainted with strange bedfellows something else equally potential does. It is right that this should be perfectly well understood. The Committee the Government think proper to ask the House to appoint is designed to inquire into the state of Westmeath—to inquire as to the nature of the combination and confederacies believed to exist there, the objects sought by them, the people engaged in them, whether terrorism exists to the extent alleged, what is the nature of the organization with which we have to cope, and as to how it may be guarded against for the future. The object in view in putting the last part of the Motion on the Paper—that is, as to “the best means of suppressing” the unlawful combinations complained of—was simply to enable the Committee to take evidence on that subject if it were offered them, and to receive suggestions from competent witnesses. Now, is there a precedent for the appointment of this Committee? The House of Commons goes according to precedent in all its deliberations, and in my judgment it is right in doing so. Precedent is the life of English law—English freedom is based upon precedent—

“Freedom slowly broadening down
From precedent to precedent.”

It is from precedents established by the wisdom of our ancestors that we are governed in our ordinary affairs every day. I hope it is our ambition, and I trust it ever will be our ambition, in legislation, not to depart from the method bequeathed to us by the wisdom of our ancestors. [“Hear!”] I can see nothing inconsistent with my avowed opinions in the observation I have made; it is an observation which everyone who thoroughly understands what Liberalism is, and who does not desire to sacrifice liberty to licence, might well endorse. I have before me the record of a Motion made in 1852 by the then Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Napier) for a Committee. My right hon. and learned Friend—and I am proud to be able to claim him as a friend, was not one to undertake resolutions lightly, nor would he lightly press them to their conclusions. Now, what course did he pursue? In Her Majesty’s gracious Speech in 1852 reference is made to the state of Ireland in these terms—

“While I have observed with sincere satisfaction the tranquillity which has prevailed throughout the greater portion of Ireland, it is with much regret that I have to inform you that certain parts of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth have been marked by the commission of outrages of the most serious description. The powers of the existing law have been promptly exerted for the detection of the offenders, and for the repression of a system of crime and violence fatal to the best interests of the country. My attention will continue to be directed to this important object.”

A change of Government occurred between this Speech from the Throne, and the moving for a Committee. Lord Russell went out of power on the Militia Bill, and Mr. Napier, as Attorney General for Ireland, supported by his predecessor in office, moved for a Committee of Inquiry into the state of those parts of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth referred to in the Queen’s Speech. The words of the reference are to inquire—

“Into the immediate cause of crime and outrage in those districts, and into the efficiency of the laws and of their administration for the suppression of such crime and outrage.”

That is a Committee substantially the same as the one we ask for. I have the report of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman before me in which he moved for that Committee, and he said, alluding to the crimes originating in the Riband system—

“They were the acts of a great confederation, which, if not put down by the law, would put the law down, and therefore this was a conflict with an organized conspiracy against life and property of the most startling description. The Return for the county of Louth embraced from the 20th of April, 1849, to the 29th of December, 1851, and contained 23 cases—they were all separate crimes of Riband conspiracy, and included murder, shooting with intent to murder, waylaying, threatening notices, acting as members of the Riband system, administering unlawful oaths, arson, and the prevention of prosecutions for crime. Of these 23 cases, there had only been in five instances convictions, and in all the others the law as yet had not been able to overtake the criminals.”—[3 Hansard, cxix. 1173.]

Mr. Napier expressed his opinion that it was no question of party, and I hope I may say the same on the present occasion. I believe there is an earnest desire on both sides of the House to repress crime and outrage wherever it exists, and I believe the Conservative Benches are as anxious as the Liberal Benches to grant full power to the Government for the repression of crime. In saying this, I merely give expression as an honest man to what I do think. My right hon. Friend Mr. Napier, in a speech extending over 16 pages of Hansard, gives details more terrible than any we have given with reference to the state of Westmeath. And yet did anyone say—“You have abundant evidence; why do not you come forward at once and legislate, without asking for the appointment of a Committee?” No. The late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Hatchell), who spoke on that occasion, said that, far from rising with the intention of opposing the Motion, he was extremely desirous that it should be carried. Sir, it is idle for me to go through the form which nearly every hon. Gentleman thinks necessary before alluding to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli)—to make two or three “kotows” to his genius, and four or five to his literary celebrity. I am a sincere admirer of the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore I will perform one kotow at all events. This I must say, however, I certainly thought it strange that the right hon. Gentleman, with all his literary powers, having not only the whole range of English literature and Oriental literature to fall back upon—but Continental literature as well—knowing, as he does, the greatest celebrities in literary and political history, I did think it strange that he could find no one to compare himself with but the lean apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, and, like him, urge the plea—"My poverty and not my will consents." For that was the only answer he gave, by anticipation, to my precedent, when he stated he would have acted differently if he had had a majority of 100 at his back. I, however, take the liberty of saying that that is no answer; and I challenge my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball), who will probably speak in the course of this debate, to give a better answer than that to this precedent, and not to give it the go-by by speaking, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has done, of the Government of 1852 as if it were a rickety baby and he were its wet nurse. That Committee sat, and on the list of its members were included the names of Sir James Graham, Sir John Young, Sir William Somerville, Sir Emerson Tennant, the present President of the Board of Trade, and other eminent men on both sides of the House—as I hope will be the case with this Committee. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire will aid the cause of justice to Ireland by casting some of his paternal glances over the deliberations of the Committee, and by listening, patient and Sphinx-like, to the evidence which may be adduced. Now, that Committee sat for a considerable number of days, and when it made its Report that Report consisted of nothing but suggestions. The first, and the only one which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, with all the efforts of his ingenuity, was capable of dealing with was the continuation of the Crime and Outrage Act for another year. The last recommendation was that such a measure should be framed as would deal with the laws relating to landlords and tenants in Ireland, and afford adequate security to Irish tenants; and this recommendation was carried into effect last year, when what the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire calls "legalized confiscation" became the law of the land. In other words the Committee appointed under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and presided over by the Irish Attorney General, recommended that this House should do what has been done by a Cabinet over the doors of which is written, according to my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford—"No Irish need apply." The Report of that Committee consisted of six paragraphs, each suggesting a change in the law, and yet only one was dealt with by the Government who proposed the appointment of that Committee. Was all this a shirking of responsibility? And, if so, why should that be flat blasphemy with us which with the right hon. Gentleman opposite was but a choleric word? I shall say no more upon the question of principle in this matter, but shall consider what this Committee will really have to do when it is appointed. I heard to-night some startling facts. I was informed by one hon. Member that in the county of Westmeath black mail is levied by these Riband societies. Although I have some idea of the way in which the law is carried out in Ireland, I never heard that alleged fact before. That fact—and I do not deny that it is a fact when it is uttered by so respectable an authority—is a fit subject for the inquiry of the Committee. If it be a fact, it will be for the Committee to inquire who levy this black mail, and who pay it; whether it be paid by men of position or influence, or whether it be merely the timorous act of a country gentleman, not believing in his power to defend himself without having recourse to these illegitimate expedients. I have been told by the hon. Member for Dublin (Sir Dominic Corrigan) that these acts are the acts of but a very few bad men. I hope that is so; but, at any rate, it is a fit subject for inquiry. The facts elicited by the Committee will be brought before the House and the Government, and the Government will never shrink from the responsibility of such legislation as in its conscience it deems right. We are also told by an hon. Member that a Westmeath gentleman could not go to the Lord Lieutenant's dinner, inasmuch as he was afraid of being shot. That gives, if it be true, a very sad picture of Irish society. I never heard it before. No intimation, I can safely say, has reached the authorities at Dublin of that circumstance; but it is only more matter for the Committee to inquire into. ["Oh!"] Perhaps hon. Members opposite think that not even the threat of being shot would prevent them from going to a Lord Lieutenant's dinner. Some people if they cannot bask in the sunshine of Royalty will endeavour to seek compensation in the moonshine of Viceregal Royalty. The officers of the Government will lay their evidence before the Committee, and every hon. Member who sits below the Gangway, in what is called the independent part of this House—and I occasionally see some Members alternating, going backwards and forwards as if they were not quite content with their position—will be able to form his own conclusions on the subject. ["Oh!"] If any hon. Gentleman feels himself aggrieved by that observation, I withdraw it. I am told that the witnesses will not give their statements upon oath; but I know very little of the powers of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who will probably be on the Committee if they do not, without such a power, extract from any witness who may come before them such evidence as he is able to give. The hon. Baronet the Member for the King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) asks why the 13th section of the Peace Preservation Act has not been put in force—the section conferring powers of examination on any magistrate who has reasonable ground for believing that a particular person can give material evidence? My hon. Friend should recollect that the magistrate must have reasonable ground for believing that material evidence will be forthcoming. And the difficulty is to find reasonable grounds for believing that material evidence can be given, and if reasonable grounds do exist for so believing, another difficulty is to induce the witness to give evidence at all. I am informed that among the magistrates of Westmeath this difficulty has been felt and expressed very strongly. The Committee might, I think, very fairly examine into the application and working of this and other sections of the Act. They might also examine some official persons who have expressed opinions as to the grounds of those opinions; and, above all, they might examine non-official persons, country gentlemen, and others who will not give their opinions in Dublin Castle, but who might be willing to do so before a Select Committee. Having disposed of the introductory portion of my remarks—["Oh!"]—hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite should, at all events, extend to me the same fair play which they would claim for themselves. I see some hon. Members sitting on the front Bench opposite who have crotchets of their own on various points; yet, if you were to talk to them for weeks, the same amiable smile of incredulity would still play upon their countenances. I have done what appears to me sufficient to convince them, and it is their own fault if they are not convinced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and my right hon. Friend, if he will allow me to call him so, the Member for North Lancashire, have told us there is no necessity for this inquiry, because they are ready to afford us every assistance to carry an effective measure. But what do they suggest? The only remedy I have ever heard from that quarter is the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Now, this suspension is an extreme measure in the case even of political exigency or treasonable conspiracy. But within the memory of living man it has never been applied to crimes not in the nature of crimes against the State. Besides, the suspension must be only temporary. You may take up half-a-dozen men in Westmeath, send them to Mountjoy Prison and keep them there for eight or nine months, and for that time the country will perhaps be quiet; but, at the end of that time, and just because the country is quiet, public opinion will become clamorous for the removal of restraints upon its liberties; and as soon as the Suspension Act expires these men go back to their own districts heroes—if not martyrs—and the same crimes are repeated and intensified. Therefore, if you tell me that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act is a complete panacea for crimes of this kind, that is a doctrine which I cannot subscribe to. There are hon. Members below the Gangway—some of them Irish Members, and some of them claiming to be more Irish than the Irish themselves, on account of the number of Irish men and women included among their constituents—who object to the proposals of the Government. I ask these hon. Gentlemen, first, do they deny the facts? Secondly, if they believe that exceptional legislation is not needed, let them help us to probe this matter before the Select Committee: no one will be more delighted than I shall be to adopt, if I am justified in doing so, the conclusion at which they seem to have arrived. As an Irishman, and as an Irish Member representing an Irish constituency, and not the less so that I now sit on the Treasury Bench—for my constituents have elected me again since I accepted office—representing, I repeat, a constituency containing all the elements of Irish life, Orange and Green, Catholic and Protestant, to the fullest extent—I do say that it would afford to me, and that it would afford to Her Majesty's Government, the greatest satisfaction if, as the result of the labours of the Committee, it should clearly appear that Westmeath may be safely left to the operation of the law as now existing. My hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) said that this is to be a Secret Committee—that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland asserted this, and that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government repeated it. Nothing of the kind—there is no question of a Secret or non-Secret Committee before the House at all. Let the House be well convinced of that. Such a proposal was never contained in the Resolution at all. My noble Friend undoubtedly said, in giving Notice of the Motion, that when the Committee was appointed he should move that it be a Secret Committee. ["Oh, oh!"] Why should hon. Gentlemen interrupt? I am only stating facts, and whether they make for me or against me, at first sight in the long run, I believe, facts never do any harm. I am not one of those advocates who wish to hold back facts, and, ostrich-like, to keep their heads in the sand. The question stands in this way. If the House vote for this Committee, it will sit as soon as its Members are appointed. It will hold its meetings in the usual manner, and I trust there will be no necessity for secrecy whatever. But what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister says is this—though he is not asking the House to give any vote upon it now—that if, in the course of taking evidence, it occurs to the Committee that it would be a wise and judicious thing that some one portion of the evidence should not be printed, and that at a particular time the doors of the room should not be opened even to the Members of this House, that then the Chairman may come to this House and ask on behalf of the Committee for leave to sit with closed doors. This House may refuse the request. I apprehend that very much will depend upon whether the Chairman is a Member possessing the confidence of this House; but, in any event, no one will be bound to vote in favour of secrecy or against it—it will be a new and fresh question. At any rate, the House will be master of the question. I must now say one word on the origin of the debate—the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. As I have said, I do not yield to any Gentleman who sits on the other side in admiration for the right hon. Gentleman, but I believe he was in no degree justified in passing the criticisms he did upon the measures of the Government in connection with the Motion for this Committee. What are the facts? On the 28th of July, 1869, the Irish Church Bill received the Royal Assent. On the 1st of August, 1870, the Land Bill received the Royal Assent. This last is not yet nine months in operation, and are you to expect it to operate like a charm? Can you expect the full result of these remedial measures to show themselves before the measures themselves have been two years in existence? Any Gentleman who knows anything about law, or the condition of the country, knows that there has not yet been time for these measures to be thoroughly known by the country; and I firmly believe that when they are known and appreciated in Ireland the results will be very different from what they are at the present time. I concur in the statement of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, that, with the exception of Westmeath, that country is at present enjoying an unwonted degree of prosperity. We speak in the Motion of other counties besides Westmeath; but they are portions of territory which extend geographically into and around Westmeath, though they do not form part of it politically, or for municipal purposes; and our object is that if a crime is shown to have occurred on one side of the border or the other we shall not on that account be precluded from going into the subject. But, substantially, the inquiry will be limited to Westmeath. When the facts are reported to the House, and the House and the Government have seen and considered them, whatever the Committee may then recommend—even if it should be legislation of the most penal character, or no legislation at all—the Government will bring an unbiassed judgment to bear upon the question, and will deal with it as they have dealt with all measures relating to Ireland—from a broad and statesmanlike point of view. And if it should be shown that no necessity for exceptional legislation exists, no one will be more gratified than the Members of Her Majesty's Government; they will rejoice if Westmeath can be safely left to yield to the same healing influences that have made themselves felt in all other parts of Ireland.

DR. BALL: Sir, two different matters have been introduced into this discussion from which, although by no means unconnected, yet, unless they are kept distinct when under our consideration, an inevitable confusion of ideas must arise. One subject in debate has been the social condition of Ireland as regards crime; and another has been the political position of that country, the claims and rights of its inhabitants, and their relation to the British Government. No doubt there is in Ireland, as I have admitted, a certain relation between these subjects; but it is also true that in order to have a clear perception of the social condition of the country, you must examine them separately. It is with the former of these subjects—the degree in which agrarian crime prevails, the extent of the organization which produces and effects it—that the Motion of the Chief Secretary for Ireland is immediately concerned. It would, in my judgment, have been better that in debating the propriety of the Motion, no topics of a political nature had been introduced; but as they have, they cannot now be evaded. Sir, when I first read this Notice of Motion I own it did occur to me that the Government were about to adopt a decisive line of action, and that they, possessing important secret information, were about to afford that information to the House, with a view to induce its acceptance of vigorous measures; but since I came into the House, and heard the explanations which have been given, I discovered the real intention—or, rather, the new intention—of the Ministry. I have a suspicion that the Motion came from some man not biassed by technicalities or delicate sensitiveness, and that the object was to wring from witnesses the real state of the case, and to obtain by secresy—for by secresy only it could be obtained—the inside and the heart of this mystery. But what do I now find? I find that the Motion dwindles to a mere inquiry—a Committee is to be appointed—for what?—to record outrages and to tabulate offences. Yes, the whole result to follow from the intellectual power to be collected in this Committee is the acquisition and digest of statistical information. There is not an official in any public department who could not, from existing materials, accomplish this fact as effectually. Do I err in my view of the original intention? Look at the terms of the Motion—"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Westmeath and certain parts adjoining, of Meath and King's County"—not crime, mark—not outrage, not offences, not the external indications or public manifestations of evil designs—but "the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and confederacy existing therein"—that is, it was the internal machinery, not external acts, was to be investigated. This "unlawful combination and confederacy" was expressly stated by the noble Lord to be the Riband Society. The Riband Society has existed for a lengthened period, extended itself over a wide range of country, supported and maintained its organization with consummate success. How are you about to deal with it? You are about to have a public Committee—without the Government avowing that they have a particle of information in respect to the conspiracy itself—to investigate the crimes it has perpetrated. I would refer to Chief Justice Whiteside's Charge, published in the journals of to-day, and remark that the Riband conspiracy is not a mere conspiracy for the perpetration of agrarian crime—it is an organized confederacy for controlling and governing the country according to the rules and laws of that organization. It is not peculiar to Westmeath. No one knows Westmeath better than I do, for I was appointed Crown Prosecutor of that county in 1852, and retained the office for many years. There is no new information, therefore, to be brought to me about it, as I know perfectly well what exists there. Is the confederacy confined to Westmeath, Meath, and the King's County? No. During a large part of the period when I held the office of Crown Prosecutor I was informed that the heads of the conspiracy were in Manchester. How futile, then, an inquiry confined to three counties! The amount of outrage is no test of the power of this confederacy. On the contrary, the amount of outrage often shows only the amount of resistance to the decrees of the secret tribunal—the fact of no outrages occurring shows that those decrees have been implicitly obeyed. Since this inquiry was announced, and since you have limited the scope of the inquiry to three counties, two outrages have been perpetrated elsewhere, equal in atrocity to any which have occurred in Westmeath. On the very night when the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was occupied in declaring to this House the peace, the tranquillity, the harmony, and the absence of crime in every county in Ireland except these three, a party of armed men fired shots into a dwelling house on the property of Lord Leconfield, in Clare—far from Westmeath—and assailed with violence its inhabitants. On the same night in Limerick, another county distant from the sphere of your proposed inquiry, an armed party proceeded to the house of the steward of Mr. Conyers, of Castle Conyers, at 7 o'clock in the evening, and shot him dead. The truth is, that the organization extends over a number of counties; it is not always necessary for it to develope itself in action; but when it is, in accordance with the system adopted by the confederacy, men are brought from a distance to execute the sentences which have been pronounced by some secret tribunal. The outrages to which I have just referred are as decisive a proof of the existence of the Riband conspiracy in Clare and Limerick as any that can be brought before the Committee from Westmeath. I have referred to the Charge of Chief Justice Whiteside in Meath. It gives a complete picture of the state of that county. I anticipate that this day Chief Justice Monaghan has, in a Charge to the Westmeath Grand Jury, supplied similar information as to that county. What can your Committee add? Some facts in the former Charge demand your attention. One of the worst outrages in the county of Meath was perpetrated because a farmer used a scythe instead of a sickle. Another was committed because a man had discharged a servant. A third was the case of a farmer whose crops were burnt not because he had committed any offence, but because he was personally unpopular. As long as I remember—as long as any barrister in Ireland connected with the administration of the criminal law can remember—outrages of this character have been committed. The organization has, indeed, changed its head-quarters; but it has always had money at its command and men of ability, somewhere or other, directing its movements. The Government have from time to time received secret information about it, and, consequently, to those who have been engaged in the administration of the criminal law in Ireland, much more respecting its proceedings has been known than it was expedient to reveal to the public. Knowing this, and assuming the Government had some valuable information not as to offences, but as to the conspiracy itself, and this not from official persons, but from members of the confederacy, when I first read this Notice my expectation was that the Government were about to proceed, though with the additional element of secrecy, as they did in the case of Sheffield, where a conspiracy was rife, limited in area, but analogous to this in its interference with social relations. In that case a Royal Commission was sent, with power to pardon and deal with the persons engaged in the organization, so as to reach not merely external acts and manifestations, but the combination itself. I confess I should have preferred a Royal Commission to a Select Committee of this House. I have a suspicion that the Government originally intended something of that kind. I am not prepared for miserable, petty, occasional expedients to meet an organization which has lasted beyond the memory of any living lawyer. I am opposed to temporary shifts and expedients being resorted to by a Government which commands a large majority. I say, it is time that some action should be taken, and action wholly different from that indicated by the speech of the Solicitor General, which amounts to whispering with bated breath—"Good sirs, see all we have done for you, be kind enough to abstain from crime." Why, the men who are engaged in these transactions, whom I have prosecuted, and seen in the dock, are not taken from the rank of society and the class in life which would be either affected or influenced by the measures which you are pleased to term remedial. I do not say that there may not be difficulties in the way of a Royal Commission and of secresy; but what have you got now? You are told by the Government it is to be what of all Committees is the least efficacious for protection—avowedly open, but secret on occasions and for particular individuals. The object of secresy is the protection of the individual—to obtain information from the very heart of this organization—to crush it out upon the evidence of informers, of men who are intimately acquainted with it. Universal secresy might attain this; occasional, never. Will it not be known who has been examined in secret, and if it is, what doubt can there be who it is that has told the tale and betrayed his accomplices. What you imagined whispered in the cellars will be proclaimed on the housetops? Instead of being a statesmanlike attempt to grapple with a great evil, founded on adequate information, this Motion has dwindled down, I regret to say it, to a mere political move. There has been an extraordinary pressure put upon the Government. The magistrates of Westmeath remonstrated, and the Lord Lieutenant made use of expressions from which the Government cannot now escape. He announced, as became his honourable and upright character, his desire to maintain the law, and his knowledge of the extent to which it was systematically violated—he told the magistrates of Westmeath he would protect them if he had the power, and that he would seek the power. The Lord Lieutenant has given this pledge on undoubted information; but the Government have a number of supporters below the Gangway who oppose the granting of this power. Is this proposal of a Committee a device to escape from the pledge? It is not becoming in the Government to give a positive and express promise through the mouth of their chief representative; and then to put up the Solicitor General for Ireland to say we are not going to give the Lord Lieutenant this power now—possibly we may never give it to him—but we shall have an inquiry where the magistrates and police, and possibly the offenders themselves, shall be subject to a skilful cross-examination. Information is to be obtained not from magistrates and grand jurors, but from the farmers who suffer from this tyranny, and many of whose sons are involved in it, from the small traders in whose shops the plots are planned and matured, and from the Roman Catholic clergymen who sprung from the people—know everything of the people. But do you imagine any of these will give evidence before a Committee which offers no protection. The Committee will be an absolute abortion both in its inquiry and in its results. But I see other difficulties in the way of this Committee. What are the advantages stated by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary to be anticipated from its appointment? He said that inquiry would be just to the Government, just to the people of Ireland, and just to the magistracy. That opens a wide field. There are three separate heads—the relation of the Government itself—mark, the relation of Government—to the present social condition of Ireland; the relation of the people of Ireland—mark, of the people of Ireland, not merely Westmeath, whose innocence, said the noble Lord, ought to be established; the relation of the people of Ireland and their crime relative to the crime that now exists in Westmeath; and mark also—"just to the magistracy." These are three subjects of inquiry, independently of the Riband organization and of the means to be devised for suppressing it. How is this Committee to be formed if these are to be the subjects of its inquiry? Are the Government to nominate a Committee who are to adjudicate upon their own merits? Is the Committee to be selected from the Ministerial Bench and from the front Opposition Bench; or is it to include those who represent the feelings of Nationalists and semi-Nationalists? Is it to do justice to the people of Ireland without consulting those who assume to represent them? The Solicitor General says the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) will be able to cross-examine the witnesses. The Solicitor General is himself an admirable hand at that operation, and, if the Committee is to comprise both these Gentlemen, I would rather be a listener than a witness. If the Committee is to be a Committee of this kind, it should be separated from the leaders and organizers of political parties. But I have grave doubts as to the propriety of such an inquiry; I have doubts as to what will be its scope and range; and I have doubts of the possibility of forming this Committee, with such extended objects, so as to give satisfaction to those whose proceedings are to be investigated. Let us look to the Committee of Mr. Napier. Nothing has more determined me to oppose this Committee than the proceedings of Mr. Napier's Committee. That Committee was appointed on the 10th of March, and reported in June, 1852. Now, is it proposed to this House that the Committee now moved for is to sit from the month of March to the month of June, engaged in these investigations, while Ireland is to remain in the state which is described by the Secretary for Ireland as intolerable? But not only do I think it likely that the Committee will proceed into the subjects indicated by the noble Lord, but I see a considerable number of others which may branch out from these. Thus, I think it not unlikely, as there has been a great deal said about the police force not being adapted for the detection of crime, that the Committee will enter into that subject; then I remember the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) last year asking whether religious teaching had been applied to induce a horror of these conspiracies in those engaged in them. Have there been proper remedies applied by education, in the bringing-up of these people, and how far is their violence the consequence of their want of it? If you go into causes and remedies, where may not the Committee wander? What limit is there to their investigations? The Solicitor General has read the names of Sir Joseph Napier's Committee; great names, undoubtedly! But what did that Committee wander into—even into suggesting a Land Bill. The last recommendation of the Committee was that a Land Bill should be introduced to revise the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland. What new remedy—what new manner of procedure—may not be introduced into the Committee now asked for? These things struck me as subjects that might grow out of this Committee, and they add to my objections to it. I ask, are you prepared now to delay useful legislation, which would meet this evil at once and protect those who are now suffering from this positive tyranny, until such a Committee shall have reported? That is the real question—for there is no doubt we are agreed as to the necessity of something being done. Is there a single Member of this House who is not anxious to terminate and crush this intolerable tyranny? If no one will advocate its continuance for a single hour, or for a single moment, then I ask what is the meaning of entering into this long, this elaborate, this possibly abortive inquiry, to terminate probably some time next year? And for what result? Short as has been the time during which I have sat in this House, I have learned very little good arises from a Blue Book. I will test it by this—is there anyone in this House who has read the Report and evidence of Sir Joseph Napier's Committee? I predict exactly the same fate for the evidence taken before this Committee, and its whole proceedings; no matter how able the Committee or sagacious their questions, they will simply pass away into a Blue Book. These Committees are meant for delay, they only produce delay, and no result but delay ever comes from them. If the Government are in earnest—if they really want an inquiry—why should they not accompany their proposal for a Committee with some immediate measure to be brought into operation in the meantime? What is to prevent them now from bringing in an Act—temporary if they choose—to enable them to seize the persons whom they say they can place their hands upon, and who are known to be the main authors of the various outrages which have taken place? What is to prevent that, I ask? It is perfectly idle to talk of the necessity of proof. There is one fact stated by Chief Justice Whiteside in his Charge which is to my mind decisive of the whole question—there are gentlemen in Meath who only leave their houses when accompanied by an armed escort, and who, without that armed escort, dare not attend the assizes as jurors. Can intimidation go further? Those who are not convinced by that fact, and by the statement in this House of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary, would not be convinced although Blue Book after Blue Book and tabulated Return after Return were laid on the Table. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. W. H. Gregory), seeing the Government rather in a difficulty in this matter, came forward in a very marked manner at an early period of this discussion to throw his protection over them, and explain the reason why, instead of action, we had investigation. I was a good deal struck by the excuse he gave for the Committee. If there was not a Committee, he said, it was not impossible that the Leader of the Opposition might coalesce with Gentlemen on the Liberal side below the Gangway, and place the Government in a minority. This is certainly a most candid confession. What! This Committee, heralded with so much pomp, and announced with so much striking effect by the noble Lord, we are now informed, on the authority of a supporter of the Government, put forward at an early period to defend their policy, is by no means aimed at the discovery and extinction of the Riband confederacy, but simply a measure to prevent the Ministry from being beaten by their own friends, and driven out of office. What a glimpse this gives of the administrative firmness and capacity to deal with crime of the Government! When the Peace Preservation Bill of last year was before the House it was opposed; there was a Division on it; the exact number who divided against it were, I think, 15; but even these 15—this band of brothers—were the terror of the Government Bench, under fear of which their best enterprizes

The defence of the hon. Member for Galway comes to this—that the apprehension of the junction of these 15 men with the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire necessitated the Government to take this course. The fact I do not presume to controvert. Indeed, I have before this myself observed that the Ministerial Bench lives in continual terror of some move in that quarter. Another instance of unfounded timidity! Never were followers more easily managed, in spite of all their angry protests duly transmitted to the Irish papers—

“Hi motus animorum et hæc certamina tanta Pulveris exigui jactu compressa quiescent.”

And, to follow the classical allusion, the “dust” is not very expensive—a letter to the Member for Meath, expressing sympathy with the Pope—a Postmaster General—tears in his eyes, distraction in his visage, lamenting over the downfall of the temporal power of the Pope—these suffice. It is impossible gravely to treat such an excuse as this, and what other has been offered? Sir, this proposal for a Committee prevents and supersedes action which is indispensably necessary. Does the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who calmly admits that they have in the background a remedy some time to be applied, never realize to himself how many lives may fall a sacrifice to this cruel system of intimidation by the delay of his measures?—what right have you to enter into a secret discussion of the merits of the case when men are being slain before your face? The Government admits the facts—not one person on the Treasury Bench has ventured to deny their existence. The Government have plainly told the House that they reserve the remedy. I do believe they have determined on the remedy; and, that being the case, they calmly gaze on the daily succession of outrage, the perpetual violation of the law, and the audacity which affronts the majesty of England with its crimes. Sir, I advocate immediate action. I am not averse to a thorough searching investigation, provided it does not interrupt your action. I am not averse to give the Government the most stringent powers they can ask, in order to obtain information, and not only to stop these outrages for the present—to stand between the assassin and his victim—but to root out the seeds of this grievous pestilence from my unfortunate country. If you will only act, and act at once, to extirpate these evils, I will not withhold from you any power. Place your country above your party; stand in the attitude in which your predecessors—Earl Grey, Earl Russell, Sir Robert Peel—stood, and I will not oppose the most rigid and determined policy. But I demand immediate protection for those who are endangered; I demand that you shall not palter with crime and confound the moral relations in men’s minds by suggestions that the presence or the absence of legislative measures can alter the quality of actions such as these. Sir, if nothing had been introduced into the debate beyond the consideration of the original Motion I should not have proceeded further. The view I have presented is short and simple, with nothing of party views or party ideas; not produced to embarrass, but offered to assist action, and awaken to a sense of the tremendous responsibility of further procrastination. But topics referred to by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, and which, as at the commencement of my observations I have said should have been kept distinct from questions relating to agrarian crime, also demand attention. Excluding the consideration of crime and outrage in the three counties named in the Motion now before us, my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) has expressed the highest gratification at the state of Ireland; and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has been pleased to say that his self-love is perfectly satisfied with its present condition. Sir, I shall candidly state what I think of the success of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. But before I do so, I crave permission to abate somewhat from the weight of my right hon. Friend's (Mr. Chichester Fortescue's) authority in this matter by asking why, if Ireland be as he has described, has he ceased to be officially connected with the country? I do not deny the charms of the Board of Trade, or doubt that his accomplished and refined mind is engaged with rapture on the occupations of that Office; or that at no period of his life did he ever feel that he was more congenially engaged than in the accumulation of figures and the multiplicity of calculations which now employ him. But notwithstanding all the attractions of the Board of Trade, it does strike me that if Ireland were now what he would have us think it is, he would have remained at his old post to watch the nascent prosperity of the country for which he had done so much, and to receive the electric shock of a nation's gratitude. Suggesting, therefore, this reason for caution before yielding to the authority of my right hon. Friend, I proceed to examine whether his flattering picture of the state of Ireland—crime now altogether apart—is justified by the facts, and whether the Government have good reason for their satisfaction. To determine this, we must first decide some questions and principles, respecting which there has never been unanimity among political thinkers. When a nation of inferior power and strength is united to one of infinitely greater power, there are two theories entertained as to the advantage arising from that relation. The one theory holds that the lesser and inferior country gains—that the fact of being incorporated into and made a part of the glory, prosperity, and power of a far greater State is in itself an ample equivalent for the loss of independence. The other theory—and it has lately come into great prominence—is that in the intellectual rivalry of separate and independent small nations, in their own autonomy and self-government, lies the true secret of human advancement and prosperity. The advocates of the first theory point to Rome, those of the second to Greece, in support of their opinions. Now, when I am asked whether the policy of Her Majesty's Government has operated beneficially in Ireland, I am obliged, before I answer you, to ascertain your view of these two theories. If you incline to the first theory, the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to Ireland can scarcely be considered beneficial, for it is a policy to encourage separate nationality—and in its immediate practical effect has revived and resuscitated the spirit of separate nationality in Ireland. If you hold the second theory, then I say their policy is successful—thoroughly successful. Does the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government know about the late elections that have occurred in Ireland, or about the societies that have been formed in that country? I have a strong impression that, amid the abstruse speculations and the great affairs which engross his attention, he has not had an opportunity of directing his mind to these matters; and I doubt, if he had, that he would have stated his self-love was satisfied with the result of his measures, and needed no solace. Consider the Meath election! Meath is the premier county of Ireland, close to the metropolis, and inhabited largely by Roman Catholic noblemen and gentry, Roman Catholic farmers, and a Roman Catholic middle-class of wealth and independence. A vacancy in its representation occurs—Mr. George Plunket, brother of the Earl of Fingall—and what, in Ireland, is not less important, brother also of a distinguished member of one of the monastic orders—a man whose character and attainments would render him an honour to this House if returned to it, comes forward to contest the county. The whole force and power of the Government are arrayed on his side; the entire strength and influence of the Roman Catholic clergy are brought to bear on his behalf; he has rank, station, money, and abilities to aid them. On the Sunday night before the nomination, a northern Presbyterian, who had never entered the county before—a man whose only merit was, as he himself stated, that his life had been devoted to undying enmity to British connection—is returned, without expending a single shilling, at the head of the poll by a majority of 900. I repeat my doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman knew of the circumstances of that election when he proclaimed that the condition of Ireland is eminently satisfactory. It is not satisfactory to me—neither does that election satisfy me. Whatever may be faults of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government looked at from an Imperial point of view, whatever may be my own opinion of his policy, I say that he might fairly expect to return such a candidate as Mr. Plunket for the Roman Catholic county of Meath. I further say that to find his defeat accomplished by an advocate of Repeal, is a subject of grave alarm. Sir, in the year 1832, and some years afterwards, Mr. O'Connell raised throughout Ireland an agitation for a separation from England. The hearts of the young were stirred:—I well recollect, in my own collegiate career, how that doctrine of separation, and the question of the advantages of self-government and autonomy were keenly discussed. What have we now?—all this repeated—and even an organized association existing in the City of Dublin, which, under the miserable veil of “home government,” aims at an independent Parliament, and its inevitable consequence—separation in counsel and in opinion from England. I say this, too, is a subject of alarm; for an association of this kind, met by no adequate opposition from those in authority, gains adherents. Sir, when Mr. O'Connell's agitation came to a head it was met by the statesmanlike attitude of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Russell. They did not fan the flame by declamation about old wrongs or grievances of sensibility which must be redressed, or by declaring that great questions must be looked at from an Irish and not from an Imperial point of view, and dealt with according to Irish sentiment. “Repeal the Union!” said Sir Robert Peel, “as soon re-enact the Heptarchy.” Is that the line taken by the present Government? That dangerous movement was crushed by the firmness of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Russell; and never revived until the right hon. Gentleman went through Lancashire enunciating a policy of nationality for Ireland, and the gratification of all the fantastic ideas that have germinated in the minds of the old native race of Ireland. The agitation for a separate nationality was extinguished until the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman kindled it afresh and fanned it; and now I warn him, and I warn the House of its spread. Ideas relegated for for years to the dreams of visionary enthusiasm, are again re-produced and embodied in action. What was the case at the last election held in Ireland—namely, at Galway? The candidate had to insert in his address a declaration of his adhesion to this principle of “home government.” Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared, as the Prime Minister of England, to tell the House that Repeal of the Union is an open question—that he views it with satisfaction—that it is to be discussed, and perhaps sent to a Secret Committee for consideration. I say that at no period has the question assumed the gravity, the importance, and the danger it presents at this moment. This is the immediate effect of basing your policy, not upon Imperial, but upon Celtic ideas; of flattering and fostering those Celtic ideas, and giving to them the sanction of intellectual authority and official power—it is the consequence of doing this in the case of a people who are incapable of discriminating; a people with whom words are things and promises are realities. Sir, I have trespassed on the attention of the House longer than I intended; but, in justice to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel), whose government of Ireland has been the subject of comment, I will say that if the present Government leaves the affairs of Ireland in the same condition in which Lord Palmerston left them at his death and in which the right hon. Baronet, on his retirement soon after, left them, they may well be proud. Was there then any agrarian crime; was there then any agitation for the repeal of the Union, or was there a single whisper of discontent? No. And when the distinguished historian of Lord Palmerston's life comes to record this portion of his history, he will be able to present a picture of the highest financial and administrative success in Ireland; and he will have to record that the measures and the speeches by which that success was attained are in direct antagonism with the measures and speeches of the present Prime Minister. Then was pursued towards Ireland a wise, a generous, and a philanthropic policy, and the history of that time furnishes a complete condemnation of the policy of the present Government.

MR. MAGUIRE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Maguire.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot, on the part of the Government, accede to that Motion. If we are to adjourn the debate upon a question of this nature at 12 o'clock on the second night of its discussion, it is idle to suppose that the Government will be able to get on with their measures.

The House divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 297: Majority 119.

Previous Question again proposed.

MR. MATTHEWS said, as many independent Members desired to address the House on the subject, he would move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Matthews.)

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman seems to think that because he and other hon. Members wish to address the House it is therefore impossible to proceed beyond 12 o'clock. ["Hear!"] If that is the view of the House I will not press my own view. This House has much to do—perhaps it never had more in the way of practical work awaiting its notice; and if this practice of moving the adjournment of debates at a quarter to 12 is to be resorted to immediately after the sense of the House has been declared by a very large majority, it is a method of obstructing Public Business against which I shall certainly record my protest by taking another Division if necessary.

MR. DISRAELI: I am quite prepared to support Her Majesty's Government in going on with the debate, and I should not in any way approve the present Motion if I had not evidence in my possession of the fact that several Members who are entitled to attention on both sides of the House wish to address it on this, which is certainly a very important question. It appears to me, having some experience in conducting the debates in this House, that it would not be possible to conclude the present debate in less than three or four hours. Therefore, I think it would be better, on the whole, to agree to the proposal which has been made; but, at the same time, if Her Majesty's Government wish to go on with the discussion, I shall not support or sanction any Motion for its adjournment.

MR. HORSMAN: In the last Division I voted with the minority, as a protest against the system recently introduced, and practised by the present Government, of taking up an undue share of every evening by speeches from the Treasury Benches. To my own knowledge the system was never carried on to such extent before as now, when on each evening we have two long speeches from the Treasury Bench, and other two from the front Bench on the Opposition side of the House. In fact, the great debates in this House are now becoming duels between the two front Benches; and for this reason, I, as I have stated, voted in the minority in the last Division.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: As an independent Member of this House, I for one, do not contemplate any prospective legislation in this House with very great satisfaction; and therefore if my hon. Friend perseveres in his Motion I shall be most happy to support it by my vote.

MR. MATTHEWS: After what has fallen from the right hon. Gentlemen on the two front Benches, I beg to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER thereupon called upon Mr. Maguire. That hon. Gentleman, however, indicating that he did not propose to address the House—

MR. DELAHUNTY rose—

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I rise to Order. I wish to know what is the Question now before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Dungarvan having, by leave of the House, withdrawn his Motion for the adjournment of the House, the Question stands that the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland having moved a Resolution for the appointment of a Committee, the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock) has moved the Previous Question; and the Question proposed is, "That that Question be now put."

MR. DELAHUNTY said, the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) having thought proper to bring before the House the question of Irish politics in reference to the "Home Government" movement, he (Mr. Delahunty) thought it right, on the part of some Irish Members of the House, to state why it was that such a feeling prevailed in Ireland, and how it would be easy to eradicate it for the purpose of securing the cordial co-operation of Ireland in support of Imperial legislation. As a supporter of the policy of the late Mr. O'Connell, who never did anything but what he conceived to be for the benefit of Ireland, he had a right to repudiate the sentiments put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and to say that he (Mr. Delahunty) thought at the time that Mr. O'Connell agitated the question of the repeal of the Union that he was right in so doing, and he thought so now. Mr. O'Connell agitated for a repeal of the Union by a separate Parliament in 1841; and he did so because he found by experience there was no getting the Imperial Parliament to grant equal laws for Ireland with England. He (Mr. Delahunty) would not have come into the House, except for the purpose of trying to get Members to turn aside from the path which they had hitherto followed, and to try to make equal laws for Ireland. Why had Ireland suffered? Why had the population of Ireland diminished? Emphatically, he thought it was because Ireland had different laws from the laws of England. He thought Her Majesty's Government deserved great credit for the attempt they had made to ameliorate the condition of Ireland. The people of Ireland thought that the question of religious liberty should be set at rest; they also thought that fair play between landlord and tenant should be secured, and the Prime Minister of England had done his best to meet the wishes of the people on these two subjects. All that the people of Ireland wanted was employment, through the revival of manufactures, having which they would pull with England against any attempt at foreign aggression. He should, however, vote against the Motion, because he considered the Committee totally unnecessary. Let the Government follow up the measures which they had inaugurated by other measures of an equally beneficial character to those of the last two Sessions, and they would have Ireland attached to them and to the country with a determination to do or die.

MR. SPEAKER having put the Previous Question, "That that Question be now put"—

MR. DISRAELI: If we go to a Division on the Question that has been put from the Chair, it will not be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to effect those changes in the Motion of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant which were agreed to by the right hon. Gentleman and also by the noble Lord, and in that case if we vote for the Motion of the noble Lord we shall, in fact, come to a vote which transfers the duties of the Executive to the House of Commons. Therefore, I must say I cannot support the Motion.

Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 398; Noes 26: Majority 372.

Friday, 3rd March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—
Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) * (29).

TABLE OF LESSONS—THE RITUAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE: Your Lordships will remember that in the latter part of last Session you had before you a Bill providing a new Table of Lessons in the Church Services. It came before you under the most favourable auspices, for it had the unanimous assent and approval of the Rubrics Commission. It passed this House with very little difficulty, and was sent down to the Commons, where, as I understand, there was every reason to expect it would be supported by a very large majority. At the last moment, however, it was withdrawn by Mr. Bruce the Secretary of State for the Home Department, much to the surprise of those who felt an interest in the question. Now, with the great respect which I sincerely feel for Mr. Bruce, I cannot but think that his decision on that occasion was an unwise one. The abandonment of the Bill was a great disappointment to very many of the clergy, who had been expecting to enjoy the advantage, in common with their congregations, of the new Table of Lessons. It was also a serious inconvenience and even pecuniary loss to the publishers of the Book of Common Prayer, for they knew not whether to retain the old Table, which was likely to be laid aside, or to insert the new, which had not yet received any legal sanction. It has been already announced that Her Majesty's Government have in preparation a Bill for the establishment of the new Table of Lessons, and I desire to ask, whether that Bill will be introduced into this or into the other House, and when it is likely to be brought in? I also wish to know whether it will be confined to the Table of Lessons, or whether it will include other points recommended by the Ritual Commission, several of which are of great importance? There are recommendations for rendering, if I may say so, the Church Services more elastic, by giving the clergy power of dividing the services, postponing certain portions of them, and adapting them to the various circumstances of particular parishes, provided they have the sanction of the diocesan. These recommendations would, I think, provoke very little opposition in either House, and would give general satisfaction. There are other recommendations which would, indeed, cause great controversy, but which are of the greatest importance. I allude more especially to the recommendation with regard to the Athanasian Creed. As a member of the Commission, I strove on four occasions by various ways to attain the object for which I was anxious—namely, that the Creed, while still retained in the Prayer Book as a profession of our Christian faith, should not be used any longer in the public services of the Church. I found that a great many members of the Commission concurred in the desirability of that object; but, unfortunately, they were not able to agree to any one of the plans which I ventured to propose. The result was that the Commission recommended the insertion of an explanatory note. But, strange to say, no sooner had the note been adopted by the members present at one meeting, than a notice was signed by a band of 17, with the Archbishop of Canterbury at their head, making an actual majority of the whole Commission, protesting against the decision. It was the opinion of the Archbishop and others that, while attaching great value to the Creed as embodying the Christian faith, it was highly desirable it should be no longer used in the public services of the Church. The circumstances I have mentioned render it difficult for the Government to deal with the question; but, though difficult, it is of great importance. We ought not to lose this great opportunity of removing from the Church Services that which has for a long time been regarded as the main stumbling block in the way of many of those separated from our Church who desire to return to it. Looking, above all, to the damnatory clause, it would be a great boon to the Church to discontinue the use of the Creed in the public services without showing any disrespect to it or eliminating it from the Prayer Book. The noble Earl concluded by asking, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to propose in this House a measure to establish a new Table of Lessons in the Church Services; and whether that measure will comprise also other points recommended by the late Ritual Commission?

sible, a Bill which was received with such general approbation last Session. Accordingly, just before the noble Earl rose, I placed the Bill of last year in the hands of the Clerk at the Table, with the view of moving the first reading before your Lordships separated. It is, however, limited to the one object of providing a new Table of Lessons for the Church Services. Her Majesty's Government do not feel that it is desirable to enlarge the measure by adding other clauses carrying into effect other recommendations of the Ritual Commission; because, bearing in mind that none of these recommendations were adopted by entire unanimity, it seemed they might give rise to contentions or differences of opinion which might endanger the passing of this approved measure. As regards the Bill of last Session, it is true it passed this House with but slender alterations—alterations rather verbal than substantial—and it reached the other House at a time when, had it been wholly unopposed, it might have passed without difficulty. The period of the Session, however, was one at which it was impossible to carry any measure likely to give rise to discussion or opposition, and in the case of this Bill numerous Amendments were suggested, some of which were calculated to elicit considerable amount of feeling. It was therefore thought advisable to withdraw the Bill, there being at that time no prospect of its unanimous acceptance. The measure I now introduce has no such difficulties to contend with; but even if opposition should arise, it is presented at so early a period of the Session that there will be ample time for discussion. Were we to act upon other recommendations of the Ritual Commission, it would be necessary to meet the question mooted by the noble Earl with respect to the Athanasian Creed. The Government, however, do not think they ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of dealing with a subject which has already called forth an amount of somewhat acrimonious opposition, and which is likely to provoke yet more: they have therefore confined their measure to the new Table of Lessons, as being a subject likely to receive general approbation and speedy enactment.

LORD PORTMAN expressed his regret that the Government did not propose to carry out other recommendations of the Commission—especially one which had received the almost unanimous assent of the Commissioners, and would afford a speedy and inexpensive remedy to the unseemly contests which had arisen in certain parishes, and had necessitated the appointment of a Commission. It was a serious evil that such protracted and expensive litigation should be necessary when the Commission had suggested a very easy remedy. If the clergy defied the law, how could it be enforced against the parishioners? The Government should consider that if speedy and inexpensive justice could not be obtained through the Ecclesiastical Courts, there was another tribunal where it could be obtained, though in a painful and disagreeable manner. The law on the subject having been laid down by the Judicial Committee, there could be no difficulty in enforcing the Act of Uniformity under the common law as a misdemeanour, and if the clergy set the law at defiance they must not be surprised if this step was resorted to.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he had heard with very great regret the declaration made by the noble and learned Lord on the part of the Government. He thought it impossible things could remain as they were. Some of the clergy had declared their intention of using the new Table of Lessons even if it did not receive the force of law, as it had received the approval of a Commission of considerable authority; and persons would be inclined to act upon other recommendations of the Commission in the same way, unless Parliament took action in the matter. It was high time that these questions should be settled. As to the Athanasian Creed, there was almost an unanimous feeling on the part of the Commission that, however valuable as a declaration of faith, it was not in its place in the services of the Church. It should be remembered that in no other Church was it employed in the same way, it being received as a document, but not introduced into the services. He should have agreed with the proposal to remove it from its place in the public services of the Church, had he not felt that it was beyond the scope of the Commission to deal to that extent with so important a question, its function being merely to deal with the rubrics. It was very inconvenient to act on one of the recommendations and leave the others in suspense, and he hoped that if the Government did not take them up some other Members of the House would do so.

LORD EBURY said, he entirely concurred with the noble Lord who had preceded him. He would not go over the ground they had traversed; but he must say it was paying a poor compliment to the Commissioners, after they had sat three years and had taken a great deal of trouble—which, however, they did not grudge—to act only on one, comparatively speaking, insignificant portion of their recommendations. Unless remedial measures were introduced the Church would be seriously prejudiced, and increased confusion would prevail. The noble Earl near him (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who had just returned from the Continent, had made several attempts to set some of these questions at rest, and it was high time that action should be taken.

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Table of Lessons contained in the Prayer Book—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 29.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 3rd March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Earl of Bective, for Westmoreland.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Business of the House, Mr. Collins and Mr. White added.

PUBLIC BILL—Referred to Select Committee—Ecclesiastical Titles Act Repeal [27].

INDIA—BONUS COMPENSATION COMMITTEES.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Returns from the Bonus Compensation Committees in India and Correspondence, which he said he would communicate to the House, will be in the hands of Members?

MR. GRANT DUFF replied, that the Returns would be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow.

EDUCATION—GRANTS TO SCHOOL MANAGERS.—QUESTION.

MR. R. BRIGHT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering the short notice given to managers of schools of the altered conditions under which any Parliamentary grant to be made after the 30th of April next is obtainable, he will postpone the date after which grants will cease to be made under "the Old Code?"

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that the time for the new Code to come into operation had been fixed with very great care by the Educational Department, and, therefore, he could not undertake to make any change with reference to it. The regulations respecting night schools would not come into operation until after the coming season for such schools. With regard to the general day schools, there was an introductory minute in the new Code, arranging among other matters that the provisions as to pupil teachers had only to be observed at the time of the inspection, and the remainder was arranged so as to suit the best working of the Department. He felt quite certain that it would be very much against the interest of the managers to postpone the date at which they were to receive grants under the new regulations.

ARMY—OFFICERS OF THE MILITARY TRAIN.—QUESTION.

MR. A. SMITH asked the Secretary of State for War, Under what circumstances three officers of the late Military Train, whose first commissions are dated respectively 21st September 1855, 23rd November 1855, and 29th October 1858, and whose commissions as Captains are dated respectively 26th December 1863, 21st June 1864, and 1st April 1868, have been appointed, under date 15th February 1870, Acting Commissaries, over the heads of officers of the late Commissariat whose first appointments date 1st April 1855, and whose commissions under which they held the relative rank of Captain were dated November 1859; and, whether one or more of such Commissariat officers had not been recommended for their special acquaintance with transport duties?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, in amalgamating the several departments which form the Supply and Transport sub-department, a certain number of places in the higher ranks were assigned to the duties hitherto performed by the several departments respectively, and these places were assigned to officers who had hitherto performed the duties in the old departments. In the Military Train a large number of officers in the higher ranks declined to join the new department, and their juniors obtained the advantage. I am not aware that any departmental officers, qualified and wishing to undertake transport duties, were rejected.

SCOTLAND—DEFENCE OF THE FIRTH OF FORTH.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any action upon the representations which have been forwarded from various quarters as to the present defenceless state of the Frith of Forth?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I must give the same answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Baronet that I have given in reply to other Questions upon the subject—namely, that no provision is made in the present Estimates for that purpose.

STAFF OF THE POST OFFICE.

QUESTION.

MR. HAVILAND-BURKE asked the Postmaster General, Whether, having regard to the late increase in the number of Letters and to the Postal Cards, the staff of the Post Office has been adequately added to; and, whether there is any time fixed within which Letters posted in the Metropolitan District ought to be delivered; and, if so, what time?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that owing to the increased work which had to be performed in the Department, a superintendent had been appointed to take on other men either temporarily or permanently as the exigencies of the service required. With regard to the second Question, the hon. Member would find the fullest information upon the point in the Postal Guide.

Mr. A. Smith

INDIA—COLLEGE FOR ENGINEERS.

QUESTION.

MR. DICKINSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What will be the charge on the revenues of India of the proposed College for Engineers; what the building will cost; what will be the annual cost of the establishment; and whether it is in contemplation to attach any and what retiring pensions in favour of professors or others employed in the institution?

MR. GRANT DUFF: There will be no charge on the revenues of India on account of the Engineering College; the fees will be slightly in excess of the charges, including interest on the buildings and plant, say on £90,000. There will be 11 professors and instructors on salaries varying from £700 to £300 per annum. Of these, nine will be entitled to pensions under the provisions of the Superannuation Act, and two will not be entitled to pensions. If my hon. Friend would like the figures here they are—Annual sanctioned charge for College, as per regulations of Secretary of State in Council, £18,350; interest on buildings, &c., say £90,000 at 4 per cent, £3,600; total, £21,950. Fees, 150 students at £150, £22,500; difference, £550.

ARMY—RETIRING ALLOWANCES.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT BURY asked the Secretary of State for War, On what basis he has calculated the amount that will be annually required for retiring allowances to officers of the Army, in order to secure a proper flow of promotion; and, what will be the probable annual cost of such scheme of retirement?

MR. CARDWELL: The first effect of the proposed changes will be not to retard, but probably to accelerate, the flow of promotion, inasmuch as the public purse will be substituted for that of private purchasers; and the employment of Army officers in the auxiliary forces will conduce to the same result. What may be the effect of the future cessation of purchase on the one side, and employment in the Reserve forces on the other, upon the flow of promotion is a question on which opinions differ, and there are no data which have been considered sufficiently ascertained to become the basis of actuarial calculation.

ARMY—STAMP DUTIES ON COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If there is any precedent why officers of the Control Department who have not been promoted by the introduction of the Control Warrant should be called upon to pay the Stamp Duty for a new commission; and, further, if there is any objection to officers who have not been promoted, and who receive no benefits from the Control Warrant, and who are permitted to retain the privileges accorded to them by former Warrants until promoted, being allowed to retain their original commissions as issued to them for their services in their old departments, without having to give them up to be substituted by new commissions in the Control Department?

MR. CARDWELL: As soon as the new commissions of those officers who have not been promoted have been signed and issued the old commissions will be received back, and the 30s. for the stamp returned.

EDUCATION—NEW REVISED CODE. QUESTION.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is to be understood, in the case of schools where the next inspection takes place after April 30th, e.g. during the month of May, and where the teachers and managers may have taught and worked during two-thirds of a year under the regulations of the present Revised Code, that they are now to be subject to the new restrictions and regulations of the Re-revised Code; and, whether it would not be more reasonable that each school should come under the new Code after, and not previous to, its next inspection?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that the hon. Gentleman would find in the Minute preceding the Code an answer to the first Question. After the 30th of April the inspection would be under the new Code. For the reason he had given, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member for East Somerset (Mr. R. Bright), it would be much against the interests of the managers if that course were not adopted.

ARMY—APPOINTMENTS TO FIRST COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the report that appointments to first commissions and retirements by sale have in several instances been delayed by Government authority pending the passing of the Army Regulation Bill now before the House; and, if so, whether such premature forestalment of legislation is not in his opinion calculated to interfere with the efficiency of the Army by producing a strong sense of injustice amongst officers who are thus compelled to remain in the service against their will?

MR. CARDWELL: Retirements by sale have not been delayed where officers are desirous of selling according to the established regulations. With regard to first appointments, those who had lodged their money have been allowed to proceed if they desire it. No fresh lodgments will be accepted for the present, as it is intended that future commissions shall be given without purchase.

ARMY—VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HAMBRO asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in case of the Volunteers going into the proposed camps of instruction, their expenses will be paid, such as for travelling and rations; at what time of the year those camps will be held, and where; and, if all administrative battalions will have an opportunity of attending?

MR. CARDWELL: In the present year, 1,100 officers and men of the Artillery Volunteers have received 10s. a head for the expenses of their attendance at Shoeburyness, the very satisfactory results of which have been laid on the Table in Colonel Chermiside's Reports. A sum of £10,000 is included in the present Estimates for a like purpose as regards both Artillery and Rifle Volunteers going to camps of instruction. Rations are issued when practicable at cost price. £8,500 are also taken for the allowance of 1s. a day to men attending brigade drills when ordered by the officers in command of districts.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, in amalgamating the several departments which form the Supply and Transport sub-department, a certain number of places in the higher ranks were assigned to the duties hitherto performed by the several departments respectively, and these places were assigned to officers who had hitherto performed the duties in the old departments. In the Military Train a large number of officers in the higher ranks declined to join the new department, and their juniors obtained the advantage. to which inquiry the Consul had given no answer. Among the great quantity of evidence that might be produced on the subject, he would select the evidence of a Dutch clergyman, Mr. Huet, residing in the Republic, who stated, in reference to the treatment of the captives by the Boers—

“One will ask whether there are no laws to prevent ill-treatment and to guarantee liberty to the poor captives, at least after some time of servitude? Certainly, with a truly hypocritical philanthropy, certain laws are made; for instance, that in case of transgression the master has to bring his servant to the field-cornet to have him punished; but the master cares little for the law, and the field-cornet just as little, and the servant does not even know the existence of the law. The same is true of the apprenticeship. Till their twenty-second, or in some places till their twenty-fifth year they are apprenticed. All this time they have to serve without payment. The Boers say—‘This is right, because we want compensation for the expense and trouble spent in their education.’ Expense, and trouble, and education! As soon as the poor creatures are able to walk, they have to look after the cattle, or carry the youngest child of the mistress, who is often as big and twice as heavy as themselves. Till the twenty-second or twenty-fifth year! And all this time without any reward, but perhaps a thoroughly worn-out piece of clothing, invectives, curses, whippings! And when the time of servitude is over, are they then free? Who will give them freedom? Who will make them acquainted with the law? Nobody. It is slavery in the fullest sense of the word—with this exception, that slave States have their laws and overseers, who at least keep the ill-treatment within certain limits; whilst here nobody, I say nobody, cares for their lot, and they are thoroughly given over to the caprice of their cruel masters and often yet more cruel mistresses. When the servant maid becomes marriageable, the master’s permission must be obtained for her taking a husband, which permission, it is unnecessary to say, is in most cases refused, and, if granted, the applicant must pay for the girl either with money or with work. After all this let nobody say that slavery or the slave trade is abolished in any part of the Transvaal Republic, as has been stated by some newspapers.”

Could we say that Great Britain was entirely guiltless in this matter? This country had played a noble part with regard to slavery; but in the Republic of South Africa the course of the slave trade and slavery was worse than anything we read of as existing when Wilberforce began his great work of slave emancipation. He asked what was to be done in this case, because we did not want a military expedition to put down these things. Was there any hope of the Transvaal Republic voluntarily joining such a Confederation as he proposed? He believed there was. There was evidence that the leading inhabitants were thoroughly opposed to the practices he had described, and would take any step to put an end to them. The hon. Gentleman referred, in support of this assertion, to speeches delivered by some of the most respectable inhabitants, and also to the Report of a Commission on the subject. He then observed that recent events had given an importance to the question which it did not possess a few years ago. In these countries gold, and more recently diamonds, had been discovered. The diamond fields were claimed by both the Transvaal Republic and the Orange Free State; but the result of an investigation which General Hay, the acting Governor of the Cape, had been at great pains to make, showed that they belonged to neither, but to a Native chief called Waterboer. He held in his hand Parliamentary Papers published at the Cape, with which he would not trouble the House, showing General Hay’s views. In last December there were 15,000 persons in the diamond fields, who were almost entirely British subjects. The British Government had a duty to discharge towards these men, to protect them, and provide a suitable government for them in the country to which they had gone. That Her Majesty’s Government was anxious to do so appeared from the fact that they had sent a magistrate to the district. Sir George Grey, in a very remarkable and able despatch addressed to the present Lord Lytton, had urged the course he ventured to bring under the consideration of the House; and the present Governor, Sir Henry Barkly, in a speech he delivered at the British Association, at Newport, had expressed similar views. He hoped that it might be the good fortune of the distinguished man who now governed Her Majesty’s dominions in South Africa to lay the foundations of a Confederation which in future days might tend to promote the glory of the British Crown and the happiness of the people of South Africa. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. W. M. TORRENS seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that Her Majesty’s Government should take steps to ascertain to what extent the Confederation of the British Possessions in South Africa and of the adjacent territories is practicable,"—(Mr. Robert Fowler,)

MR. GILPIN said, it was the duty of this country, and of those who represented it in the Colonial Office, to take care that treaties affecting the lives and liberties of thousands of persons should be literally carried out. If territories were occupied, as those in question were, upon condition that slavery and the slave trade should not exist in them, it was required of us as honourable men, and of the Government as an honourable Government, that this condition should not remain a fiction, but should be made a fact. He had received a large amount of evidence as to the existence of the slave trade in those districts. He had no doubt his hon. Friend in the Colonial Office (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would be as earnest as the right hon. Gentleman his predecessor (Mr. Monsell), than whom he had never known a man more disposed to carry out the real object of his appointment, or more willing to listen to the representations of the various Colonies. In the Colony of Natal there was a Governor at serious issue with his constitutional Assembly. Within 18 months this gentleman twice dissolved the Assembly in order to procure one that was subservient to his will; but in spite of his efforts an Assembly had been returned which would no doubt carry on the reforms upon which the community were bent. This was the more necessary because the Colony was now living beyond its means; and the Governor should be informed that his administration in the Colony was not approved by the Home Government. Even that day a Bill had been sent down from the Lords relating to the West African Settlements to be read a second time. Its object was that any crime, or alleged crime, committed 20 miles from the border of that Colony should be subject to the tribunals of that Colony. In other words, the jurisdiction of the colonial government was to be extended 20 miles beyond the colonial territory—upon a territory we had never claimed, and over a people who had never acknowledged our authority.

Why, if such a thing were proposed in civilized life it would be considered utterly monstrous. What Bismarck was the author of such a Bill as that? If we were to have Colonies at all we should show them that we recognized the duty of seeing that all the legislation affecting them was just and wise.

MR. KINNAIRD said, it was horrible to think that that remarkably intelligent and acute race, the Basutos, should be treated in so disgraceful a way, and carried into slavery, under the sanction of the British Government, or from the want of proper interference by us. Better give up our Colonies than govern them so.

MR. BUXTON said, he had made a very thorough study of this question, and had come to the same conclusion regarding it as his hon. Friend. There could be no doubt that there had been an abominable system of slavery which had received encouragement from the Government. He hoped the suggestion contained in the Motion might be carried out, as he was confident it would result in great good. There were a great many, both at home and abroad, who were in favour of federation, and the feeling was growing, especially among the most respectable classes in the Colonies.

MR. MACFIE considered it of great advantage that business connected with the administration of our Colonies should occasionally come under the notice of the House, because it showed our fellow-subjects at a distance that we regarded them as associated with us in all that concerned the interests of the Empire. He was of opinion that the examples which they had before them of the successful results of federation in British North America and in the United States ought to induce Her Majesty's Government to bestow their best attention on the Motion of the hon. Member for Penrhyn (Mr. R. N. Fowler). The Colonies of South Africa were important in consequence of their magnitude, and productiveness exhibited in the increased growth of wool, sugar, and other commodities, and also on account of their central position with regard to other parts of the Empire. There could be no doubt as to the advantage of maintaining our Colonies. The strength of the British nation must depend on the number of its population and of the fighting men it could send forth. Surely our colonists would do their duty as British subjects when the occasion arose. On the other hand, we must do our duty to them, and show that we acted with vigour, like Englishmen worthy of being associated with such communities.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he had listened with astonishment to the hon. Member for Penrhyn (Mr. R. N. Fowler), when he proposed federation not only with regard to the Colonies of South Africa, but also to the Transvaal Republics, with which this country had nothing to do. The Orange River Territory and the Transvaal Republic were originally under our control; but the inhabitants revolted, and their territory was now beyond our authority. How, then, could those States be federated with Natal, British Caffraria, and the Cape? [Mr. R. N. FOWLER: Only with their own consent.] Many hon. Members must be aware that those Transvaal Republics, instead of wishing to join us, desired to split up into a series of still smaller republics, in order to carry on their own modes of government, and to make predatory inroads into neighbouring States with less inconvenience. The subject was one, he might add, on which it was impossible for any hon. Gentleman to say that he represented the feelings of the colonists, because no sooner was a particular Colony declared to entertain certain views with respect to it than the declaration was disavowed. His hon. Friend opposite was anxious for incorporation, in order that we might get rid of slavery; but he felt satisfied that in the case of a body of men such as those to whom he was referring it would be impossible to do away with slavery unless we were prepared to enter again into a series of South African wars. There was, he might add, no proof that the Colonies in question wished to be joined together.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he was much obliged to those of his hon. Friends who had afforded him the opportunity, if he desired it, of excusing himself for a very brief statement, on the ground that he had been but a short period in his present Office. While quite conscious of his own shortcomings, he thought no man could have sat in that House so long as he had done without acquiring some knowledge of colonial affairs. There was a considerable vagueness about the Motion, which might have been more explicit. He

(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) protested against it being supposed that the withdrawal of troops was to be taken as indicating an unfriendly feeling towards the South African or any other Colonies on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It was capable of contention that the consolidation of power at home was in the best interests of the Colonies themselves; that the presence of British troops often encouraged the colonists to act towards the Natives in a manner not conciliatory; that the supremacy at sea of the mother country was of more value to the Colony than the presence of an isolated regiment; and that in the case of communities as well as of individuals, the more self-reliance was encouraged the more stable was their prosperity likely to be. With respect to Natal, he declined to enter into the question as to the differences between the Lieutenant Governor and his Council. It was unfortunately true that differences had existed, and probably, as in most cases of the kind, there might be faults on both sides; but he trusted that all was now in a fair way of being settled. No effort of the Government should be spared to bring about an arrangement that would be generally satisfactory. With respect to the Dutch Republics in South Africa, he agreed with much the hon. Member had said about slavery, civilization, and Christianity going hand in hand in that country. He was afraid it was too true that civilization was sometimes accompanied by fire and sword, and that Christianity was sometimes heralded by rapine and slavery. Such civilization was no matter of boast to Europeans, and such Christianity was sadly at variance with the precepts of its Divine founder. In the Transvaal Republics slavery was no doubt carried on under another name. It was impossible to read the accounts which had been received without arriving at that conclusion. The history of the Republics was brief. The Boers, after the emancipation of the slaves in 1834, left the Cape Colony and went to Natal, and, driven out there, they proceeded to the Orange Territory, and, after many conflicts with the Natives, established themselves as independent republics, until the assumption of British sovereignty by Sir Harry Smith, in 1848. This assumption was at least premature. No country had the right to annex territory

unless it was prepared to maintain therein law and order, and to secure life and property. For this we were not prepared, and moreover, as to the wishes of the Boers, Pretorius at once opposed our authority and was only driven across the Vaal after a severe engagement. Then when the Basuto Chief Moshesh attacked us, the Boers refused to join us in defending the country against him. It was in consequence of the people not supporting our authority that in 1851 Lord Grey wrote a despatch, in which he said that British authority had been established for the good of the inhabitants, and that if they refused to support us it was doubtful whether this country would incur the expense of supporting the Sovereignty. In 1854 came the abandonment of the Orange Territory, arranged by Sir George Clerk, as Special Commissioner, and it was said that we abandoned it against the wishes of the inhabitants. Now, it was difficult for any one in this country to express the opinions of the colonists. No doubt there was a protest against the abandonment; but it was equally clear that there would have been a protest the other way. All we could do was to rely upon the able men whom we had instructed to carry out our policy. The hon. Gentleman had said that the Government of the day wished to get rid of the territory; but that was because the people of the State believed they were carrying out a course of policy best adapted to their own interests. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gilpin) was mistaken as to the character of the Bill to which he had referred, which indeed referred not to South Africa but to the West African Settlements, where it had been rendered necessary by the occurrences which had taken place. One of the Natives had plundered a village and murdered several persons. It was true he was arrested; but in the case of one murder he got clear on the technical point that it was committed just outside the British boundary, and had he not committed a second murder just within the boundary he would have escaped scot free. Thereupon this Bill was brought in by the Law Officers of the Crown, and it provided that if a murder was committed within 20 miles of British territory by a person not being a subject of any civilized State, and not being amenable to any established jurisdiction, he might still be tried and convicted. The hon. Member said that we owed protection to British subjects. No doubt that was the case; but he could not assent to the proposition that when, as in the case of the diamond diggers, British subjects of their own free will established themselves in a country in which we had no authority, we were bound or entitled to annex that country in order to afford them due protection. [Mr. R. N. FOWLER: With the consent of the chief and people.] That might or might not be; but even then it was doubtful whether we were to go on annexing and annexing. With respect to the claim of Waterboer, it was true there was a dispute between him and the President of the Free State Republic, and it was also true that the President of the Republic, after having been asked to submit the claim to arbitration, and finding that Waterboer would not give up his right, took the usual mode of issuing a proclamation, in which he said that all this property in the diamond fields belonged to the Republic. In consequence of the disagreement between Waterboer and the President of the Republic the arbitration was not entered into, and Waterboer appealed to the Government of this country. It was not true that we had declared that this territory belonged to Waterboer, and it was quite possible that his claim to the whole of it could not be established. What had been done was this—as soon as the proclamation was issued, General Hay, who was administering the government at the Cape until the arrival of Sir Henry Barkly, gave notice to all the British subjects not to join in anything which would show that Waterboer's claim was not recognized, and announced that this country could not by any means recognize the proclamation annexing this large tract of land. The Resolution of the hon. Member declared—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government should take steps to ascertain to what extent the Confederation of the British Possessions in South Africa and of the adjacent territories is practicable.”

He wished to call the attention of the House to the wording of this Resolution. The confederation of British territory was something which he could well understand. Schemes of confederation had been going on in British North America, and were under discussion in Australia, which, tending as they did to economy of administration and consolidation of power, were arrangements which the Government would always regard with favour. But when they talked of the confederation of British territory with adjacent territory, they must take care that that was not annexation under another name. There could not be a confederation of adjacent territory without its coming under the sovereignty of England. Were we prepared for that? The abandonment of the Free State settlement was part of a deliberate policy which had been pursued by previous Governments. So far as home interests were concerned, we did not wish to extend the boundaries of our South African territories, and did not intend to expend the money of England and to risk the lives of Englishmen in projects upon which neither the honour nor the interest of England required us to embark. The policy of the Government was not to expend Imperial money and risk the lives of Englishmen in the cause of wild annexation. But having laid down that principle, he did not think it was the policy of any Government to prevent the extension and the development of Colonies by their own aid and for their own interests, under their own management. No doubt it might be a good thing to draw a line across the map of South Africa and say the territory should be settled under British protection; but that could not be done without a clashing of interests, the loss of money, and other things more valuable than money. There might be, and he hoped there would be, a future of power and prosperity for the Cape Colonies; and if he might be allowed to refer to the extension of those Colonies, he would respectfully say that he ventured to doubt whether a Colony which had not yet found itself able to assume the duties and privileges of responsible government was in a fit state to annex other territory to it. He thought that when a European population numbering 200,000 felt itself equal to self-government, it might probably be the case that its resources might be developed by its own exertions and management without Imperial aid. If the Colonies showed a desire to develop their own resources without requiring Imperial aid, it would not be the business of the Government to throw any obstacles in the way, but rather to afford facilities. He did not think the Motion of the hon. Gentleman would advance the objects he had in view, especially as any "steps" to be taken must be taken by the colonists themselves, and not by the Home Government. Let it not be supposed that the Government was unfriendly to the Colonies. They were rather desirous to encourage their self-reliance. He had no doubt, after the discussion which had taken place, that the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion, and he might rest assured that the affairs of South Africa would continue to receive the careful attention of the Government. The hon. Member should bear in mind that Sir Henry Barkly, who had only recently arrived in the Colony, had all these subjects under his consideration, and there could be no doubt that he would endeavour by arbitration to bring these matters to a satisfactory issue.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY observed that the question raised was, supposing these adjacent territories, to which reference had been made, wished to return under the allegiance of Her Majesty, whether the House would be willing to encourage and facilitate such proposal. He considered the proposition well worthy of discussion, and, even although the Motion could not end in any definite proposal, the discussion which had taken place would show to the colonists at the Cape the interest taken in them by Parliament, and that a desire existed to do everything possible to strengthen and consolidate their interests. On the other hand, it would show to the adjacent territories that, if they were anxious to come under allegiance to Her Majesty, the House was willing to promote their wishes. He had always advocated the consolidation of colonial territory and government, and thought it was in the interest of the integrity of the Empire that such consolidation should take place. He had been misrepresented as holding lightly the value of colonial connection with the British Empire. His hon. Friend (Mr. R. N. Fowler) had done him the justice to remind the House that on the question of the abandonment of the Orange Sovereignty he stood alone, in the debate which took place, in protesting against that abandonment. He considered that any abandonment of territory was a symptom of the decadence of national spirit. He thought, also, that there had been no precedent for abandonment; there was precedent for exchange and cession, but not for abandonment. The result of the subsequent 16 years' experience had convinced him of the correctness of the views which he then entertained; and Sir Philip Wodehouse, who had ably governed in South Africa for 18 years, said in one of his last despatches that the result of that abandonment had been mischievous alike to the interest of this country and of the Cape Colony. But it was a difficult thing to retrace our steps. He had mentioned this for the purpose of defending himself against much misrepresentation as to his readiness to separate any Colony from this country. There was not a Member of the House who did not value our colonial connection, and think it essential to the strength and greatness of this Empire. The only dispute was as to the way in which the connection would be best cemented. He had always maintained that the proper way to cement that connection was by making the Colonies stronger and more self-reliant; and he had always taken colonial soldiers, defending their own territory, to be an addition to the strength of the British Army, while the defence of Colonies by home troops was only keeping up a show of connection which paralyzed the Colonies—a connection of dependence, and not of extended empire. If it were true, as he had heard it rumoured, that America expected a cession of territory from us, either in the West Indies or in Canada, in settling the disputed claims between the two countries, he was sure it would be found, from the way in which any such proposition would be met by England, that they had been grossly mistaken in their supposition, and that nothing would incense this House more than such a proposal being made to it. The policy of the past Government, and of the present Government, had been identical on these points. The late Government took the first step for gradually withdrawing British troops from South Africa, in order to draw out the self-reliance and the strength of the Colony, and that course had been carried on effectually by the present Government. But now

came the question, how far the confederation suggested by the Motion before the House would advance that policy? The late Government took one step towards the extension of British territory in South Africa by admitting within the Queen's allegiance the tribe of the Basutos, which was a mutual advantage, as it removed the isolation of Natal, and gave a distinct intimation that if other places wished to own allegiance to the Queen, the same arrangement might be practicable, but on two conditions—namely, that the proposition must come from the territory itself, and that the arrangement should be maintained by the resources of the Colony, and not by the British taxpayer. There were several reasons for bringing the Orange and Transvaal Territories under one Government with the Cape Colony. There was much British capital invested in these South African districts; and if these large territories were brought within the colonial Government they would form a new and extensive field for British enterprise for many years to come. At the same time the result would be a gain to humanity, for the abominable and atrocious system of slavery which prevailed in those districts would at any rate be greatly checked; and so also would the constant wars and conflicts which were at present bred by border disputes. For the interests of peace, of humanity, and of commerce, it would be better if this consolidation of government could take place, and the whole South African territory, governed by English rulers, and on the principles of colonial government—now being happily again recognized, would be more useful to us than Algeria had been to France. It would be impossible to govern it from Downing Street; but if, under whatever local distribution of sub-government, it were all brought under the Queen's supreme executive at Cape Town, such an arrangement would be for the best interests of all concerned. He feared, however, that the people of the Transvaal Republic were too much wedded to the Commando system; were too much enamoured of slavery; and had become too much brutalized by it to desire now to join us. He doubted whether the Orange Free State would willingly return. Many unforeseen opportunities, however, might occur. No one could tell what would be the result of the discovery of gold and diamonds in the very heart and centre of this territory, for the influx of capital and speculation from Great Britain and from the rest of the world might bring about most important events. The States in question also had strong motives for uniting themselves with us—for access to the sea, and for a termination of mutual disputes and better government. He thought the hon. Member for Penrhyn had done good service in drawing this unanimous expression of opinion from the House on the subject; and if the opportunity should occur he hoped it would be found for the good of this country, and for the general interest of South Africa, that the suggested consolidation should take place.

MR. W. M. TORRENS concurred thoroughly in the reprobation expressed in reference to the abandonment by this country of the Orange River Territory. It was a fatal precedent if it was to be repeated; but he fancied he heard whisperings in the air that told him it would not be. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had made many unexceptionable protests against a proposal which nobody had ever made. Annexation? It had always been denounced and reprobated by that party in the House who contended for the maintenance and consolidation of our colonial Empire on free and federated principles. What they advocated was facilities for free agreement, and the announcement of a resolve on the part of the parent State to accept territory in the name of the Sovereign only where such agreement should be made. If those neighbouring States thought they did well in coalescing with us, they should be welcomed. But the hon. Gentleman, besides denouncing annexation, had distinctly approved the policy of the Duke of Newcastle, which he, for one, could never look back upon without regret. This was the very antithesis of the policy of annexation as commonly understood. Those who thought that discussions of colonial matters in the House of Commons were ineffectual might usefully contrast the tone of the Under Secretary that evening with the tone of his predecessor 12 months ago, and he made that observation not by way of taunt, but of encouragement. Those who were active in this matter last year received exceedingly little favour from Her Majesty's Government; but, if it was then desirable on general grounds that distant and outlying Colonies should be recognized and knit closer together as part and parcel of the Empire, how immeasurably had the importance of such a policy increased, through the events which had since occurred in Europe! To maintain, he would not say the pre-eminence, but the equality of this country, it was necessary to improve on our past colonial policy, and avoiding, as far as might be, conflicts upon land, to assume, as we were able to do, the place of the great ocean power of the world. This was not, and never ought to be, degraded into a question of party; it was a question of nationhood, of race, of language, of the spirit of a people, and must not be toned down by official answers or perfunctory criticisms upon the terms of a Motion, as to the best possible, or the next best possible, form of wording. Very possibly the wording of this Motion might be improved; but the hon. Member who brought it forward had done well, and wherever the English language was spoken, and the telegraphic wire could reach, feelings of gladness would be awakened when it was discovered that the English Parliament had not confined its attention merely to matters of local concern, but had extended its care to the best and most practical modes of cementing the power and amalgamating the forces of distant and outlying British possessions. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary had said that before other States were consolidated with British territory, it should be shown that they were able to rule themselves. The argument, he presumed, referred to Cape Town, and a portion to Natal. The contention was that States should become adults before they had any business to think of confederation. In reply, he would point to that marvellous aggregation of commonwealths at the other side of the Atlantic—bone of our bone, worshipping in our language, and whose Courts every day quoted the decisions of our Judges. What was their condition at the time they broke from the yoke of a lunatic king? ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; that was the best excuse that could be given for the murderous war by which it was sought to retain the Colonies—a war which brought into play the scalp-

ing knife of the Red Indian—a war which every statesman looked back upon with regret, and which the people of this country, above everything else in their history, desired to be able to forget. In 1775, of the 13 States that defied the power of this country and asserted their independence, there were eight which had a collective area of 341,000 square miles, while the joint population of eight of those States numbered 816,000. The four States, which it was now proposed to combine in South Africa, had an area of 520,000 square miles, with a population of 911,000. In the physical element of importance, therefore, the South African communities were not deficient. Socially, they were every year improving in agriculture and trade; husbandry and handicraft were peaceably pursued both by colonists and Natives throughout the greater portion of the South African regions; and, although compulsory labour continued to exist in the border country, there were many signs that the Dutch were getting heartily sick of the system of “commands and apprenticeship,” and were willing to cast both aside if they had the advantages of British connection. And now the discovery of gold and diamonds has imparted a new impulse to emigration, and offered a new stimulus to enterprize. Yet some hon. Members had talked of these Colonies in this debate as places semi-barbarous, and that we had better be rid of them. The noble Lord the Member for Berwick (Viscount Bury) had talked of the Transvaal Republics. There happened to be no such places. There was, indeed, a Transvaal Republic, the worst and weakest of the whole group; but it was immaterial whether it came into the present scheme or not. He was amused by the coquetterie of ignorance practised by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State, who had shown that he was not only well-informed, but ready to be further informed, on all these matters. The States of Natal, of the Orange Free State, and Cape Colony could, he believed, be confederated without a loud word or a deed of violence. In 1858 they had the offer of the Volksraad of the Orange Free State, who communicated officially to Sir George Grey, the then Governor, their desire to be included in a confederacy. It had been said that dominion over the Orange Free State, having once been wrongfully assumed, its people had resented our control, and that now we were well rid of them. But it did not follow, because the proceedings of 1848 have been untenable, that the policy of 1854 was therefore wise. Nor did the recollection of either render it impossible that three neighbouring communities might not come to see they had a common interest in forming one federalty. The memorable despatch of Sir George Grey, which had been made the pretext of his recall, remained unanswered, and incapable of answer, as a statement of our true policy in Southern Africa. If ever the real history of the transaction were challenged, his friends would not be slow to join issue as to the facts, and to vindicate the character and consistency of that remarkable man. He (Mr. W. M. Torrens) could not but regret, on public grounds, that Sir George Grey was no longer in the service of the State, whose interests he had served so well. Since that time, however, nothing more had been done in the matter. England had a laudable ambition that these territories should be permanently occupied by our race, as we had founded the greatest Colonies of the modern world. He did not, however, wish the old country to interfere in the internal affairs of the Colonies, except to insist that the institution of slavery should not be tolerated. The Colonies, he believed, would be greatly gratified by this Resolution being passed, and he was unable to perceive what possible harm it could do. He would now refer to a letter he had recently received from a gentleman long resident in Natal, who described the feeling there of vexation at the coldness and indifference shown by the Colonial Office in past times, and expressed his pleasure at seeing the commencement of a new career for the Colonies. The writer added—

“South Africa at present offers a noble field for the aggressive ambition of a Christian and colonizing nation—by aggressive I mean as regards the inroads of a beneficent civilization, rather than the encroachments of territorial greed, or political aggrandizement. With scarcely an exception, all the independent tribes between British frontiers and the Zambesi are seeking British protection, and are craving the good offices of our Secretary for Native Affairs, Mr. Thepstone, as a means of enabling them to live at peace with their neighbours.”

If the House of Commons were selfish, isolated, and cold, the people of this country certainly were not so. They were not indifferent to the great question whether we should cement the Empire and maintain its place among the nations by a fusion of race, language, commerce, and arts, and thus keep for the Queen a heritage better worth bequeathing to her children, or whether we should leave the Empire worse than when we found it.

MR. EASTWICK said, he had been astonished to hear the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) say that there was no authority for representing that the inhabitants of the countries under consideration had a desire to join the Cape Colonies. The noble Lord seemed to be unaware that a former Secretary of State, Sir Edward Lytton, wrote a despatch in 1858 to the Governor of the Cape, Sir George Grey, asking his opinion as to whether a federation of these States was desirable or not. Sir George Grey not only replied by recommending federation, but stated that the large majority of the inhabitants of the Transvaal Republic, had not been consulted on the subject of the Convention by which we got rid of the management of the territory of that Republic. The same thing was true as regards the Orange State, the abandonment of which was carried out in opposition to the wishes of all the wealthy and influential inhabitants of that country. The statement of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies was unsatisfactory, because he had omitted one very important point which ought to be made to the House—namely, that so long as these Republics remained separate and independent the horrible and inhuman traffic in slavery would never be put down. That was a fact to which the House should direct its attention. In 1834 the Act of Emancipation was passed in the Cape Colony. Well, in 1835, these Boers left, because they were determined not to give up their slaves, passing into the Orange River Territory, and next into the Transvaal, and ever since had been engaged in war with the Natives. We might be sure that unless we in some manner attracted the Boers to the British Government, we should never put an end to the slave traffic. We ought, therefore, to encourage federation, in the hope that we should win back our former fellow-subjects.

Mr. W. M. Torrens

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, after the debate which had taken place, he was willing to withdraw his Resolution.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FRANCE AND GERMANY— THE SIEGE OF PARIS—ABSENCE OF THE ENGLISH CONSUL.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in rising to call attention to the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Ambassador quitted Paris, September 17, with reference to the statement on this subject made by the Prime Minister, said: Sir, in undertaking to deal with the question of which I have given Notice, I shall appeal with confidence to the impartial judgment of the House. I wish to be thoroughly impartial in what I have to state on this question. I have no personal feeling in the matter; and it is entirely on public grounds, and on account of the interest a great many people take in it, that I have ventured to bring the subject under the notice of the House, with the intention of asking the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for the production of further Papers which will bear upon the subject. Now, I think I shall be able to show that in quitting Paris on the 17th of September, with only three other Representatives of foreign Powers, and leaving in Paris 18 Representatives of different States and Peoples until the middle of January, and in closing the British Consulate in that place, great injury was inflicted by the Ambassador upon British interests. The other day I used two expressions which I cannot but reiterate now, because I feel they are justly applicable to the circumstances under which the British Ambassador left Paris. I said that I considered his flight to be unmanly and to be ungenerous; and I said it on these grounds—I believe it was unmanly in him, on the 17th of September, when the instructions of the Foreign Secretary were that he should remain, to leave Paris and to neglect the interests and concerns of thousands of British subjects, who were in Paris at the time when the investment commenced. And I consider that it was ungenerous on his part to take away the whole corps of his Embassy, leaving in Paris only one inferior member of the Embassy—as the Prime Minister called him the other night—at the very time when, under Lord Granville's advice, the Government in London was pressing upon M. Jules Favre a negotiation with Count Bismarck, which, aided by the good offices of our Ambassador, might have resulted in peace and in the sparing of thousands and tens of thousands of people who have suffered in this war since the date when that negotiation was abruptly terminated. Before alluding further to the course taken by the British Ambassador, I wish to say one word about Lord Granville. As I said the other night, I have no desire to say intentionally any unkind word about my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. On the contrary, in common with a great many people, I have a strong personal regard for the noble Lord; but, like all other public men, his public acts must naturally be liable to be canvassed in this House. It so happens, however, that as regards his acts up to the 17th of September, they require no apology whatever. Lord Granville's instructions were clear and explicit, for he kept repeating to the British Ambassador this injunction—“Remain at your post, in Paris, and take care of the interests of British subjects;” and in doing this I think he adopted a course and displayed a spirit which would have been adopted and displayed by his predecessor under the Administration of Lord Palmerston. I wish to draw the attention of the House to several inaccuracies and mis-statements which have been made on the subject of the British Consulate, and with regard to the British Ambassador. I know, of my own knowledge, that British merchants and poor people in Paris, in consequence of the neglect to which their affairs have been subjected, owing to the entire absence of any Representative of the British nation in that city, not only lost remittances and were put to great inconvenience and loss, owing to documents requiring the Consular visa and seal failing to obtain such official legalization; but failed to obtain the true value for such remittances which they received, and were otherwise unable to obtain that protection to which, under the Act which governs Consulates, they were entitled. I shall be able to show, therefore, that, in consequence of the entire closing of our

Consulate and Embassy, great injury occurred; but, before I do so, let me refer to what has been said on recent occasions by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. It will be in the recollection of the House that this question has been brought before it two or three times. On the 13th of February the Under Secretary, in answer to a Question from an hon. Member (Mr. Goldsmid), said that the British Ambassador left Paris under the urgent advice of M. Jules Favre. Now, I regret to say that is not the case. The words are clear and distinct, and in Lord Lyons's despatch to Lord Granville on the 12th of September, they are repeated—“M. Jules Favre particularly begged me to remain.” And when M. Jules Favre wrote to the Austrian Ambassador on the subject of leaving, he told Lord Lyons that no reference was made to him, and he still hoped our Ambassador would remain. The other day, when I asked a Question of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, I said—“Surely it must be advisable for the British Ambassador to remain to take care of the interests of British subjects.” But the right hon. Gentleman said, in reply—

“The right hon. Baronet seems to think that the primary duty of the Ambassador in Paris is to take care of British subjects in Paris; but there cannot be a greater mistake.”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 450.]

I never said anything about the “primary” duty of an Ambassador; but I maintain that it is the duty of such a functionary to take care of the interests of his fellow-countrymen under the circumstances in which they were placed, and the orders of Lord Granville, in this respect, were clear and distinct, and those given by Lord Palmerston's Government under similar circumstances were equally so. Therefore I repeat, I exculpate Lord Granville altogether. But when I said, speaking on the 17th of February—“There were 1,500 or 2,000 British subjects left in Paris, with nobody to take care of them,” the right hon. Gentleman replied—“I can only say that, as regards the numbers mentioned by the right hon. Baronet, his information is entirely at variance with ours.” After such a statement, it was with much satisfaction I saw in The Times a statement confirmatory of what I had said. In a letter, dated February 17, which appeared in The Times of February 20, a correspondent says—

“At present 1,500 British subjects are being kept from starvation by the Committee for the distribution of charity to the distressed English in Paris.”

Therefore, my statement was not so far wrong. Yet the right hon. Gentleman twice contradicted me. The correspondent I have quoted also says—

“68,000*l.* have been expended by the Committee for the relief of British subjects in Paris, from August 1 to December 31; 23,000*l.* of which amount has been contributed alone by Mr. Richard Wallace, who since the new year has placed 10,000*l.* a month, in addition, at the disposal of the society.”

It is impossible for any Englishman to speak in higher terms than I would of the philanthropy and conduct of Mr. Wallace during the whole time of the siege—indeed, his conduct has been almost worthy of the thanks of this House. I now come to the discussion of the particular point I have raised. The Prime Minister said to me the other day that Lord Lyons left Paris, acting under the direct injunctions of the Government. Now, I will show that Lord Lyons left on the 17th of September, and that in his last despatch, which is dated the 16th of September, not a single word occurs of the probability of his leaving Paris. And, again, the last despatch from Earl Granville at the Foreign Office, to Lord Lyons, before the 17th of September, was written on the 16th, and in that there is not a single word said of his leaving Paris. Therefore, when the Prime Minister says Lord Lyons left Paris under the direct injunctions of the Government, I can only say that those injunctions do not appear in the Blue Book; and it is a well-acknowledged principle that no Minister has a right to quote documents, or make assertions from official Papers, that have not been laid on the Table of the House. In this Blue Book there are no such direct injunctions from the Government to Lord Lyons. But the right hon. Gentleman says Lord Lyons acted in accordance with certain rules and regulations and considerations which had been supplied to him. I know of no rules and regulations and considerations applying to diplomatists under circumstances like these. I myself have been placed in circumstances almost precisely similar to those under which Lord Lyons left Paris. During the Sunderbund War in Switzerland in 1847, when 180,000 men were engaged in civil war, I was at the head of our Mission in that country, and the French Ambassador came to me and tried to induce me to leave Berne, the seat of the Government. All the other missions had left. I had no telegraph by which to communicate with Lord Palmerston; but, without any rules or regulations, my own common sense told me that I ought to remain at my post, and I did remain, almost the only Representative of a foreign Power at Berne, when the French Ambassador, and other Missions, had left for other places. But I was amply rewarded; for I was complimented by the Swiss Government, and by Lord Palmerston and his Government, far more doubtless than I deserved. I want now to show exactly how matters stood with reference to Lord Lyons, the British Ambassador in Paris. Here is a despatch, dated September 5, containing Lord Granville's instructions to the British Ambassador. He says—

“Her Majesty's Government are in possession of your Excellency's telegraphic communications. . . . And I have to instruct you to remain at your post as long as any of the Corps diplomatique are able to do so, with a view to protect, as efficiently as possible, the interests and the property of Her Majesty's subjects residing in France.”—[No. 71.]

Nothing could be stronger than that. Lord Granville again writes on the 8th of September. He says—

“Her Majesty's Government would wish you to concert as much as possible with your Colleagues; but to remain in Paris as long as possible with the Government, except in case of immediate bombardment.”—[No. 86.]

Now, the bombardment did not occur till about the middle of January, and I am now speaking of the 8th of September. I say, therefore, the orders of Lord Granville were clear and decisive that Lord Lyons should remain in Paris. There seems, however, to have been a person who had great influence over Lord Lyons. The most intimate relations existed between Prince Metternich and his family, and the Imperial Court of France, and therefore it was quite natural that he and his family should wish to leave Paris when things had arrived at the point they had now reached. On the 7th of September Lord Lyons wrote to Lord Granville—

"I am informed by Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, that he has received a telegram from Count Beust, directing him to point out to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and to chiefs of Missions at Paris, the great inconvenience, and indeed impropriety, of allowing the diplomatic body to be shut up in Paris during a siege, and thus deprived of the means of communicating with their respective Governments. Prince Metternich tells me that he has spoken in consequence to M. Jules Favre, and represented to him that it is incumbent on the Minister for Foreign Affairs to give notice to the diplomatic body in time to enable them to leave Paris without undue haste or inconvenience. He adds that M. Jules Favre appears to take the same view. The Noncio and the Spanish and Turkish Ambassadors, as well as other chiefs of Missions, have also come to-day to speak to me on the subject. I have said to all that, in principle, Count Beust's view appears to me just and reasonable; but that, for my own part, I do not desire to hasten my departure from Paris without very good cause. I shall, I have said, be disposed to act in concert with my Colleagues in the matter, and shall feel no difficulty about leaving Paris if I am requested or advised to do so by the French Government, but I shall be content to leave the matter as it stands without making any special representation to the Minister for Foreign Affairs."—[No. 84.]

He kept repeating that his desire was to remain in Paris; everybody was under the impression that these were the instructions he received, and it was hoped that he would carry it out. Now comes a letter, dated September 12, from Lord Lyons to Lord Granville. I find from this despatch in the Blue Book that there must be despatches omitted which would clear up a great deal, and I want the right hon. Gentleman to give us these Papers to set things in their proper light. Here is the letter from Lord Lyons—

"I have also the honour to enclose a copy of a note in which I have thanked M. Jules Favre for the offer of facilities; but have informed him that I do not, at present, intend to leave Paris. M. Jules Favre came to see me this morning, and spoke to me of the intention he had at one time entertained of going himself to Tours and establishing the Foreign Department there. He said that he had now abandoned this intention, because he had reason to believe that he could be of more use, with regard to the internal as well as the external affairs of France, by remaining with his Colleagues at Paris. I told M. Jules Favre that I had, of course, heard of the plan of going to Tours; but that I had purposely abstained from speaking to him on the subject. I would confess that I was, personally, disinclined to leave Paris; but nevertheless I had been willing to remain entirely passive, and await a communication on the subject from him. I would, however, now, as he had introduced the subject, ask him whether it was in truth the wish of the Government that the diplomatic body should retire from Paris. He answered that, on the contrary, the Government would much prefer our remaining here for the present. If the place were actually besieged or bombarded, the case might, he said, be different; but due notice would, of course, be given by the enemy before proceeding to any such extremities. I observed to M. Jules Favre that I should probably see many of my Colleagues in the course of the day, and I inquired whether he authorised me to say to them that, so far from wishing us to go at this moment, the Government, on the contrary, would be glad that we should stay. He replied that I might not only say this, but that I might add that he particularly begged us to remain."—[No. 112.]

The answer, therefore, of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State given to me and before referred to, on this particular point, was quite a mistake—the noble Lord not having been long enough in office probably to master all these matters. Here, also, is a letter from Lord Lyons to M. Jules Favre, dated Paris, September 11, 1870—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note dated to-day, by which your Excellency is so good as to offer facilities for quitting Paris to any members of the diplomatic body who may desire to withdraw to Tours. I beg leave to express to your Excellency my thanks for this considerate offer. I am disinclined to quit Paris at this moment, and, as I gather from the conversation which I was so fortunate as to have with your Excellency this morning, that the Government has no desire that I should do so, but, on the contrary, would rather I should remain, I have no hesitation in informing you that I do not at present propose to move."—[Inclosure 2 in No. 112.]

In his despatch of the 12th of September, Lord Lyons says—"I have desired Mr. Atlee and Mr. Lascelles to leave Paris." Now recollect that Mr. Atlee was the British Consul. He was appointed to remain in Paris, and he should have remained; and, when he left, the Consular seal was no longer available to British merchants, nor his influence for poor persons who were placed under his protection. No one was appointed in his place. The excuse made for the Consul in the House of Lords was that he was a married man, and he left Paris under the orders of Lord Lyons; but Paris was the place where he was appointed to remain, and I cannot understand what authority Lord Lyons had for desiring him to leave Paris, without placing some one in his stead. It was at the back of the door of the British Consulate, which is at the Embassy House, that the notice was posted that, if British subjects remained, they would remain at their own peril, and the Consul had left Paris. I have been told by a number of Englishmen that they had not the slightest idea of the fact. Lord Lyons had the notice put in Galignani; but these people do not read Galignani, or the French papers, and were entirely ignorant of it. I now come to the letter of the 19th September. The British Ambassador left, or rather fled, on the 17th September. He wrote from Tours on the 19th. And here Prince Metternich again is evidently the person who induced him to leave Paris. Lord Lyons wrote—

“ Prince Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, came to me at Paris on the 17th inst., and told me that the Comte de Chaudordy, the head of the Cabinet of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, had brought him a message from M. Jules Favre which made him think that it would be desirable that the Representatives of the principal European Powers should leave Paris at once, in order not to be cut off from communication with their Governments. . . . I went accordingly to M. Jules Favre the first thing in the morning, and related to him what had passed between Prince Metternich and myself. I said that, for my own part, I thought that the Representatives of the principal European Powers might very well stay some time longer in Paris. . . . M. Jules Favre answered that his message to Prince Metternich was specially intended for the Prince himself.”—[No. 147.]

M. Jules Favre was to be the following morning at the head quarters of the Prussian Army, and at the very moment Lord Lyons left Paris negotiations for peace—at all events for an armistice—were going on between M. Jules Favre and Count Bismarck. The British Minister actually sent one of his attachés, Mr. Malet, to the Prussian outposts to facilitate communications between M. Jules Favre and Count Bismarck; and it might have been of immense service if the British Minister had remained in Paris to see the issue of these negotiations. Under the advice of the British Ambassador, these negotiations might have resulted in peace, and the war might have terminated on the 17th of September. But, in the very midst of these negotiations, the British Ambassador, who had sent Mr. Malet to the Prussian outposts, suddenly left Paris. There is no mention in the Blue Book of any telegraphic despatch sent by the British Ambassador from Paris to Lord Granville. Had such a despatch been received by Lord Granville, he might have telegraphed to Paris, desiring the British Ambassador to stick to his post. But Lord Lyons wrote the long letter of the 19th of September, in which he said—

Sir Robert Peel

Lord Lyons told everybody that he wished to remain, and that nothing should induce him to leave Paris. He seems to have acted like a coy female—like a man, or rather like a woman, who did not exactly know her own mind. He said that he would go, and he would not go. Like Julia in Don Juan—

“ A little still she strove, and much repented, And whispering ‘ I will ne’er consent,’ consented.”

Lord Lyons at last “ consented,” because the Austrian Ambassador wanted him to leave Paris. He had already sent away Mr. Atlee and Mr. Lascelles. Whom did he leave? He said, “ I will leave Colonel Claremont.” Well, does the House know who Colonel Claremont is? He is what is called a military attaché—one of those appointments to which I, and, I believe, many other hon. Members, most strongly object. He has, I think, been for 16 years military attaché in Paris, and in the receipt of a salary of between £1,200 and £1,500 a-year—the Foreign Office paying a portion of the salary, and the War Office the rest. He has been 16 years military attaché, doing nothing; and the very moment when his services might have been called upon he leaves Paris. I do not know whether he is in receipt of his salary now; but I believe that for many weeks past he has been in Norfolk. Well, when the Vote comes on for maintaining these military and naval attachés, I shall entreat the House to support me in opposing it. These gentlemen are absolutely useless; the moment their services are required they leave their posts, and are never heard of afterwards. The British Government sent five or six officers to Versailles and Tours, and to General Chanzy’s Army, but never Colonel Claremont; and the moment when he might have been expected to remain in Paris, taking an interest in the siege and attending to his duty, he entirely disappears. These military and naval attachés are, I repeat, the greatest farce in the world. Here is the conclusion of the celebrated despatch from our Ambassador, dated Tours, September 19. Lord Granville had told him not to leave Paris except in case of an immediate bombardment. Now, the bombardment did not occur till about the 15th of January, and Lord Lyons says he told Mr. Wodehouse to remain in Paris, but that he was to quit it if it was threatened with immediate bombardment, or with any other immediate danger. Why, "immediate bombardment" seems to have haunted Lord Lyons! He is told to stay until immediate bombardment is threatened; he goes away, and then he tells the attaché also that he must leave in case of the danger of immediate bombardment. I must say that the conduct of the British Ambassador appears to me most extraordinary, and to involve a dereliction of duty not only on his own part, but in the person of every member of the Embassy, such as almost to require the censure of this House. Sir, I hold in my hand a letter which I have received from a very respectable gentleman, for the accuracy of whose statement I can vouch. It is dated "Faubourg St. Honore, Paris, March 1, 1871," and here is an extract from it. The writer says—

"Allow me to thank you personally for having brought under the notice of the House of Commons the extraordinary state of abandonment of British subjects in Paris during the late siege by the German Armies. I am one of a considerable number of English residents here, who had serious reasons for incurring the risks of danger and privations during such a critical period, engaged as I am in a branch of trade which I could not absent myself from in such circumstances without exposing myself to great loss in various ways."

The writer then goes on to allude to the notice posted on the inner door of the British Consulate at the Embassy, and states that, one by one, all officially connected with the Embassy and Consulate by degrees deserted their post. He details the difficulties which arose in consequence of the informalities of the Consular certificates being without stamp, as regards remittances, and concludes—

"The good offices of Mr. Washburne, the American Minister, were required for the English who left in the course of the siege, as the passes delivered by Colonel Claremont were issued by the American Legation, and signed by the American Minister."

Surely it was too hard that British subjects in Paris should have been obliged to look for protection to the American Minister. And, in referring to Mr. Washburne, I must say it is impossible to speak too highly of his conduct. Not only has he obtained the warm thanks of the German subjects in Paris who were under his care, but also of many British subjects in Paris to whom he rendered good service. I have received another letter from an English gentleman who had resided in Paris for many years, and who says—

"In my own name, and that of many other English residents in Paris, I beg to offer you my most sincere thanks for having brought before Parliament the disgraceful manner in which we, British subjects, were abandoned during the siege of Paris."

He goes on to say—

"On the 17th our Ambassador fled, and so hasty was his flight that he did not take the precaution of placing his unfortunate countrymen under the protection of some friendly Minister who remained in Paris."

He continues—

"Every other country had either their Minister or Consul General. England alone had no one to represent her. Mr. Washburne generously extended his protection to many English who were in want of it."

And he states that hundreds of English ran great risk of perishing from want. I have many other letters of a similar character, all referring to the kindness of the American Minister, and showing how the interests of Englishmen were neglected by their own Legation. What is still more remarkable, I hold in my hand the copy of a letter published in The Times of September 15, 1870, signed "Edward Blount" (who was appointed British Consul after a delay of months), and written when it was supposed that everybody would be obliged to leave Paris. It is to this effect—

"Paris, 3, Rue de la Paix, Sept. 13.

"Sir,—I read in the Money Article of The Times of Friday that many of the Paris financial houses are forming branch establishments at Boulogne-sur-Mer, whither they are sending their books and securities. After having made inquiries, I can assure you this statement is erroneous, and I fear, if uncontradicted, might cause an impression that the heads of the principal banking and financial establishments had left this capital. Such is not the case, and, as far as regards myself, it is my intention to remain here, and in no case to abandon the interests confided to me."

That was written by Mr. Blount on the 13th of September, and he says he will remain in Paris during the siege attend-

plainly that Lord Lyons, on the 12th of September, did not think of leaving Paris simply because M. Jules Favre had given up the idea of leaving that city. When the Ministers representing Russia, Austria, and Turkey left Paris it would have been of the gravest importance to this country had its Ambassador been locked up in Paris for an indefinite period. Upon this point the right hon. Baronet had completely refuted himself, because he had gone on to show how important it was to obtain, as Lord Lyons did, a safe conduct for Monsieur Thiers, to enable him to negotiate with Count Bismarck—a service which Lord Lyons would have been unable to render had he been shut up in Paris. The reason why Lord Lyons changed his opinion between the 12th and 19th of September on the subject of his remaining in Paris was, because on the 17th of that month it had become perfectly obvious that the city was to be closely besieged; that there would be no communication between those within its walls and the outer world; and that, consequently, the British Ambassador would not be able to maintain that correspondence with Her Majesty's Government which was necessary for the interests not only of this country, but also of France and of Europe. It therefore appeared to him that the right hon. Baronet had not made out his case as far as regarded his charge against Lord Lyons. But as far as Lord Lyons was concerned, under any aspect of affairs—under any view of the case, the right hon. Baronet had hardly a right to say that the flight of the noble Lord from Paris was unmanly. It was not upon such a consideration that Lord Lyons had quitted that city. The House would rest assured that even in the event of Lord Lyons having been mistaken in the course he had pursued, the noble Lord had acted under a strong sense of duty, and that he had left Paris in the belief that he could serve his country best by so doing. There was, however, the other charge, which he regarded as the much more serious of the two, and as the one which more closely affected British interests. In his view there was a great difference between the position of an Ambassador and that of a Consul. While the primary duty of an Ambassador was to look after the interests of his country, the primary duty of a Consul was to look after the interests of individuals; and accordingly, if there was a state of danger in any particular place, there was all the more reason for the presence of a British Consul. He had travelled in various countries, and had found a reference to a British Consul of the very greatest importance. Lord Lyons appeared to him to have been guilty of a mistake in permitting the British Consul to leave Paris simply on the ground that he was a married man. Without desiring that the British Consul in that city should have been more rash in exposing himself to danger than other Consuls in similar circumstances, he thought that that gentleman should not have consulted his own interests before those of the persons whom he was sent to look after; and, therefore, even if he did run some risk by remaining in Paris, he ought to have remained in order to succour British subjects who might be in distress. Since he (Mr. Goldsmid) had asked the Question which he had put to the Government some time ago, he had received several letters from Paris, in which he was informed by the writers that the sufferings and distress among the poor English during the siege knew no bounds, and they corroborated what the right hon. Baronet had said, that they had gone in crowds to the British Consulate, and endeavoured to obtain assistance, but they found nobody but a porter at the Consulate, who told them that everybody else had left. That, most certainly, was not a satisfactory state of things. As the right hon. Baronet had said—and said well—though these poor people were succoured by the noble charity of Mr. Wallace and Mr. Blount, and the brother of the Member for Nottingham, who did that work during the whole of the siege, still it was a work which should not have been thrown on private hands. He believed it to be a fact that, at a subsequent period, Lord Lyons had discovered that he had made a mistake in removing the British Consul from Paris, and had endeavoured to get him back into Paris; but that the endeavour totally failed. If this was true, it went strongly to show that his view of the case was the correct one; but, under any aspect of it, the House ought to have some better reason for the absence of the Consul than that he was ordered to leave because he was a married man. He would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government whether there was any other ground on which the English Consul had been removed, and had thereby left the interests of the poor English totally unprotected? The answer that had been formerly given in regard to the poor English in Paris—that if they were unprotected it was their own fault, because a notice was put up at the door of the Consulate that they were to leave at a certain time, was, in his opinion, hardly an answer at all; because a great number of the very poor English in Paris had a great deal more to do in order to earn their daily livelihood than to go looking about for notices which might or might not be attached to the door of the Consulate. It was a very serious matter that these poor people had been without the means of protection which they ought to have had. There was another point on which he had a word to say—that Paris was one of the few places where a Consul also occupied the position of an attaché. Now, was this a desirable mixture in Paris? He thought the duties of a Consul and those of an attaché ought to be so entirely distinct; and that, in Paris especially, the duties of Consul were of such importance that the two offices ought to be confided to different persons, and that the Consul ought to have nothing else to do. His principal reason for saying this was that, according to his information, on many occasions long before the siege of Paris, British subjects made application at the Consulate for the performance of the various duties which Her Majesty's Consuls usually attended to, and only found a clerk, who, from want of knowledge, was not able, or from superciliousness, was not willing to comply with the requests made to him. This was a matter of much importance to English interests; and he hoped it would in future receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government. For the reasons he had given he could not agree with the right hon. Baronet as to the departure of Lord Lyons, but thought it was the right and proper course to take under the circumstances; but, on the other hand, he joined with the right hon. Baronet in deeply regretting that, during the long and terrible siege of Paris, there was no Consul in that city to look after the interests of British subjects.

Peel) had referred with laudable pride to his own conduct in 1847, and he had a perfect right to do so, for he (Mr. B. Cochrane) perfectly remembered the generosity and the courage with which the right hon. Baronet acted at that time. The right hon. Baronet also referred to the gratification with which he received the approval of his conduct by the Government, than which nothing could certainly be more encouraging to an official who had been placed in difficult and painful circumstances. But even before the approbation of the Government of the day was the approbation of Parliament; and therefore he regretted that his right hon. Friend, who was always so generous in his character and in his emotions, had not considered the matter a little more before he had made this attack upon the Ambassador at Paris, who throughout his career had won the respect and affection of everyone who knew him, and the confidence of both sides of the House, and who had on the present occasion justified by his conduct the approval which Parliament had in time past bestowed upon him, and would bestow again. Now, his right hon. Friend was the last man to put a thing unfairly; but yet there was something like a suppressio veri in his manner of putting his case before the House. His right hon. Friend said that Lord Lyons acted in direct opposition to his instructions, and that he did so from unmanly—in fact, from cowardly motives. Before proceeding to examine the evidence on this point he must say, with regard to the policy pursued by Lord Granville, that so far as Lord Lyons and the British subjects in Paris were concerned, the policy was a generous one. The first despatch to which he would refer was one from Lord Granville to Lord Lyons, in which he wrote—

“I have to instruct your Lordship to remain at your post as long as any of the Corps diplomatique are able to do so. . . . In the event of Her Majesty the Empress deciding to retire from Paris, with a view to maintaining the Imperial Government with even a mere shadow of power, you will under no circumstances follow Her Majesty.”—[No. 71.]

This showed clearly that at the time the despatch was written Paris was neither invested nor besieged. Coming to the despatches themselves, he must say that in the comments upon them but scant justice had been done to Lord Lyons. In one of the despatches the noble Lord said he had heard of a plan to remove the Government to Tours, but he purposely abstained from speaking to M. Jules Favre on the subject, as he was personally disinclined to leave Paris; and in another despatch, dated the 19th, he repeated that two days earlier he had expressed the same disinclination to Prince Metternich the Austrian Ambassador, adding that, nevertheless, he should leave the city if it appeared he could be more useful elsewhere. After reporting a part of the conversation between himself and Jules Favre, the despatch of Lord Lyons proceeded as follows (and this passage the right hon. Baronet did not read to the House):—

“In the meantime he” (Jules Favre) “would advise me to take advantage of the train he had ordered for Tours, as by doing so I should, perhaps, learn the result of his mission sooner than if I remained in Paris, and, at all events, he was far from thinking it desirable that the Representatives of the principal European Powers should run the risk of being shut up in Paris and deprived of free communication with their Governments.”—[No. 147.]

“I said that I still disliked the idea of leaving Paris just yet, but that of course I should not hesitate to proceed to any place in which I could have a better prospect of being useful, and that after what he had said if I found that my principal Colleagues thought it advisable that we should go off to Tours in the evening, I would no longer be an obstacle to their departure.”—[Ibid.]

He understood his right hon. Friend to say that the other Ambassadors remained in Paris; but Lord Lyons, in a despatch which he wrote to Lord Granville on the 19th of December from Tours, said—

He (Mr. B. Cochrane) thought he could clearly prove to his right hon. Friend that M. Jules Favre, instead of protesting against Lord Lyons leaving Paris, urged him in the strongest manner to leave Paris, and Lord Lyons gave up his own convictions in order to perform his duty towards the Government and the country. He thought this was a question on which he ought not to trouble the House at any length. The question lay in a nutshell, and he could only repeat that his right hon. Friend marred the powerful speech which he made by his attack upon Lord Lyons. Nothing could be more distressing to any man who attempted to do his duty in most arduous and difficult times than to find himself subjected to this description of attack. Every Ambassador must act on his own judgment and discretion in these matters. Lord Lyons acted with that great discretion which he always showed. He (Mr. B. Cochrane) was very pleased that his right hon. Friend had brought forward this question again, because he thought Lord Lyons in a recent despatch showed that he felt very deeply the attack made upon him some days ago in the House, and he (Mr. B. Cochrane) believed the unanimous feeling of the House would be that Lord Lyons had deserved well of his country.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) stated in the outset of his observations that it would be his duty to ask the Government to produce further Papers bearing upon the subject of Lord Lyon’s departure from Paris. These Papers have already been laid on the Table, though I am not sure the right hon. Gentleman has seen them. I had hoped they would have been circulated to-day; but, whether they have been so or not, I shall observe the invariable rule adopted in this House of not alluding to Papers which Members may not have yet seen. But this I will venture to say—that, if the right hon. Gentleman reads those Papers with the same care and attention he has devoted to other Papers in the Blue Book, he will become convinced that the conduct of Lord Lyons was neither “unmanly nor ungenerous;” but, on the contrary, it was dictated by everything that was kind, generous, and humane. I may be well content to leave the defence of that noble Lord not only to the approbation of Her Majesty’s Government, as expressed in the Blue Book, but to those speeches which we have heard this evening from my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) and the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid), and which go directly to contradict what the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth has said with respect to the conduct of Lord Lyons; and I feel sure that every hon. Member, on whatever side of the House he may sit, who has studied the career of the noble Lord for upwards of 32 years, will feel that to apply the epithets "unmanly and ungenerous" would be altogether a great mistake, to use the mildest Parliamentary expression. It will be my duty to bring back to the consideration of the House the position in which the English Embassy was placed after the departure of Lord Lyons on the 17th of September. If it be urged against the noble Lord that he did wrong to allow Mr. Atlee and others to quit the Embassy, I think he might fairly claim for himself, in his high position, the right to select the subordinate he thought best fit for a particular duty; and by his selection of Mr. Wodehouse to remain in Paris, I believe British interests did not suffer. Mr. Wodehouse remained in Paris from September 17th up to November 8th; but during the month of October Lord Lyons, naturally solicitous for the interests of the British residents remaining in Paris, and of the remaining portion of the diplomatic staff, obtained from the Prussian authorities a safe conduct; and the British residents received due notice to leave the city, under the safe convoy of Mr. Wodehouse. That was done, and I believe he used every means in his power, and gave every information at his disposal, to enable those residents to quit. Accordingly, from 80 to 90 of them left Paris on the 8th of November, under the safe convoy of Mr. Wodehouse; but, unfortunately, it came to the knowledge of Lord Lyons that there were still a certain number of British residents who, whether from their inability to obtain the information as to the safe convoy that was circulated in the widest possible manner, or whether they had a dislike to leave their homes in the city, still remained there. Every exertion was used to induce them to quit; our military attaché was willing to accompany them—our naval attaché was also willing to go with them, but was unable, through illness, to leave the city—but when Colonel Claremont finally quitted Paris, these remaining British residents, from unwillingness or inability, did not accompany him. Now, when I hear grave reflections made on the character of Colonel Claremont, and when it is stated that, when the Estimates are brought forward, the House will be asked to refuse the Vote for Colonel Claremont's services, I hope I may then be in a position to prove that during the 14 years Colonel Claremont has occupied the position of military attaché to the Embassy of Paris, he has done his duty as a soldier and as a gentleman. It is not to be denied that a certain number of British residents yet remained in the city, and that from the 8th of December until the middle of January no actually accredited person represented the British Embassy; but by means of the British Charitable Fund, a gentleman, Mr. Blount by name, was enabled to convey that assistance to those residents which, from strategical motives, it was impossible could be conveyed by an accredited official representative. Mr. Blount acted with such humanity, generosity, and delicacy of feeling that he won the approbation of this House and the country. It was impossible, from the 8th of December to the middle of January, for the gentlemen of the Embassy, who had been desired by Lord Lyons on no account to quit France, to obtain a permit to pass through the Prussian lines into Paris; and consequently during that time, those gentlemen were absent from the city. But on the 20th of January a commission was sent to Mr. Blount to act as British Consul, and from that time up to a very few days ago that gentleman has acted in defence of British interests in a way which will, I am sure, obtain the approbation of everyone not only in this House, but in the country. And while on this subject I am anxious to correct what was doubtless an unintentional mistake on the part of the right hon. Baronet when he said that Mr. Blount was superseded, or likely to be removed from those duties. Now, if my memory serves me correctly, it was at Mr. Blount's own request that that commission was cancelled. It was cancelled because he felt that the period during which he had to perform the services he rendered with so much zeal and ability had expired, and he was anxious to receive relief in regard to the duties he had undertaken. He was accordingly relieved at his own request, and the thanks of Her Majesty's Government had been conveyed to him for what he had done. It is to be regretted that during a certain portion of the time to which I have referred there was actually no Representative of the British Embassy in Paris; but I believe it was unfortunately through the stress of circumstances, and strategical reasons, that anyone was prevented from passing through the Prussian lines into Paris;

said he had heard of a plan to remove the Government to Tours, but he purposely abstained from speaking to M. Jules Favre on the subject, as he was personally disinclined to leave Paris; and in another despatch, dated the 19th, he repeated that two days earlier he had expressed the same disinclination to Prince Metternich the Austrian Ambassador, adding that, nevertheless, he should leave the city if it appeared he could be more useful elsewhere. After reporting a part of the conversation between himself and Jules Favre, the despatch of Lord Lyons proceeded as follows (and this passage the right hon. Baronet did not read to the House):—

"In the meantime he" (Jules Favre) "would advise me to take advantage of the train he had ordered for Tours, as by doing so I should, perhaps, learn the result of his mission sooner than if I remained in Paris, and, at all events, he was far from thinking it desirable that the Representatives of the principal European Powers should run the risk of being shut up in Paris and deprived of free communication with their Governments."—[No. 147.]

of State had in no way met. His Lordship said that Lord Lyons had the power of selection. No doubt he had. Lord Lyons had the right of selection; and he had abundant opportunities of selection. At the time of the breaking out of the war there were in Paris, in addition to our Ambassador, a secretary of the Embassy with a salary of £1,000 a-year; three second secretaries with salaries ranging from £400 to £250; a military attaché, Colonel Claremont, receiving £500 a-year from the Foreign Office, a naval attaché similarly paid, a third secretary, and an unpaid attaché. Mr. Atlee was not only our Consul but registrar and librarian to the Embassy, and, in addition to a salary of £570, he received £200 a-year for office expenses and house rent. The total charge of the British Embassy at Paris, leaving out the expense of keeping up the official residence, and only reckoning the salaries, was £14,000 a-year; and yet it was impossible for the British Embassy, with its numerous subordinates, to find a single man to leave in charge at the Embassy under circumstances entailing great difficulty and distress among some 2,000 British subjects. Mr. Atlee the Consul, and Mr. Lascelles were sent out even before Lord Lyons left, upon the ground that they had very little or nothing to do, and that he could, therefore, spare their services. And his noble Friend (Viscount Enfield) thought it a justification of what Lord Lyons had done that they were only sent to Versailles. When, however, he wanted to send Mr. Atlee back into Paris, he found he could not do so, and that he had put him outside the possibility of being of any service. If it had been thought right to allow Mr. Atlee to leave Paris, some other official should have been left to take care of British interests, and as this had not been done the House had a right to call in question Lord Lyons' judgment and discretion in allowing the Consul to quit Paris at so very early a period. Let hon. Members consider what Mr. Atlee had to do. He was not only an attaché and a Consul, but a librarian. The librarian had to take charge of the archives of the Embassy. What were those archives? The Foreign Office would tell them that they were manuscripts of great value. Probably, they would go back to a remote period—to possibly a century. The rule at the Foreign Office had been to send copies of important despatches to Paris, and to allow the Embassy there to take copies of such despatches from our Ambassadors on the Continent as used to pass through Paris, in order that our Ambassador in that capital might be well informed in all matters of diplomacy. But our Foreign Office was like the Bourbons: it learnt nothing and forgot nothing, and the old system, which might have been necessary before the days of telegraphs, railways, and steamboats, was still kept up. All these archives were left at the Embassy during the siege. They were at the mercy of the bombardment, and the librarian, whose special duty it was to take care of them, was not there to protect them, if necessary, with sandbags. Perhaps, if all these despatches had been destroyed, it would be no serious loss either to England or Europe; but at least, as Consul, Mr. Atlee was bound to be at his post to look after the interests of British subjects, when other countries were represented during the siege by their proper Representatives. The noble Lord had, in fact, admitted this part of the case; but he argued that Lord Lyons had a right to select Mr. Wodehouse to remain in the place of Mr. Atlee, and if he had remained to the end of the siege, and discharged the duties of Consul throughout, there would have been nothing to complain of. But Mr. Wodehouse's departure was only a question of time. The very first note of danger carried away Mr. Atlee and Mr. Lascelles, and by the end of September Lord Lyons not only took his departure, but carried away with him almost the whole personnel of the Embassy. Mr. Wodehouse, in November, also left, and when he did so, he left behind him in Paris from 1,500 to 2,000 British residents not gentlemen of property and with the means of leaving Paris, but people who were chained there by the circumstances of their lives. Hundreds of them could not leave. While Mr. Wodehouse took with him 80 or 90 British residents, and conveyed them through the Prussian lines, he left from 1,500 to 2,000 behind, disregarded and ignored by the whole of the British Embassy. He had received a letter from a British tradesman in Paris, stating that he had sustained a large amount of inconvenience in Paris by the fact that, from the middle of November till the

and I venture to say, believing the House will agree with me, that the fact of Lord Lyons having quitted Paris at the time and under the circumstances he did will not detract from the high appreciation of his public services which has been entertained both by this House and by the country, whom the noble Lord has served so long and so faithfully.

MR. W. LOWTHER said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) had called the conduct of Lord Lyons "unmanly and ungenerous." Now it struck him that if there was anything unmanly or ungenerous it was that a Member of the House of Commons should get up and attack one who had no means of defending himself in that House. Lord Lyons, as the noble Viscount had stated, had served for many years in various parts of the world, and had always been looked up to with the greatest respect for the high qualities which he possessed. No blame whatever was to be attached to Lord Lyons for leaving Paris under the circumstances. He had clear instructions for what he had done; but, at all events, some discretion must be left to persons in his position, and Lord Lyons had acted with the greatest circumspection. If he had remained in Paris the right hon. Baronet would probably have accused the Government of want of foresight for having left him there, when he might have been of much more use elsewhere. At the time Lord Lyons received his instructions, it was the general opinion that the bombardment of Paris was going to begin; Lord Lyons was accredited to the Emperor, and was bound to remain with the Government of France, whatever that Government might be. When Lord Lyons removed from Paris, and authorized Mr. Atlee to leave Paris also, he ought to have received instructions from the Foreign Office to appoint some one in Mr. Atlee's place to look after the interests of British subjects. The noble Lord stated that Mr. Blount was not appointed to act as British Consul until January 20; whereas Lord Lyons ought to have given him some sort of official position before he left, so that distressed British subjects might have applied to him for relief. British Consuls abroad had authority to advance money to distressed British subjects, and out of the 2,000 in Paris some would no doubt have gladly availed themselves of the assistance of their Consul to return to their native country. Any such outlay, if asked for by the Government, would gladly have been voted by that House. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the United States Minister had remained in Paris, and had been most useful to British subjects. No doubt if the United States Minister received instructions from his Government to remain in Paris during the siege, he was bound to do so, and not to go away. But when we saw the Representatives of great countries—Italy, Austria, Turkey, and Russia—leaving Paris; all under the same circumstances, and all of one mind, he thought it was quite enough to convince Lord Lyons that the time was come for him to leave Paris too. It was stated that 17 Representatives of foreign Powers had remained; but he doubted whether there was among them the Minister of any country that took a great part in the affairs of Europe, and the British Ambassador was therefore quite right to associate himself with those who accompanied the Delegate Government. It was remarkable that the right hon. Baronet who had brought the accusation against Lord Lyons had himself served, and with credit, in the diplomatic circle, and consequently must have been aware that a man in the position of the Ambassador in Paris must take upon himself a great deal of responsibility, and that if he could not at any moment ask for instructions he must act on his own discretion. He trusted that the House would not hear any more hard words thrown at one who occupied so high a position in the public service as Lord Lyons. His personal acquaintance with that nobleman was very slight; but he was well acquainted with his public career, and no man was more deserving of the high opinion of his fellow-countrymen.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not wish to join the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) in any harsh language directed towards Lord Lyons, or against his having left Paris. Upon this point he thought there could hardly be a question that Lord Lyons discharged his duty, and that the Government were pleased that he accompanied the French Government to Tours. But there was an important question which had been alluded to by the right hon. Baronet, and by the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Goldsmid), and which the Under Secretary of State had in no way met. His Lordship said that Lord Lyons had the power of selection. No doubt he had. Lord Lyons had the right of selection; and he had abundant opportunities of selection. At the time of the breaking out of the war there were in Paris, in addition to our Ambassador, a secretary of the Embassy with a salary of £1,000 a-year; three second secretaries with salaries ranging from £400 to £250; a military attaché, Colonel Claremont, receiving £500 a-year from the Foreign Office, a naval attaché similarly paid, a third secretary, and an unpaid attaché. While Mr. Wodehouse took with him 80 or 90 British residents, and conveyed them through the Prussian lines, he left from 1,500 to 2,000 behind, disregarded and ignored by the whole of the British Embassy. He had received a letter from a British tradesman in Paris, stating that he had sustained a large amount of inconvenience in Paris by the fact that, from the middle of November till the middle of January, there was absolutely no British Representative in Paris. The presence of Mr. Blount only dated from the end of the siege, on the occasion of the armistice. In The Daily News, whose correspondence on the war had been remarkably accurate, a letter had appeared from their correspondent in Paris, who had some business to transact at the Embassy, and he said that when he went there a porter, mopping the stairs, was the only visible Representative of the British Government. This porter showed him into a room, and presently a little man in slippers came in, and told him he had been summoned from some cleaning operations upstairs, and produced a seal and spat on it, and, with gentle persuasion, succeeded in affixing the seal to his credentials, and then gave the document to him to get signed by Mr. Blount; that he then went to Mr. Blount, who was very kind for a Consul, but said he was totally ignorant of his new duties, and then signed the document. It was incomprehensible that such a state of things should occur, and, not being satisfied with the explanation of the noble Lord, he hoped when the Estimates came to be discussed that it would be found possible to save the pockets of the taxpayers in the matter of the Paris Embassy without damage to the State.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought it of the utmost importance that Lord Lyons should be at the seat of Government in France; and, having been at Bordeaux on a mission of charity, he could testify to the zeal and devotion of the noble Lord in the discharge of his duties there. It would not have been possible to give full effect to the benevolence of the English people had it not been for the personal interest taken by Lord Lyons in this effort, as he said, to sweeten the relations between the two countries, and had it not been also for the authority he exerted.

MR. GLADSTONE: Two points have been raised in the course of this debate, and in both the conduct of Lord Lyons has been impugned. I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) will not think me too critical if I say that he has mixed up, in a manner not the most expedient with a view to perfect justice in the case before us, two distinct characters—one, that of a judge upon the Papers before the House, and the other that of a diplomatic reformer and economist—a career in which I heartily wish him success. If my hon. Friend objects, as we know he does, to the diplomatic establishments which he seeks to prove unnecessary—and we shall be very glad if he can prove them to be unnecessary—he ought not to fortify his case against them by any biassed judgment upon questions affecting the conduct of the members of those establishments upon a particular occasion. Now, Sir, we do not deny that there has been suffering, which was less adequately relieved than it would have been if a British Representative had been in Paris all through the period of the siege. The question is—how that came about, and whether blame is justly attributable to Lord Lyons. We contend that blame is not justly attributable to Lord Lyons. My hon. Friend, unintentionally of course, did not state with perfect accuracy the time during which there was no British Representative in Paris. I understood him to say that period began in the middle of November and continued till the 18th of January. When Lord Lyons left Paris he exercised his individual judgment as to the person he had better leave behind to take care of British interests; and in a despatch written at the time, and circulated to-day, he advisedly determined—and I see no reason to doubt that his decision was a good one—that it would be better to leave Mr. Wodehouse, on account of his being able to discharge diplomatic functions as well as Consular duties, than to leave Mr. Atlee to perform the latter duties alone, Mr. Wodehouse being perfectly well able to take care of the interests of British subjects. Mr. Wodehouse continued in Paris till a certain day in November, and when he left a certain number of British subjects went with him. I am bound to say, in passing, that we do not subscribe to the estimate given of the number of British subjects who remained behind. We have no means of giving accurate information upon that subject; but we believe the number to be very greatly less than was stated upon hypothesis by an hon. Gentleman opposite, and very considerably less than was stated by my right hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel). But these functions for caring for British subjects were passed on by Mr. Wodehouse to Colonel Claremont, who remained in Paris until December 12.

Mr. Rylands

That, therefore, was the period from which the unfortunate interval commenced. It has been already stated by my noble Friend (Viscount Enfield) that the mind of Lord Lyons was directed to this subject; and it was not the fault of any British authority that no person was sent into Paris, after Colonel Claremont left it, for the purpose of looking after those destitute persons. Efforts were made to send in a Consul; but the rules then enforced by the besieging army made this impossible, no one being allowed to cross the lines. That, I believe, is the simple state of the case; and, under these circumstances, although we may lament what happened, I cannot think that blame attaches to Lord Lyons for what it was impossible he could foresee, and what, through military exigencies, it became beyond his power to prevent. That is one question, and with respect to the other, I appeal to the candour of my right hon. Friend (Sir Robert Peel) whether, during the whole of the debate, the opinion of the House has not been against him with regard to the departure of Lord Lyons from Paris. It is impossible to fix the blame upon him for two reasons. In the first place, although we did not at a given moment telegraph to Lord Lyons and say—"Now the time is come at which you must leave Paris," we did provide him with directions as to the circumstances under which he was to leave, and upon those directions we consider he acted. If, therefore, anybody is to blame in the matter it is the Government, who have made themselves responsible for his conduct. But I think my right hon. Friend, in his treatment of this case, has given undue importance to those duties which are inferior, and has forgotten, or placed out of view, those duties which are paramount. We felt it to be of paramount importance that Lord Lyons should continue in a position in which he could communicate with the French Government and deal with us. That condition it was impossible to fulfil unless he quitted Paris, and, in our opinion, he exercised a perfectly sound judgment, as well as acted within the spirit of his instructions, in the choice he made. I am very glad that Lord Lyons, when he becomes acquainted—as doubtless he will—with the tenour of this debate, will find that the course of the discussion has abounded with testimony as to his merits and high character, which the slightest disposition has not been shown to disparage, while, as to the particular case of his having quitted Paris, I think my right hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth will be of opinion that he has opposed to his view the unanimous sentiment of the House.

INDIA—CIVIL ENGINEERS.

RESOLUTION.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID rose to call the attention of the House to the recent establishment, under the orders of the Secretary of State for India, of a College, to the students of which are to be transferred the opportunities until lately afforded to young men possessing the attainments required (wherever they might have been educated) of entering the service of the Government of India as Civil Engineers; and to move the following Resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, young men qualified by character and attainments for admission into the service of the Government of India as Civil Engineers, ought not to be excluded from such service by reason of their not having been educated at a Government College."

The hon. Baronet said that the question raised by this Resolution had been mentioned by him during last week's debate on Indian Finance, but that it had been impossible, amidst the multiplicity of topics which that debate involved, that either he or his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India should discuss this particular subject in a manner worthy of its importance; and that he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) therefore, now asked permission to bring it distinctly under the notice of the House. It was important not only because it affected the competency of the persons to whom was to be entrusted an expenditure amounting, as appeared from the recent Financial Statement, to £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 a-year, but also because the arrangement proposed by the Government was a departure from the entire course of the policy for some years past adopted by them, and approved by the House and the country. It would be remembered that, when the rule of India was transferred from the East India Company to the Crown, the whole Civil Service of that country had been thrown open to public competition. Haileybury College, where formerly young men nominated for appointments in that service received their education, was closed. The Under Secretary of State said that this step was taken not because Haileybury was useless, but because pupils had been admitted to it by nomination only. If, however, this was the reason, why was not admission to Haileybury thrown open to public competition, instead of the institution being abolished? Again, this principle of open competition, which had now for some years been tried with reference to the Civil Service of India, had so commended itself to the general opinion that, when last year the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) brought forward a Motion for the extension of the same principle to the Civil Service at home, the Prime Minister announced the intention of the Government to make arrangements for at once applying it to nominations in several Departments; and these arrangements were shortly afterwards carried into effect. When the Civil Service of India had thus for years been thrown open to the ablest candidates, wherever educated, when the same principle was being extended by the present Ministry to large branches of the Home Service, how were we to explain the fact that this same Ministry was almost at the same moment announcing that through one door alone should admission be obtained to one particular department of the Indian Civil Service? The only possible reason for so wide a departure from the whole course of recent policy would be that the Government could not get the want that had suddenly arisen for civil engineers, to be employed by them in India, supplied by any other means. And, accordingly, the Under Secretary of State had informed the House that he would show conclusively that the attempts of the Government to obtain the men they required by open competition had failed. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) did not dispute this; but he said that they failed not through the absence of a special place of education, but because the terms offered had been too low to attract young men of first-rate ability and attainments. Hon. Members might say—"On such a point as the proper rate of remuneration we must necessarily trust the opinion of the Government, not yours." But on this point it was the opinion of the Government that he asked them to trust. The Secretary of State had shown that he thought his previous offer too low by largely increasing it. The rules of 1869 (p. 1-4) offered £20 a-month, or £240 a-year, and left the time when that salary might be increased wholly uncertain. The prospectus of 1870 offered £420 a-year from the time of admission to the service. Thus the new offer was to the old in the proportion of 7 to 4; or, if one supposed the outfit, which in each case the young engineer would have to pay for himself, to cost £60, the net receipt for the first year was now doubled, being £360 instead of £180. Why did not the Government try this liberal increase of remuneration in the first instance, instead of rushing at once to the foundation of a College? Why were all to be excluded from the Government service, however great their qualifications, who could not afford to pay for their collegiate training £150 a-year? He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) did not know whether hon. Members had had occasion to make themselves acquainted with advertisements of eligible private academies. It appeared to him that the prospectus of the new College bore too close a resemblance to this branch of light literature. The provision in Paragraph 25 that each student would be required to furnish his own linen, &c., for use in his room, reminded one irresistibly of the usual declaration that every pupil must bring six towels; and, though the accompanying silver spoon and fork were not to be found in the present edition, he had little doubt that they would appear in the next. But it was more important that the making of education in this College a necessary preliminary to the admission of young Englishmen to the Civil Engineering Service of India amounted to an announcement that the noble Principal had, by an arrangement with his partners in Downing Street, secured exclusive privileges and patronage for the pupils enjoying the benefit of his care. By not trying, in the first instance, the experiment of raising their rate of remuneration, the Government had lost the most convenient opportunity of ascertaining the necessity for establishing a College. But it was still possible to avoid objectionable exclu-siveness by allowing young men educated elsewhere to compete with the Government Collegians. The Under Secretary of State had intimated in last week's debate disinclination to consent to this, and an opinion that if it were done the money expended on the College would have been thrown away. But he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had reason to hope that further consideration might have modified this view. The truth was that such an arrangement would afford the best chance of preventing money from being thrown away. It must have one of the three following results:—1. Men from without might in the competitive examinations show themselves, in a large majority of instances, superior to the Collegians. In this case the Government would themselves admit the expediency of closing the College, and avoiding further useless expenditure. 2. The Collegians might habitually show themselves superior to the men from without. In this case the Government would have established the wisdom of their scheme. Or 3. As appeared to him (Sir Francis Goldsmid) most probable, success would be pretty equally divided between the two classes, and an honourable emulation would be kept up which would have a most wholesome effect on the professors and students of the College. The Under Secretary of State had spoken of the value of esprit de corps. He (Sir Francis Goldsmid) thought that its value depended on the meaning you attached to the phrase. If by esprit de corps you meant pride founded on the consciousness of real superiority of the body to which you belonged, it might be beneficial. But if you meant a vain belief in fancied superiority, it was worse than useless, and might be more fitly designated esprit de clique. Which kind of feeling should prevail at the Cooper's Hill College appeared to him to depend on its students being, or not being, protected by a monopoly. If he might be permitted to use two old rhymes to express the feeling which seemed to him likely to be engendered in the Collegians by such injurious protection, he would say—

"No man can Roman lore acquire, or Attic,
Or science physical, or mathematic;
Or Indian tongues, or engineering skill,
Save in the magic bow'rs of Cooper's Hill."

Let the Government guard their new institution against the growth of such enfeebling fancies, and subject it to invigorating rivalry with other institutions, in examinations conducted by independent examiners. If he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) had rightly apprehended some private communications, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State thought that this was already authorized by the 18th paragraph of the prospectus. Supposing, however, that to be the meaning, it was very obscurely expressed; and he (Sir Francis Goldsmid) trusted that, by consenting to issue supplemental regulations making that meaning clear, the Government would render it unnecessary to press his Motion to a Division. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR DICKINSON, in seconding the Motion, observed, that the question before them had a double aspect—one more immediately affecting England, and another more immediately affecting India. He could not see why the Government of India, which had a large Civil Service formerly, but not now, educated in a College of its own, should be now establishing a College to educate its civil engineers. He asked upon what principle were those enormous outlays and great changes to be made? This was the creation of a service of 1,000 engineers, many with high salaries. Why was all this to be done without any communications to the British Parliament or to the people of India? It was all done by the India Office at home, and they heard nothing whatever about it until the whole thing was completed. He was told on inquiry that it cost £90,000; but looking into the Indian Finance Accounts he could not find any such sum. He was further told that it was a speculation of the East India Council. He objected to the Government undertaking educational institutions without consulting Parliament. He concurred in the proposal made by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) the other day, that those important documents which from time to time were furnished by the Government of India should be presented to the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament for the inspection of Members interested in Indian affairs. It was proposed to distribute through the country 1,000 civil engineers, the cost of whom entailed upon the country a burden of nearly £1,000,000 a-year? To obviate the expense attending the education of engineers this College was established; but there was no provision to encourage the Natives of India to enter this particular branch of the service. It had, in fact, been made entirely an English question and no other, and the result would be that all the public works in India would be exclusively executed by the English Government and English agents. No doubt there was in India an objection to have public works carried out by men unconnected with the Government; but were they to lay down the rule that in future it should only be done by one class of Englishmen and those connected with the Government? It was a case that called for the serious consideration of the Government, and one not to be settled by the mere ipse dixit of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, young men qualified by character and attainments for admission into the service of the Government of India as Civil Engineers, ought not to be excluded from such service by reason of their not having been educated at a Government College,"—(Sir Francis Goldsmid),

—instead thereof.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I am glad that my hon. Friend (Sir Francis Goldsmid) has given me an opportunity of telling the House our story with regard to the Civil Engineering College; for, so far from believing that we deserve the smallest blame in the matter, I think we have done a thing absolutely necessary for India, and very advantageous to England. The state of the case is this—We have, as everyone knows, an immense number of public works to do in India. In the Actual Accounts of last year the sum paid, under the two heads of Public Works Ordinary and Public Works Extraordinary, amounted to close on £8,000,000. All these public works are carried into effect, and superintended by what is known as the Public Works Department. That department is a creation of quite modern times; for, as long as we were conquering our Indian estate, we had no time, and very little money, to improve it. The year 1842 may be taken as the commencement of the endeavour systematically to improve our Indian estate. Well, when we began to improve it, we used at first the instruments which were ready to our hand—our own officers, engineers, and others; and, up to the year 1854, public works were managed in the military department. In that year they were put upon a new footing, and civil engineers, who had, since 1845, been filtering into our service, were for the first time introduced in some numbers, selected on the nomination of leading civil engineers at home. Many and various inconveniences having, however, arisen from getting men out from England who were already of mature years, it was resolved, in 1859, to recruit the service from the bottom, by admitting young men into it by open competitive examination. These young men having been caught by open competitive examination, were then sent out to a College in India and further trained there. This plan was tried for a year or two, but it did not succeed; partly, because these young men caught by open competitive examination were not sufficiently advanced to be able to profit by the instruction which they got at this Indian College; partly, because there was a difficulty in getting a sufficient number of tutors for this Indian College at any moderate expense; and partly, because the Government in India had so much urgent work to do that it preferred to have half-trained engineers rather than no engineers at all, and so took the students and put them to active work while still only partially qualified.

When the original plan of training these young men at a College in India was found too difficult to carry out, the wise thing would, undoubtedly, have been for the Indian authorities immediately to have started in this country the sort of College that they wanted; a College which could, of course, be maintained here much cheaper than in India, because skilled European labour is at least three times as costly in the tropics as it is in Surrey. Unhappily, they did not determine upon taking that wise step. They shared the views which are held by my hon. Friend. They believed that they would get the article they wanted merely by going into the market, stating their conditions, and offering good pay. They did so; and, after some 10 years' experience, it became only too clear that their belief was ill-founded, and that the plan had turned out a hopeless failure. A hopeless failure it, indeed, has been. In 1868 the Indian authorities offered 40 appointments to competitive examination. And how many competed? Fifty-nine. Well, of course, 40 of these passed a brilliant examination and got appointments. Not a bit of it. Only 22 passed the minimum qualifying test; and these were appointed. Again, the same year, the Indian authorities offered 40 more appointments, and the result was that 43 competitors appeared, and 20 of them succeeded in passing the minimum qualifying test. In 1869 things were little better; and in 1870, out of 70 competitors for 40 appointments, only 13 passed the minimum qualifying test. Meantime the Government had entered upon a new policy. They had determined very much to enlarge their Public Works Department, and to increase very much the number and importance of their public works. What were they to do for men to manage them? Their original plan of open competition in England, and College training in India, had not succeeded. Their plan, or no plan, of open competition in England, and happy-go-lucky training in India, had hopelessly failed; and, what was more, the experience of 11 years had taught them that our scientific training in England, like so much of the rest of our training, was in a chaotic, and, indeed, contemptible state. They had learned that an engineer is trained in England as a barrister is trained, by what some people are pleased to call "the practical system"—that is, by rule of thumb; a system under which, no doubt, some great engineers have been produced, just as some great lawyers have been produced; but a system the most absurd and wasteful which it ever entered into the human mind to conceive, and just about the time that a movement, headed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), but the way for which had been prepared by a great many other people, for giving a systematic training to our lawyers and creating a legal University, began to show that it was growing strong and was going to win, the Indian authorities came to the conclusion that they, too, must move with the times—must recognize that, although in civil engineering, as in everything else, extraordinary talent will force its way to the front, however ridiculous are your systems of education, yet that, if you want to utilize ordinary talent—that much commoner article—you must provide for it systematic training. So they set to work and devised this College, availing themselves of all the best educational advice and experience which they could get hold of. I need not say that the result was that I know not how many institutions throughout the country which had been contributing one man or two men—or, in some cases, only the fraction of a man—per annum to the list of successful candidates for our Public Works Department, immediately took alarm. They cared nothing—why should they?—for Indian exigencies. They were not responsible, but we were; and we determined to go on our own way, quietly answering as they arose the accusations which the craftsmen of Ephesus brought against us.

First, we were told that we were injuring the great and sacred cause of competitive examination—that best of expedients for the distribution of patronage in this bad world; which, however, threatens ere long to become a British fetish. We replied that we never dreamt of anything of the kind; that the examination for entering our College was to be absolutely open and purely competitive. Then we were told that we were narrowing the field of selection. We replied by showing that we were immensely widening it by sweeping away a number of restrictions with which, while the previous plan, or no plan, existed, we had been obliged to fence round our examinations. Then we were told that it was hard that the amount of time spent in special engineering studies at other institutions should be lost to the successful candidates at the examinations. The Government replied that such was not their intention; that all the special training at other institutions would be allowed its full value in cur-

“Although students will ordinarily be required to go through a three years’ course, that condition may be dispensed with in the case of those who, on admission, shall satisfy the College authorities that they possess already a competent knowledge of the subjects taught at the College. Such students will be permitted to enter at once on the second year’s course of instruction, and to qualify for the public service in two instead of three years. Similarly, the third year’s course of practical engineering may be dispensed with in the case of those who can show that they have already gone through an equivalent course. Students consequently who may be found entitled to both of these dispensations will become eligible for appointment to the public service after a single year’s residence at the College, and this period may be still further reduced in special cases to a time sufficient to enable the student to go through the various exercises which form a part of the College final examination.”

Under this clause hon. Members will observe that any youth, trained at any institution, who gives proof, by passing these examinations—first, of having received a sufficiently good general education to render him a proper person to be admitted into a great and responsible public service; who gives proof, secondly, of a sufficient knowledge of the special subject of engineering for Indian purposes, may go out to India after remaining only just so long at the College as to pass our final examination in engineering. I say just so long, for we have come to the determination not to admit anyone into our Public Works Department who does not pass an examination of sufficient length to enable us to test him as well with regard to his power of doing things as with regard to his mere knowledge. In short, we have determined to adopt the method of examination in engineering which is followed in Germany, instead of the perfunctory examination which we have hitherto had. It will be seen, then, that students coming from outside will be really in the same position as our own students; so that I think I may say that never did a Government do a more liberal thing, than just when it has started with infinite trouble a College of its own, to enable students coming from other Colleges to compete against it, provided they show that they have had sufficient general education to make them desirable public servants. But so important is it for us in India to get good engineers, and to get them quickly, that we are quite willing—and, indeed, anxious—to open this door into the service. Then we were told that we were asking too much money—that the Engineering College would be merely a College for the rich. We replied that we asked £150 a-year for three years, in return for which we gave to those young men who passed through the College £420 in their very first year of service; whereas a youth who wished to become an engineer in this country had to pay a premium of from £300 to £500 a-year to the engineer with whom he served his apprenticeship, to say nothing of the fees which he had to pay at any of the existing institutions where there were engineering classes. And when all is done, instead of getting £420 his very first year, a good position, and admirable prospects, in five cases out of six he gets for some time nothing at all to do, and ends very often by being simply an idler in the market-place waiting for some one to hire him. To quote the words of a man most bitterly opposed to our Engineering College—

“An apprenticeship to an engineer has hitherto been pretty nearly synonymous with three things—firstly, the payment of a premium, which varies from £200 to £500, or even more, according to the position of the gentleman who condescends to accept the position of tutor in the case; secondly, a period of from three to five years, spent, even under the most favourable circumstances, in work which is mainly of a mechanical character, and in not a few cases, in almost utter idleness; thirdly, as must follow from the two preceding premises, an almost complete ignoring of anything like systematic instruction on the part of the presumptive tutor, especially in those branches of scientific knowledge, such as mathematics and physics, on which the science of engineering itself rests, and which occupy a leading position in the Public Works examination. Of course, there are exceptional cases, to which these observations do not apply—cases in which the master really teaches, and the apprentice really learns something more than it is for the master’s interest that he should learn—namely, the routine duties of the office, or factory, in which he happens to be placed. I am describing what is the rule, and what everybody who knows anything about engineering apprenticeship will admit to be so. It is not in the nature of things that a professional man, engaged in active practice, can find time for the kind of tuition which most lads of from 16 to 19 require, even if he be honestly desirous and capable of doing so, and it is simply absurd to expect it.”

Then we were told that we were adopting a retrograde policy, and founding a new Haileybury. We might have replied, if it had been legitimate for the Secretary of State in Council to quote

Fuller, that Haileybury was like God's ravens in the wilderness—not so black as it had been painted; but we did reply, that most of the defects of Haileybury, such as they were, and they were many, were of a kind which could not possibly exist in a College based not on pure nomination, but on pure competition, and in many other ways entirely different from Haileybury. Then we were told that we ought to follow the example which we ourselves have set in our Civil, our Forest, and our Telegraph Services. As to our Civil Service, we replied it is much easier to get adequate instruction in the branches which a civil probationer has to study than it is to get instruction of the kind which we mean to give to our engineering probationers. And, further, we never said that the system by which we train our young civilians at present is by any means a miracle of human wisdom. As to our Forest Service, we replied if we had institutions ready to our hand in this country or elsewhere, which could be made as useful for our Engineering Service as the Forest schools of Hanover and Nancy are for our Forest Service, we should certainly not have established an Engineering College at Cooper's Hill. As to our Telegraph Service, we replied, its importance is not for a moment to be compared with that of the Engineering Service, and even as it is we are by no means entirely satisfied with the results which we have obtained by the method at present in use. Then we were told that before establishing the College we ought to have tried the effect of raising the pay for the first year. We replied that we feel satisfied that we cannot get the article we want for twice £420 a-year; that it does not exist, and that there are no sufficient means at present for calling it into existence. We, nevertheless, did raise the pay to £420, thinking that sum would not be too much for the new kind of men we mean to turn out. A section of the Royal Engineers contend that the Public Works Department ought to be officered entirely from that body; but that course, although the Government does employ a great many of the Royal Engineers, and will continue to do so, is obviously out of the question. It is said, too, that we are excluding the Natives from competing. So far from this being the case, young Englishmen are obliged to pay for being educated for the Public Works Department, while young Natives of India are actually paid for allowing themselves to be educated for that service, and the Scholarships available for that purpose are not taken up. "But even admitting," it is said, "that the College may justify all the expectations of its promoters, and maintain an unquestionable superiority over all similar institutions, its establishment will deal a blow to engineering education in this country from which it will take years to recover." Such an argument as this, we said, is really too bad. Is the Government of 150,000,000 of very backward people in Asia not to do what it thinks essential for their welfare, because 30,000,000 of comparatively far advanced people in Europe cannot come to some understanding as to how they shall order their educational institutions? And yet this argument, preposterous as it is, has caught some persons whom it should not have caught. I would not be very much surprised if we heard something like it to-night. We may be told that we ought to have waited till the Royal Commission, which is now investigating the scientific institutions of the country, has made its Report; but we could not wait; while you were deliberating, we were suffering. If anyone is to blame in the matter it is we, who have a right to blame the savants and educationalists of England. Is it not too monstrous that we, the representatives of a nation of Asiatics which has been wandering for so many thousand years in the mazes of science, falsely so called, should be unable to find at either of your great Universities, rich though they are beyond the dreams of avarice, any institution where we could get training for the persons whom we wish to employ on our public works? Do you suppose that if India had belonged to Germany, had belonged to France, had belonged even to Switzerland, it would have been necessary for its representatives to have set up an Engineering College of their own? But here, in this enlightened country, the inheritors of Archimedes have just got the length of persuading the Government to find out whether all was, indeed, for the best with regard to the scientific teaching of this best of all possible Englands.

Try our new institution by any standard which you please, have you anything to object to it? Take the open competitive examination by which it is entered. Have either of your two contending parties—the men who believe that science, and the men who believe that language is the best training for boys—anything whatever to complain of? Will not any boy who feels in himself an aptitude for engineering be sure to succeed, if he has had a good education in any of the usual subjects taught in your public or other good schools? Then, when the College is entered, is there any of our arrangements which is open to fair criticism? I can only say that if any scientific man of name and fame does criticize them, we will give the most careful attention to his suggestions, but we believe that we have followed the best models and the newest lights. We certainly have done our best to do so. Then, as to the passing from our College into our public service, have we not by discarding the old fashioned kind of examination, and adopting instead a continuous trial—a trial examination in the course of which a youth will not merely be obliged to write down answers on paper, but to show that he is an efficient surveyor, and that he can make plans with the usual aids which he would have if he were working as an engineer on his own account—made it absolutely certain that we shall have no hard bargains; that every man who enters the public service will be fit for it? Here, in England, if a young man after spending more money than we ask upon his engineering education, turns out inefficient, he is simply not employed; but once in the Indian public service, there he is and must be paid, even if he cannot be utilized. The rough-and-tumble of the battle of life has been in itself an examination for your engineers at home, but even here what millions upon millions would have been saved, if only your engineers had been properly trained. In the new number of Macmillan's Magazine there is a short paper on engineering education, which excellently sets forth the views that are now entertained by the best engineers upon this subject. Mr. Scott Russell, Professor Pole, Professor Fleeming Jenkin, and others, have exactly the same things to tell you about your engineering education, that Professor Bryce, and Mr. Maine, and many more have to tell you about your legal education.

To sum up then—what we claim is, by the establishment of this Engineering College, to have done, first an imperative duty to India in getting for her the trained engineering ability which she wanted; secondly, to have done many works of supererogation for England, of which the chief are these following:—We have created a new profession on a level with the two great Indian services—the civil and the military. We have not restricted, but widened, the area of competitive examination, by admitting the public schools to compete, which were hitherto, like all the other great schools, discouraged from competing by the necessarily technical character of the examinations. We have offered a first-rate education cheaper than a third-rate education can now be got. We have done service even to those institutions which growl most at us, because such an institution, for example, as University College, will gain much more in its other branches than it will lose in its engineering branch. We have done service to practical men, because, if they can prove while of the proper age, by passing our continuous trial examination and the previous examination that they can be really useful, to India they will go, after merely a few weeks' residence at our College. Lastly, we have done good service to English scientific education by acting, while its other well-wishers have been talking and inquiring. When they have succeeded in creating a scientific institution as creditable to England as the Polytechnic School of Zürich is to Switzerland, then it may well be that our institution may merge in theirs, but before that happy time arrives our Cooper's Hill engineers will have made some thousand miles of railways and canals, have stimulated commerce through wide provinces, and have turned many deserts into fertile fields.

MR. FAWCETT said, he thought this discussion must convince the House that the Committee appointed to inquire into Indian Finance had not been appointed one hour too soon. Here was a new scheme introduced involving considerable expense; but hon. Members did not know how much it would cost, as the Under Secretary of State for India had not condescended to supply any information on that point. Parliament had not been consulted, and if such a system were to be continued, what, he asked, was the use of the House going through the farce of discussing Indian affairs? He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) would take the sense of the House on this question, if only by way of protest against the system of spending the money of the people of India in England without consulting Parliament, which, in respect to financial matters, was, to a certain extent, regarded by the people of India as their trustee. Of course, as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) had remarked, the system of open competition had proved a failure, and no wonder, considering that the Government expected that English youths of great attainments would, after incurring great expense in their education, joyfully accept appointments worth £240 a-year. The hon. Gentleman had remarked that there was a danger lest open competition should become a fetish with the British people; but he would warn the hon. Member against another fetish—the fetish of officialism. Anyone who had listened to the speech of the Under Secretary, would imagine that this Engineering College was an established success, and that the railways and canals had been constructed with greater economy than they had ever been constructed before. But it was necessary to wait before such brilliant anticipations could be realized, and to see whether the Government can do these things better than could be done by private institutions. The Under Secretary had spoken as if it was impossible to obtain a supply of duly qualified engineers. But the whole question turned on this—had they tried to obtain them in the open market? No one acquainted with practical engineering would say that the Government had made a fair trial when they only offered a salary of £240 a-year. The Under Secretary was mistaken as to the necessary expense of obtaining an engineering education. Premiums of £500 or £1,000 a-year were not paid for education, but for going into the chambers of an eminent engineer for the sake of the ulterior connection that might be secured. A good scientific and engineering education could be obtained in Edinburgh, Dublin, Manchester, or London for £50 a-year. No doubt the College would offer to young men who could afford to pay £150 a-year, or say £250 including incidental expenses, great advantages over those who were training themselves at Owen's College, Manchester; Trinity College, Dublin; University College, London, or at Edinburgh; for the Government would have the examinations in their own hands; and this was the reason why the managers of the educational institutions of the country were unanimously opposed to the establishment of this College. There was no analogy whatever between the Military College at Woolwich and an Engineering College, because the Queen was the only employer of skilled military labour, while the business of the whole world demanded the services of engineers. There was no reason why it should not be left to the educational enterprise of the country to supply any amount of engineering talent which India could require. Of course, the examination ought to be severe; but, besides science and mathematics, practical knowledge was required, and that could be obtained better in the towns than in a remote country district in the valley of the Thames. Let the Government decide upon the most severe testing examination they pleased, and if they offered as a reward for the possession of engineering knowledge a fair and reasonable price in the open market, he had no hesitation in saying that the educational authorities throughout the country would quickly adapt themselves to those examinations, and before the lapse of two years there would be no lack of engineering talent whatever. He had been informed that when the Natives of India had got an engineering education they had found it uncommonly difficult to get engineering employment, and that at this time many young men who had been educated in Native Engineering Colleges were reduced almost to manual employment because the Government seemed to have not a dearth but a surplus of engineering talent. He deeply regretted that this College had been established in the way it had been, for Parliament might have been consulted first. When he found that the scheme was progressing, he wrote to the Under Secretary of State for India, asking him whether he did not think it would be well to delay it for a few months until Parliament had been consulted; but the hon. Gentleman seemed to think there was no time for delay, because land was bought and professors were engaged.

All this involved a heavy cost; yet Parliament had never been consulted, and the scheme might fail, because other institutions might produce better men. If it failed Parliament would have to bear the blame, and the people of India would look to Parliament for redress. He trusted the independent Members of the House would unite in bringing to a close a policy which threw upon the House a grave responsibility without adequate opportunity for its discharge.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN, on behalf of the authorities and students of the Queen's University in Ireland, said, that they looked upon the establishment of this College as putting an end to open competition. A worse species of nomination than that of patronage was nomination by money. Open competition had not failed, because it had not been fairly tried by the offer of adequate remuneration for engineering services. He believed the result of this discussion would do good, because he felt satisfied that everyone was only stimulated by the single thought of doing what was best for the country. When a few years ago the payment in the medical departments of the Army and Navy was so low, and the position of the medical officers so humiliating, that sufficient young men could not be found to enter into those branches of the service, the evil was cured not by establishing a College for the education of these young men, but by increasing their scale of payment and elevating their position. The Under Secretary for India said it was not the amount of salary which prevented candidates from coming forward, and that even if £800 a-year were offered fitting men could not be got. But had such an offer ever been tried? The hon. Gentleman also said that there was no University or College in the kingdom capable of educating an engineer. But if that were so, where were those engineers educated who had been an honour to this country and to the world? Surely the manufactory which had produced them was also open to the Indian market. It was said that Cooper's Hill College would establish no monopoly, for a young man would not be obliged to spend four years there; but if he satisfied the College authorities one year, or even six months, would be sufficient. They all knew what was meant by satisfying the College authorities. What did University College do? It found it necessary, in order to establish an impartial tribunal, to pass a law that no person holding office in the College should be an examiner. Although the examinations were perfectly fair, the new College would, in its very nature, be a monopoly. It would be impossible for pupils from other establishments to get fair play without spending two or three years there at an expense of £150 per annum, while very few of their parents could afford to give that sum. He would not go so far as the Mover in saying that the College should be altogether dispensed with. He was prepared to suggest a compromise. He knew a good deal of competitive examinations. The practical science competitive examination did not test all the requisite qualities of candidates. The knowledge of medicine and engineering might be tested; but in the Army medical service young men who had passed their examination, having shown a knowledge of the theory and principles of their profession, were not at once put in charge of Her Majesty's soldiers or sailors—it was necessary to test their steadiness, quickness of eye, and social and moral qualities, which could not be determined by competitive examinations. Having passed their competitive examinations, the young men were sent to Netley, where they got pay—at all events, they were supported without expense—for a term of 6 or 12 months. Their other qualities were tested in that way. If found not qualified they had to seek their fortunes elsewhere. Let young men come from what College they might, they never asked where the horse got his oats if he won the race. The only question was, had the young men the requisite knowledge and other good qualities? Do not let them establish a College which was sure to become a monopoly, and where none would be educated but those who could afford to spend a large annual sum.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR sympathized with those who desired to see this College not enter into unfair competition with the existing educational institutions of the kingdom, and had, like his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), put himself in communication with the Secretary of State for India, as representing two Universities, one of which had a large engineering department, and as member of Council of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The views submitted were met with the greatest attention and consideration, and the evils feared for the scientific institutions of the country were obviated by the regulations which the Government had adopted. In other countries—in Switzerland, Germany, and France, there was a united technical and scientific education of engineers; whereas in this country technical and scientific education were dissociated. That was the root of the whole difficulty the Indian Government had to contend with. They wanted practical men in order immediately to carry out the works of the Indian Government; and the only way of obtaining them was to go to the engineers of the country, who undertook to educate the rising young men of the profession. A fee of from £300 to £500 was required with each pupil, who had the run of the drawing and machine shops, but learnt nothing of the science of engineering except what he could pick up. Apt pupils were generally retained, through a process of natural selection, by the engineers themselves; and it was only the incapables, who were practically rejected by the engineers, that the Indian Government could depend upon. These were found quite unequal to pass the low scientific examination to which they were subjected, and hence the system had broken down from a want of supply of qualified candidates. The College system which existed at the University of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Trinity College, Dublin, Durham, and the Queen's Colleges was a purely theoretic system, which was dissociated from practice. That was not fit for the Indian Government. Only 12 men could be got to answer the combined practical and scientific examination, though purposely kept at a low standard. The hon. Member for Brighton said that was a question of money. He denied it. Whenever men were appointed by that examination they obtained a salary of close upon £300 a-year, and were appointed to the third grade of assistant engineers on probation; but as soon as they had proved themselves capable they were promoted, and there was no difficulty in getting men for the medical service or the Army on such terms. Under the circumstances of the case, there had been three courses open to the Government. The first course was to reject practical experience altogether, and to trust that theoretical knowledge would bud into practical experience; and the second was to reject theoretical training, and rely on the practical experience of the men derived from an apprenticeship. In a practical profession like engineering the first course would commend itself to no one, while the second was not adapted to a country like India, where engineers were isolated and depended upon themselves. In this country a man with practical aptitude, but deficient in scientific knowledge, could refer to a distinct class of mathematical engineers who made the necessary calculations for him. That separation of practice from science would not do for India. As neither of these two courses would do, the third course open was to wait till the educational institutions of the country and the practical engineers reconciled their differences, and organized a training of young engineers by a combination of scientific and theoretical knowledge with practical experience; but that would be to wait indefinitely, and to leave the opening up of the industrial resources of India to the slow process of educational reform. The Government had done practically what the hon. Member for Dublin (Sir Dominic Corrigan) recommended. They first tested the ability of the persons who came to the College, and if they possessed the scientific knowledge that was required their time was shortened largely; and if in addition to scientific they possessed practical knowledge, their time was shortened still more largely, or they were sent out at once to commence their duties. If the Government had had time to wait until an institution arose like the Polytechnic Institution at Zurich or the Ecole Centrale at Paris, they would have obtained all they wanted in the shape of practice and science combined. But they could not wait for that; and, therefore, they had joined science to practice in a way which was not a substitution for existing institutions, but a mere supplementary and accessory means of promoting them; and as the representative of the only University that gave engineering degrees he thanked the Government for the care they had taken in giving credit to the work which other institutions were doing in promoting engineering education, instead of monopolizing it all for their new College. The chief argument against the College was the annual charge of £150 a year for pupils. This would practically exclude poor young men of merit. But this evil might be obviated by establishing a certain number of free scholarships for the best pupils. Such a provision, however, did not yet exist.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM warned the House that if it was not careful the Scotchmen would be too much for it. The Secretary of State and the Under Secretary having got them into a mess, the hon. Member for the Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair) patriotically came forward to defend them. The question lay in a nutshell. The Government of India wanted trained engineers; they said they could not get them, and that that College would produce them. But what means had that College of producing trained engineers which other institutions did not possess? Certainly the Government had boundless pecuniary resources. £90,000 was to be spent on the building, with a large annual sum for the Staff to begin with. But no new method of instruction was proposed. The teaching, it was said, must be theoretical and practical, and no doubt the range of study contemplated embraced an ample field. But other institutions now existing in this country already taught all those very subjects, and if such a handsome market for the young men who had learnt them would be open in India, there could be no doubt that those existing institutions would rapidly provide the necessary training. There were no peculiar facilities possessed by the Government for teaching mathematics, pure and applied, and other subjects required they could be taught equally as well in very good institutions in different parts of the country. The College would only provide what they wanted at an additional cost, and who, either in India or in England, he would ask, would be the better for its establishment? The whole purpose of the Government College was to give a three years' course at £150 a-year to the students; and although it was said that students trained elsewhere might enter the College for a nominal period at the close, yet it was not to be supposed that students who went there for the three years would not be allowed a preference over those who went for six or for three months. As the Government would decide who were the students to be admitted to the College, it was only to be expected that they would favour those who accepted their whole system and entered for the full term. He protested against that project not only as a gross injustice towards the educational institutions of the country, but as a slur on English education in that particular line in which it had been most successful; for if England had not produced engineers, he did not know what kind of genius she had produced.

MR. GORDON assured the hon. Member who had just sat down that his apprehensions were not well founded. Scotchmen were not unanimous on the subject of the College. For himself, he entertained a strong feeling against it, and he found himself in this position—that, sitting on the Conservative side of the House, he had to oppose a monopoly promoted by a Scotch Liberal Member, and supported by Scotch Liberal Members. Hitherto the Government had not given fair play to the young engineers who were to be sent out to India; and let them now see whether the holding out of more adequate inducements would not secure a more luxuriant crop of better educated engineers for service in that country. He was at a loss to know why the Government desired to resort to this new system, which would have the practical effect of handicapping all the educational institutions in this kingdom, and the one educational institution in India, to which reference had been made in the course of the debate. Further, it would be an interference with the Universities which the Government themselves supported. The Chairs of Engineering in the Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities were founded by the Government; but if the scheme they now proposed to introduce were adopted it would at once put an end to the supply of young men educated there for the engineering services in India, and concentrate them into the institution which the Government proposed to establish. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India adopted the view which had been taken by the Mover of the Resolution, and regarded India rather as a great estate belonging to this country than as a country which ought to be governed for the benefit of the Native population. India being regarded simply as a vast estate, it was, of course, necessary, following up the same simile, to have preserves, and the Government theory evidently was that it would be well to create a preserve for the rearing of civil engineers; but he had no doubt that the scheme which had been shadowed forth by the Under Secretary for India would fail, and that utterly. He was not arguing solely with reference to the interests of the Universities, because he understood from his hon. Friend the Member for the Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair) that some favour was intended to be shown to those students who had passed an University course; but, so far as he understood, the advantage was only intended to apply to those students who had been a full year in the University.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, it was only intended that the students should have been in the University a sufficient time to enable them to pass the examination.

MR. GORDON: Let that be as it might, he ventured to say that the proposal of the Government would, if carried, establish a monopoly opposed not only to the interests of the Universities, but also to the interests of those private schools which had up to the present time afforded a good and sufficient education to those students who were anxious to enter into that particular branch of service under the Indian Government which was then the subject of debate.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that while he entirely concurred with what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Member who had just sat down, he (Sir John Lubbock) thought that the discussion had drifted away from the terms of the Motion, which referred not to the establishment of the College, but to the limitation of Indian engineering appointments to the students of that College. He felt bound to say that in the entrance examination for the College, justice had for the first time been done to physical and natural science; and he regretted the more, therefore, that he was unable to support the Government in the matter. If, however, the competitive examination were equally open to students and others, he thought it would very much meet the difficulties of the case. In the interest of general education, and of India itself, he thought it would be wise to accept the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid).

COLONEL SYKES remarked that one point of view of this subject had been entirely overlooked in the course of the debate, and that was that by the present scheme the Natives of India would be entirely excluded from profitable employment as engineers in that country—a result that would lead to considerable dissatisfaction among the people. The people of India were not very well content with the existing state of things, and the scheme would increase their grievances. India had produced engineers capable of constructing the most magnificent works in the world, long before we had ever had anything to do with the country, and it would be very unfair for us to turn round upon the Native engineers and exclude them from employment. The marvellous Taj, at Agra, had been constructed by Native engineers and architects; the dome of Mahomet Shah's tomb at Bejapoor—larger than that of St. Paul's—was supported upon a principle unknown to British architects, which was admitted by the Architectural Society of London, from the inspection of plans and sections which he (Colonel Sykes) had obtained for the society; the celebrated Jumna Canal was designed and completed by a Native engineer; and the gigantic irrigation remains all over India testified that the principles of hydraulics were known and applied in India. In our own times there was the Roorkee College for the express purpose of instructing civil engineers, and all the Universities in India had an engineering class. There should not, therefore, be any difficulty in obtaining competent persons; and if a higher class of engineers were desired, with personal experience of engineering works in Europe, the Government would not have any difficulty in obtaining them, by making it worth their while to give up their prospects in Europe.

MR. MILLER said, he had listened to the discussion with very considerable interest, because it appertained to the profession in which he had been engaged for very many years, and if the hon. Member who brought the question before the House (Sir Francis Goldsmid) persisted in going to a Division, he should certainly vote with him. He thought the Government proposal would act unfairly to the other educational institutions of the country, and would further fail to effect the object which the Under Secretary of State for India anticipated from it. As the result of much experience, he was able to express a confident opinion that to send a young and half-educated man—half-educated he meant solely in reference to his particular profession—would have the effect of reducing the engineering staff under the control of the Indian Government to a state of utter inefficiency. In fact, they might just as well send none at all. The salary paid was a very small matter when compared with the necessity for obtaining the services of thoroughly well-educated candidates for the engineering service; he meant educated in the practice as well as in the theory of engineering: and if the Indian Board supposed for a single moment that they could obtain such men for the amount they proposed to pay, they were utterly mistaken. He ventured to inform the hon. Member for Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair), that apprentices to engineering are not confined to the run of the plans and specifications prepared in the office—during the first two years they may be so, as during that period their services in practice are not of much value—but afterwards they are engaged in surveys, and designing works, and somewhat generally in superintending works—thereby acquiring a practical knowledge of their profession; therefore to send men out to India learned in theory only, according to the plan of the Secretary for India, would be to transplant from this country men ignorant in practice, and who would have to spend there, as they had to do here, a considerable period in acquiring that practical knowledge essential to their profession, and where the facilities for doing so were less than in this country, and the expense much greater.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as the Government of India was spending £8,000,000 a-year in public works, he presumed it would be admitted that the disbursement of the money should be carefully looked after, in order that it might effect the largest possible amount of good. The Government of India relied upon three bodies of men for this purpose—first, upon the Royal Engineers, who were out in the country with their corps;

secondly, upon the Native engineers, who were educated gratuitously in the College of Roorkee, which had been described as a failure; and, thirdly, upon civil engineers who went out to India from England. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) mistook the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India when he interpreted that hon. Gentleman's words as conveying that the Native College had proved a failure. All that the hon. Gentleman said was that the system of education of English engineers in that College had not proved successful. And this was quite reasonable, because young Englishmen were placed at a very great disadvantage when learning their profession in a country so different from their own in every respect as India was from England, and it was incurring a needless expense to take competent gentlemen out from England to teach them that which they could obtain better at home. The failure of the system which had been adopted by the Government of India in order to provide itself with civil engineers might have been predicted long ago by impartial witnesses, because it was based upon examining candidates upon highly technical matters in an open competition. In this country, where engineering was in its infancy, or nearly so, if he might so express himself without offence, no one could be surprised that persons were not forthcoming for the engineering service of India, without reference to the money they were to receive. As for the money, he thought a little too much had been made of that. It was supposed that competent men would not compete for positions worth £240 a-year; but he could tell hon. Members that at the English Universities a man thought himself made for life if he could obtain a Fellowship of a like amount; and, he would add further, that to secure the £240 a-year candidates had only to pass an easy examination, with the prospect of speedily rising to a salary of £360, and then in a short time to £440 per annum. Hon. Gentlemen who objected to what was proposed on the part of the Government had nothing better to suggest than that the old system should be continued—a system based upon competition, but under which the majority of the appointments were the result of simple nomination. If they were not to revert to the old system—and he thought no hon. Gentleman who calmly considered the question would advocate such a course—what was to be done? He thought the best course would be to adopt the plan that had answered so well in connection with the appointments to the Indian Civil Service. For appointments in that service three things were required—good natural ability, a good liberal education, and the technical education and knowledge of those branches necessary and useful to the Civil Service of India. They had not instituted a competition in the Hindostanee and Telegu languages, and technical matters of that kind, because it was thought that what was gained in these special technical matters was lost in the general ability of the men. Thus was ensured the greatest possible amount of ability that could be got; and, having got it, the men underwent a period of probation, during which they acquired the other things that fitted them for beginning their work in India. And that system had not been altered. The same principle ought to be adopted in the present instance as in the case of the Civil Service—that is, they should adopt the principle of competition so far as applicable, and not ruin it by requiring an examination in technical matters, which would only drive candidates away. And that was what Government proposed to do. It required an examination somewhat similar to that instituted in the Civil Service; by the examination, persons were admitted into the College, and then, after their admission, the technical education began which was necessary for forming an engineer. He would not enter into the question whether other interests had a right to be heard in a question of this kind, and whether the Government of India should be prevented from doing what they considered expedient for the sake of English institutions. It was the intention of the Government that no person should be admitted into this College, and from this College into the Indian engineering service, except by competition, and that no one should get a footing in the College at all unless he was a successful competitor for a vacancy. The Government intended that when the number of successful competitors had been ascertained there should be an examination into the amount of knowledge that the successful competitors possessed, and according to their knowledge they would be put through a course of three years, or two years, or one year, or merely retained in the College to enable the authorities to test their fitness to go out. They did not propose, as had been rather invidiously suggested, to put fees into the hands of the College authorities. If the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge now examined their own men, he thought the House might assume that the College authorities would not reject any man at once in order to screw some money out of him in the way of fees for teaching him that which he knew already. It had been suggested that this examination should be placed in perfectly independent hands, so that no suspicion should exist that persons would be forced into this institution merely for the purpose of extracting money from them for teaching them what they knew already; so that if any of those institutions which had been so much recommended sent up a young man to pass the examination, in proportion to the success which he passed the examination, one, two, or the whole three years' course would be dispensed with in his case, and he would be admitted at once to the privileges of the College, just the same as if he had gone through the whole course of three years. That, he trusted, would be satisfactory to the public. It would insure the most perfect fair play and prevent any sort of bias. He maintained, with great confidence, that this system was fair and honest and well-conceived for the purpose that it had in view; that it was founded on a spirit of justice to India, and of enlightened fairness towards all sister institutions. As he had shown that admission to this College might be obtained by those who passed a successful examination without reference to the place where they had been educated, he would suggest to the hon. Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) that there was no necessity for passing his Resolution.

DR. BALL said, if there were no other person who would insist on a Division of the House on this question, he would. This proposed College, the building of which would cost £90,000, and the supposition it could teach practical engineering, was as if the art of war could be learned from the fortifications which Corporal Trim put up in Uncle Toby's garden. There were two kinds of education required—one mathematical and scientific, and the other practical and experimental. The first, he thought, might be taught in the Universities better than in any other institution, whilst the second could only be acquired by actual experience or work.

MR. DALGLISH believed that greater experience was to be gained in England than in India, and that it would be better to send out qualified men to that country than go to the expense of educating them there.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 52: Majority 6.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, young men qualified by character and attainments for admission into the service of the Government of India as Civil Engineers, ought not to be excluded from such service by reason of their not having been educated at a Government College.

ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES ACT REPEAL BILL.—[BILL 27.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Solicitor General.)

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [2nd March], "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I have on two previous occasions requested the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to defer this Bill on account of the lateness of the hour at which it came on; first, on Wednesday last, when it was a quarter to 6 o'clock, and the night before, when it was brought on at a quarter past 1 in the morning. It is now 35 minutes past 12, and I really think it would be but reasonable that the House should have an opportunity given it of considering the proposals which the Government have to make upon the subject. I will, as shortly as I can, place my reasons for holding that opinion, and for proposing the Motion, with which I shall conclude, before the House. I need hardly remind the House that the Bill was but little discussed on its second reading; except a short statement made by the Attorney General, the Members of the Government said nothing. It has since been understood that there is so much difference with regard to the legal construction of the Bill, that Her Majesty's Government wish to refer it to a Select Committee, in which they may have the advantage of obtaining the legal advice of certain Members of this House on the language and details of the Bill. But I would take the liberty of submitting to the Government that, although the principle of the Bill has been affirmed, there has been no inquiry by Parliament since two circumstances occurred which materially alter the subject-matter, to which it is intended that the Bill should apply. It was in the year 1868 that the House of Lords inquired into the operation of the law with respect to the assumption of ecclesiastical titles. That was the year preceding the passage of the Irish Church Act, which, of course, altered the bearing of the law, inasmuch as, having abolished the legal existence of the sees connected with the Established Church, the 24th section of the Relief Act of 1829, which prohibited any ecclesiastics from assuming the titles of the sees then occupied by Prelates of the Established Church, has ceased to be operative. But another circumstance has occurred since the Lords' inquiry in 1868—that was the last inquiry; for the Committee of this House sat and reported in 1867. There has also been a Council held at Rome, called "Œcumenical," by which, avowedly, according to the statements of the Roman Catholic Bishops who composed the minority in that Council, their positions, and that of all Archbishops and Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, have been entirely altered. After January, 1870, the proceedings of the Council were secret by command of the Pope; but before the 14th of January, 1870, much information was published, which shows that the Bishops considered their position was to be materially altered by the proceedings of the Council. Notwithstanding the attempts to preserve secrecy, much has become known of the latter proceedings of the Council, while the decrees, as published, prove the alteration in the position of the Bishops. The plea issued by the late Cardinal Wiseman in defence of the Papal Brief of 1850, which created in this country, and in Parliament, the feeling that subsequently took form in the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, was that the Vicars Apostolic—the title by which the Roman Catholic Bishops were known previous to the publication of the Brief—had no canonical jurisdiction, and that they could not therefore assemble in synod, whether diocesan or provincial, and bring the canon law into operation; and it was pleaded that the English Roman Catholics would acquire certain rights and advantages for their Church, if the canon law were brought into free action. As far as I can gather, the recent decrees of the Council have not abrogated the jurisdiction over others, which the canon law vests in the Bishops who were appointed under the Brief of 1850; but it has done this—it has totally annulled all independent rights, all power of independent action on their part; and, therefore, whilst they are still invested with all the privileges and powers which the canon law confers upon them over others in their own community, or over any country, where that law is admitted, they have no right whatever as against the Holy See itself. So there is a distinct change created by the Irish Church Act with respect to the constitution of the United Kingdom; and, next, there is a still greater change in the constitution of the Roman Catholic Church itself, and in the position of those, who, by this Bill, would be permitted to assume titles, that have hitherto been by law prohibited. I will not now go into other circumstances, which might well induce the House to pause; but I will simply move by way of Amendment to the Motion of the Attorney General, the words of the Instruction, adopted by the House of Lords in the year 1868, for the guidance and direction of their Committee—namely, that all the words after the word “that” be omitted, for the purpose of inserting the words—

“A Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of any Law or Laws, as to the assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, and whether any and what alteration should be made therein.”

It should be remembered that in 1868, the Committee of the House of Lords inquired into the operation of the canon law as it affects Bishops, and with all respect for the learning of this House, I do believe, that there is at present a want of important information which has never reached the Members of this House generally. And, whereas, this very Committee of the House of Lords deemed it essential to ascertain the position of those Roman Catholic Bishops in their own Church, I think that, if their Lordships did not err, it must be still more the duty of this House to obtain information on the subject, considering that the position of these Prelates has been materially and recently altered, so far as the information goes which has reached this country. For my own part, I cannot conceive what objection the Government can have to allowing this House to obtain additional and necessary information upon this subject, since that information relates to facts and their effects, which are totally novel as respects both the laws of this country and the laws of the Roman Catholic Church. I will not longer detain the House; but I hope I have stated sufficient grounds to show that my Motion is neither factious, nor without foundation.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of any Law or Laws as to the assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, and whether any and what alteration should be made therein,”—(Mr. Newdegate.)

DR. BALL said, he hoped his hon. Friend would see the expediency of not proceeding with the Amendment. The proposition to which it was an Amendment had already received the sanction of the House. He was a decided advocate for the Bill, having always considered the Ecclesiastical Titles Act as one of the most unstatesmanlike measures ever passed, and he should view its repeal with unqualified approbation. A Committee of the character suggested by the hon. Member was wholly unnecessary, seeing that the Committee of the House of Lords had fully gone over the ground. Was the Committee intended to stop the progress of a measure to which the House had already assented? The Bill had now arrived at a stage in which nothing but the settlement of certain legal points remained to be done. In his opinion the supremacy of the Crown was fully established by the common law without this Act. The hon. Gentleman would have other and ample opportunities of enforcing his views on the House, and he did trust that the hon. Gentleman would now withdraw his Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 10: Majority 63.

MR. CHARLEY was of opinion that further inquiry was necessary, and he reminded the House that penalties in reference to this subject were not new, having been imposed by Richard II. There could be no doubt that the Attorney General had refused to give Mr. Cobbett permission to proceed against Archbishop Manning.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL gave the statement that Mr. Cobbett applied to him a flat contradiction. He applied to his clerk, who told him he must memorialize in the usual way, but he declined to do so.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Moved, "That the Select Committee on the Business of the House do consist of 23 Members. That Mr. Collins and Mr. White be added to the Committee." —(Mr. J. Lowther.)

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock, till Monday next.

OUR NATIONAL ENGAGEMENTS AND ARMAMENTS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY rose, pursuant to Notice, to call attention to the guarantees which have been undertaken by this country, and to the military resources at the command of this country for fulfilling them; to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communications have passed with Foreign Governments with reference to those guarantees; and to move that the collection of guarantees published in 1859 should be reprinted, with the addition of any that have been contracted since that time? [Earl Granville, was not yet in his place, but arriving at this moment, the noble Marquess, after making allusion to the noble Earl's tardiness, proceeded] — My Lords: I do not think it necessary to offer any apology for calling your Lordships' attention to a most important matter connected with the foreign relations of this country, inasmuch as I think it will be admitted that this is a juncture of no common peculiarity, and no common moment. The whole of the old system of Europe may be said to have been swept away. We are looking into a future in which the equilibrium that governed Europe in past times has disappeared, and we have to reckon on new forces, new balances of power, possibly new enemies—I trust on new and strengthened alliances. This, at all events, is a time at which it is fit to ask the House and the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) to review our position with respect to our foreign obligations. My Lords, I cannot think that your Lordships will be of opinion that the aspect of our relations with Foreign Powers is at present altogether satisfactory. We find ourselves in this peculiar position—that while all our leading authorities at home tell us our condition was never more satisfactory, and our influence never greater, every important organ of opinion abroad, whether French or Prussian, tells us we have effaced ourselves, and that our influence in Europe is nought. And certainly the events of the past year would rather seem to confirm the foreign view of our position than that which we are pleased to indulge in ourselves. There are three great Powers in the world now

—Russia, Prussia, and America—and from their treatment of us we may very satisfactorily gather the condition in which we stand in the estimation of the world at large. Now, what do we find? We find that in a momentous matter Prussia has concluded a treaty defensible on no ground, and in utter contempt of our remonstrances. We find that Russia has taken the opportunity of tearing up the treaty which we imposed upon her in happier times. We find that America, in the Hall of her Representative Assembly, and in the residence of her chief Executive Officer, openly receives and honours those whom we had cast out as rebels. That is the condition in which our power and influence stand, so far as illustrated by those three Powers. I confess that it would be nothing but a gloomy prospect that I should ask you perhaps to consider, were I to enter on the general question of our foreign relations, and to compare our present position as regards other countries with that which we occupied in past times. It is not, however, with matters of mere sentiment that I desire to trouble you. Whether we exercise a great influence or a small one—whether our influence is of that material kind which our fathers were wont to value, or that great moral influence with which we are flattering ourselves, and which means our never being able to induce others to do what we want—these are, to a certain extent, matters of taste and sentiment. If the people of this country do not choose to occupy the position of those who went before them—if they prefer to lose the honour or sentimental tradition rather than incur the cost and risk which it would involve, there is little more to be said. What I am going to ask your Lordships' attention to is a matter of a more solid and practical character. We have been accused of being a shopkeeping nation. Now, I want your Lordships to examine your ledgers and see what is the condition of your obligations—to see, in commercial language, what are your liabilities and what are your assets. I want you just to look and count up the obligations you have incurred in the past, to calculate the results of those obligations, and to look round and see what are your means of satisfying them. Now, my Lords, what are those liabilities? It has been the practice of many Powers of Europe, on the conclusion of a treaty, to guarantee the resolutions to which they have come as to the territory it might assign to any particular Power. That was a dangerous game to play—a game to which all nations have committed themselves more or less, but none so much, or so frequently, as England. Our guarantees extend over the whole of Europe, and even into the other hemisphere. I will not follow them beyond the Atlantic, but will simply ask, what are the guarantees which we have undertaken in this quarter of the world? Beginning from the Westward, we have guaranteed the territory of Portugal, the territory of Belgium, of Switzerland, Greece, Turkey, and Sweden; and, to show your Lordships that this term guarantee is no word of uncertain significance, I will venture to read the terms in which two of these guarantees have been undertaken—so that you may know the exact extent of the obligations they involve. I will not quote any of the ancient guarantees, which, it may be said, belong to a system of politics that has passed by, but will confine myself to those entered into since the noble Earl opposite became a Member of the Legislature of this country. The first that I will ask your Lordships to look at is that which guarantees the territory of Sweden. It was undertaken during the Crimean War, in conjunction with the Emperor of the French. The Article by which we undertake to guarantee Sweden and Norway states that, in case Russia should attempt to obtain the cession or exchange of any part of the territories belonging to those Crowns, the King engages forthwith to apprise England and France, and that England and France engage to furnish him “sufficient” — mark the word—

“Sufficient naval and military forces to co-operate with the naval and military forces of his said Majesty for the purpose of resisting the pretensions or aggressions of Russia.”

I will take another model of these guarantees, and that the most important into which we have entered, and the one which is most likely to be brought home to us by a breach of the conditions on which it depends. I refer to Turkey. The guarantee says—

Your Lordships will notice the words "jointly and severally"—they are very important words. In a discussion on a recent guarantee a short time ago, it was shown that the guarantee was purely a joint one; that the execution of it could never be required unless all the parties who joined in it were prepared to join in executing it; and that, as the parties who were to join in executing it were the only parties at all likely to break it, it did not involve much danger. But this cannot be said of our guarantee with regard to Turkey. This guarantee is joint and several. If you stand alone—if, as Mr. Odo Russell said the other day, "with or without allies"—the infraction of the treaty on any point of the frontier of Turkey binds you in honour to interfere. From the moment this guarantee was entered into, the frontier of Turkey became to you as the frontier of England—indeed, something more, for you can deal with the frontier of England with loss but without dishonour, whereas you cannot abandon an inch of Turkish frontier without forfeiting your plighted honour. Now, in the presence of all these gigantic engagements to protect the territories of Portugal, Belgium, Switzerland, Sweden, Greece, and Turkey, I wish to inquire what means you have at this moment—what means the Government propose to furnish—of executing the obligations you have undertaken. I will just state the forces with which you would have to deal. And here I must guard myself against being told that it is premature to assume that there will be any necessity for meeting our obligations. We hope the world will remain for a long time at peace; but had there been no danger of anybody attacking these territories you would never have entered into guarantees, and the very fact of our having concluded these guarantees obliges us to consider what we should do in case other Powers violated the frontier we have thus secured. We must, therefore, inquire what their power is? The countries principally likely to be attacked in case any Power was disposed to attack them, lie on the frontiers of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. I do not include France, for, I suppose, at the present moment it is unnecessary to inquire into its power, in the event of another war. The standing Army of Austria is 800,000 strong, its Reserve, is 300,000, and its Landwehr 200,000. Russia has a standing Army of 827,000 men, 410,000 local troops, and 229,000 irregulars. The field troops of North and South Germany number 670,000, their depôt troops 228,000, and their garrison troops 263,000. Austria has altogether 1,053,000 men, Russia 1,466,000, and Germany 1,161,000. Now, what have you got to meet this? I was very much struck in the debates, both in this and in the other House, by the readiness with which the Ministerial advocates always point to our fleet as a sufficient answer to all such questions. My noble Friend behind me was recently rebuked for not alluding to the fleet, and for not remembering that the fleet is our first line of defence. So, again, in discussing our military forces, it never seems to enter the mind of anyone that our fleet has anything else to do beyond defending the particular island on which we stand. If, however, you have entered into these guarantees, you must recollect that the frontiers of those countries are your own frontiers, and that so long as the boundaries and the guarantees exist you are bound to resist attack on them until you have released yourselves from your engagements. Of what use is it, then, to talk of the fleet? Of what value would the fleet be in defending the European or Asiatic frontier of Turkey, or in defending Sweden? Look at the history of the past. Was the fleet of much use in the siege of Sebastopol, or even in the Baltic during the Crimean War? So far as I know it, it did nothing towards the reduction of any great fortress or town on the Russian coast. It did nothing towards keeping troops in the North which Russia wanted in the South. We are too apt to be misled by the great things the fleet did during the great Revolutionary War. No doubt it was a powerful instrument in hampering and ultimately in subduing Napoleon; but why? We had then the power of declaring a general blockade, and of searching neutral ships for enemies' goods. In your reckless Utopianism you have flung those two weapons away, and your fleet can only blockade the particular port to which it is sent, or bombard any fortress which may happen to be on the coast. I believe that since the Declaration of Paris the fleet, valuable as it is for preventing an invasion of these shores, is almost valueless for any other purpose. I do not doubt the courage or vigour of French sailors; but we have seen how perfectly worthless the French fleet has been during the deadly peril of their country. I believe there is no delusion more fatal to this country than to believe that, if we are called upon to sustain our foreign policy with respect to any one of these guarantees, our fleet is a first line of defence. If so, what have you to oppose to the millions of men of these European Powers? I believe we have 100,000 soldiers in these islands, or are to have when the Estimates are voted; 200,000 Militia and other irregular troops, and 150,000 Volunteers. But the Militia and Volunteers cannot leave these islands. For the purpose, therefore, of foreign action, your utmost strength is limited to 100,000 men. I do not intend to criticize their composition. I am perfectly willing to accept with thankfulness and with full credence the testimony of the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief the other night to their efficiency; but I remember that at the same time he added that they were far too small for our needs at the present day—a statement very important coming from one in his position. It is absurd to suppose that you can sustain these guarantees with nothing but whatever you can spare from these 100,000 men. I know I shall be told that we do not, and never can, compete in numbers with the military monarchies of the Continent. No doubt; but I would venture to call your attention to another Power which proceeds on a totally different principle, and which, like you, refuses to compete with the great military monarchies of the Continent, and frames its policy accordingly. I am no great admirer of America; but I must say that in this matter of foreign policy there is a consistency and unity of purpose which we might well study. The Americans, it is true, have a smaller standing Army—not more, I believe, at present than 50,000 men—but then they do not pretend to share in the councils of other nations. They appear at no council board, and as they do not care to take part in the negotiation of any treaty they are burdened with none of those onerous guarantees. If you wish to share their immunity from danger you must also share their immunity from all responsibility for what occurs in Europe. Now, it is not easy to make this little “streak of silver sea” like the Atlantic. It is very difficult for us to keep apart from European affairs. I was going to say it is impossible—but when I have seen how readily we stood aside and witnessed a great nation crushed, I cannot say that it is impossible. We are taking up a position which is without example among the nations of the world. The art of war has received enormous development. Vast bodies of men are now raised which could not be raised in times past, and owing to the railway system every one of the Powers to whom we are likely to be opposed is capable of concentrating at a few weeks’ notice upon a single point its whole military strength. They have recognized the change in the art of war, and how necessary it is to increase their power both of defence and offence. We have reduced both; and yet while we have refused to increase our military strength we refuse either to take the part of retiring from promises which we are unable to perform, or of ceasing to meddle with affairs which we are no longer able to influence. We are speaking with a double voice. We maintain the pretensions and hold the language handed down to us from another period when we had more spirit, and at the same time every nation in Europe knows that our military organization is such that we cannot act up to the promises we have made. We have been recently told on very high authority that the organization of our military system imposes upon us a rôle d’effacement.

EARL GRANVILLE: What is the authority?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The Moniteur of Versailles. Consequently a power of deliberation is all that is now left open to us in European affairs. It throws a doubt into all we may do. It is no use our maintaining a high tone when it is well known how far short our means fall of our great pretensions. There is great danger of our being at any moment in a difficult position. It is impossible to mistake the course of current events. We see that these small kingdoms which we have guaranteed are marked out by the destinies of the world for destruction. Almost every successive generation sees the absorption of one or other of them into a larger empire. The great organizations and greater means of locomotion of the present day mark out the future to be one of great empires. The small Powers will have hard work to live at all. These guarantees, therefore, will be no sinecure. These territories we have guaranteed are, of all others, the very territories that are likely to be attacked. Who will say that Sweden, and Turkey, and Belgium, and Portugal are likely to be the most long-lived among European nations? We know that the military storms of this era do not give much notice. They burst upon us suddenly when we least expect them; and with our onerous obligations, and our minute military force, we may at any moment be put in the dilemma of either sacrificing our national honour or of rushing on to certain defeat. I do not think that defeat is likely to be the horn of the dilemma we should adopt. My fear is that when the extremity comes we shall look at the obligation, turn it round and round, talk very big, lecture one side or the other, and then when Europe cries shame on us, we shall congratulate ourselves at home upon the moral pinnacle on which we stand. That of late years has generally been our part when we have had inconvenient obligations to encounter, and it will increasingly be our part in the future. At all events, let us face these things now. This is a period above all others when this subject can be entertained by Her Majesty's Government. The treaties which inflict upon us the most burdensome guarantees are at this moment under discussion at the council table of Europe, and a Congress at which others will be brought forward is likely to be summoned very shortly. I think it is now right to ask the Government to look boldly at the future—no longer to postpone their decision to the last extremity; to make up their minds whether anything is to be done to provide forces adequate to fulfil these obligations, or whether they intend to ask other Powers to allow them to withdraw from, or modify them. Unless they come to some determination—if they continue this system, which I must call one of permanent braggadocio—if they will not adapt their promises to their powers, or their powers to their promises, I foresee a time of terrible humiliation to this country which may shake our institutions to their centres. Therefore it is that I now venture to ask the noble Earl to give us some as-urance of his policy in this respect, and now, while the nations of Europe are in council as to the future aspect which the political whole of Europe is to assume, not to forget the guarantees which are contained in this book, but to do something to spare us the terrible humiliation which will come upon us if the day should arrive for meeting, with such a force as the Estimates now present, the great military monarchies of Europe. The noble Marquess concluded by asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any communications have passed with Foreign Governments with reference to these guarantees, and his Motion?

Moved, "That the collection of Guarantees published in 1859 should be reprinted, with the addition of any that have been contracted since that time."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has made a very remarkable speech, and has put most important questions connected with the welfare of this country. The noble Marquess was so anxious to make the speech that he gave notice of a Motion four days before he had made up his mind what the Question he should put to the Government should be; and such was his haste that even this evening he complained of my not being in my place before the hour at which, according to the forms of the House, the Orders of the Day are called on. There are one or two things I wish to say with regard to the speech. One is, that I certainly recognized, except in a very few sentences, nothing of party spirit in it. The other is, that the noble Marquess has not shown the inconsistency which some of the critics of Her Majesty's Government have done, who have declared that we are utterly unprepared for war, and yet in the same breath have complained that we did not use language and do things which must inevitably have led to that result. I would, however, appeal to your Lordships whether, in the exaggeration which characterized almost every portion of the noble Marquess's speech, it is likely to be of utility in any national point of view. It was once remarked by a very eloquent and witty man that the peculiarity of this country was that we were in the habit of laying ourselves upon the dissecting-table and cutting down to the very bone in the face of Europe and all the world. I believe that the principle is a good one; but when carried to a false and exaggerated extent, the only effect it has is to give an impression very far from the truth as to the position of this country in the eyes of Europe. I think the noble Marquess, in introducing this subject, might have avoided his preface about the miserable position this country holds in Europe—about our being effaced from the councils of the world, and the impossibility of our exercising any influence for any good purpose. The noble Marquess, on my asking the authority for this description, told us it was The Moniteur Officiel, of Versailles, which said this. Now, it is rather remarkable that that sentence was in a non-official article in that journal, and that the next day the Foreign Minister of Germany expressed his regret to Mr. Odo Russell that such an article had appeared without his knowledge; and he took the important step, certainly not at our request, of putting a censorship on the non-official articles of that newspaper. The noble Marquess even condescended to twit us with being considered a nation of shopkeepers. Now, if our being a nation of shopkeepers means that we love peace, order, liberty, and industry, I admit the accusation; but if it means that we flinch from doing that which the honour and interest of the country require us to do, I entirely repudiate it. The noble Marquess throws it in our face as a term applicable to us because in a great and deadly struggle—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: May I interrupt the noble Earl? I did not use the term as one of reproach. I adopted it as a common figure of speech.

EARL GRANVILLE: I really do not think that, when the noble Marquess quoted the phrase, as showing the estimation in which we were held all over Europe, it was with any other view than that which I have pointed out; but if he disclaims it, I am glad to have him on my side so far. I beg leave to say, for the benefit of others who have used it in the sense I have described, taunting us because we have maintained a fair and impartial neutrality during the struggle which we vainly attempted to prevent, that it was applied to us by a great military genius whose fall was very much accelerated by the most extravagant expenditure, both of blood and treasure, which up to that time any nation had ever made. I say, therefore, that the re-pointing of it as a term of reproach is perfectly ridiculous as applicable to a judicious and politic course, and to the policy which, when we first declared it in Parliament, was almost unanimously approved by both Houses and by the country. I perfectly admit that in this country remarks are made about our descending to the position of a second or third-rate Power. I admit that this sort of language has been repeated abroad, in France and Germany, and in some of the neutral States; but when I seek tangible proofs of it I fail altogether to find that to be the estimation in which we are held on the Continent. Let us look first to the neutrals. With one neutral there was, for a moment, an incident of a very painful character—I allude to the Circular of Prince Gortchakoff; but whatever there was of offensive in the mode of that declaration was offensive in like manner to both the belligerents. I say both advisedly, for I believe that whatever understanding there might have been between the two countries, as to a possible revision of the Treaty of 1856, the mode was surprising and distasteful to both the belligerents. It was the same matter of offence to every other country of Europe, and it has been met in a way common to us as well as other countries. I would point out a slight incident with regard to it. We were the first to complain, and to assert that we would not admit what had been done by Russia; and the very fact of Russia going into a Conference, where the condition which we put on the entrance into the Conference was a withdrawal of the declaration she had made proves a good deal. What is more—although two Governments in Europe were desirous that the Conference should be held in their capital, and although we expressed no wish whatever, and even put London as the last alternative to other places, the European Governments unanimously decided that London was the proper place for holding it. With regard to other neutrals, does the noble Marquess rely entirely on a phrase in an article published by a small French paper? Has he read the Papers laid before Parliament, and can he conscientiously say that, on the part of the neutral Powers, a feeling has been shown of our being effaced, and of no account in the councils of Europe? It is impossible not to remark the courteous and conciliatory tone they have displayed towards us, their anxiety to know our views upon every subject, their wish to conform as much as possible to our policy, and their always proposing to us to put ourselves in the first rank with regard to anything to be done. This is evidently the estimation in which we are held in Europe, and we are not to judge in the matter from chaffing articles in newspapers. With regard to the belligerents, take Prussia. I am sorry to say there has been a feeling of great dissatisfaction with us on the part both of Germany and France. I remember Lord Clarendon speaking in this House four years ago on the disadvantages to us of a war between France and Prussia. He pointed out not only the great difficulty of our avoiding being dragged into the war—which we fortunately have not been—but said it appeared to him almost impossible that the most hostile feelings should not be excited on the part of the belligerents if we performed our duties strictly and impartially as a neutral Power. The result has verified his prophetic sagacity to a certain extent, and I certainly expected it last year. Has Prussia, however, treated us with the contempt which is alleged? She has complained of certain things—such as the export of arms. I do not say that was reasonable on the part of statesmen; but it was most natural that some irritation should exist, such as we ourselves felt, to some extent, under similar circumstances. I have from the first known the firm declaration of Germany, that as it was belligerents who made war, it was the belligerents who should make peace. I could hardly understand myself how men so strong with regard to military means, so powerful with regard to diplomacy, should be so sensitively fearful even of appearing to yield to any advice tendered in a friendly manner by Powers who would have been inclined to act in that manner; but if there is any inference to be drawn from it—if that fear has been expressly shown to England more than to any other Power—it is certainly an indirect compliment in itself, and does not, in the slightest degree, show what the feeling would be towards small and insignificant States which should offer advice without any possible means of enforcing it. Both

France and Germany have shown an incapability of understanding how, notwithstanding our neutrality, we could wish to be on friendly relations with the other belligerent without being hostile to them; but, with this exception, I really am not aware of any one proceeding on the part of Germany which justifies the view taken by the noble Marquess. When an unfortunate incident occurred on the Seine, nothing could be more prompt or courteous than the explanations made by Prussia; and the Correspondence on the Table with regard to one of the guarantees to which we are parties does not show that we have much to complain of in the tone which Germany has adopted towards us in that Correspondence. There is another incidence of some importance—the fact of Mr. Odo Russell having, for the last three months, been at the German headquarters at Versailles, he being the only diplomatic Representative there of any European Power. He has been received with singular courtesy and cordiality—a good deal owing to his personal merit, his great ability, knowledge, and conciliatory manner; but still I cannot believe that the exception made in that way can be regarded as otherwise than a compliment to this country. With regard to France, her position of calamity and her reverses naturally inspired more dissatisfaction on her part. She is angry with us, not unnaturally, again—though I believe our policy was perfectly just and right—for not flying to her assistance when she was in difficult circumstances; but in none of her appeals to us is there a trace of her thinking us feeble and useless. At one time she assures us that one word from us would be sufficient; at another time she asks us to give more force and strength to our appeal, saying that if we did so she could succeed and conquer the enemy. Are these evidences of the feebleness or weakness of this country? I entirely deny that we have effaced ourselves, as the noble Marquess says. The noble Marquess has given a description of the different guarantees, and our ability to execute them; and in that description he said things which I cannot possibly agree to. There was great exaggeration in his description of international law. I remember, four years ago, when some of us were complaining of an explanation of treaty obligations which we thought extraordinary, a noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) reproved some of us for continuing the discussion, as one which it was very undesirable to continue. I believe the remark applies still more strongly to a person having an official position, who should go and lay down general principles as to the application of different liabilities. It is not only not my duty to do that, but it would be acting contrary to my duty to give any definition of the sort. A Turkish statesman, when asked by three great European officials as to a certain doubtful alternative, said—"When a lady is in an interesting condition, it is impossible for me to tell whether the child will be a boy or a girl, and I decline to answer the question until the child is born." If any of those dilemmas occur which the noble Marquess dwelt upon, it will be our duty strictly to recognize whatever obligations we are under, and then to concert with our allies—or, if there is any obligation resting on us exclusively, to consider by ourselves—the means best adapted to the honour and interest of the country. No doubt these treaties exist, one of the most stringent being the Treaty entered into 400 years ago with Portugal; and they come down to the Treaty respecting Luxemburg, which the noble Marquess omitted to mention, the stringency of which, as explained by the Government of that day, is of an infinitesimal character. The noble Marquess asks if there has been any Correspondence with Foreign Powers with reference to these guarantees? There has been Correspondence on the subject of these guarantees from the time of the Portuguese Treaty 400 years ago, and there has lately been Correspondence respecting the Luxemburg Treaty, which has been already placed on the Table, as also has the Correspondence respecting the Treaty of 1856, which preceded the Conference. I am not aware of any other Correspondence which has passed under the present Government, to which, I presume, his Question is confined. I entirely deny the noble Marquess's description of the helplessness of this country. We have done things during the last six months—I have mentioned three—which would have been eminently culpable in the Government had we believed that we were so impotent, both for offence and defence, as the noble Marquess has represented us to be in the opinion of all foreign nations. I will not enter into the question of our Army preparations, for that was discussed here a few nights ago by competent authorities, and we shall have opportunities, probably, of discussing in detail the measures which the Government have thought right to introduce to strengthen what now exists; but I deny that we are in a position of incapacity to fulfil the engagements we have entered into and the language we have held. As to our system of "permanent braggadocio," I was accused the other day—not, I think, with much force—of having used some of those conventional phrases of courtesy, which, avoiding irritating, do not in the slightest degree weaken the force or clearness of what is said; but I challenge the noble Marquess to produce anything which I wrote by the advice of my Colleagues bearing the least semblance of braggadocio, or containing a word to which I do not now implicitly adhere. We adopted a certain policy last year, and endeavoured to adapt it to circumstances as they arose, I am told with great success—not in stopping the war, which I believe it was utterly impossible for us to stop, unless we had rushed into the fight ourselves, and then, of course, no one could tell what would have happened—but success in keeping this country out of entanglement. I believe we have contributed also, in some degree, to localize the war, and prevent its becoming a universal conflagration. The noble Marquess derided the usefulness of our Navy. Now, three days after hearing a noble and gallant Admiral describe our Navy as in a perilous condition, I met one of the most eminent men of the United States, Commodore Roberts, who has been sent here, not exactly as naval attaché, but as inspector of the navies of Europe. He told me he had heard these criticisms with astonishment, for he was struck with the admirable state of our Navy, and its immense superiority to all the other navies with which he was acquainted. I asked his permission to mention this, which he frankly gave; and when you get this sort of independent observation in support of the official declarations of the Government, I trust neither your Lordships nor the public will go to bed at night with the nightmare created by the noble Mar-quess's speech. I have no objection to the Motion the noble Marquess has made; but I thought it necessary to say thus much in answer to his exaggerated statements.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I was surprised to hear the noble Earl reproach my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) with indecent hurry in bringing forward this subject, for I began to think that it was almost a disrespect to the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs for the House to have sat a month without taking more notice of his important Department, at a time when Europe is in an unparalleled condition; and had not my noble Friend brought the question forward, I think I could not have abstained from doing so myself. During the whole of my life—and that is now not a very short one—I have never remembered political international morality at so low a standard. This decadence of political morality began with the breach, in the most inexcusable manner, of the Treaty of 1852, which was drawn up by Lord Palmerston, approved of by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell), then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and signed by me, and from that moment Europe has been a scene of confusion. My Lords, this first act of aggression—of dishonesty, I will call it—was the invasion of Denmark; and I remember the late Lord Palmerston saying to me on that occasion—I wrote down his words afterwards—"This is the worst thing I have ever yet seen; but it will bring on worse things still." He spoke a prophecy which has been fulfilled. That invasion of Denmark did not profit those who expected to profit by it, because Prussia took care that it should not, that being her second breach of faith in the matter. Then came the war between Austria and Prussia—a war so dishonourable, I think, to both parties, and which set a bad example to other nations—and which I cannot help thinking has, like many other bad examples, been followed. What was the cause of this war between France and Germany? Napoleon III., believing that he would be the next person attacked, anticipated—exactly as he did when he made his coup d'état in Paris—the attack that would be made on him by Prussia. He put on one side all respect for the covenant of nations and for international agreements, as made in 1856, and, as your Lordships know, he has been severely punished for a breach of these, when, at the time, he had received no adequate insult from Prussia to justify him. This brings me to the remark of my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville), who said he believed it was impossible to stop this war. I will do my noble Friend the justice to admit that, once the war began, it was impossible to stop it; and for this reason—because the fortune of the war all ran in one way, and so rapidly that it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, to mediate between the belligerents. If the victories had been alternate, or anything like drawn battles, then my noble Friend might have stepped in to stay the slaughter, and might, perhaps, have stopped the war. But I am not so sure that he might not have averted it originally. That he could have averted it eventually, perhaps, was doubtful; but, still, every moment gained in diplomacy is a blessing to mankind. Every year added to the duration of peace is of immense advantage, because through the death of some one man, or through some other event, you may hope to see an outbreak of hostilities prevented. An historical fact occurred in 1859, when the late Lord Derby's Government was in office, and I was myself at the Department over which my noble Friend now presides. At that time the Italian War was about to break out. We, of course, desired to settle the difference between Austria and Italy by a Conference. The Emperor Napoleon was most eager for that war, because he had his dynastic reasons for wishing it. Your Lordships may depend upon it that he was more eager to go to war at that time, and to join Count Cavour in attacking Austria and emancipating Northern Italy, than he was to commence hostilities against Prussia a few months ago. After extensive correspondence and great anxiety on the subject, we did prevail on the Emperor Napoleon to agree to disarm himself, and to oblige Count Cavour to disarm, and refer the questions in dispute to a Conference; and if Austria had not madly and precipitately rushed into Piedmont, that war, so far as the French Emperor was concerned, would never have happened. I say this because it is just to the Emperor Napoleon, who has been the best ally to this country of all Sovereigns who ever sat on the

Throne of France, and in whom, therefore, whatever we may think of his course since, we ought to feel some grateful interest—I say this in justice to him because it proves that he was amenable to the representations of the British Government, to whom he was a firm ally. Therefore, I do not agree entirely in what my noble Friend said as to its being absolutely impossible to have averted the war. I may observe that we found the Emperor Napoleon amenable to two arguments—first of all, to the argument that he did not fight with the other powers of Europe upon equal terms—that the Emperor of Austria might lose half-a-dozen battles and not lose his Empire or his Crown, whereas he staked everything on the fate of one battle. The second argument was that if he defeated Austria completely, it was impossible to suppose that the rest of Germany would stand quiet and allow her to be destroyed. Therefore, if in the more recent case it had been properly shown to him not only that he risked his dynasty by this wilful war, but also that Russia would not have allowed him, even if he had gained some victories, to take possession of Prussia, that might have induced him to change his mind, or, at all events, to wait till he was attacked. It may, my Lords, be said that these are mere speculations on the past; but I have adverted to them in consequence of the observation of my noble Friend opposite that it was impossible to stop the war. The main object of the speech of my noble Friend behind me (the Marquess of Salisbury) had reference to our guarantees towards foreign States. No doubt, our honour is involved in those guarantees, and I confess that I should have been better pleased if my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) had risen in his place to-night and boldly said that England was bound to stand by her guarantees, and that she would stand by them. My noble Friend opposite did not say that: he left us to guess it; for I do not for a moment think he meant to throw doubt on those guarantees. They are of various descriptions. Some of them do not involve our own national interest, or our own self-defence and security; but others, again, do directly involve the safety and security of this country. The guarantee of Belgium, for instance, is as necessary for the security of England, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the greatest statesmen who are gone, as that which has been called our “silver streak of sea.” Antwerp was described by the great Napoleon himself as a pistol held at the head of England by whoever possessed it. I know that has been doubted by some persons, and among them by a very able and gallant officer, Captain Sherard Osborn, who has published his views that Antwerp is no longer of the same consequence to us that it used to be; but he has not proved his case. We have no guarantee in respect to Holland; but is it to be supposed that if Holland were invaded we should not defend her, because we have no guarantee? Mr. Pitt and Lord Palmerston placed the highest value on the independence of Holland. The state of Europe, and the state of morality among Governments, is such that we cannot answer for a single day that they will not make might right at any moment or at any point. Recollect the negotiations which occurred—and they were by no means fictitious, but authentic negotiations—between Count Bismarck and the Emperor Napoleon with regard to the annexation between them of Holland and Belgium, and that they should each defend their share of the spoil against all comers. Your Lordships do not suppose that men of that position and note talk over plans of that sort like school girls talking about their sweethearts, just for the pleasure of chatting? Do you suppose these ideas were not in the brains of those two able men as possibilities, and that the only thing which prevented their maturity was that it suited neither party to carry them further at that time? Well, my noble Friend behind me (the Marquess of Salisbury) asks my noble Friend opposite—“Are you ready to support your guarantees, and are you strong enough to defend them?” My noble Friend opposite says—“We are strong enough; we have a great Navy.” But is it not most extraordinary that my noble Friend—a Member of the Cabinet, and a most important Member—knowing what he must have known of the state of Europe last year, should have allowed the Army to be reduced to such a degree as it has been? The Government then, it appears, regrets what has been done, and has placed the Army at a higher strength; but it is impossible to suppose that strength is equal to maintaining our guarantees affecting Belgium and other countries; and therefore, considering the noble Earl has not said that we will stand by these guarantees, his speech will very much increase the difficulty of maintaining them, and very much alarm those who believe that the safety and honour of England are involved in maintaining them. My noble Friend's language is much less strong than it was six months ago, because we understood then from him that he did regard the guarantee respecting Belgium as one which England should never shirk. I cannot help saying, then, that I am not at all satisfied with the answer of my noble Friend opposite. I am one of those who believe that this country is bound strictly to maintain whatever covenants she has entered into with other nations; and, consequently, that it is our duty — our bounden duty — to provide ourselves with such a force as will enable us to do so with that lofty spirit which has ever characterized us.

EARL GRANVILLE: One word in explanation regarding the treaty obligation as to Belgium. I certainly decline giving general answers to specific cases put by the noble Marquess; but the noble Lord forgets that the treaty obligation entered into at the end of last summer with regard to Belgium was exactly one of those engagements which I said we entered into in the belief that we could carry them out; and I added that I defied the noble Marquess to show that we used any words to which we do not adhere.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, as the Navy had been alluded to, he thought it right to make a few remarks. He quite agreed with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that the fleet did little in the Baltic and the Crimea; and there was good reason for it, for the guns and shot which they carried were perfectly useless against stone walls or granite. There was not a broadside gun that carried solid shot, and anybody who knew anything of our naval guns knew that hollow shot were perfectly useless against granite forts. That would sufficiently account for the Navy doing nothing. But as an instance which lately occurred he might mention that the Report of the French Admiral who commanded the French fleet in the North Sea, and which did comparatively nothing, gave the reason why. The Admiral said—"I had not a ship with me with which I could go near their shores." Now, he was sent to carry on coast operations, and if he was not supplied with ships that could go near the shore what could he do? The Admiral showed that it was not the fault of the French officers or the men, as the officers and men from the ships behaved admirably when defending Paris. He (the Earl of Lauderdale) had heard a great deal said about our fleet; but he believed that at the present moment our fleet was much in the same condition as the French. We had hardly a single armour vessel afloat for coast and harbour operations; hardly a vessel fit to go in shore and attack forts. He was glad to hear that a distinguished American officer had found out that we had a very powerful fleet. It was true we had about 40 iron-clads; but they all drew from 24 to 26 or 27 feet of water. Now, these vessels were not fit for coast operations. What we required was a very large number of vessels fitted for operations in shore. Of armour-plated vessels drawing less than 16 feet of water we had hardly any, except the class of vessels called gunboats. There was no doubt that our fleet consisted of very powerful ships, but it was a mistake to suppose that because these 40 vessels were armour-plated that they were fit to attack forts. He did not think that out of the 40 we had above 10 which were shot-proof against guns of 12 tons or upwards. He did not believe that the Navy was in such a state as the public supposed it to be. We were not in a state to defend our own coasts or forts, or to attack an enemy's. They knew that some 200,000 men could be collected on the opposite coast in a very few days, and as the ports opposite had each 20 or 30 large ships at command, each ship capable of transporting 800 to 1,000 men, the work of transhipment would not fail on that ground.

EARL GREY, in reply, acknowledged that the present would be an inopportune moment for discussing the conduct of England during the war just closed, but hoped some noble Lord would bring the matter forward before the Session was over.

Motion agreed to. (No. 33.)

JUSTICES PROCEEDURE (ENGLAND)

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts regulating Proceedings before Justices of the Peace out of Quarter Sessions in England—Was presented by The Lord CAIRNS; read 1^a. (No. 31.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, 'till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 6th March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Lord Henry Richard Charles Somerset, for Monmouth County.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Westmeath, &c. Unlawful Combinations [2nd March], discharged; Westmeath, &c. Unlawful Combinations, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Income Tax Assessment* [64].

Second Reading—Army Regulation [39], debate adjourned; Stamp Act (1870) Amendment* [46]; Metropolitan Commons Supplemental* [62]; Local Government Supplemental* [63].

STATE OF IRELAND—WESTMEATH, &c.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to give Notice of my intention to do what I think will be agreeable to the House—that is, to fulfil an implied obligation which Her Majesty's Government undertook in the course of the debate upon the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the state of Westmeath. My noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland intimated—and I supported him in the intimation—that it would be perfectly agreeable to us to alter the terms of the Motion by omitting the closing words, which were considered to bear the interpretation that we desired to diminish the responsibility of the Government in regard to the inquiry—an interpretation we never intended them to bear. It was impossible to do this at the time; but it can be done now by cancelling the Order for the appointment of the Committee, and making a fresh one. I hope, however, that it will be understood that the Order is cancelled for this purpose alone; and as it is desirable that no time be lost, I shall take the necessary steps in the course of this evening.

SCOTLAND—MAIL TRAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. CARNEGIE asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Post Office authorities have exacted any; and, if so, what penalties from the Railway Companies in the north of Scotland for the frequent unpunctuality of the mail trains during the past year?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the Post Office authorities had not exacted any such fine, nor did he think it would be possible to do so. He was informed that the principal irregularities were occasioned by delays in the branch lines, or by the extreme severity of the winter weather, which made it necessary, for the safety of the trains, that they should travel at a slower pace, and be stopped more frequently for examination. In ordinary times, the overtime hardly ever amounted to more than half an hour on the journey of about 500 miles, over lines belonging to two or three different railway companies. Delays often were owing to the letters not being ready on the branch lines, in consequence of a press of business. If the Post Office were to insist on exacting the penalties for delay, the railway companies would, of course, insist on not waiting for the branch mails, and serious inconvenience to the public would result.

SMALL POX AT GREAT GRIMSBY.

QUESTION.

MR. CADOGAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that on the 8th February a vessel called "The Star," from Hartlepool to London, put in at Grimsby, where the Captain landed a seaman suffering from small pox, and that the Captain was thereupon ordered by the authorities to take the man on board again, and was informed that his conduct subjected him to a severe penalty?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have inquired into the case, which does not appear to be exactly as has been represented. It appears that the captain of the Star landed one of his sailors at the Royal Dock on or about 8th of February, and took him through the streets to the office of the clerk of the peace, leaving him outside the office while he went in, and stated his belief that the man was suffering from small-pox. He was told that he ought not to take the man about the public streets, as it was dangerous, and contrary to law; and he was recommended to take lodgings for the sick man; and as he apprehended some difficulty in finding them under the circumstances of the case, he was advised to apply to the relieving officer. He went to the relieving officer's house, and found that he was not at home, and he was again recommended to get the man lodgings. He was now told to take the man on board again; and I believe that he did not apply to any other person. I will add that this scandal, as I may call it, has arisen in consequence of Great Grimsby not having availed itself of the power given under the 37th clause of the Sanitary Act to erect either temporary or permanent hospitals, which, necessary in all large towns, are especially indispensable in our seaports.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1871.—QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether this House will be asked specifically to vote any sum towards the Exhibition of 1871; and, if not, whether any charge for this purpose on the ordinary Votes of Parliament will or can be made by any Department of the State?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not, Sir, the intention of Her Majesty's Government to ask the House for a Vote of any sum towards the coming Exhibition. I cannot, of course, say what the Departments can or will do; but I do not believe any Department ought to apply its funds to such a purpose.

NAVY—WORKS AT CHATHAM DOCKYARD.—QUESTION.

MR. CAWLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the "Amended Contract," directed to be prepared by Board Minute of March 17, 1869, and to be entered into with Mr. Gabrilli for the execution of works at Chatham Dockyard has been signed by the Contractor, and why a Copy of such Contract was not presented to this House on the 2nd August last, along with the Correspondence (Paper 412), in accordance with the promise given by the Junior Lord of the Admiralty on the 30th June; also, why Copies of the several Contracts made with Messrs. Foord, Messrs. Ball and Co., and with others for various works in connection with the extension of Chatham Dockyard have not been presented to this House as required by the Act 28 and 29 Vic. c. 51?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, a copy of the amended draft contract was presented, and forms part of the Correspondence laid on the Table of the House on the 2nd of August last; and though the conditions, specifications, and schedule were signed by the contractor on the 4th of June, 1870, and are alone a sufficient security for us, the continued absence of the contractor in Vienna, where he has extensive works in hand, has delayed our solicitor in obtaining his signature to the formal deed. I understand the contractor has now sent a power of attorney to his agent to sign for him. I may add that no delay or loss has arisen to the service from the non-signature of this deed. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Member, I am advised that the contracts there alluded to, and of which some, if not all, were made by the late Government, were not entered into under the provisions of the Act quoted, and, therefore, it was not requisite by virtue of that Act to present them, they being contracts or agreements made under the ordinary authority of the Admiralty, and giving no special advantages to the contractors. There is, however, no possible objection, should the hon. Member wish it, to lay copies of these documents on the Table of the House. I would further wish to inform the hon. Member that the Return he proposes to move for to-morrow will be given.

NAVY—NAVAL RESERVE (SECOND CLASS).—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he can state the number of Ordinary Seamen of the Merchant Service who have enrolled themselves in the Naval Reserve (Second Class) from its establishment to the present time?

MR. BAXTER: I regret to state that owing to circumstances which are, no doubt, known to my hon. and gallant Friend, but which it would be needless to explain to the House now, the Second Class Naval Reserve has proved a failure, only nine men having enrolled themselves.

ARMY—MARRIED SUBALTERNS.

QUESTION.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will object to extending to married subalterns and all Regimental Staff officers the same indulgence already afforded to other married officers in respect to passages on board ship for a female servant, from which the former are at present excluded by Clause 136 of the Army Circular of 1870?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the object of the Circular was to extend to those officers, who were entitled to have male servants kept at the public expense, the power of substituting female servants in certain cases. Subalterns were not allowed to have any servants at all.

ARMY RESERVE FUND.—QUESTION.

MR. STAPLETON asked the Secretary of State for War, If there is any objection to lay upon the Table a Return of the Army Reserve Fund and the Guards' Reserve Fund, showing from whence they are derived and how applied?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, he thought the Paper furnished that morning would provide his hon. Friend with the information he wished. If it did not, he would give him any further information he might desire.

FOREIGNERS SERVING IN OUR MERCHANT SERVICE.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the President of the Board of Trade to state, If the 20,158 Foreign Seamen, mentioned in the Return presented on the 15th February, are Able Seamen; and, if so, to state the number of Foreigners in addition thereto serving in other capacities in the Merchant Service?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, the 20,158 foreign seamen mentioned in the Return included all foreigners serving in our merchant service, whether acting as seamen, or as cooks, stokers, &c. He could not discover that the Board of Trade had any information as to how many of the 20,158 were able seamen.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES.

QUESTIONS.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the First Commissioner of Works, When it is intended to remove the block of houses between Parliament Street and King Street, facing the New Home and Colonial Offices?

MR. AYRTON replied that a portion of the block to which the noble Lord referred was now occupied by public offices, which were very much needed, and the rest was occupied by special arrangement; so that the whole block could be pulled down when the new Home and Colonial Offices were erected. The back part of the block had been already pulled down to admit of the work being carried on. No object would be gained by pulling down the rest at present, and the pulling of it down would only exhibit the scaffolding and the workmen engaged in the erection of the new buildings.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked whether Parliament Street would be widened?

MR. AYRTON said, that Question involved another important question—namely, whether the Treasury or the public were to give up part of the land which had been purchased at the public expense for the purpose of widening a street. There was no Act of Parliament which directed any part to be so applied; but it was competent to the Government to do what was necessary to have adequate approaches to the Home and Colonial Offices. Those approaches would probably be best made by retaining the land in front of the new offices.

ITALY—THE PAPAL STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the honourable Member for Longford, Whether, as stated in "The Belfast Daily Examiner" of the 27th ult., he has postponed his Motion concerning the "occupation by the Italian troops of the Papal States," in view of the "probable action" of "The National Assembly of France," in favour of the Papacy, and in consequence of a meeting held at Archbishop Manning's on the 23rd of February?

MR. O'REILLY said, in reply to his hon. Friend, he would beg to read a statement which he made in his place in the House, on the occasion of postponing the Motion to which the question referred. He said that—"He did it in compliance with the urgent representation of many Irish Members that, the Papers having been delivered late on Thursday, it was impossible to study them by Friday afternoon; that many Irish Members being absent from town, could not be present on the day originally fixed for the discussion of the Motion."

With regard to the statement in a Belfast newspaper to which his hon. Friend referred, he had no opportunity of seeing any such statement, except that when he was listening to a debate in the House, his hon. Friend the Member for Belfast himself put in his hand what he stated to be a Belfast newspaper. He glanced at the newspaper, and saw enough of it to ascertain that it gave an inaccurate account of several private conversations, and gave rather a report of what might have been said, instead of what was said. He had given his reasons in his place in Parliament for the course he had taken, and he hoped his hon. Friend, and he was sure the House, would excuse him if he declined to give an account of private conversations in his own house or in the house of another.

TRADE MARKS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Under Secretary to the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the great inconvenience occasionally caused by the innocent infringement of Trade Marks; and if he does not think that it would be just to insist upon registration as an essential condition before any claim of damages for infringement of trade marks could be established?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE replied that he was not prepared to deny that inconveniences occurred in the way mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. That was a matter which deserved consideration. This Question, however, was put in a very abstract form, and was not very easy to answer. At the same time, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that a Bill, conceived very much in the spirit of his Question, was introduced three years ago by the late President of the Board of Trade, and he was informed that it met with a very cool reception in the House.

ARMY—FLEETWOOD BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. EASTWICK asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state why, when barracks at other places are overcrowded, those at Fleetwood are kept unoccupied?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, he understood that it was intended to put a regiment in the Fleetwood Barracks, and the reason why they had not been occupied already was that it had not been decided what particular regiment should go there, and as it was undesirable to have two removes they had, consequently, remained empty.

THE HOUSE TAX AND LANDLORDS' INCOME TAX.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that the House Tax and Landlords' Income Tax are now being collected in some parts of the metropolis on the rating of the new Valuation Act, 32 and 33 Vic. c. 67, while by the 43rd section of that Act such rating does not come into force before 6th April, 1871?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that it was necessary to distinguish between valuation and personal rating. It was quite true that the Act did not come into force till the month of April; but it was upon the valuation that the assessment was made, such alterations being allowed as seemed good to the Commissioners. The new valuation had been made under the Act for the convenience of the taxpayers, and the Commissioners had allowed that valuation to be sent in as their valuation, and upon it they had made their assessment.

ARMY—LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. LEA asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any officer in receipt of full pay and on active service can obtain leave of absence for several months at a time, in order to prosecute political objects; if so, whether such leave is granted by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, without consultation with the Secretary of State for War?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, leave of absence, within the rules laid down by the Queen's regulations, is granted to officers by His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief without reference to me. I do not know what my hon. Friend points to particularly. Members of this House who are in the Army obtain leave during the whole Session of Parliament. With regard to other officers desiring leave, the Commander-in-Chief is guided by considerations of the requirements of the service, and not by any reference to the political objects they may have in view.

IRELAND—STATE OF WESTMEATH.

QUESTIONS.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that the Grand Jury of Westmeath, on Thursday last, passed a resolution to the effect—

"That the measures hitherto adopted by Her Majesty's Government for the suppression of agrarian and other crimes involving intimidation have proved wholly ineffective, and that an immediate remedy is urgently demanded for a state of things so truly described by the Chief Secretary for Ireland as 'intolerable';"

whether Chief Justice Monaghan, in his charge to the said Grand Jury, described the state of affairs in that county as "going from bad to worse;" and, if it is correct that the resident magistrate at Trim, the assize town of Meath, informed Her Majesty's Judges he had received trustworthy information that they were to be attacked on their journey from Trim to Mullingar, the assize town of Westmeath; and whether he reported such information to Dublin Castle?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I will give to the noble Lord the most accurate information in my power with reference to the three Questions he has put to me. With regard to the first, I have no authority in my possession with respect to the presentment of the Grand Jury or their resolution except a telegram which was sent to Her Majesty's Government; but, from what I have seen in the newspapers, I conclude that the telegram is textually a transcript of the substance of that document, a fact of which I was not aware during the debate. The quotation of the noble Lord is correct, with this exception—which is of some consequence—that it does not contain the words "wholly ineffective"—the expression used by the Grand Jury—but "wholly insufficient." That is the only point on which the noble Lord's quotation is not accurate. The telegram is quite at the noble Lord's service if he likes. With respect to the Charge of Chief Justice Monaghan, the noble Lord is doubtless aware that the Charge of the Chief Justice is not an official document—that there is no report of it which we should be justified in attempting to hold the Chief Justice bound by, in case a mistake had been made in the report. Still, a report of that Charge is in my hands, which I believe has been made with as much care as possible, and in that report, substantially corresponding with what the noble Lord has stated, the Chief Justice says—

"When I was last here, gentlemen, the county was in an unsettled state, but I am bound to say that things are proceeding from bad to worse."

In answer to the third Question, as to the resident magistrate at Trim—

"Whether it is correct that the resident magistrate at Trim, the assize town of Meath, informed Her Majesty's Judges he had received trustworthy information that they were to be attacked on their journey from Trim to Mullingar, the assize town of Westmeath; and whether he reported such information to Dublin Castle?"— the resident magistrate made a report, I believe, to officers of Her Majesty's Government upon that subject, and stated that he had received information to the effect that the Judges were to be attacked on their journey from Trim to Mullingar. With regard to this being trustworthy information, I believe it to have been trustworthy so far as respects the character of the person from whom it was received. I particularly dwell on the phrase—"so far as concerns the character of the person from whom it was received." But with regard to its being trustworthy information in the sense of its being information with a great probable appearance of truth, I am bound to say we consider it was not trustworthy in that sense, because there were several indications in the report itself which appeared to show that it was not worthy of belief. Notwithstanding that, in consequence of the very fact of such a report having reached the Crown Solicitor, communication was made to Dublin Castle, and special precautions were taken upon the road by which the Judges proceeded, which, however, was not the route indicated in the report.

The Charge of the Chief Justice may be examined by the noble Lord if he desires it.

NAVY—“MEGÆRA.”—QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty or, in his absence, the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's transport ship “Megara” has just been commissioned to take out to Sydney 33 officers and 350 men, with several hundred tons of stores, whereas she is only qualified to carry 14 officers and 220 men; that half the officers' mess gear is on deck from want of stowage room; that she is moreover in an unseaworthy condition, leaking from stem to stern, and that notwithstanding the distinct assurance of her commander that the ship was not ready for sea, the Admiral told him “he must go, as he had orders to send him off?”

MR. BAXTER: It is true, Sir, that Her Majesty's ship Megara was commissioned to take out to Australia 33 officers and 350 men (inclusive of her own complement), with 400 tons of cargo. It is not true that she was only calculated to carry 14 officers and 220 men; on the contrary, she has taken to the Cape 22 officers, 425 men, 26 women, and 56 children, in addition to her own crew; and from Jamaica to Cape Coast Castle 18 officers, 400 men, 12 women, and 12 children, also exclusive of her complement. She has also frequently carried over 400 tons of cargo. There is not a word of truth in the statement that she is unseaworthy and leaking from stem to stern, nor in the further statement that the men had twice protested against going to sea. With respect to the accommodation of the officers, I have to state to the House that I have this morning seen Vice Admiral Elliott, Commander-in-Chief at Sheerness, who authorizes me to say that, in his opinion, it was amply sufficient. Regarding what passed at Plymouth between Admiral Codrington and Captain Thrupp, I prefer quoting the account of the conversation given by the Admiral himself, and received at Whitehall to-day—

“After dusk Captain Thrupp again came to me from the Megara and asked if the ship might wait till next day (Sunday) morning. As he acknowledged having received the stores I had ordered for the ship's use, I inquired his reasons for remaining, as there was a fine, fair wind for the ship. He said that the ship's decks were lumbered up with casks and packages which had not yet been stowed away. It appeared that they were not public stores, but provisions, &c., for the mess of the officers. Considering that after fitting out for the eastward the ship had been two days in this port, it appeared to me that the officers might have procured and stowed away their own sea stock before then, and as it could not take half an hour's attention on their part to do it now, I did not see sufficient reason to authorize the Megara remaining another day. I told Captain Thrupp that if the weather was bad, or the wind from the south-west, I knew the Admiralty would not wish him to go to sea; but that as the weather was fine, and a nice fair wind blowing, I did not think the Admiralty would be pleased if, without any defects to be taken in hand, he remained another day in the Sound, as it was a great object for the Megara to get clear out of the Channel. I may add that I did not give Captain Thrupp any order to sail on that evening, though I certainly advised him as I stated above.”

What really caused the inconvenience and discomfort was the very large quantity of private baggage and stores belonging to the officers and men taken in at Sheerness and Plymouth after the ship had completed her loading, and for which sufficient allowance had not been made. The condition of some of the main-deck ports, moreover, seems to have been imperfect, and in consequence the water washed from side to side, wetting the things which had not been stowed away. As to the real condition of the ship, her readiness to go to sea, &c., perhaps the House would like to hear me read two or three sentences from a letter dated Saturday, from Rear Admiral Forbes, at Queenstown—

“I have to report that, in compliance with their Lordships' directions by telegraph, of yesterday, which I found on my return to Queenstown, I have carefully inspected the Megara this morning, and have already telegraphed to their Lordships my opinion that the ship is fit for the service on which she is employed. . . . All the decks are much lumbered; but she is very ill-stowed, and much clearance may be made when this is better done. . . . The ports are now mended and re-lined, and new ones placed where necessary. The main deck is also inconveniently crowded for sleeping; by clearing out the troop deck below as suggested, many men now berthed above may be berthed there. . . . The result of my inspection is that the Megara has been inconveniently crowded with cargo, considering the quantity of stores and effects accompanying the officers and men she takes out; that landing about 100 tons weight would rid her of this evil; and that the officers taking passage have also been crowded considering the length of the voyage. If the number of them were reduced by four the remainder would also be relieved.”

Orders have been sent to Queenstown accordingly.

Mr. Gladstone

CLERKS OF CONVICT PRISONS.

COLONEL GILPIN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the sum of £450, voted in the Civil Service Estimates 1869-70 and 1870-71, for increasing the pay of the Clerks in Convict Prisons, has been disbursed as voted; if not, what has become of it?

MR. STANSFELD said, in reply, that the sum of £450 for increasing the pay of the clerks in the convict prisons had been inserted in the Estimates of 1869-70, but was not required or expended in that year. It was also asked for in 1870-1 by an error. The result was that, as in 1869-70, the amount would be returned to the Exchequer.

EDUCATION—NATIONAL SCHOOL ENDOWMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. CORRANCE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether Clause 32, a. 1, Excess of Grant over School Fees, &c. does exclude endowments or like receipts from other sources than those specified—namely, subscriptions and payments from a School Board?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that the sums which could be written against the Government grants were confined to school fees and voluntary contributions. He might, however, remind the hon. Gentleman that whereas, under the old Code, a reduction was made in the grant on account of the endowment, under the new Code there was no such reduction.

MUSIC HALLS.—QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the music halls in London are allowed to give entertainments on Ash Wednesday whilst all theatres within the Metropolitan district are compelled to close their houses for theatrical representations on that day; and, further to ask, if he will take steps to place music halls and theatres on the same footing?

MR. BRUOE, in reply, said, there was no difference. Music-halls, as well as theatres, were forbidden to be opened on Christmas Day, Good Friday, and Ash Wednesday.

ARMY—DOUBLE COMMISSIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. DENT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that several Officers on full pay in Her Majesty's Regular Forces, as well as some Colonels in the Volunteer Service, also hold Commissions in the Yeomanry Cavalry; and, whether the restriction that no Commanding Officer of Volunteers shall hold at the same time two Commissions, or, if he does, one of them must be of a purely honorary character, is applicable also to the holding of Commissions in the Yeomanry Cavalry as well as the Volunteers?

MR. CARDWELL was understood to say that some time since the practice of issuing two commissions to the same officers had been discontinued, and it was intended, within a very short time, to require officers who held two commissions to elect between them.

EMIGRATION—THE CIRCULAR DESPATCH.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Answers have been received from the Colonies to the Circular Despatch, dated 14th February 1870, as to Emigration; and if he intends to lay these Answers upon the Table of the House?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, in reply, that answers had been received from all the Colonies to the Circular in question; they had been forwarded to the Emigration Commissioners for their Report, which Report, giving a summary of their contents, he would lay on the Table, and if the hon. Gentleman would communicate with him he would consider whether it would be desirable to print any of the answers in extenso.

EDUCATION—SCHOOL ATTENDANCES.

QUESTIONS.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he has any objection to alter the Revised Code, Article 19, so as to render it unnecessary that the 250 attendances should all be at the same school in any case where it be proved to the satisfaction of the Council that a scholar has attended more schools than one in consequence of the bonâ fide removal of his parents?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had very attentively considered the question: but the Department would feel it almost impossible to make the change. He thought he could convince the hon. Gentleman that it would be out of their power to make any arrangement by which the attendance of the scholar, if transferred from one school to another, could be taken into account. There were two difficulties in the way. In the first place, although it was very much to the credit of English managers and schoolmasters that they could be relied upon, yet in some cases there was necessity for inquiries which would be made more difficult by this proposition. And then it would be exceedingly hard to know how to apportion the grants between the schools. Besides this, a possible change of school was considered in making the grant, and an increase of 50 per cent was given in consequence for 250 attendances. It would be necessary to re-consider the money grant if the number of attendances was diminished.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY asked, When the Returns which he had moved for on this subject will be circulated; and whether care will not be taken that the Revised Code shall not come into full operation until this question has been discussed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that the Returns had left the Department the very morning after the right hon. Gentleman had moved for them, and they would be circulated as soon as possible. With regard to the second part of the Question, the Act of Parliament clearly laid down that one month was the time required for the Code to lie on the Table before it should be regarded as approved. Personally, he would be glad of an opportunity of explaining any portions of the Code, and as two or three points would be raised to-morrow he trusted he would then have that opportunity.

IRELAND—GRAND JURY OF WESTMEATH.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not in his place, he would put to the Prime Minister the Question he had intended to ask of the noble Marquess. He wished to know, Whether the right hon. Gentleman will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Resolution of the Grand Jury of Westmeath at the present Assizes: and, whether it is the intention of the Government to comply with their request for the application of an immediate remedy to a state of things which the Grand Jury agree with him in describing as intolerable?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard, Sir, to laying on the Table the resolution come to by the Grand Jury of the county of Westmeath during the present Assizes, I presume that resolution is an official document, and I therefore see no difficulty whatsoever in its being laid on the Table. As to the intention of the Government to apply immediate remedies to the evils existing in that county, undoubtedly the Government have taken, and will continue to take, the course which they deem to be best calculated to bring about there a sound and satisfactory state of things.

METROPOLIS—CAB FARES.—QUESTION.

MR. EYKYN asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to a decision given in the Westminster Police Court with respect to Cab Fares, to which he had already called his attention, Whether he is prepared to take any steps during the present Session to render more clear the position of the public and the cabowners in connection with those fares?

MR. BRUCE replied that on the following or the next day amended regulations dealing with the subject would appear. He might also take that opportunity of stating that, inasmuch as he considered what was called the free trade experiment had already been sufficiently tried, and he was bound to say with no substantial success, he thought it would be convenient that the fares should now be fixed. He proposed, therefore, to fix them at the rate at which, with a very few exceptions, they had been fixed by the free action of cabowners themselves. A few experiments had been tried at somewhat higher fares with a better class of vehicles; but the public had given but little encouragement to those experiments, and the old fares had to be resorted to—that was to say, 2s. per hour in the case of the ordinary four-wheeled cab, and 6d. per mile, subject, of course, to the arrangement with respect to the first two miles which had been some time in operation; and in the case of Hansom cabs 2s. 6d. per hour and 6d. per mile. He felt bound to add that he expected there would have been more enterprize on the part of the cabowners, and more encouragement given on the part of the public. He wished to take that opportunity of stating that, so far as he and the police were concerned, everything had been done to fulfil the promise which had been made to the House—that all cabs should be removed from stands which were not considered to come up to the proper standard. He had not in his hand the Return of the number of cabs which had been struck off last year; but he believed, including Hansoms and four-wheelers, it amounted to above 1,500.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cardwell.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the expenditure necessary for the national defences and the other demands on the Exchequer do not at present justify any Vote of Public Money for the extinction of Purchase in the Army," said, the Bill for the Army Regulations, which was explained to the House on Thursday, the 16th of February, was so large in its scope, and so extended in its character, dealing radically (and by that he meant extending to root and branch) with the interests of the Army, from the Commander-in-Chief down to the lowest private soldier, and to the recruits who have not yet even attained to that rank, that anyone with less power of lucid exposition than the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill might well shrink from dealing with the whole subject in a single speech. Feeling, therefore, the difficulty and the inconvenience of having all the questions of the Bill mixed up together in one debate, he had, with great diffidence, given Notice of the Amendment which stood in his name, in order that the most important point of the Bill—the abolition of purchase—might be discussed separately, and that the opinion of the House might be taken upon it. The question of purchase was not a party question. All Army matters, in his opinion, and also in that of the House, were not party questions; and now that the House of Commons was exercising more and more influence upon Army affairs, it was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the Army that party considerations should be excluded. As one who had belonged to the military profession he desired to pay his acknowledgments to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) for the liberal and just conclusion he had come to—namely, that the full amount which officers had paid for their commissions should be returned to them. Recognizing the justice with which the Government had approached the subject, and their wish to act fairly and honourably towards the officers of the Army, he felt certain that they would find themselves engaged in an expenditure of money far larger than they now anticipated. The cost of compensating officers in full he estimated at £12,000,000. He had the calculations at hand, but he would not trouble the House with them. They were founded on what was officially set forth as the price of commissions in 1856. A large portion of that sum—namely, £5,000,000 or £6,000,000—ought to be paid back to officers at once, in order to avoid the injustice of having officers in the same rank serving with different rates of pay, and because the conditions of the service had been altered. They would no longer be the same as when the men paid their money. Again, an adequate and liberal system of full-pay retirement would have to be provided, in order to give the same amount of promotion which was provided for under the present system. In the calculations he had made he found that for a retiring system in the Royal Artillery £500,000 a-year would be required for that one item. Lastly, in order to reap any advantage from the change it would be necessary to revise the whole scale of pay and allowances to officers. In framing new regulations for the Army, as the Government were now doing, it was first of all necessary to ascertain the weak points—to find out what was amiss, and what required to be put right. Now, the universal opinion—and he believed everybody would acknowledge it to be the truth—was, that the point where the Army failed was that it was not well put together; but however well it might answer in detail, it was not one joint machine which worked harmoniously and satisfactorily together. The best example we could have of such a well-organized Army was the North German Army, in which there was no less than eight Crowned Heads and Royal Princes, all holding separate and supreme commands. It was difficult to suppose that they were all men of marked military genius or talent, and we must, therefore, conclude that the regulations of the Army were so perfect as to render it independent of what a less perfect and complete organization would require. A force could only be properly called an Army when it was bound together by an organization consisting of staff, commissariat, transport, and medical departments; and although we might possess the separate parts of an Army in perfection, unless they were bound together by an efficient organization, all the splendid material which we had would be useless and unavailable. The Bill, while it called for this vast expenditure, left us no better in this respect than before. There existed a strong conviction that this Army Service organization—which was now called the Control—was quite insufficient, and might prove inefficient. There was a belief that it was both, and bearing in mind the lesson learnt in the Crimea, when there was a complete collapse of this department, and our Army was left to starve at a distance of only seven miles from its base of operations, we could not wonder at the feeling which existed on this point. This feeling would certainly continue to exist until the Control department were proved to work well. Such practical proof could only be obtained by putting 30,000 or 40,000 men into camp, and throwing them absolutely on their own resources; not at Aldershot, where, from constant repetition, everything became mechanical, but in some open country, where cavalry, artillery, and infantry could be manoeuvred in line, taking up fresh positions, and changing their ground every day. In this way the Staff might learn their duty, which, owing to ill-judged parsimony, they had hitherto never had an opportunity of learning in the field—the only place where it could properly be learnt. The benefit of thus learning it was enormous, and the cost trivial when compared with what it was now proposed to do. The Prussians, a remarkably economical nation, yet thought it worth their while to spend £75,000 a-year on their camps of instruction, and the advantage derived from them had been shown in the perfect harmony with which the whole machinery of their Army worked in actual warfare. Real extravagance it was, indeed, after spending millions, to grudge the last thousands which were required for the final completion of the work. Infinite pains had always been taken by us, and with complete success, to render perfect the several separate branches of the service—the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, and whenever you examined them in detail, whether by regiments, by troops, by companies, or by batteries, you would find them nothing less than first-rate. If you saw them in the field, if you examined their interior economy—by that he meant the relations which existed between the officers and the men—you would find them equally good and satisfactory. Physically, our soldiers were men superior to any men in any Army in the world, and if you look at them morally, in their disposition to obey their officers with readiness and alacrity, or to obey the laws of the country, you will find no Army like the English Army. The regimental system had never failed in the English Army, and nowhere was it more severely tried than in the Crimea. General Trochu bore testimony that—“ l'infanterie Anglaise est la plus redoutable de l'Europe. Heureusement il n'y en a pas beaucoup. Et c'est une opinion que des observations personnelles, impartiales, faites au milieu de l'armée Anglaise pendant la guerre, ont depuis confirmé dans mon esprit. ”

Where could you find more valuable evidence than this—given by an impartial observer, who watched the English Army during the time of its greatest trials and disasters? The English cavalry and artillery were as good as the infantry, if taken separately or examined by themselves; but General Trochu would never have gone on to say that we knew how to combine these forces together by a Staff organization of transport and commissariat. That was precisely the point in which we failed, and it was precisely the point where the Bill before the House proposed to do nothing, while it called for an expenditure of

£12,000,000 to remedy that which was admitted to be the best feature in our system. The regimental system was good because it was founded on sound principles. The men who joined the Army did so because they believed themselves more fitted for the Army than for civil life. Therefore, the civil community was not, to any great extent, injured by the standing Army. Some would even say that it was improved by it, because you took away from it men who, if left without military discipline, might become idle and unprofitable, and even worse. It was, of course, not the duty of Government to provide employment for people; but it was their duty to allow the various qualities of all men to be usefully employed, whether these qualities lay in the direction of roving, restless activity, or quiet and patient industry; the first of these qualities fitted men for the Army, the latter for civil life. And here he would say a word about competitive examinations, which were already very numerous, but which the new regulations for the Army would increase to a most alarming extent. There were qualities required in an officer which no examiner could ever bring to light, but which a skilful general in the field would know well how to discover, and turn to the best possible account for the good of the service. But by testing all men by one uniform standard of bookwork examination we ran the risk of shutting out the very men we should endeavour to bring into the service. He had said that the private soldiers joined the Army because they liked it. The same thing applied to the officers. They also joined the Army because they liked it, and they were so anxious to serve their Queen and country that they were ready to pay down a large sum of money on entering the Army, and to add to that sum at each successive step in rank, up to the grade of general, which was acquired without purchase, but which, when once obtained, gave better pay, especially when they were employed, but which entailed forfeiture of all previously deposited money. The system might be explained by question and answer—“Why do officers leave the Army before becoming generals?” “Because when once that step is taken their purchase money is forfeited.” Again—“Why do the best officers remain, and forfeit their money?” “Because they know that they will be employed as generals, and will receive the extra pay.” “Why do the least good officers leave the Army before they become generals?” “Because they know that they will not be employed, and will only get ordinary general's pay.” Here, then, you had an excellent system of self-supporting retirement, to replace which you would have to provide £500,000 a-year—calculating this on the scale of retirement for the Artillery. This expenditure would then bring the other branches of the service to the position of the Royal Artillery and Engineers—a position so unsatisfactory that the Committee appointed by the right hon. Gentleman himself, reported that “both these corps are gradually approaching a state which may seriously affect their efficiency.” It was now proposed, at a cost of £8,000,000 or £12,000,000, to place the rest of the Army in the very difficulty which the Government were at their wits' end to know how to get out of in the non-purchase corps—namely, stagnation from want of promotion. In the Army List it would be found that the first 19 lieutenants in the Royal Artillery had each seen 14 years' service. They entered about the age of 20. You have, therefore, subaltern officers of 34 years of age serving in the Artillery without the smallest hope of being promoted to a battery. The importance of having young officers for regimental service could not be over-estimated, and if the right hon. Gentleman were to give the Army the greatest scholars in Christendom for officers they would not be equal to those men of ordinary attainment who had the benefit of youth on their side. Here was an instance of the character of this Bill, which, in his opinion, was complete for destruction, and most incomplete for construction and re-organization. He wished to call the attention of the House to another matter. The number of men who were candidates for entering the Army far exceeded the number of commissions to be given. The result, therefore, was that the country had the command and pick of the market. During the last 20 years the authorities had been continually requiring more and more from the officers. They were examined on first entering, and again at each successive step in rank, and they were told that in spite of all their purchase money they should not move up unless they passed those examinations satisfactorily, and then only each in his turn. There were required from them more professional knowledge, closer attendance at duty, and a greater sacrifice of liberty. The reins of discipline being thus drawn tighter than at any former period, so far from having checked the number of men who wished to join regiments, it was found that the number had even increased. The average number of commissions which the Commander-in-Chief had to dispose of was 300 in a year. There were at that moment 500 young men who had passed their examination, and were waiting to enter the service, and yet the Commander-in-Chief most wisely checked men as much as possible from going up to be examined till there were commissions vacant for them. To show how large was the reservoir from which the supply of officers was drawn he would mention this fact, that during the last six months 225 young gentleman had been allowed to note their names to enter the Army; but so little was the chance of an adequate number of vacancies occurring for years to come that no one over the age of 14 was allowed to enter his name. And a curious fact remained to be told—namely, that the regiments which were the strictest, and had a reputation for being thoroughly efficient, were those which were most sought for in the service. Now, opponents to the purchase system might argue as much as they liked about inefficiency of officers, but they could not get over that fact. The more that was exacted professionally from the officers the more anxious they were to come into the service. It was the fault of the Government, therefore, if officers were inefficient. But he denied the fact of their inefficiency, and he would presently prove that they were, on the contrary, most efficient. The only well-sustained charge against the officers was that they looked too much like gentlemen. There was a grave suspicion that they came from the aristocratic classes of the country; but this, like most suspicions, was by no means founded on fact. They came from all classes. There was no special caste in the Army. That they behaved like gentlemen might be inferred from the fact that the Queen's Commission, even to an ensign, was a passport to the best society—

intellectual or social. There existed in England the largest leisure class of any country in the world. Men rose every year by thousands to the rank of what is commonly termed and accepted as gentlemen. There were professions without end which led a man up to this position in life, and with education and some affluence a man was soon supposed to belong to the aristocratic classes. The sons of these men might not have the same tastes, and perhaps not the abilities, of their fathers, and might not follow them in their vocation; but there was a profession open to them, and, indeed, to all men of moderate means—a profession honourable in itself, and in which for those who succeeded there were honours and rewards which far exceeded anything which money could procure. For those who failed there was the consolation that they, too, would have succeeded had the same opportunities fortunately come to them; and for all, the feeling that they belonged to a profession which stamped a man a gentleman—a profession in which there was a fair field and no favour; in which a man, if he fulfilled the conditions of the service, was as certain to rise as that the sun itself will rise—a profession in which he need seek no man's favour or protection; need not bow before his commanding officer or induce his friends to hang about the lobbies of the Commander-in-Chief, or, worse still, to intrigue among political Members in this House. It was now proposed to alter all this, and to substitute for it a system of pure selection, which meant favouritism, while they were told that such a system could not and would not work. This was done in spite of the advice of the Commander-in-Chief, who gave it as his opinion that the plan would not work, and in spite of the noble Marquess, formerly Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), who said in 1867 that under the condition of things existing in the House of Commons, "the system of selection was impossible," and in the face of the practical experience of almost every officer in the Army. The Secretary of State had said that there was a danger of falling back. Now, there was a danger which the House must be very circumspect if they expected to escape from it. The moment they extinguished purchase it cropped up again. When a man had money he was certain to use it for his own advantage. In the non-purchase regiments which they had created within the last 10 years, the system was as completely established as in any other. The system had grown up in the Indian service, where it was recognized and worked well; but, unfortunately, it did not advance promotion so rapidly. The Secretary for War said, in order to prevent that, they must exercise a great deal of secrecy; they must have confidential reports; they must have accurate information as to the character of every officer; they must know his moral behaviour; and, in addition to that, they must have penalties to prevent corruption and the same system which once prevailed in the Parliamentary history. The right hon. Gentleman said they would never know a successor until his predecessor had left the service. Now by that system they would destroy one of the best features of the service—namely, a feeling of confidence that, serve where men might, in the most distant part of the globe, or under the eyes of the Commander-in-Chief, whether they served brilliantly before the enemy or quietly at some out-of-the-way station, their regimental promotion yet went on steadily. It was not fair to say that because a man had had the good fortune to see service before an enemy he was, therefore, to be advanced regimentally before those who had not been equally fortunate. And yet that was the popular view of the case. He wished hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House would look into the system of selection, which would entail nothing less than destruction on the service. He wished to fortify the House with the opinion of some eminent men as to the character of our officers, and of the system which established the relations which existed between them and the men. Sir John Burgoyne, who had the largest experience of the English Army of any man alive, said, writing on the 12th of February, 1871—

“I would venture to assert that no Army in the world is better officered regimentally than that of Great Britain, and that in no respect would the abandonment of the purchase system tend to improve it. The impression that in proportion to the means possessed by an officer he can, by purchase, obtain promotion over the heads of his brother officers, is an error. No officer obtains promotion by purchase without it being certified that he is worthy of it.”

That sentence of Field Marshal Burgoyne ought to be published in every newspaper in the kingdom, and he was not sure that he should not have it advertised daily in the papers. The public were in great ignorance on this subject. They ought to know that it was the law of the Army that no officer was promoted without being properly certified. He did complain of Members of that House, who had taken advantage of the ignorance of the public out-of-doors to represent the officers as inefficient, and the purchase system as very different from what it really was. The public were about to pay an immense sum to remedy an imaginary evil, and he was certain if they understood the matter properly they would never sanction the proceedings of the Government with respect to this Bill. That was not only an imaginary evil, but they were doing away with a system which had worked admirably, and substituting another which would not work so well. He would now quote what was said by a French Marshal when he came to see the English Army, in combination with the Army of his own country, in the Crimea. He was at the head of an Army whose officers rose from the ranks, and who were in consequence always associated on equal terms with the men whom it was their business to command, and he contrasted that Army with one whose officers only in exceptional cases rose from the ranks, and where the system of purchase prevailed. He saw in the one Army that the officers were zealous, painstaking, and constantly anxious for the welfare of their men, and the consequence was that the men, seeing the deep interest which their officers took in them, obeyed them with alacrity, and executed the orders given them with steadiness and zeal. On the other hand, from constant familiarity there was an absence of respect on the part of the men for their officers, and the French Marshal said to Lord Raglan—“Whatever you do, take my advice, and never alter the system which establishes the relations now existing between the officers and men in your Army.” When we remembered how continually the superior French officers warned us about this, we could not now fail to understand and see that thoughtful men among them saw signs before them of that collapse of their regimental and Army system, and of the good relations existing between the officers and men which had occurred in the recent war, where officers had failed to lead, and men refused to follow. Respecting and admiring the French Army as he had always done, he sincerely grieved at the calamities which had befallen that brave nation. An event occurred in the Crimea, the history of which was familiar to every Member in the House. He was a spectator of the charge of the Light Cavalry Brigade along the valley of Balaklava. Four armies witnessed that deed of chivalry, and when the Crimea was forgotten that deed would be still remembered, because it was a deed of self-devotion and discipline unequalled in history. Into the very heart and centre of the Russian Army those cavalry regiments carried their swords, and cut down the enemy at their guns. The French exclaimed—C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre. These were thought wise words at the time, but they were not wise. For it was magnificent, and it was war, and war in its finest aspect; for it displayed true courage, which consists in this—confidence and reliance between man and man, between regiment and regiment. One will actuated the whole of that armed force, and no man doubted what his neighbour would do. It was an act to inspire a nation to turn soldiers, and had there been anything so magnificent in the war between France and Prussia, our old allies the French would not now have to deplore the loss of their country. He would now quote the Duke of Wellington. The Duke of Wellington knew the value of his officers.

"Nothing," he thought, "could surpass, or, indeed, equal, the British troops in the field. The sense of honour among officers existed in no other service to the same degree. He felt always confident when he put a detachment into a post, that they would maintain it against any force until they dropped."

This passage occurred in Lord Palmerston's Tour to Paris in 1815. Now, from that day to this there had been no falling off in the British officers. They were as good now as they were then. It had been the custom of opponents to the purchase system to found their arguments in favour of its abolition upon the alleged inefficiency of the officers of the Army. It had been his object in the course of his remarks to give to the House the testimony of eminent men who held very different views from those which had found favour with the uninstructed people out-of-doors, and he hoped he had succeeded through those quotations in vindicating the Army from the charge brought against it by the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), who said that it was a system in which efficiency was sacrificed to idle show. One more quotation he would give, because it bore directly upon the purchase system. The words quoted were those of The Times' Correspondent, Dr. Russell, written on February 24. He said, speaking of General Blumenthal, that not only was he—

"In favour of a well-regulated system of purchase, which he considered had worked wonderfully well in the British Army, but that he would gladly see it introduced into the Prussian Army, if it were possible, and regretted that it was not so, in consequence of its composition."

Dr. Russell, himself a high authority on Army matters, for he had seen the armies of every nation in Europe and America in the field, went on as follows:—

"General Blumenthal is one of the few officers in foreign armies who understands the question, though there are more in those armies who understand it than there are Members in the House of Commons who equally appreciate its merits and bearing."

He trusted he had avoided all indication of party feeling in the remarks which he had made in support of his Amendment. He had shown that that which they propose to alter, at an enormous cost, was the very part of our military system which should be carefully preserved. The system of selection of officers was not so good as the system of rejection which was now possessed, and which might be more freely used. He had shown that we had admirable materials, but did not know how to use them, and we were going ignorantly to make a great change which we had not sufficiently considered or weighed. This country might well and properly expend any amount of money in making itself secure, and maintaining a feeling of honourable security and tranquillity. But he held it to be the bounden duty of Members in the House to remonstrate to the utmost of their power against acts of mistaken and mischievous extravagance. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

COLONEL WHITE: I rise with extreme humility to second the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend. Knowing, as I do, the extreme ability and energy of her Majesty's Government, I regret to find myself obliged to take an active part in opposition to them, especially on a question like this, on which I know all their energy and ability has been signally brought to bear. But I feel I should be wanting in the commonest honesty and courage if I did not express my opinion that, great and talented as they are, Her Majesty's Government have, on this question, condescended to regard the most colossal interest that could affect the nation as secondary to their own party interests. Hon. Members should bear in mind, and perpetually repeat to themselves the questions—What is the meaning of this Bill? Why do we discuss it? For this reason—It means that, in consequence of recent events abroad Englishmen have been rudely and suddenly awakened to the awful fact that their country has been, and still is, in a position of danger—that while other nations have been active and awake, we, in a military sense, have been slothful and asleep—lulled, in all probability, by what one must almost begin to think was too long a period of uninterrupted prosperity. This country is in a position of danger, because I assume that any country which is, practically, totally undefended, is in danger. Now, how have Her Majesty's Government approached the fact? Have they come forward eagerly and readily, as they ought to have done, being fully alive to the emergency? Have they said to the country—"Rely on us; do your duty, and we will do ours, and replace England in the position from which she never ought to have stirred?" No, they have done nothing of this sort; but they have faltered, and hesitated, and looked behind them, and they have studied their majority, their opinions, their prejudices, and their party interests more than they have studied the vital interests of England. I think, at the same time, however, that they have shown extreme courage. It was most courageous in the right hon. Gentleman to come down to the House, as he did the other night, and propose a Vote of £8,000,000, as he put it, but more likely to be £14,000,000 before all was done with—I will call it £10,000,000, and throw it into the lap of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). With £10,000,000, what might not have been done to organize such a system of defence throughout the land as would make future generations look back to 1871, and its reforms, as the time and the work from whence England's perfect security dated! And yet they propose to waste that enormous sum by laying it at the feet of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs. Truly that hon. Gentleman may congratulate himself with all justice upon being by far the most successful man of the day. The question of the abolition of purchase has been, I believe, a hobby of his, and of his honoured and talented father before him, for many years. In point of fact, it has been a family mania, and it is now proposed that we should devote some £10,000,000 to the furtherance of that mania. In the face of the greater and more important demands of this country for a generous outlay, the question of the abolition of purchase is of secondary importance. It is a minor detail, to be dealt with or left alone as the wisdom of Parliament and the country may decide; but that it should be regarded as the solution of England's difficulties appears altogether incredible. What is the question of purchase? I do not wish to be misunderstood: I do not stand here as a defender of the system of purchase in the abstract; but I do stand here to protest against this outlay for this purpose at this time. I grant that purchase may be said to be a great anomaly; but I think the good will outweigh the evil. Half of the objections against the purchase system are objections of a sentimental nature, and I believe the House will be prepared to admit that sentimental grievances are very often the worst under which people can labour. It is objected, as my hon. Friend said just now, with partial truth, that the profession of a soldier is closed to all except the wealthy classes, and that, in consequence, a feeling of discontent and ill-will has sprung up throughout the country. If such a feeling has sprung up I admit it to be an evil. Again, it is objected that a soldier is trained to face death, and he should never be called on to face death with a consciousness that his death may either ruin or impoverish his wife and children. There is some force in that objection certainly; but I am not at all aware that it ever prevented an English officer from doing his duty. Again, it is objected that the rank and position of an officer should never be degraded by being made a subject of sale and barter. That, I contend, is purely a sentimental objection. Lastly, it is objected that an incompetent man, and a wealthy man, may obtain superior rank over his more competent but more needy brother officer. But have you no good word to say for the purchase system? Is there nothing to be said in its defence? Having had some 15 years' experience of its working myself, I can say for one that there is much to be urged in its favour. Denounce it as hon. Gentlemen may at Birmingham, Manchester, and elsewhere, it has officered our Army for centuries with a class of men who have made the term "an English officer" and "a gentleman" to be synonymous, and to be understood all over the world. It has officered our armies for centuries with a class of men, whom, though you will not believe it—we soldiers know it—the British soldier as at present constituted prefers to obey willingly, to serve cheerfully, and to follow devotedly. The British officer belongs to a class who have led the armies of England—as I very much doubt their successors will lead them—to a class whose memory defies you to dare to detract either from their character or efficiency. There are two points in connection with this subject upon which I would especially wish to touch. The first is that which relates to selection. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned the matter the other night; but I would desire to have some more definite explanation from the right hon. Gentleman of the point than he has yet given. The right hon. Gentleman has thrown down a challenge to the House to prove that it is possible to reorganize the Army of England until the system of purchase has been abolished. I now beg to throw down a counter challenge to the right hon. Gentleman, and I defy him, or anyone else, to carry out the principle of selection with anything like satisfaction to the country. I should like to know upon what basis the right hon. Gentleman founds this system of selection. Is it to be an exaggeration of that most pernicious and unpopular and un-English system of secret reporting, than which I know nothing so malevolent and so disliked among officers of all grades? If so, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman he will strike a vital blow at the position and character of the officers of the English Army. Nay, it must be so, because it would change them from what they are now—manly, generous, and open—into sycophants, fawners, and time-servers. I know the case of a subaltern who got all his hunting leave because he scrupulously supplied his colonel's wife every morning with hot-house flowers. That applies closely to the case in point. I defy any man, not in out-quarters where, as we all know, society moves in such an extremely limited range—not to be affected with serious dislikes, prejudices, or favours. It is impossible that he should not be, and the result would be that in all probability a man who would be an efficient and good officer under one colonel, and who did not succeed in being so under another, would have by this system of secret reporting, the whole of his future prospects blighted, and his character and profession destroyed. The right hon. Gentleman said the other day, that when a man got a hint that he was not to be promoted he would understand that he was not wanted; but I say that that would cast a slight upon his character as well as his professional reputation. The right hon. Gentleman has declined to impose compulsory service upon the country at large, he is too meally-mouthed for that; but he does not shrink from imposing it upon the officers. Supposing three years hence I should wish to sell out, should I not be liable, under the right hon. Gentleman's system, to be told that whereas there then were 250 applicants for permission to sell out, only 200 were to be allowed to do so; and would not that be compulsory service on my part? The right hon. Gentleman told us the other night that the Government declined to introduce the system of compulsory service, because it would be distasteful to the country and altogether objectionable; but he told us, in the same breath, that the Government proposed to empower the Sovereign, under certain circumstances, to make use of compulsory service. It is not difficult to imagine a case. There is a cloud even now in the East of which we may feel the effects in time. It is not an exaggeration to suppose a diplomatic difference—to imagine the withdrawal of our Ambassador at three days' notice, the hasty embarkation of troops, a doubtful naval engagement—and in these days the result of any naval engagement must be doubtful—a force landed on your shores, your capital threatened, and what happens? [A laugh.] An hon. Gentleman laughs; but he would have laughed equally if such a thing had been said of Paris 12 months ago. In such a case what would the right hon. Gentleman do? He would sound the tocsin, and call upon the nation to unite in arms. But with what result? With the example of France staring him in the face there is only one thing to which he could have recourse, and that is to empower my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) to enact the part of M. Gambetta in a balloon, and try and get troops in that way. But suppose you spend some of this precious £8,000,000 in endeavouring to organize a system of thorough defence throughout the length and breadth of the land? I do not say that I advocate compulsory service for every man; but I do advocate distinctly a system of compulsory military training and drill. What could be easier, and what would the effect be of such a system? You would confer not a hardship, but a positive boon upon the country. You would create a fusion of classes. You would physically improve your coming generation; and I venture to say that you would spend your money far more wisely than in trotting after the skirts of the Member for the Border Burghs, and devoting it to the furtherance of his family mania. Upon the subject of the Government proposal respecting the Militia, I have nothing to say further than that I entirely approve it. It is quite right that the officers of the Militia should receive their commission from Her Majesty; that they should consider themselves on the same footing as officers in the Line, and that the men in the Militia should look on themselves as equally as much soldiers as the men in the Line. We should do away with all absurd distinctions of lace, and so on; and should brigade the Militia on every possible occasion with the Regulars. Above all, we should do away with the system of billets. Carry out, in short, your own programme, and you will have the support and approval of every right-thinking man in the country. With regard to the Volunteer force, it may be thought that is a subject which I should leave in the hands of gentlemen more intimately connected with it personally; but I take leave to say that the Volunteers have never had a more sincere admirer and sympathizer than I am, because I think they are by far the most devoted body of men that tread on English soil, and the most ill-used. The only notice the right hon. Gentleman took of the Volunteers the other day was to confer on them the honour of a sneer and a snub. [Mr. CARDWELL: No!] The right hon. Gentleman says "No;" but I remember he told us it was an extremely difficult affair to arrive at the correct number of the Volunteers who would attend at the various reviews. He then indulged us with a personal anecdote of some 60 rounds of ammunition which he saw fired away at Wimbledon, and finally he flashed the Mutiny Act in our faces. Now, I go further than the right hon. Gentleman, and I say that when he applies the Mutiny Act to the Volunteers he should apply it not to the Volunteers when brigaded only, but to Volunteers when outside their house in uniform. When a man puts on a uniform it changes, or ought to change, his nature as much as the chrysalis changes into a butterfly; for the man assumes new responsibilities and obligations. The time to put him under the Mutiny Act is when he leaves his own door in uniform. ["No!"] I venture to say that commanding officers of Volunteers would be willing to agree to that, provided they were first fairly treated. But have you left nothing undone with regard to the Volunteers? Indeed, have you ever done anything for them? Are you aware that you might have hundreds of Volunteers to swell your ranks if you would offer to pay for their uniforms; and are you aware that some of the public parks are closed to the Volunteers? I will not intrude my own opinions upon the House; but I will quote from a letter written by an officer commanding one of the largest battalions of Volunteers in the service. He says, in the first place, that the—

"Crucial difficulty we have to contend with is the dislike which employers have to their men serving in Volunteer corps."

And he further states that—

2 Z 2 [Second Reading—First Night.]

"It is possible to prove many cases in which men have been brought to the verge of starvation in consequence of their employers turning them off because they had served in a Volunteer regiment. A very considerable number of employers, if not a majority, do all they can to prevent men serving, and it is possible to prove many cases of men being obliged to conceal the fact of their being Volunteers from the heads of the establishment to which they belong. Legislation in some form is, therefore, absolutely necessary to protect men serving as Volunteers."

"The Government grant," he observes lastly, "is enough if the Government would clothe the men; but not nearly enough unless the clothing is given. It is impossible to get officers to bear all the expenses which are thrown upon them, no forage being allowed. The various shooting butts, if not bought up by the Government, will be bought up for building purposes."

I apologize to the House for having spoken at such length. But I wish to say, finally, that I object to assist Her Majesty's Government in their endeavour to persuade the country to give them a donation of from £10,000,000 to £14,000,000 for the furtherance of the views of one man. ["Oh!"] That they were originally the views of one enthusiast I maintain. I object to assist Her Majesty's Government in doing that which I know will ruin the character of the English officer. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. G. Bentinck) said the other night—and the observation was pregnant with truth—that hon. Members who sit in those seats below the Gangway on the Government side of the House were practically the legislators of this country. I think there never was so flagrant an instance of the truth as in the case of this Bill. I have much pleasure in seconding the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the expenditure necessary for the national defences and the other demands on the Exchequer do not at present justify any Vote of Public Money for the extinction of Purchase in the Army,"—(Colonel Loyd Lindsay.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. DAVISON trusted that the House, whatever it might think of the measure, the second reading of which had been moved, would never, by adopting the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), affirm that the financial state of this country, and its exigencies, were such that no Vote of any kind ought to be granted for the extinction of purchase in the Army. Of course, he did not say that the Government was not quite ready to meet the hon. and gallant Member, and those who supported the Amendment, upon that which he believed to be the real pith of the whole Bill—namely, the abolition of purchase in the Army. He was glad to hear, notwithstanding the form of the Resolution as it appeared on the Notice Paper, that the hon. and gallant Member meant to put the question before the House in its broadest view. He feared that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded the Motion had not gone so far; and, as many hon. Members entertained a distinct opinion upon the question, he should shortly state why the Government came to the conclusion that it was necessary to abolish the system of promotion by purchase, before anything effectual could be done in the way of improved Army organization. He entirely agreed in the opinion of the hon. and gallant Member who moved the Resolution, that it was desirable for the House and the country to know what the system of purchase was. Assuming that every hon. and gallant Member had read, more or less, the Blue Books, and especially the Report of the Commissioners, he would place some facts and figures before the House. It was reported by the Commissioners, and he believed there was no doubt of it, that in all the purchase corps in the Army—excluding the Royal Engineers, the Royal Artillery, the Royal Marines, and 12 Indian regiments, three of cavalry and nine of infantry, in which the system did not exist—the amount which an officer had to pay for any commission except the first was nearly double the regulation price. This statement might possibly be more startling to him as a civilian than to gentlemen in the service; but he could not help thinking that, if the purchase system was ever to be got rid of, now was the time to abolish it. It had been growing out of all proportion, and the Bill before the House allowed for something like £7,500,000 or £8,000,000 being expended on this matter, that sum to be extended over a number of years; so that in no one year should the amount exceed £1,400,000 or £1,500,000. If a war broke out no doubt the value of commissions would fall very low; but, apart from such an occurrence, unless immediate steps were taken to check this system, it would go on increasing until the expense of abolishing it would soon be double or treble the amount he had named. He found from the Report of the Commissioners, that in order to attain the highest rank in the Household Cavalry which could be got by purchase, an officer had to pay altogether £13,250, while in ordinary cavalry regiments an officer in the same circumstances expended a sum of £12,000. In the infantry of the Line the sum paid was £7,000, and in the Foot Guards—where, owing to exceptional circumstances in 1854, there was no purchase above the rank of captain—it was perfectly well understood in the market that £8,500 had to be paid. He asked the House whether these were not startling figures. The system of over-regulation prices had been going on growing ever since the year 1719, and without saying one word in disparagement of gentlemen who held Her Majesty's Commission, he must say that, in his opinion, and in that of the Government, the time had come when such a vicious system ought to be swept away. He did not seek to depreciate the bravery of the officers who led the Balaklava charge; but he thought that it could have been led with equal bravery and efficiency by officers who had not been appointed to their commissions under a system of purchase. Well, then, was this system of purchase a good thing for the Army? From what he had seen and read in Blue Books and newspapers, and heard since he had been in office he was led to agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved this Amendment, that the regimental system was one of great importance. With the hon. and gallant Gentleman, too, he believed it was essential that the system should be still carried out; but he failed to see with the hon. and gallant Gentleman why the system should be affected by the abolition or the retention of the purchase system. He could not see why everything which the Mover and Seconder of this Amendment desired should not be as obtainable after the abolition of the purchase as it was now. The commanding officer ought, unquestionably, to be a person who had not only the interests of his men at heart, but one with the necessary qualifications for service in the field. But, under the present system, an officer who possessed all the requisite qualifications, but had not money enough to purchase the step, failed not only to secure his promotion, but, owing to his not being able to find these large sums of money, had frequently to retire from the unpleasantness which his position entailed upon him. ["No, no!"] It might be that he had misapprehended the Report of the Commission; but, if hon. Members would refer to the Report of the Commission, he thought they would find that he had placed a right interpretation on the words of the Report. Under the present system, therefore, they not only treated hardly the man who had not the money to purchase his step, by putting another over his head, but they rendered his position, if unable or unwilling to pay the over-regulation price, so intolerable as to oftentimes compel him to sell out. What the Government proposed in place of this unsatisfactory state of things was a judicious system of selection. This system had been characterized by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded this Amendment as an odious system. But he ventured to think that this term could not be properly applied to a judicious and fair system of selection such as was contemplated by this Bill; nor could it be said that these selections would not only be unfair and improper, but that promotions would be obtained through the intrigues of Members of the House of Commons. How could it be said that such a system of judicious selection, coupled with promotion to a certain extent by seniority, could be open to the charge of being "odious?" Hon. Members, too, who took this view, and, at the same time, urged that the officers in the Army possessed all the qualifications necessary for their profession, were apt to forget that if this were true there would be no difficulty about the selection, or, if the officers were all what they were told they were, it would be impossible to go wrong. He would urge upon hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway that the abolition of this system of purchase was, in the opinion of the Government, the first step towards the reorganization of the Army. And he would ask hon. Members who were desirous of seeing an alteration in the existing system, what would be the use, if the Government proposal were rejected, of the Reserve and the Militia, under the new regulations which it was intended should apply to those branches of the service? How would it be possible to make that fusion of the Regular Army and Reserve forces, which was regarded as so desirable, if in the one branch the promotion went by purchase, and in the other by non-purchase? He maintained that, if the proposal of the Government were rejected, this fusion would be impossible, and he trusted, therefore, that the House, by its vote that evening, would not affirm the view taken by the hon. and gallant Gentlemen who had moved and seconded this Amendment.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY thought it right to confine his remarks to the Resolution before the House, and said that it certainly appeared to be a very anomalous description of policy, for a Government that was pledged to retrenchment, to propose an increase of some £8,000,000 to the national expenditure, in the same breath with which it had added a charge of £3,000,000 to the Army Estimates over and above that of last year, and especially when no one could conscientiously agree, or at all events be convinced, that the bond fide efficiency of the Army for active service would be insured by it; and when one came to reflect upon the onus probandi, to say nothing of the responsibility which ought to guide the legislation of every Member of the House, as a conjoint guardian of the interests of the country, it was a matter of grave consideration whether the House of Commons was justified or warranted in accepting so questionable, because so useless and unnecessary, a policy. He wished to remark that if the British Army required so violent a remedy to revive its drooping constitution, and if the doctor's bill was to be £8,000,000 or £9,000,000, independent of the £16,000,000 already charged against the Estimates, into what a deplorable condition must its responsible advisers have allowed it to sink. If that were so, it was trifling with the taxpayers of the country to impose so extravagant and unnecessary a burden upon them—unnecessary, as far as they were concerned; for it would be idle to say that such an expenditure could in any way benefit their interests, inasmuch as the question of purchase or non-purchase in the Army was essentially a private arrangement, and had no place in the matter of the efficiency of the Army for either offensive or defensive purposes. It would, therefore, be a dead loss to those who had to pay it, which would be undoubtedly the taxpayers. Besides which, this new-fangled policy was singularly subversive of that which the Liberal party inaugurated in 1868, in order to fortify their efforts to drive the Conservative party from power, and as soon as possible assume the reins of a Liberal, Radical, and retrenching Government. Surely, then, the taxpayers had a voice in the matter, though he doubted whether it would be satisfactorily heard if the debate assumed a party character. No one could deny that this extraordinary proposal was playing a desperate game with the British Army. It was distasteful to the officers themselves, who were serving, and who did purchase, and who had a claim upon the consideration of the House, as the existing guardians of the honour and the prestige of the service they had adopted. He asked, why disturb a system that had worked well, when no benefit could be derived from its removal? Had the existence of the purchase system in any way reduced the tone and the quality of the British officer? No! Would the abolition of purchase in any way advance that tone and quality? Was it worth £8,000,000 to create this disturbance, when so much better application of public money was required? No! The Secretary of State, of course, did not wish to be unjust to any officer, nor need he, in a financial point of view, were he to adopt one of two plans—either to pay the money down to every officer as soon as the Bill became law, or to pay every officer who may apply to retire, irrespective of any limit as to numbers. He contended that the over-regulation had been virtually legalized, because the Government had, for the first time, recognized it, and guaranteed to pay it off. It was, therefore, as much a vested interest as the authorized regulation was, and should be dealt with as such, and honourably compensated. The Secretary of State, however, in order to ease off the strain upon the Exchequer, and from the fear of too great a pressure of retirements upon him, at the same time, was about to limit the number of repayments in each year, and thereby inflict a great injustice upon all those who, wishing to retire, were not to be included in that limit. And here was the blot of the Bill, which the House of Commons, in dealing with so sweeping a proposal, ought to feel called upon in its conscience to wipe out. The blot, which is the 2nd clause of the Bill, had been already explained and denounced; and, as it affected every Member in the House who had a son or a relative in the Army, and who had probably paid heavily for the honour, and as party feeling ought to have no place in this truly personal question, he could not imagine that the Government should have any claim upon even the staunchest of its supporters following it into the Lobby. He thought he would be supported by a large majority when he said that if purchase was abolished, the character, and the tone, and the prestige of the Army would be destroyed; for there was no doubt that if purchase was abolished and another system unavoidably substituted, such as promotion by secret selection and retirement by open compulsion, away would go the regimental system, upon the elasticity of which the success of our armies in the field had so much depended; for promotion would be spurious and non-regimental. He considered the question of the abolition of purchase bristled with difficulties, and probably the repayments would be about the least difficult, for it mattered not upon what plan the Government proceeded, injustice would be done to officers; for many would be serving on unequal terms, which was unjust and untenable. For instance, as a correspondent in a military journal had pointed out—

“Suppose that the abolition of purchase was consummated on the 31st December, 1871, and that on the 30th of that month A purchased his promotion; he received as an equivalent such additional pay as amounted to the interest of the sum he invested; B, on the other hand, was promoted on the 1st of January, 1872, and received as his reward an absolute increase of pay. However advantageous this might be to B, it could not be said to be justice to A, inasmuch as A and B, holding the same rank and discharging the same duties in the same regiment, were receiving different rates of pay—which was obviously unsatisfactory and unjust. Now, take the case of death, which is no respecter of persons, we cannot blink the question that unless some provision be made to meet that casualty, the refusal to pay at once those officers who may wish to retire may deprive the widow and orphans of a brave and gallant officer, who has served his country with credit and honour, of their lawful birth-right—an injustice which no civil law would permit.”

He said he put a Question, bearing upon this point, to the Secretary of State the other day, which, with the permission of the House, he would read, in order that the answer might be clearly understood; the Question referred to the position in which the widow and orphans of an officer who was dangerously ill and had died, or was killed in action were placed as regards the repayment of his commission to them. The answer of the Secretary of State was as follows:—

“The widow, children, or next of kin referred to, do not receive the purchase money according to the purchase system, and, therefore, will not be entitled to compensation on the abolition of the system.”

It surely could not be possible, therefore, that the House of Commons would sanction the abolition of purchase, when it had been publicly declared by a Minister of the Crown that if an unrecouped officer was killed, or was seriously ill and had died in his bed, the customary price of his commission, which the Government intended to recognize by its I O U, was to be lost for ever, notwithstanding his application to retire had been made and refused. It might be said there was no occasion to alter the existing regulations with respect to illness and death; but it appeared to him that there were decided reasons for the alteration, if purchase was abolished; one of which was, that because the Secretary of State was about to possess a power, over which he had no control at present, of refusing to pay an officer the price of his commission when he wished to retire, if he be not included in the annual list of repayments, he would be inflicting a great hardship, as well as an embarrassment, upon that officer and his family, by not guaranteeing to his family, in case of death, that money to which he would have been entitled had he lived, when his turn had come, and which he would have realized under the existing arrangement, when he wished to retire; and the Secretary of State would be establishing a breach of faith with every officer who had entered the Army upon the present arrangement. He was speaking to those on both sides of the House who must sympathize with each other on this vital question; he was speaking to those who had sons in the Army, who might not be included in the first batch of repayments; and he claimed their support. He asserted that, if purchase was abolished, retirement must be provided for upon the principle of compulsion. Was the Government prepared to do so? No; they were not; because the Secretary of State had distinctly said that it was impossible to determine with accuracy what would be required in the way of retirement. Then the process of selection could not be performed with satisfaction to the Army, and the process of shifting officers about, at the will and pleasure of the Government, would be distasteful, and would damage the regimental system, which had never yet broken down, but which this measure was doing its best to destroy. He asked, how could selection be made when all were regimentally efficient? It could not be done; in which case the system of seniority, if accompanied by efficiency, the various grades of which it would be impossible to analyze, must hold its own to be just; and if it did hold its own, the object in view would be defeated, because the line would be blocked, the stream of promotion would be stemmed, when the abolition of purchase had become a thing of the past. He pitied a man who would have the patronage to dispense upon those terms, for he would be a victim of public opinion, no matter how well his invidious duties might have been performed; and the Army would become an arena of debate, wrangling, distrust, and despondency for the future, which would not only engender acrimony, jealousies, and heart-burnings, but it would, he feared, and he regretted to harbour the thought, tend to loosen the reins of discipline. He hoped that the Government would not oppose the Resolution before the House, and that it would be convinced, before the close of the debate, that it had declared a decided opinion against the abolition of purchase, upon which the Bill seemed mainly to depend. But if the Secretary of State had not sufficient elasticity; or of that expansive element which was so necessary to the Army, as to yield to the opinion which had been expressed outside of the House of Commons, and if he preferred that the sense of the House should be taken, he would discover that the Division Lists of 1871 would not only be tarnished with one record which had been unnecessarily provoked, but that they would contain another and more important one—namely, a formal protest against a step which could benefit no interest whatever, but which would saddle the taxpayers of the country with the payment of several additional millions of money. He did not wish to detain the House any longer, as he only felt justified in confining himself to the terms of the Resolution; and he would conclude by saying that he fully endorsed the Resolution of his hon. and gallant Relative, and he did so because he considered it was far better to devote the energies and resources of the nation to those things which were really needful than to hamper the field that was presented for the re-organization of a comparatively impotent Army with such a formidable barrier, through which it would be almost impossible to travel on to the winning-post of success and reality, for the speedy accomplishment of which the country was impatiently waiting.

SIR GEORGE GREY: We are not now called upon to discuss any of the details by which the abolition of purchase, assuming that the House agrees to it, will be carried out, nor are we called on to consider whether the regulations proposed by the Government for the retirement of officers are the best and fairest that can be devised: details of that kind will be matters properly for consideration when the House gets into Committee on the Bill. Indeed, the Motion moved by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) does not appear to raise the question whether or not it is desirable that the purchase system should be abolished, although the debate has, to a considerable extent, turned upon that. As I read the terms of the Motion, it does not ask the House to agree to any Resolution that would express an opinion adverse to the abolition of purchase, but only that the abolition of purchase at the present time would lead to the expenditure of a large sum of money which might be more advantageously applied. The arguments, however, of the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself, and of the Seconder of his Motion (Colonel White), have all gone to show that the abolition of purchase is a measure that ought not to be adopted now, or at any other time. I confess I am not insensible to the advantages of the purchase system. As the hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded the Resolution has remarked, there is much to be said in its favour, while, as he candidly admitted, there is much to be said against it. Theoretically, I think that the system is utterly indefensible, and I think that no Government that came forward with a Bill for the reorganization of the Army could avoid dealing with this question of purchase; and in dealing with it I think that the present Government have taken the right course in dealing with it wholly and not partially. I admit, indeed, to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it has created a flow of [promotion in the regiments of the Line and in the Guards at little or no cost to the public, and although it may have prejudicially affected the interests of some meritorious officers, who were unable to pay the prices required for commissions, yet, on the whole, the system has not been disadvantageous, even to non-purchasing officers. Some evidence laid before the Commission of which I had the honour of being Chairman tended to show that this was the case, and that the promotion of a non-purchasing officer was generally more rapid in a purchase than in a non-purchase corps. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has contrasted the officers of the British Army with those of other armies, and has referred to the charge of Balaklava as showing the advantages of the purchase system; but what would he say as to the officers of the Artillery and Engineers, who obtain promotion without expending a single shilling? I think he will admit that they are fully equal to the officers of any regiment of the Line, and that in no regiment of the Line do better relations exist between the officers and men than in the Engineers and Artillery. Again, the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the reverses that have recently happened to the French Army in the late war, and seemed to attribute it to the fact that most of the officers in that Army had risen from the ranks; but he omitted to make any allusion to the successes of the German Army, in which promotion goes, not by purchase, but, in great measure, by selection. All these matters should be borne in mind when this question is under consideration. One great objection to the purchase system, as was demonstrated to the Commission I have referred to, is the absolute impossibility of keeping it by any laws or regulations within prescribed limits, and of fixing the price at which commissions should be sold. The figures that have been cited by the right hon. and learned Gentleman below me (Mr. Davison) show the great extent to which the system has prevailed, and the very large sums over the regulation price that have been paid. Indeed, Mr. Hammersley stated before the Commission that the sums thus invested amounted to nearly £3,500,000. Now, if this be correct, what will the system come to in the course of a few years? It has been admitted that at some time or other it may be advantageous to abolish purchase, and, for my own part, I think the present time is the most advantageous. And here I wish to correct a slight misstatement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, on the occasion of his moving for leave to introduce his Bill a fortnight ago. He spoke of the recommendations of the Commission over which I presided having had great effect upon the Government, and even upon His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Command-in-Chief. The fact is that the Commissioners made no recommendations whatever, because by the terms of their appointment they were precluded from doing so. They were simply desired to ascertain the facts under certain specified heads, and to report those facts to the House. We endeavoured to discharge our duty to the best of our ability, and I believe we gave as complete a history as was possible of the mode in which the purchase system has acted, and showed that it is necessarily interwoven with the over-regulation prices. Here I may, perhaps, be allowed to quote the opinion expressed by the Commission of 1857, which was presided over by the Duke of Somerset, and of which Mr. Sidney Herbert, then Secretary for War, was a member—

“The practice of paying sums exceeding the regulation price must be considered to be an accompaniment of the purchase system which it appears impossible to prevent. This is an evil which is inherent in the system, and which cannot, it is said, be remedied, although it operates unfairly to meritorious officers and injuriously to the public interests.”

The Commission over which I had the honour to preside thought these remarks were completely justified by the facts, and although we made no recommendation, I may state my individual opinion—and I should be much surprised to find that any member of that Commission is of a different opinion—that the evidence showed the impossibility of dealing with the subject without recognizing the claims of officers to the sums paid—contrary, indeed, to law, but in accordance with a system practised for many years past, and still practised even by every man in authority, whether civil or military, with regard to promotion in the Army. It is absolutely impossible to deal with this subject without recognizing the equitable claims of officers in respect of over-regulation prices. I am glad, therefore, that the Government propose to act in a just and fair manner towards the officers. I am quite sure that if they had not done so they would have been met by a reasonable opposition to their scheme, and that it would have been impossible for them to obtain the sanction of Parliament for such a course. Still, while thinking the Government have taken the right course, I am bound to say I agree with those who think the expediency of the abolition of the purchase system depends very much upon what is proposed to be substituted for it. The Commissioners of 1857 thought so, and I entirely agree with them. I am convinced that the opinion expressed by that Commission is correct; that if you resort to mere seniority as a substitute for purchase you will adopt a system that will be prejudicial to the best interests of the Army. If, then, you abolish purchase you must have a system of selection, and also a system of compulsory retirement. With regard to promotion by selection, I agree that there are great difficulties; but, nevertheless, I think it may be possible to overcome those difficulties. I think too much importance has been attached to the opinion expressed by His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief before the Commission of 1857. He fairly stated his opinion in answer to questions put to him; but I wish to call the attention of the House to the following passage in the Report of that Commission:—

“His Royal Highness has stated that if the returns from inspecting officers are fairly given, as they ought to be and might be, there is no officer in the Army with whose professional character the Commander-in-Chief might not be acquainted.”

Now, I must admit, that if the case alluded to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who seconded the Amendment, be founded in fact, I should not be inclined to attach much weight to a character given by a commanding officer. It is not intended, however, as far as I understand, that the selection should be made on the mere report of the commanding officer; but inspecting officers are to be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief who may inform him as to the professional character of every officer in the Army. It has been truly said, in the course of the debate by the right hon. and learned Gentleman below me (Mr. Davison), that the regimental system is admirable and has worked well in the British Army; but I am by no means so sanguine as he is that if you abolish purchase you can maintain the regimental system to the same extent as at present. It is obvious, that if an officer is about to retire, and knows who will succeed him, no power on earth, no ingenuity, no regulation you can devise, can prevent a private arrangement, by which the succeeding officer who desires to obtain the promotion would make it worth the while of the other officer, in a pecuniary sense, to retire. Unless you prevent the officer who retires from knowing what officer is to succeed him, you can not effect this object, and therefore it will be necessary that promotion should be in the Army generally, rather than in any particular regiment. But nothing now is more common than to exchange from one regiment into another; and, therefore, practically the system proposed is not a new one altogether. We may be told that the practice to which I have referred does not exist in the corps of the Engineers or Artillery; but the answer is that this is owing to the vast extent of those corps, and their dispersion throughout the world, which prevents the possibility of a private arrangement between two officers, although it can easily be made between two officers who reside in the same quarters and are in daily intercourse. I trust the House will not sanction the Resolution of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. Indeed, I hope he will allow us to proceed at once with the second reading of the Bill, for when it goes into Committee we shall have an opportunity to consider all the details connected with the abolition of purchase, with a view to make them as fair and as equitable as possible.

Sir George Grey

MR. F. STANLEY said, that, although a comparatively humble Member of the House, he found himself compelled to speak on this occasion, and yet he did so in a position of embarrassment. He could not but think that he was placed under more than ordinary difficulties, because he believed he was about the only Member on that side of the House who had expressed a decided opinion as to the desirability of abolishing the purchase system. In the abstract, he was in favour of a proposition for the abolition of purchase; but the proposition of the Bill must be viewed in connection with other considerations involved in it, which were of a very serious nature. Any scheme for the abolition of purchase, ought, in the first place, to endeavour, as far as possible, to provide for the equitable redemption of the existing interests of officers, and, in the second, ought to endeavour to lay down clear and distinct regulations by which the flow of promotion might be further regulated. But he searched the Bill of the Government in vain, in an endeavour to find in it the fulfilment of either of these two conditions. He believed, and the opinion was shared by many hon. Members on his side of the House, that the Government fully intended to deal with the interests of officers with the utmost liberality; but they could not altogether forget what had happened on a former occasion. With that candour in his dealings with the House which would ever do him honour, the right hon. Gentleman discarded his former scheme on which he confessed he had not had sufficient information, and which, undoubtedly, was received with considerable disfavour. Although they could not doubt the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman, they might be led by what happened last year to doubt the accuracy of his information. He would find it urged with considerable force by those who were practically acquainted with the bearings of the question that, however unintentionally, the Bill as it stood would operate so as to cause considerable injustice to officers who were now in the service. The answer given the other night by the right hon. Gentleman to a Question put, he thought, by the hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon (Colonel C. H. Lindsay), would have led hon. Members who had not paid the subject the fullest attention to the belief that, under the regulations of the Bill, officers who kept in the service and who died in it, not being killed in action nor dying of wounds, would be placed in no worse position than they are placed in now under the present regulations of the service. At present, officers who desire to leave the service, provided they are not certified as being likely to die within a given space of time, may make their own bargains with other officers and leave the service at once; but, under the Bill of the Government, they are no longer to be placed in the same position, for the State can step in and say—"I am become the only purchaser, and, under certain conditions, I do not intend to exercise the right of purchase." Therefore, officers were no longer placed in the same position; and if there were any kind of service worse than unpaid service—which had been characterized as being worth exactly what it cost—it was a service which was distasteful to the persons engaged in it. If we were to have duty performed properly—if officers were to sustain their high traditions—it seemed to him a fatal mistake to have officers whom we did not permit to leave the service except at a sacrifice not only of their professional reputation, but also of their personal fortune. There was a very wide-spread opinion among officers of the Army—he thought the opinion was entertained by those who had most considered the question from a professional point of view—that if the purchase system were abolished, the satisfaction to be given to officers for the absorption of their commissions ought to be assured to them as early as possible. There was force in the objection which had been raised to our having officers serving side by side, one of whom would have everything to lose, while another would be placed in a less unfavourable position. If, by any means, satisfaction could be given to the officers of the Army that from the moment after the passing of the Act, or from such other time as might be fixed, direct compensation for their commissions should be assured to them, that would go far to remove the feeling of disfavour with which the Bill had been received. He believed that the feeling of disfavour with regard to the abolition of purchase was not so general in the Army as it was supposed to be; on the contrary, he believed that many officers, perhaps those who had not given the least attention to the subject, were convinced that there was not so much danger in it as had been suggested by some hon. Gentlemen in that House. Notwithstanding this opinion, they entertained a deep and sincere conviction that their pecuniary interests were not as well and equitably served by the Bill as it was apparently the wish of the Government they should be. It was easy to find fault. It was easy to say that security for the payment of so large a sum of money should be at once given; but he saw that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had sitting near him another right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) who exercised a check over any undue liberality that might be given in that direction. It was one of the recommendations of the Committee on Retirement which sat in 1867, that, as far as possible, retirement should be promoted by compounding for the payment to be made to officers; and he had not the slightest doubt that, supposing there were a difficulty, as undoubtedly there would be, about the capital sum being paid down, many officers would gladly accept anything in the nature of an annuity. This would spread the payment over a number of years, and would also have this advantage to the individual officer—that there would be the certainty that he would receive the payment, and this would go far to remove the feeling of uncertainty and dissatisfaction among the officers which might otherwise prevail. He had looked in vain through the Bill, he had looked in vain through the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, in delivering the Estimates, for any promise of a provision to be made for retirement, and he could not consider that the propositions of the Government in this respect were as fair as they might be. Admitting, as the right hon. Gentleman did, that the question of retirement must ultimately come into discussion in connection with the abolition of purchase, all that the right hon. Gentleman had to say now was that he could not tell what was necessary. True, that was qualified by the expression of the hope that in the Reserve forces he hoped to find many places for officers of the Regular service; but how far was such a provision to be considered in the nature of retirement? They were undoubtedly told, with truth, that the right

hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to examine the question in all its bearings, and he recognized in its fullest sense the importance of the two questions of the retirement and the promotion of officers in the Army. The right hon. Gentleman gave the reason which induced the Government to recommend the principle of selection, of which there was some distrust in the Army, a distrust which was recognized by the Duke of Somerset's Commission of 1856-7. In its Report that Commission urged that the principle of selection ought to be introduced very gradually, and not until the minds of officers were fully relieved of the distrust which attached to it. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the carrying out of the principle was a matter of the greatest difficulty. What was the form in which the Government proposed to adopt it? Tabulated reports were to be kept in the office of the Military Secretary. Looking in vain for any clearer information on the subject, he came upon these words of the right hon. Gentleman, which seemed to be almost fatal to the very principle which he now wished the House to adopt. The right hon. Gentleman said he would not enter into the details of the mode in which security was to be afforded to the Army for the impartiality and fairness of promotion, because the matter was still being carefully discussed. This almost implied that the right hon. Gentleman had no plan to lay before the House; and if they went into Committee, he trusted they would not go far without a more distinct assurance on this point. They were told that the promotion from captain to major, and from major to lieutenant colonel, was to be Army promotion, and was to be by selection. Now, selection meant either nothing at all or a very great deal too much. If an officer was only to be selected upon the principle of seniority, then it was a farce to call that system a system of selection. But if promotion to the higher ranks was to be Army promotion—and stress was laid by the right hon. Gentleman on Army promotion as distinguished from regimental promotion—then it meant a most serious change in the constitution of the Army. He had had opportunities of conversing on these matters with foreign officers. He was not going to quote in detail any opinions; but he did say this, without fear of con-

tradition, that even those officers of foreign armies who most found fault with the general organization of our Army had always a good deal to say for our regimental system. If, therefore, it was proposed to do away with much which produced the feeling of attachment of officers to their regiments, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was bound to show that some very great advantage would accrue from the change which he proposed. He would appeal to the recollection of almost any officer in the House whether, when he looked forward to his career as being an Army career, he did not regard himself as being bound up with the welfare and well-being of his regiment. Now, if promotion to higher ranks in the service meant that an officer was to be taken from his regiment for the simple reason that he was to be promoted and moved to some other, then they would have done a serious evil not only with regard to the officers, but also with regard to the men who were under them. However distinguished the regiment might be to which he was appointed, it would be little consolation to an officer who had served throughout his life in, for instance, the Rifle Brigade, with all the honour with which the name of that brigade was connected, to be told—"Now you have arrived at the rank of senior captain, you have an absolute certainty that your promotion will not be in your regiment; you must go to some other branch of the service." Suppose that an officer was promoted from the Rifle Brigade and transferred to a Highland regiment. The traditions of that regiment were not inferior to those of others; but each branch of the service had its peculiar feelings, and required peculiar management on small matters of detail which were best known to those who had served in the Army. It was one of the most important points in the system of the Army that these very details, on which depended the emulation of the various regiments one against another, should, to a certain extent, be kept up and encouraged. He did not think that any proposition had ever been made more fatal to them than that an officer brought up in a particular regiment should on no account receive promotion in the same regiment. The right hon. Gentleman had proposed the abolition of purchase, and, so far he could discover, the main argument of the right hon. Gentleman, independently of those which might be characterized as sentimental arguments, appeared to have been that it was necessary to abolish purchase before you could amalgamate the two forces. But let them see what was the quid pro quo given by the right hon. Gentleman. The amalgamation proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, so far as he could make out, consisted in these points—that infantry regiments were to be attached to counties, and that they were to recruit in their own sub-districts. He regretted that the Return for which he had moved had not yet been laid on the Table, because, unless he was greatly mistaken, it would have furnished considerable information which he thought was wanting on these points. He was afraid that the infantry regiments would, in some cases, be unable to recruit in the sub-districts of which they bore the name. He need hardly recall an instance quoted by a right hon. and gallant Gentleman now no longer in the House—General Peel—who, in speaking on this same proposal of localizing regiments in 1867, mentioned the case of a regiment that was unable to get a single recruit out of the militia regiment of the district of which it bore the name. He thought that if the principle of localization was to be carried out to such an extent that regiments were only to recruit in their own sub-districts great practical inconvenience would be the result, unless there was some further provision—which he had not been able to discover in the Bill—to meet it. Then the next principle of amalgamation was that recruits of the Militia were to be trained with those of the Line. It might be in the experience of hon. and gallant Gentlemen to know that a recruit was for the most part a very suspicious creature, and he could not help declaring that a great many Militia recruits would think "there was more than met the eye" in the proposal with regard to drill with the troops of the Regular Army. That point, of course, could only be determined in practice; but in renouncing those views he was only saying that which had been asserted by officers of more practical experience than himself, and he thought considerable difficulty would be found in inducing Militia recruits to come up to barracks with the Regular Army for the purpose of being drilled with the recruits of the Regular Army. The Militia recruits would feel that if once they were taken to be drilled with recruits of the Regular Army, the military authorities might not be so anxious to let them go. He wished the right hon. Gentleman would give a little further explanation on the point as to how far the officers of the Militia and of the Regular Army were to be interchanged. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that—as during the Peninsular War—officers might be so far interchanged, that officers of high standing in the Militia service might go with their men to serve in the Regular Army. Was that plan intended, or was it intended that companies should be stripped of everything except the companies' officers? That was a point on which considerable anxiety would be felt, both by officers of the Militia whose prospects might be involved, and also by officers of the Regular Army for whom it was proposed to find places in the Reserve force; and the right hon. Gentleman would do no harm in giving the House some fuller explanation on it. There was another point which he approached with some diffidence. He understood that the localized and Reserved forces were to vary from 15,000 to 20,000 in each sub-district. They were to be placed for all purposes, with the sole exception, he thought, of artillery instruction, under colonels on the Staff. Then the question at once arose—for if this organization were proposed, it would be formed at considerable expense—Was it intended that if these large corps d'armée should be mobilized, or raised to a sufficient standard in time of war, they should be left under the command of colonels of the Staff? Would it not be better to assign to such large corps general officers, as to the little employment for whom there was so much complaint now, and allow them to become acquainted with the district of which they would be in charge in time of war? Otherwise what would happen? Assuming, as he did, that general officers would be appointed in time of war, they would come to their districts ignorant of its circumstances, ignorant of the character and ability of the officers with whom they would be brought in contact, and at the very moment the country would most want their services they would have to learn their business and to organize their forces. It was impossible not to think that a somewhat increased expenditure would be usefully incurred to prevent the disadvantage to the public service arising from the confusion which would be inevitable if colonels on the Staff had to be superseded by general officers. The Bill before the House had, since it was first spoken of, changed its title. It was no longer an Army Organization, but an Army Regulation Bill, otherwise it would be impossible entirely to pass over the lack of information as to what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do with those large Army corps when he had got them. He need not remind the House of a most painful spectacle seen in the beginning of last August, when an Army, not inferior in its traditions to any Army in the world, was paralyzed from want of organization, want of supplies, and want of military train. There did not seem to be the slightest provision for the expansion of the Control department which would be necessary under the new organization, and he ventured respectfully to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who so ably presided over that department (Sir Henry Storks) whether the Control system was capable of expansion so as to meet such a very large increase above the Regular forces. Some stress has been laid on the provision in the Bill that when the Volunteers were being trained and exercised with the Regular forces they would be subject to the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War. Suppose a Volunteer, who was generally embodied with the other forces for a particular day, committed an offence which rendered him liable to military punishment, he understood that punishment could extend only to the day on which the Volunteer was actually serving. Now, circumstances had occasionally occurred at Volunteer reviews, generally held late in the day, which might subject a man to military punishment, and as the control over men existed only for the day, he wished to ask whether the inconvenience might not be greater to the officer who had to deal with the offender than to the offender himself if dealt with under the provisions of this Bill. There was a provision which authorized the justices of the peace of any county, at the general or quarter sessions, to provide barracks for the county Militia. He could not help thinking that was putting the saddle on the wrong horse. Precisely where a county had made the greatest efforts to raise an efficient force would a vast burden be laid upon it. The burden would not fall on those counties which had raised only a few men; but where a large contribution in men had been made towards the defence of the country, the counties would also be called upon to vote a large sum of money in order to provide accommodation which, in the majority of cases, it would fall rather within the duty of the Government itself to furnish. When the right hon. Gentleman introduced his Bill he asked whether the House was prepared to accept three points—first, that enlistment should be voluntary; second, that purchase should be abolished; and third, that the patronage of the Militia should be transferred from the Lords Lieutenant of counties to the Crown? On the first and third points, he thought the House was unanimous. But when they saw that the abolition of purchase was made one of the principal points of the Bill, and that one of the chief reasons given for that abolition was that a complete amalgamation of the various forces of the country might be effected, then it was for the Government to prove to those who would support, as he intended to do, the Resolution of his hon. and gallant Friend, that this amalgamation could really be brought about. The House was asked to assent to great changes. The right hon. Gentleman could not complain, as far as the debate had gone, that there had been anything like an exhibition of party feeling. There was a well-founded agreement in the House that this question ought not to be considered as a matter of party. It was in no party spirit that he had made the observations which he had ventured to offer, and he was sure his remarks would be received by the right hon. Gentleman with that candour and courtesy which he always exhibited to the humblest Member of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman had any explanation to give on the point to which his attention had now been called, he would do much to promote the progress of the Bill. He agreed in the abstract that the abolition of purchase would tend to the ultimate advantage of the Army; but it was for the Government to show that at the present moment, when every farthing of public money was as far as possible being saved, they would be able to effect that complete amalgamation which seemed to be the

MR. H. R. BRAND, while admitting that the officers of the Army came, as had been stated that evening, from various classes in the country, observed that a great many educated men were nevertheless excluded from the service because they happened to be poor. In the Army the system of promotion was now based on a money qualification, and what he desired was to see advancement in the profession made rather the result of merit. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) seemed to think he had adduced an argument which was quite unanswerable in support of the position which he had taken up, when he quoted the authority of General Blumenthal, to the effect that purchase was an excellent system, and that he should like to see it introduced into the Prussian service. That, however, was no proof that we ought to retain the system; and he had no doubt the country would be prepared to spend £8,000,000, or even £12,000,000, for its extinction if it were shown that it was injurious to the Army. But whatever the sum might be which the abolition of purchase might cost, it was equally the duty of those who were opposed to it to prove that the evils attending it were of so grave a character as to justify the course which the Government proposed to take in putting an end to it, as well as to suggest some system to be adopted in its stead. Purchase had existed in our Army for a considerable time, and it had been defended in past times on the ground that it gave security to the public that the Crown should not promote officers who were mere creatures of its own, while it was supported at the present day because it was alleged that it erected a social barrier between the people and the Army, and caused the Army to be composed of men who, being possessed of property, were not likely to lend themselves to any revolutionary scheme. Such was the view taken by Lord Palmerston, who was of opinion that it was only when the service became filled with adventurers that it would be found to be opposed to the liberties of the nation. Now there was, however, a strong feeling growing up in the country, that in military, as well as in all civil employments, the disability to engage in them should be imposed on no class in the community. It was at the same time urged that if promotion in the Army were given only by merit an inferior class of officers would spring up; but it must not be forgotten that it discouraged all competition when an officer knew that whatever amount of intelligence he might possess it would not gain him a single step in his profession; while a great many men were prevented, owing to the purchase system, from entering the Army who would otherwise be glad to join it. Lord Clyde, who was a non-purchase officer, had been 46 years in the service before he attained the rank of major-general, while in the case of other general officers he found that the average time which it took to obtain that rank was 36 years. Now, any system which could prevent the speedy advancement of such men as Lord Clyde could, he thought, scarcely be regarded as advantageous to the public. So long as you had purchase it was impossible to absorb officers, or to reduce their rank, or to effect any reform that touched their monetary interests. The abolition of purchase was desirable for the sake of the efficiency of the service, because efficiency depended upon merit, and merit must never be confounded with money; and it was desirable in the interests of the less wealthy classes, to whose sons the Army was now virtually a closed profession, that it might be replaced by a system of pure selection, or by selection with seniority. If the former was adopted, the Government ought, without delay, to furnish them with further details of the machinery by which it was to be carried out; but if the system of seniority was to be introduced, he could only say that it would be nothing else than purchase under another form. There was, at all events, one respect in which he hoped the Government would change their plan, for there was a very strong esprit de corps among the officers of a regiment, who took a pride in it, who were respected by the men under them, and who would think it very hard to be promoted out of it, as was proposed, in entire disregard of that regimental system which was the life and soul of our Army.

VISCOUNT MAHON maintained that injustice would in many respects be done to the officers of our Army by the abolition of purchase. It was an injustice that an officer who had given nothing for his commission should be placed on a par with a man who had paid a large sum of money. What would a colonel have to look forward to after becoming a general officer? He had no chance of the rise held out under the present system, and no allowance. He might be too old, or he might be too young, and therefore not selected, or by accident he might not have seen foreign service, or, finally, he might be passed over in consequence of his political sentiments. Altogether, the new system would inflict a great injustice upon an officer on the point of becoming a general. As to the purchase system itself, he would remind the House that before the Royal Commission of 1857 an officer, who had been passed over 18 times, stated that, on the whole, he was in favour of retaining the system, since without it he would have been still longer without promotion. He (Viscount Mahon) fully agreed in the opinion that the only just way of abolishing purchase was by paying the money down on the spot; and he thought that it would not cost the State more in the end to pay the money down by a loan—to be repaid, say in 25 years—than to follow the plan of the right hon. Gentleman. There was one exception, that according to which Government now proposed that the money of every officer who died in the service should go to the State. It was most unfair to take such an advantage, it was mean, and the matter ought to be arranged in an honourable and straightforward way. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had said the other evening that the officers, as a body, were adverse to Army reform. He (Viscount Mahon) could most distinctly contradict that statement, for he was sure that every officer to whom he had spoken on the subject was anxious to see the Army put upon a good basis. The same Member had also stated that the War Office would be obliged to stuff any reform down the throats of military men. Now, with all respect to the hon. Member, he (Viscount Mahon) did not think that the service was prepared to swallow one-half, or even one-quarter, of what that hon. Gentleman had proposed. A most important subject in connection with the Army was the Control department, which was intended to amalgamate the supply, transport, and munition services, but which, he feared, had not thoroughly fulfilled the expectations formed of it. The system was one of centralization, entirely opposed to the Prussian, which was a system of decentralization, each corps d'armées being responsible for its transport and everything connected with it. The Prussian system had worked remarkably well; there was a wholesome emulation between each division of the Army as regarded both economy and efficiency, and greater responsibility was imposed upon the commanding officer, which was a great advantage. It was by this system that the Duke of Wellington managed in the Peninsula, and he thought that, by a slight change, the present Control Department might be made efficient—namely, by putting it under the commanding officer of the district and not apart from him.

MR. CARDWELL: It is so at present.

SIR HENRY STORKS: According to the present rule, the responsibility rests, where it ought to rest, with the general officer commanding the district, the controller being merely his agent.

VISCOUNT MAHON held that, at any rate, the commanding officer said in cases of complaint that it was the controller's fault, the controller, in turn, said the blame lay with some other one, and so adequate responsibility was evaded. Another objection to the Bill was that it provided no further augmentation of the Reserve forces available for foreign service. The only force so available was the first-class Reserve and the Militia Reserve, together about 23,000 men. Now, we could not stand by our allies on the Continent in any adequate way with 50,000 men. We ought to be able to send abroad at once, if required, a much larger force. In 1814 and 1815 we had (according to Alison) in Europe and in Asia a standing Army of over 1,000,000 men, and never did the name of England stand so high upon the Continent. Without saying that it was necessary to maintain any such force now, he thought we should be able to expand our Army to a much greater limit than was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. In the belief that the Bill did not do justice to the officers and did not meet the full requirements of the time with regard to the Army, he should cordially support the Resolution of his hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. MUNTZ said, the noble Lord who had just sat down had told them that in 1814-15 this country had 1,000,000 of men under arms. He (Mr. Muntz) did not know what number of men we had with muskets; but he did know that at Waterloo we scraped together every man we had, including two regiments of Militia who had never smelt powder, and all we mustered was 36,000 troops. He mentioned that because the public might be led to believe our forces had greatly deteriorated, and had become attenuated since that wonderful time, and that we were no longer a powerful nation. He had noticed in almost every instance hon. Members had come to the conclusion that by the abolition of the purchase system we should somehow get rid of the regimental system—a matter he should be sorry to see, for it would interfere with the esprit de corps, so indispensable in an English regiment. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) argued that, in consequence of the parsimony of the House of Commons, the military establishments of the country were upon a contemptible system; and the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) said that, in case of a foreign war, we should be totally and absolutely at the mercy of the foe. The charge of parsimony might easily be disposed of by a comparison of our military position with that of the North German Confederation, which had an Army of 300,000 men in time of peace, and 586,000 more—total 886,000—in time of war—real soldiers, who knew how to fight—costing a trifle under £10,000,000 sterling; while we had a force of 135,000 men in the Regular Army, 139,000 Militia, and 175,000 Volunteers, for which, during the past 10 years, we had paid an average of £15,000,000 per year, or a total of £150,000,000 for the whole of the period. They had been told that the officers were altogether in favour of purchase; but, in fact, there was a great deal of discontent in the Army with regard to purchase. There was ample evidence in proof of the practice of young men, by sheer force of wealth, buying over the heads of others who had seen from 12 to 15 years' service. He was therefore delighted that the Government had the moral courage to take up the matter, and he hoped they would persevere with it. Now, this was a very serious subject, and they had to do two things—first, to do justice to the officers, and second, to do justice to the taxpayer. They knew very well that the officers had paid for their commissions on the good faith of the country that they would be repaid, and with the conviction that under the usual regimental system they would rise in rank till they obtained command of their regiments. The least thing, therefore, that the country could do was to pay back that money, for they must never forget that they were Englishmen and honourable men. The officers of the British Army—and, with few exceptions, a more noble body of men could not be found—had advanced certain sums of money for their commissions, and they were entitled to be repaid. For that purpose about £7,500,000 would be necessary. It was not for him to say how that sum should be raised; but he believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no difficulty in raising it in Terminable Annuities, and paying off those gentlemen at once. But, then, how were they to deal with those who had paid the over-regulation price? That system had, no doubt, become ingrained in the Army, although it had never been acknowledged by the Horse Guards; and it would be extremely difficult to abolish it. Officers who had paid over-regulation prices stood in a totally different position from those who paid their money on the faith of the nation. What, then, would he do? He would simply abolish regulation purchase, and leave the regimental system as it now was, so that if officers liked to buy out one another they might continue to do so as they had done. There were non-purchase regiments in the British Army; was there no purchase there? There was a regular system of buying and selling, and in the Indian Army also, as well as in the Line and the Guards; and there would have been in the Artillery, if they had not been so spread over the world that it was impracticable. He believed that regimental purchase would continue. Human nature was the same all over the world. The Government proposed that subalterns who had been two years in the Militia should, by virtue of their service of two years, obtain commissions in the Regular Army. He did not know what the right hon.

Gentleman's intention was; but if the Militia and Volunteer officers were to be men who had seen service and knew what it was—and half-pay officers of that class could be found in any number—they would have in a few years a body of troops fit to do anything that could be required of them. But if those officers were to be appointed hereafter as they had been, they would only have so many men with muskets. Referring to the short-service system, he took exception to the proposal that men should be enlisted for 12 years, for he believed it to be a fatal mistake. Short service was of immense value. What they wanted was a small, thoroughly efficient body of soldiers—say 100,000—complete in every respect, ready to go anywhere and do anything; and in addition to that a large Reserve. The Reserve need not cost much, and they might have one of 300,000 well-drilled, efficient men, fit to take the field in any emergency, and who would make it absurd for any Power ever to dream of attacking this country. He was not enamoured of the Prussian system, but thought that three years would make a young man of 18 or 19 a good soldier, without making him a bad citizen; and if after that period he served a certain time in the Reserve and in the Militia, they might then have as fine a body of men as could be handled. They must, however, have a separate Army for India, for which the enlistment should be for 10 years. And this led him to ask, in reference to non-purchase, how they were to stop officers from exchanging? Some men could stand a hot climate and some a cold one, and vice versa, and it would be the greatest tyranny to say that officers should not exchange. Whatever they did with the Army, the secret of success was to make it contented and comfortable. Army reformers were often unfairly accused of wishing to cut down the defences of the country; whereas all that they really wanted to cut down was waste and extravagance. They desired to have a thoroughly good and effective Army, maintained with the greatest possible economy. Whenever the occasion arose for strengthening our forces, he believed that those Gentlemen to whom he had referred would be found as ready as any other party in that House to vote for the increased Supplies.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he thought that whatever differences of opinion might exist amongst them in respect to the details of a measure of such magnitude and importance as that before them, they must all acknowledge and appreciate the great labour and pains bestowed upon the question by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, as evinced by the brilliant speech he had made when introducing it the other evening. It was to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not acceded to the request made to him to divide the Bill into two parts—the first part dealing exclusively with the organization of the Army, and the second with the abolition of purchase. The question of organization he thought ought to precede that relating to the abolition of purchase, and the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) was extremely opportune, for it asked the House to hesitate before incurring enormous expense to abolish a system which, speaking generally, had worked well for the Army and for the country. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), a man of great experience, give such ample evidence of the benefits that had arisen from the purchase system. Their regimental system had been admitted to be almost as perfect as a regimental system well could be; and the most ardent advocates for the abolition of purchase would hardly say that their officers had failed in their duty, whether in looking after the comfort and discipline of their men in quarters, or in the example they had set them in the field. As he understood, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had not solved the problem of how promotion was to be kept up and a due infusion of young blood obtained for the service after the purchase system was extinguished. He was informed that there was at present a block in the Artillery. How was that to be remedied? Under the system of the old Indian service every officer was compelled, by a custom as strong as law, to pay annually so much to buy out old officers, and so essential was it deemed that something should be done that the Board of Directors actually sent out a Minute sanctioning purchase in a non-purchase service, and when he endeavoured to get justice for those officers on the amalgamation of the two services it was refused, because the Judges had decided that the act of the Company in issuing that Minute was illegal. In respect to the work of re-organization, the first thing the right hon. Gentleman had to do was to get good men to enter the service. He (Colonel Gilpin) had last Session given his opinion adverse to the right hon. Gentleman's plan of enlistment, and expressed his regret that before he had reduced his establishment he had not looked more carefully into the state of his Reserve forces. Neither in England nor in Ireland had the right hon. Gentleman been able to recruit the ranks of the Army up to their full complement. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to dissent from that statement; but he understood from the recruiting parties, and from the officers of regiments, that the class of recruits were not such as they had been in the habit of having. One of the right hon. Gentleman's pet projects was short enlistment; and that had not succeeded, because the bulk of those who offered themselves were for long and not for short service. So much the better; for the Duke of Wellington said that the old soldier was the bone, sinew, and strength of the British Army. He understood that the office of Commander-in-Chief was to be a permanent appointment, or, at least, not subject to the five years' limit, as was the office of Military Secretary, and he rejoiced that the Secretary for War had not listened on this point to the recommendations of a small but noisy section of the community. But there was another important office, that of Controller, the tenure of which had not been fixed as far as the House had heard. He congratulated the present holder of the office (Sir Henry Storks) in having at length found favour with a body of free and enlightened electors, and he congratulated the Government on having at length succeeded in their endeavours to secure for the Secretary for War that advice and support he was so thoroughly competent to give; but if the tenure of the office of Controller was to be limited by a fixed period of five years, the politics of the gentleman holding it must be elastic, or else, upon a change of Government, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, for instance, instead of being the fidus Achates to the Secretary of War, might be his bitter opponent. As regarded the Militia, he deprecated the proposal to remove patronage from the hands of the Lords Lieutenant, because if the Militia were to be a local force, the right hon. Gentleman must not disregard local influences. He was, however, glad to find that the Secretary for War had refrained from listening to those who had advised him to adopt the Ballot; because, before the privileges of the people were curtailed, the House should consider what the Militia had done, and what it was capable of doing. The hon. Member who had last spoken said the Militia had done little at present; but he reminded the House that during the Russian War the Militia sent 30,000 men to the Crimea; they released our Regular men from garrison duty, and they performed all the home duties both in England and Ireland. He took this opportunity of offering the right hon. Gentleman his thanks for what he had done in favour of the Militia. He (Colonel Gilpin) had received several applications for commissions in the regiment which he had the honour to command. If the right hon. Gentleman had only acted in time, he would have benefited the labour market as well as the regiments generally. He presumed that, after the Census had been taken this year, the Militia would be largely increased, and if this increase could be obtained by beat of drum, there was no need for compulsion. There was, however, one important matter he wished to bring before the right hon. Gentleman. The 27 days' training for inspection was about to commence; but that period would embrace three Sundays, and a certain proportion of wet days, so that the available time would hardly be sufficient to complete the course of musketry practice. Under these cases he hoped an extra week would be allowed, because under the present system he was convinced that much of the money expended for this purpose was thrown away. The proposal to saddle the country with the cost of additional Staff colonels to inspect the Reserve forces was quite beyond his comprehension, because already the country was mapped out into military districts, each commanded by a general officer with a number of colonels under him ready for the service. He would add only one word with respect to the Volunteers, of whom he always desired to speak with respect and admiration for their devotion to the public service. If the Volunteers were called out for a certain number of days in each year, paid for their services, and put under the Mutiny Act, their efficiency and discipline would be greatly increased. He should be happy to aid the right hon. Gentleman in his efforts to re-organize the military service; but he could not be a party to the enormous expenses which the abolition of the purchase system must involve—a system which, in his conscience, he believed had done great service to the country and to the Army.

MR. BUXTON said, he had come down to the House earnestly hoping he would hear arguments of sufficient weight to relieve him of the painful duty of voting against a party with which he had acted for 13 years; but no such arguments had been addressed to the House, and he had now only to state why he could not support the Government upon this occasion. He had come into the House almost extravagantly in favour of economy; but having well considered the present question, he would be no party to a measure that would entail a cost of £8,000,000 by the abolition of the purchase system. Moreover, no one had told them what would be the cost of the pensions which the abolition of purchase would necessitate. The calculations which the Government had not ventured to make had been made by private individuals, and he believed that if the sum mentioned were capitalized it would exceed £7,000,000. Everyone would see that if that system were abolished, under which large numbers of officers retired of their own accord every year, and if instead of that system a direct incentive were offered to officers to remain in the Army in the hopes of promotion, the result would be a large addition to the pension list. Putting the total cost at £12,000,000, no one would object to that expenditure if value was received for it; but it had not yet been proved that the country would get value for its £12,000,000. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), an enthusiast for the abolition of purchase, and a member of the Commission appointed to inquire into the subject, had said it was his firm conviction that after spending these £12,000,000 for the abolition of purchase it would revive again in its original form in a few years. Was the country to spend £12,000,000 for putting an end to that which competent authorities in favour of abolition believed would inevitably revive from the very first day of its abolition? The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Davison), who spoke for the first time from the Treasury Bench this evening, must be taken as giving expression to the views of the Government which put him up to speak, and that right hon. and learned Gentleman had appealed to the House not to be alarmed by the idea that the regimental system would be abolished. But the hon. Gentleman who spoke from the front Opposition Bench (Captain F. Stanley) had clearly shown that the regimental system was of essential value to the Army. If that esprit de corps were done away with which urged each regiment to excel its neighbour, whether at home or in the field, the British Army would be deprived of its most powerful stimulus. If the Volunteer service were treated as it was proposed to treat the Army—if its officers were to be passed from battalion to battalion, the service would go to pieces in 10 days. He maintained that any alterations in the regimental system would inevitably result in the destruction of that esprit de corps which acted as such an incentive as matters now stood. Fortunately, however, the Government had declared that there was no intention of abolishing the regimental system. But if that were not so it was evident that promotion would go on by selection within the regiment, and hon. Members could easily imagine what ill-feeling would be created supposing some lieutenant were selected as the cleverest officer in the regiment and promoted over the heads of those even higher in rank than himself. He contended that if they had the system of selection they must destroy the regimental system and make commissions interchangeable, the result of which, as he believed he had shown, would be to destroy that esprit de corps which was at present the pride of the British Army. If the British Army had broken down under the present system as the French Army had broken down he would not grudge £12,000,000, or even more, in effecting an alteration; but when they remembered that in the Peninsula, at Waterloo, in India, in the Crimea—everywhere, indeed, except in the shameful war against our brethren in America

—our Army had been uniformly victorious, he could not help thinking that the necessity for the change had not been shown. There were many who advocated the abolition of the purchase system under the impression that the Army was an aristocratic institution, and that, somehow or another, with the abolition of purchase it would become a more popular institution and more democratic. No one sympathized more warmly than he did in any movement which had for its object the raising of the social standing of what were falsely called the working classes of the country. If he thought that the effect of abolishing purchase would be to raise the social standing or promote the well-being of the lower or middle classes, the cost of the alteration should not deter him from voting in its favour. But he did not believe that this would be the result, while he also felt convinced that after the expenditure of this £12,000,000 purchase would revive and commissions would still be sought by those who sought them now. It was only the other day that he had glanced at the Army List, when he found that, with an exception here and there, the names of the colonels and lieutenant colonels, for instance, were not the names of men belonging to the aristocracy, but the names of men who belonged to the middle classes. General Simpson, who took Sebastopol; Havelock, who served with such distinction in India, and Lord Clyde were none of them scions of noble houses. He felt convinced that after spending all this money we should find that we did not gain what we were seeking, and he could not therefore feel justified in voting for the expenditure of a sum of money which, if applied to the reduction of taxation, would so much add to the comfort of the people, and especially to the comfort of the working classes; and he should, on that account, though with great regret, vote against the Bill introduced by the Government. He regretted, too, having to vote against his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan), whose Motion with reference to the Commander-in-Chief he had a few days since supported. He might add, before sitting down, that his vote on that occasion had been given in no feeling of personal hostility to the present illustrious occupant of that office, but purely on the abstract consideration that it was undesirable so important a post should be a life appointment.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT said, that having been but recently elected, it was with no little diffidence that he rose to ask the indulgence of the House whilst he stated his opinions on this important question. He should have not done more than record his silent vote had he not felt it desirable that every practical officer should make his opinions heard within the walls of that House, and by practical he meant officers actually serving, as he himself was. Not that he expected this would give much weight to his opinion with the Treasury Bench. On the contrary, perhaps, it might have exactly the opposite effect. He said this in no disrespectful spirit, but he could not help remembering that a most important measure in connection with the Army was recently passed against the unanimous military opinion of the House, with the exception of that of the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian). Whatever might be the merits or demerits of this Bill, there could be little doubt that its fate would be decided and its acceptance or rejection determined by the attitude which hon. Members might take up with regard to the question of purchase. He did not mean as to the good or bad points of the purchase system itself, but as to the opinion which they might form of the propriety of the time selected by the Ministry for proposing its abolition, and of the mode in which their scheme provided for the replacing of the purchase system by any other method of officering the Army. His objections to the Bill were two-fold—first, on account of the enormous expense which would be necessary to carry it into effect and to meet the just claims and vested interests of officers now serving; and, secondly, because no method was proposed for preventing that stagnation of promotion which was so detrimental to the efficiency of the service. His hon. and gallant Friend who brought forward this Motion (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) had alluded to the great expense which would be attendant on the abolition of purchase; but had not alluded to another very costly element—the effect which the Bill would have upon the military labour market. He himself had been but a very few days in the House; but during that time he had heard a speech delivered by the hon. Member for Brighton

Mr. Burton

(Mr. Fawcett) upon the absurdity of expecting highly educated young men to enter a profession in which they were expected at starting to live on a miserable pittance of £240 a-year. Much better, he thought, live on £240 a-year than starve on £70 a-year, which was the position in which young men found themselves on first obtaining commissions in the Army. If this Bill became law it would be necessary to raise the incomes of junior officers to an amount which would enable them to live as gentlemen, for, though talented and well educated, they would probably be for the most part men of very small private means. Otherwise, the inducements to enter the Army would be very small indeed, notwithstanding the attraction of wearing Her Majesty's uniform, and the prospective honour and glory of being shot in defence of their country. Increase of their pay would, of course, make itself felt through every grade of the Army; and, though the item of pay formed but a small portion of the Army Estimates, by the abolition of the purchase system it would be very materially increased. The Secretary of State for War had told them that promotion would be much accelerated by the substitution of the public purse for private purses. What had the public purse done for the scientific and non-purchase corps, to which he had the honour, or, perhaps, he should say the misfortune, to belong? And he used the word "misfortune," because he thought that the Ministry were not at all alive to the very great detriment to the efficiency of those corps arising from the stagnation of promotion. He by no means came forward as an advocate of the purchase system. On the contrary, he was prepared to support any scheme for its abolition which at the same time would secure a flow of promotion, and recognize the just claims of vested interests. But such was not the case with the present Bill, which unsettled what existed without determining that which was to take its place. He must accordingly give his vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. HEADLAM said, that during the time when he had the honour of being officially connected with the Army, he had occasion more than once to consider the question of purchase, and he was desirous of stating to the House the conclusions at which he had arrived upon the subject. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) had no need to make an apology for introducing an abstract Resolution on the second reading of the Bill, because the subject of purchase was so important that it was desirable that the House should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this question alone, without having it mixed up with the general question of the second reading of the Bill. It was scarcely possible to exaggerate the importance of the abolition of the system of purchase, whether regarded in its effects upon the Army, or in its effects upon the Estimates in the sum that would have to be paid by the taxpayers of the country. First, so far as the Army was concerned, they could not help recollecting that the present system of purchase, whether it was good or bad in itself, had formed part of the constitution of the Army since the time when first a Regular Army was established in this country. We were about to establish the Army on a new basis. Again, so far as the taxpayers were concerned, we were about to spend, according to the Government, £8,000,000, and according to Gentlemen opposite, £12,000,000. These were matters deserving the grave consideration of Gentlemen below the Gangway. He entertained a strong opinion that the purchase system was bad and vicious in itself; so much so, that he had sometimes thought himself of bringing forward a measure for the abolition of the purchase system. But he had been met by two arguments which always seemed to him too strong for an independent Member to grapple with. The first was that, be the system of purchase bad or good, the Army had flourished under it, and had deserved well of the country. The other argument was that, although the abolition of the system would involve a very large outlay, nobody would be thankful for it, but, on the contrary, many persons would consider themselves aggrieved by the change. Though he was unable, personally, to vote for the Amendment, he assured the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had moved it that he did not, in the slightest degree, concur with those who cast censure upon him for the Motion. No man was better qualified to speak of the deeds of the Army than the hon. and gallant Gentleman in his own person. In spite of what might have been said at public meetings, he thought this country had every reason to be proud of its Army. At all former periods of history, it could bear comparison with Continental armies, and it had done its duty upon every field on which it fought. Without going back to historic periods, it was sufficient to call to mind the fact that, in modern times, the British Army had been tried in many serious campaigns—in the Crimea, in India, in Abyssinia, and everywhere it had gallantly done its duty. And although it might be true that the officers were nurtured in luxury, and that many of them belonged to the rich and aristocratic classes, yet we know that not only, as might have been expected, have they never avoided the dangers of war; but what was not so certain, considering their previous habits, they have borne cheerfully, and without complaint, the evils and privations incidental to war. Besides that, they had done what was the greatest possible achievement on the part of an officer, they had won for themselves the confidence and loyalty, and, in many cases, to use a stronger expression, the affection of the troops under their command. Now, when the Government came forward, and made a distinct proposal on the subject, the House had to consider whether sufficient cause had been shown for the abolition of the purchase system. In arguing the matter, he must draw a distinction between the regulation and the over-regulation prices. The Resolution was to the effect that neither should be done away with; whereas the proposal of the Government was to abolish both. Now, the fact was that regulation prices and over-regulation prices by no means stood on the same footing, and he wished it to be clearly understood that the arguments he was about first to adduce were applicable to the regulation prices only. Many years ago he came to the conclusion that the regulation system, under which the country received a certain sum of money from the persons it admitted to its service, was an essentially vicious one, not creditable to a great country; one that ought to be put an end to; and he came to this conclusion, although he was not prepared to say the system might not confer some pecuniary benefit on the country. The Secretary of State for War put forward as his chief argument that it was necessary to do away with the system of purchase, because the country had decided upon an amalgamation between the Regular forces and the Militia. "And," said the right hon. Gentleman, "it will be necessary either to do away with the system of purchase in the Army or to establish it in the Militia." For his own part, he confessed that argument had never crossed his mind, and he gave his right hon. Friend great credit for his ingenuity in devising it. Far be it from him, however, to say that there was not some force in it. It struck him, however, that this argument was more Parliamentary and popular than substantial. The House was, more or less, committed to Army reorganization; and therefore, to those who wished to abolish purchase, it was a very good way of putting it, to say that we could not get a better reorganization until purchase was first got rid of. If, however, the system of purchase was a good thing in itself, he thought the difficulties incident to reorganization might be obtained without the abolition of it, and that we should be able to get a sufficiently good reorganization without paying £8,000,000 for it. The ground on which he had always felt that the system of purchase in the Army could not be defended was that, as he had stated, it was wrong and discreditable on the part of the State, and that it produced many hardships and great injustice as regarded the officers. We learn from the Report that, at the time the system of purchase in the Army was introduced it prevailed also in the Civil Service, and he confessed his inability to comprehend why, if it were right in the Army, it should be wrong in the Civil Service. If every right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench paid a certain sum on entering office, the State would have derived a pecuniary advantage from the transaction precisely as it did from the Army at the present moment. In his time the office of Secretary of State for War had been created. If a system analogous to that which prevailed in the Army existed in the Civil Service, the last Secretary of State for War would have paid £5,000 for his place to the State, and each successive Secretary of State, on coming into office, would have paid this sum to his predecessor leaving office. He had no doubt that Ministers would have done their duty under such a system in the same way that officers in the Army did their duty; but the system itself would be no less false and harsh, and he, for one, would have been quite willing to the payment of a large sum to get rid of it. He did not think there was any difference in principle between the State and a private employer. Suppose a banker, or the head of a mercantile establishment, borrowed money from every clerk in his employment, and used it in discharge of his obligations, leaving it to the clerks who had thus paid their money to the firm to obtain repayment from those who succeeded them. Everyone would have admitted the impropriety of this practice, and would expect that the firm would come to a bad end. And if the firm had succeeded, it would be held that its success was in spite of the viciousness of the principle rather than in consequence of it. He had always felt that the system of purchase, so far as the State became a borrower from those it employed, was one that could not be maintained. He was prepared to show some of the hardships that arose out of the system. It was said by his right hon. Friend that, under the purchase system, an officer killed in action would not now lose the money he had paid to the State in respect of his commission. This was in consequence of the Royal Warrant of 1856; but the contrary was the effect of the original system of purchase. During the Crimean War so many cases were brought under his notice of the extreme hardship of officers being compelled to go into active service with the weight of the money they had expended hanging round their necks, that he determined on bringing the subject before Parliament. He moved a Resolution, in 1855, declaring it to be the opinion of the House that the regulation value of the commission should be paid to the representatives of officers killed in action. The House was with him; but, as frequently happened, the Government, in order to avoid something in the nature of a hostile Division, came forward with certain proposals, and he refrained from dividing on the Motion. The promise given by the Government was to the effect, that when an officer died in active service his representatives should either receive the regulation value of his commission or a pension. A Royal Warrant was issued in consequence of that promise; but shortly afterwards he felt it to be his duty to draw the attention of the House to the unsatisfactory manner in which the promises made had been fulfilled, and unless the Royal Warrant had been altered, which he believed had not been the case, it had become an absolute absurdity, and had done scarcely any good in the Army. He alluded to these facts as one of the incidental hardships arising out of the system of purchase, and he believed that, with few exceptions, when an officer went into active service he not only risked his life, but also the loss of the money he had paid for his commission. When a young man entered the Army he paid his money under the expectation that a certain system would be carried out, and it was one great evil of the system that it was construed one way by those who paid, and another by the State who received the money. Great discontent was occasioned by the fact that when an augmentation of the Army took place the State sold commissions, instead of granting them, to non-purchase officers, and when a diminution took place there was always great heart-burning, because officers were squeezed out of the service and placed in positions to which they had never looked forward. He held in his hand a letter from Colonel Hart, the editor of the Army List, which stated that, under the purchase system, a non-purchase officer often rose from the junior to the senior rank in half the time he could under the non-purchase system. Colonel Hart added that he was in favour of the reform, and not of the abolition of the purchase system. He also mentioned individual instances, and stated that in every case there was no way of getting an answer from the War Office. What the War Office did was this — They said the matter was decided by the Treasury, and that there were no means of entering into the question with the Treasury as to whether their decision was or was not in accordance with the system of purchase. Now, suppose that a banking company took money from their clerks, and that on a question arising the company allowed no appeal from their decision, but were advocate and judge in their own case, could such a system be considered just? That was an additional reason why the State should not traffic in money with those whom it employed. He was therefore prepared to go to the extent of making a sacrifice by paying sufficient to get rid of the regulation portion of the system of purchase? That would involve a very much less sum than the Government asked for. [Sir GEORGE GREY: £3,500,000.] It might be £3,000,000 or £3,500,000; but he did not think an accurate calculation could be made on the subject; but even at that sacrifice he was prepared to abolish the system. He fully agreed, too, with those who held that if it was to be done it was better it should be done quickly. He came now to the non-regulation price. The payment of the over-regulation price stood upon a perfectly different principle. How was it that the non-regulation prices had grown up? They had grown up out of two principles now in force in the Army — one was that promotion, Army as well as regimental, went with promotion in the regiment; and the other was that, as a general rule, it went within the regiment according to seniority. These regulations made it the clear interest of the officers in every regiment to expedite promotion in their regiment as much as possible; and hence the practice grew up for the junior officers to subscribe and induce their seniors to retire. This practice was the immediate certain consequence of the regulations — there was no particular harm in the practice, and if the State had made rules which led to such a practice, it could not complain of the consequences. Now, the payment of over-regulation prices had, at all times, been prohibited, and formerly very stringent rules had been laid down to prevent the growth and continuance of the practice, but whilst the general rules concerning promotion led almost necessarily to the practice, prohibitions to the contrary had proved nugatory. In modern times the practice had been recognized and acquiesced in. Under these circumstances, he could not agree with those who would at one and the same time alter the system of promotion under which officers had been led into these payments, and refuse them compensation for what they had paid. If promotion by seniority be abolished, and promotion by selection be adopted, over-regulation prices must be paid. Then arose the question, was the introduction of the principle of selection worth the price it was proposed to pay for it — for it was the principle of selection alone which rendered it necessary to pay over-regulation prices? But, if promotion by seniority, as a general rule, be maintained, then there was no reason why our regulation prices should be paid. It was the proposal to adopt the principle of selection which caused all the discontent; and this discontent would not be healed even by the payment of over-regulation prices. Men had subscribed and paid their money on the faith of the rules of the service, in the hope, and with the object of obtaining ultimately the command of their regiments. It would not satisfy them for the Government to say to them—"You may take yourselves off, and leave the service, and then we will return you your money." They did not wish to leave the service. They wished to continue in the service, and get the promotion for which they had both served and had paid. It was the adoption of the principle which caused all the difficulty, gave rise to the discontent, and entailed the necessity of paying the over-regulation prices. The question for the House to consider was whether the principle was worth the cost. Now, how stood the matter with respect to this principle of selection? Some years ago the Duke of Cambridge had given evidence before a Select Committee of this House, concerning the great difficulties and serious objections incident to a system of selection. This opinion had been animadverted upon strongly before the country by his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs, and it had been seriously asked that for giving such an opinion the tenure of the office of Commander in Chief should be altered. He trusted that the time would never come when anyone, whether a Royal Duke or the humblest person in the realm, would suffer for giving a conscientious opinion, whether right or wrong, before a Committee of this House. To confess the truth, he agreed with that opinion. He thought that there were infinite difficulties in adopting the principle of selection. The House must recollect that the question it will have to decide was, whether it was worth while to pay so large a sum, and excite so much discontent, for the purpose of rejecting the system of promotion by seniority, and adopting the principle of selection. Recollect that in the Artillery and Engineers, the system of seniority was strictly and sternly enforced, and yet the Artillery and Engineers were held up as the best force in the Army. The course the Government should adopt was — pay the regulation prices at once, and be done with it. Get the State out of the false position in which it is now placed. We shall then have done all that is really necessary. Let the system of promotion continue, not materially different from what it is at present. Thus, millions would be saved to the taxpayer, the amalgamation of the Line and the Militia might be accomplished, and the discontent of the Army would be appeased.

MAJOR GENERAL SIR PERCY HERBERT said, he thought there were matters in the Bill which would require many nights' debate, independently of the question of the abolition of purchase in the Army. On a former occasion, when the question of abolition of purchase was being discussed, he had stated that he had no objection to accept the principle of the abolition of purchase if qualified by two provisos. The first being that the efficiency of the Army should be guarded by a good system of retirement, which would prevent it from degenerating in consequence of the old age of the junior officers; and the second being that the Government should deal faithfully with the vested interests of the officers. One of these provisos, that of the retirement of officers, was completely shirked by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and the other was one which he was quite sure the House of Commons would have no desire to deal with lightly or ungenerously, and he believed that such a sentiment would find acceptance below the Gangway on the other side of the House. The Secretary of State for War had very handsomely admitted that the over-regulation prices must be dealt with in the same way as he proposed to deal with the regulation prices. Let the House consider for a moment what the system of purchase was. There had been a great deal of misapprehension and of misconception out-of-doors upon this subject. The system of purchase was not, as had been popularly supposed, the putting up a commission for sale to the highest bidder, although many hon. Members in their speeches delivered in the country had adopted that view of the subject. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had made a statement to that effect not in the heat of debate, but deliberately in a speech which he had subsequently printed and published in the form of a pamphlet. That was a total misconception of the purchase system as it was now in force. The truth was, that the senior officer on the list, whether he were captain or lieutenant, could not be passed over by any junior officer, provided he was possessed of the regulation price, if he chose to enforce his right. That was a fact perfectly well known in the Army, and it was rather too bad that Members of the House of Commons, whose remarks on the subject were faithfully and fully accepted by those whom they addressed at public meetings, should make such statements, which, if made in the House would be contradicted and put right in five minutes. Let him now say what, in his opinion, the purchase system really was. In the scheme of retirement it had been found to be the only means of securing a proper flow of young officers to the Army, because it had supplemented the amount paid from the public purse, and so made it worth the while of officers to retire earlier than they would have done otherwise. The Secretary of State said the other day that the efficiency of the non-purchase corps had been seriously compromised by the slowness which existed there, in spite of the enormous increase in the Royal Artillery during the last 30 years, and considerable retirements on full pay which had been offered from time to time by the Government. The country had recognised the system of officers entering the Army by paying for the retirement of their predecessors; but the money which they would be entitled to receive on the abolition of purchase was now employed in paying the retiring allowances of those men who, from ill-health or advanced age, had become unfit for the service. The object of purchase had been fully attained, for they had had in the purchase corps younger men than in any other branch of the service. He recollected that at one time promotion in the Marines—a non-purchase corps—was so slow that a captain had a son in the service. It was evident that a man who was old enough to have a grown-up son in the service, was not fit to go through the fatigue of handling his company in the field. The Government said with some force that the present system was bad, because as officers barely got back the interest of their money it was an unpaid service. But they were not going to abolish this evil, because the money for which they asked the House would not go to the officers, but would in a great part be withheld until even so distant a time as the year 1900. There would be another disadvantage under the proposed scheme, for those officers who had not paid for their commissions would be in a better financial position than the officers who had entered the Army under the present system, and who would serve alongside of them. Hitherto the Government had always allowed old soldiers to enjoy any advantages which might be held out to younger men. It might be said—"Oh, the officers now serving could not get back their money under the present system." No doubt that was true, and if matters remained in their present position they would not put forward any claim to it; but if a serious alteration was made in the conditions of service a clean sweep must be made, and the officers repaid all the money they had invested in the purchase of their commissions. Under the scheme of the Government, officers would be open to the disadvantage of obtaining their promotion with a regiment different from the one in which they had served, rather than submit to which many officers would prefer to leave the service. A captain who chooses to remain in the service under the present system is sure to get his lieutenant colonelcy in course of time, and after 20 years' service he is entitled to retire, receiving the full price of his commissions—£4,500 for a lieutenant colonelcy—whether he obtained them with or without purchase. By doing so he gives up all claim to the half-pay of £200 a-year. Under this Bill, however, he is on quite a different footing, for he will only be allowed to receive the price of a captain's commission which he holds when the Bill passes—namely, £1,800 in lieu of £4,500 which he would get under the existing system. It is evident that £1,800 is no equivalent for the £200 per annum half-pay which he must relinquish in order to obtain it; that the offer to repay him is illusory; and that the £1,800 he has paid for his commission will practically be confiscated. Therefore the boasted generosity of the Government amounted to this—that only those now at the top of the tree, or those who retired at once in the rank they now hold, would ever have the option of getting back their money at all, because it was manifestly a losing bargain that was offered them by the Government. Here, again, the question of retirement must come under consideration, inasmuch as when officers were forced to remain regimental promotion became clogged. Our boast had been that our service was voluntary; but this Bill would introduce compulsion. Until now there had been no bar to an officer's selling his commission and leaving his regiment, unless the country was in danger and required his services. The Secretary of State proposed to add another condition. He would say—"It is very true that the country is not in danger and your services can be spared; but I have no money in the till; I have overdrawn my account; and what is more, your regiment is in Hong Kong or Jamaica, so perhaps you will die, and that will settle the account; there will be no claim upon the country." Last year the right hon. Gentleman said he knew nothing about purchase. He proclaimed himself the Lord Dundreary of the War Office, and said—"It was a question that no fellow could understand." He (Sir Percy Herbert) thought at that time that the right hon. Gentleman done himself an injustice, and that he perhaps wished to get rid of a troublesome subject by making an indifferent joke. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman repeated that view in a new form, and said that none but a prophet could tell what retirement would be required for the Army after the abolition of purchase. [Mr. CARDWELL: Hear, hear!] That was, no doubt, avoiding the difficulty, and leaving it to be dealt with by another Secretary for War; but he begged to remind the House that it had a duty to perform, and should not be drawn away by the cheers and jokes of the Secretary of State. It was perfectly clear that, on the abolition of purchase, if the Army is to be kept efficient, a retirement scheme must be found. The Government ought not to throw the work of devising such a scheme upon others; it would only be straightforward on the part of Government to tell the House what they thought would be necessary. The right hon. Gentleman knew, or could easily ascertain, the rules and regulations in the Indian Army, which consisted of non-purchase corps, and the same remark applied to the Artillery and Engineers at home; so there was no excuse for the Government asking Parliament to legislate in the dark on the question. With regard to the second part of the Bill, let him say, speaking as a soldier, that he did not object in the abstract to the abolition of purchase, and more especially did he not object to a scheme of military re-organization. He thought the country would make a bad bargain, financially, by the abolition of purchase; but he did not believe that, in consequence of the change, any injury need be done to the service, or that a different class of officers would come in. He trusted that the Government would reconsider their proposals, for he was unwilling even to appear to oppose the second reading of a Bill not only for the abolition of purchase, but for the re-organization of the Army. It was the desire of his heart to see the Army and the Militia well organized for the defence of the nation. He had hoped to see that some things sketched and touched upon in this Bill, had been efficiently provided for in the Bill or in the Estimates; but he did not think they had been dealt with in a very broad and comprehensive spirit. At the same time, he was most unwilling to be forced into an opposition to the Bill. He perfectly approved of the system of transferring the first appointment in the Militia from the Lords Lieutenant to the Commander-in-Chief. But what the abolition of purchase had to do with this transference he was at a loss to conceive. The difficulty had been in obtaining young officers to serve as subalterns. He maintained that the numbers to be provided, which the right hon. Gentleman provided for the Militia, were not sufficient. He did not want to see any large increase of the Army. He wanted to see a strong increase of the Reserve, and a strong increase in the establishment of the Militia. From a letter he had received from a colonel of Militia he learned that a great many of the Militia Reserve would not be fit for the service for which they were specially intended, in consequence of so many having joined since the restrictions as to height, size of chest, and soundness were done away with. Another objection relating to the provisions dealing with the Militia was, that there was no provision made for the training of the Militia recruits for any extra time. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech the other night, spoke of training them for three months only, and in his Bill he took power for training them for six months, which he (Sir Percy Herbert) quite approved of. But in the Estimates no provision was made for such periods of training. He could only see £70,000 put down in the Estimates to train recruits; and that sum, according to his calculation, would only train 14,000 men for three months. Now, 14,000 men was not the number of men they would have to deal with; and, therefore, it was evident it was not intended to train them for more than one month. Then, with regard to the first Reserve, that Reserve is stated at 9,000 men, and even then it was manifestly insufficient. When a reduction had to be made, recruiting was stopped, and the standard was raised so high that men could not come in. We did not offer sufficient inducements to bring out the best class of men for recruits. [Mr. CARDWELL: I have increased the inducement.] He was very glad to hear that. During the last six months the right hon. Gentleman had had admirable success in recruiting. He had obtained 25,000 recruits. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would go on recruiting year by year, and fill up the Army of Reserve by thoroughly trained men. He ventured to tell the House a fact brought to his knowledge, bearing upon the importance and value of a real Reserve of trained soldiers. Last autumn he had gone over to France to see what he could of this extraordinary Prussian Army. A general officer, commanding a division engaged in the blockade of Metz, told him that the day the orders were telegraphed to him to mobilize his division, and move it to the front, his division was about 100 miles to the eastward of Berlin. His division was then on a peace footing of 7,500, and in 15 days from the receipt of the order his division was brought up to 15,000 men, all fully equipped and trained soldiers, and moved across Prussia to Saarbrück, and it was one of the divisions which took part in the battle of Spichern one week later. There was no reason why our own Army, in proportion to its size, should not be as efficient. It was not a Prussian Army he wanted; but our Army ought to be as efficient as any one of the 12 or 13 corps d'armée of Prussia. If one thing more than another was wanted for the purpose of making young raw men, such as Militia recruits must be, into soldiers, it was the establishment of Militia barracks. And how did the right hon. Gentleman propose to deal with that subject? He put two or three clauses in the Bill to enable quarter sessions to borrow money for building barracks; but why on earth did he do so? Barracks were a part of the national defence. And the right hon. Gentleman did this at a time when everybody was complaining of local taxation. The clauses in question would be mere waste paper. That was another instance of the Government attempting to shove responsibility off their shoulders. He, as a Member of Parliament, would certainly oppose any money being borrowed in his county. He gave notice that he would move in Committee the omission of those clauses touching on this point. It would be as reasonable to ask the country to revert to the old system of asking a maritime county to provide a ship of war. That was a custom of the time of Elizabeth, and he thought it was worthy to be placed along side of this proposal about Militia barracks. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman ask the metropolitan ratepayers to provide a barrack similar to that at Chelsea? It was because he (Sir Percy Herbert) was most unwilling in any kind of way to oppose the organization of the Army—it was because he was unwilling to oppose the abolition of purchase, if it was properly dealt with, that he hoped some indication would be given by Ministers, in the course of this debate, which would render it unnecessary for him to oppose the second reading of the Bill. But he would not be doing his duty, either as a soldier or as a Member of Parliament, if he were to sanction a Bill which struck at the efficiency of the Army by doing away with the only system of retirement now in existence, without a substitute, or that would sanction so gross an injustice to the officers and Army as to force them to serve upon new terms, without paying them back the money they had actually disbursed.

MR. WHITBREAD observed that it was quite true as the right hon. Baronet

the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) had said that the Commission of 1870, over which he had presided, was asked for no opinion and gave none; but, at the same time, the Report of that Commission was accepted unanimously, partly because the history of the matter led to no other conclusion than that which the Government had arrived at. The conclusion was that it was impossible now, in 1871, to separate the over-regulation price from the regulation price. Now, what did his right hon. Friend (Mr. Headlam) invite the House to do? The Government and the country having made a commission a subject of sale and barter, his right hon. Friend proposed that they should attempt to fix a price at which that sale was to take effect. Again, the Government might tell an officer the regulation price of a step was so much. But could he get the step without paying the over-regulation price? Surely not, and yet his right hon. Friend proposed to separate the two things. He would like to see his right hon. Friend on the Treasury Bench trying to carry a scheme of that kind through the House, a scheme based on the refusal to pay the over-regulation price. He had listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Colonel Loyd Lindsay). It was a temperate and generous speech. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that this question should be far removed from party, and he wished the gallant Second (Colonel White) had seen it in the same light, because then he would not have made what was a reckless and cruel assertion, coming from that side—that the Government had taken up this matter merely as a means of strengthening their party. The truth was that the proposal to do away with purchase was not acceptable to the Army now; but a year or two hence it would be recognized as a very great boon. It was not a proposal which could be very acceptable to the taxpayers. To what quarter, therefore, could the Government look for support, unless to those who, seeing the serious events of the last six months, wished to place the Army of England on an efficient footing? He had himself never been moved by sentimental arguments on either side of the question. He had never voted for the abolition of purchase, or believed that it was a class question, or that it was a gross injustice to the poor man, or that it kept men from rising from the ranks, or that it had given us anything but the very finest material in the world for our officers. He quite admitted certain advantages in the system of purchase. He did not know what the calculations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) were as to the cost of abolition; but he agreed with him that the amount was not to be limited by the actual price paid for the commissions. There was behind another, and quite as serious a question—the question of retirement. Anyone who knew anything about retirement in the Navy must admit it. The gallant Officer quoted the words of a French marshal who had the greatest opportunities of judging between our system and the French system, and his advice was not to follow the French system. But did the one hang upon the other? Not at all. It had been suggested that there was a danger of the system of purchase cropping up again. He did not think it was a danger with which Parliament would ever have to deal. If purchase ever cropped up again it would be more in the shape of a mode of facilitating retirement—something given out of pay in order to create a greater inducement to retire. Then the gallant Officer thought a different class of men would enter the Army. But why? Would any hon. Gentleman oppose object to his son entering the Army because he could not purchase promotion, but must enter into competition with his fellows? What class would have a better chance in the competition than those who now filled the rank of officers in the Army? The gallant Officer had said that the system of selection must interfere with the regimental system. Now, everyone who had studied the history of the British Army must know the value attached to the regimental system. But was it necessary that the system of selection should be so ruthlessly exercised as to put an end to the regimental system? And had hon. Gentlemen never heard of such a thing as exchanging from one regiment to another now? The gallant Officer had seen something of the Prussian system actually at work, and what was his argument? It might be summarized thus—"The Prussian Army system has been a magnificent success; the French

system has broken down; therefore, I counsel you, do not adopt the system of the Government, which has almost everything in common with the Prussian system, and nothing with the French." That was literally the argument of the gallant Colonel. He admitted the difficulties of the question; but he felt so sure—and in that respect he entirely agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who spoke first in the debate—that what we wanted now in our Army was organization, that he should give his support to the proposal of the Government. It was because the system of purchase blocked the way, and that those who wished to effect reforms in our military system found themselves led into a trap and checkmated by it, without a move left upon the board—that he, for one, should vote in favour of its abolition. If we were satisfied with the condition of our Army as it stood, and that no further change was to be made when purchase was abolished, then we ought not to ask the country to pay the gigantic sum which was necessary for the purpose. But if we were anxious to have reform and organization, and to have the different branches of the Army brought into harmony with one another, the first step which we must take was to sweep away the system of purchase. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who spoke last had told the House what purchase was, and what it was not, and he concurred with him in his definition of what it was not. It was not putting up a commission to the highest bidder; but he must differ from the hon. and gallant Gentleman when he said that an officer who offered the regulation price could not be passed over, and might insist on his rights. [Major General Sir PERCY HERBERT: Without his own consent.] Now, that was but a very partial and a very technical statement of the case. It was, of course, quite true that the officer who paid the regulation price could not be passed over; but then he could not always get the officer above him to leave, so that he was not in a position to rise himself. [Major General Sir PERCY HERBERT: He cannot be purchased over.] No; but he could not insist on his right and could not get his step. What under those circumstances sometimes happened was that the step went into another regiment. The most distinct evidence upon that point had been given before the Commission, and the hon. and gallant General had clearly overstated the case. But he went on to say—Conceive when this Bill passes the hardships which will be inflicted, and the ill-feeling which will be created between those officers who receive promotion in the Army by means of competition and selection, and who are serving side by side with the purchase officers. As things at present stood, however, were not the purchasing and the non-purchasing officer serving side by side? He concurred with those who thought there would be some difficulty in working out the proposals of the Government with respect to the retirement, and if he believed those prophets of evil who predicted that if the Bill before the House were to pass into law, the rank, culture, intelligence, and wealth of the country would no longer be found in the Army, he should greatly hesitate before he recorded his vote in favour of the second reading. But had, he would ask, the profession of arms no charms for us beyond that of being, for the most part, one which the rich only could hope to enter? To suppose that would be to suppose that this was one of the most degenerate of nations. The military had been, and must always be, one of the grandest of professions, and he, for one, could not imagine that because admission into that service was no longer a question of sale and barter, the best and most promising of our youth would hesitate to join its ranks. Was it because when they did join they were to be placed in keen competition with their fellows that hon. Members would not allow their sons to enter it? Surely, they did not think so meanly of those who were near and dear to them? His belief was that when they got rid of this abominable money question—it was a low, paltry, niggling consideration—if they once made a bold step and got rid of the difficulty, they would have some chance, not only of making the service still more acceptable and more delightful to those who had served in it, and those who would now join it, but they would have the opportunity of rendering it the most intelligent, the most cultured, and the strongest Army in the world.

CAPTAIN TALBOT: Sir, I trust I may be allowed to make a few remarks upon this Bill; and, as one of the few officers upon full pay in this House, although I do not presume to speak in the name of the profession, still, as one of those personally interested in this scheme, the House will, perhaps, kindly bear with me. Now, Sir, the first question that I ask myself on reading the Bill, and after listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is, does it provide for the "better regulation of the land forces?" does it provide for the best regulation that can be devised? does it insure such an improvement that our land forces may be welded into one homogeneous organization? and, above all, does it insure such an organization that, in case of imminent danger, the whole force can be mobilized on a war footing with rapidity, and systematically without confusion? I say, Sir, that unless every one of these questions can be answered in the affirmative, that the Bill does not meet the demands of the day, and that we should be failing in our duty if we allowed this great opportunity to pass without placing the nation in such a state of defence as the occasion calls for. I say great opportunity, for at last public attention is roused, and we have the force of the terrible example in the fate of France to warn us of what may be our lot should we, too, live on in a self-complacent sense of security. With regard to the mobilization of our forces, without which numbers are of no avail, perhaps I may be allowed to quote from a pamphlet just published in Berlin by an Englishman, an officer in the Prussian cavalry. He says—

"In time of peace all is held in readiness, in order that an Army may be made mobile on the shortest notice—i. e., placed on a war footing and marched into the field, &c., &c. . . . Each commander of a corps de armée augments his corps quite separately; he not only has to see that the necessary number of men are called out, but that everything that a corps would require in the field be supplied. In this manner it is possible to place the whole Army on a war footing in 14 days."

Now, I should like to ascertain how far we fall short of such perfection of organization? Does the Bill, does the speech that explained the Bill, give or show any prospect of such a desirable result? I fear not. It is of the utmost importance that our shortcomings should be measured; and I should be glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman had ordered, without notice, without preparation, the whole available force in the kingdom—Regulars, Militia,

Captain Talbot

Volunteers—to assemble in 14 days on Salisbury Plain, or some other open space, in every respect as if upon a campaign, and entirely dependant upon its own resources—complete in its transport services, commissariat, &c., and with medical and hospital arrangements, upon a scale that would be requisite in war. Such a test could not fail to be most instructive to officers and to men; and, if successful, most satisfactory to the nation—and, if not, would give a knowledge of shortcomings and defects, instead of waiting for the disastrous experience of actual warfare. I hope that some of the £177,000 I notice as an increase in the Transport Vote is intended for some such purpose. Now, Sir, with regard to the first portion of the Bill, it is entirely devoted to the abolition of purchase. I fear that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs will not credit any officer who has been demoralized "with bargaining in commissions" with any patriotic spirit, or with any other than a spirit of selfish love and self-advancement; but I hope the House will believe that I have endeavoured to approach this subject impartially and without prejudice. With respect to the abolition of purchase, it seems to me that before a system which has stood the test of past experience, and especially in times of war, which has provided the Army with officers competent for their duties without charge to the country, and with satisfaction to themselves—I say before it is abolished we ought to have some assurance that its substitute will contain none of its defects, and will have no greater defects of its own. Very little has been urged against the present system, except individual cases of injustice, which will happen under any system, and that men unfit for promotion are placed over the heads of those who are fit—an event that can never occur if the rules of the service are carried out. In theory it is objected to as demoralizing to officers to have to bargain for their appointments; but in the same breath we are told by Royal Commissions, supported in opinion by the right hon. Gentleman, that the country has been well served by its officers and in a manner highly creditable to them. Surely there is some contradiction here. Well, granted that there are defects in the present system which might be remedied, what is proposed in its place? I will not say a word as to the pecuniary terms offered, for, being personally interested, I think the House will be of opinion that it would be better taste on my part to leave alone that part of the subject to those not interested; and I am quite content to leave it in the hands of hon. and gallant Members, especially of the gallant Member for Bewdley (Major Anson), who has done such good and distinguished service with the Army in the field, and for the Army in Parliament. What is the new system proposed? Seniority and selection — seniority means stagnation, selection means favouritism (or fancied favouritism almost as pernicious); discontent, and stagnation, unless some forced retirement is adopted, which means injustice and expense. Have we not striking examples of services in which there is no promotion by purchase? Look at the Artillery. Is it not sad to see men of the highest merit occupying positions they were fit to hold 20 years ago, and men of the greatest promise sick to death with the hopelessness of advancement? And when a retirement scheme is proposed it cannot be adopted, and why? Because it costs so much money. If this is the case in dealing with 2,000 officers, what will it be when an additional 6,000 have to be provided for? Again, look at the Navy where there was selection, a little seniority, and a great deal of luck. The system of promotion in the service was well described by a distinguished naval officer—"Ever since I entered the Navy I have been a beggar. I had to beg to get in at all. I had to beg to be made a mate, then for a ship. Then I had to beg for my lieutenancy, and then, again, for a ship. I had to beg to be made a commander, and then for my first command. Then, again, for my post captaincy; but the hardest 'beg' of all was for employment to save myself from being put on the retired list." This is a fair sample of naval opinion, and certainly naval officers are not, as a rule, contented men. Was the system so successful as to encourage its imitation? We are asked to abolish purchase, and no scheme for retirement is even shadowed out, and yet we know it will be necessary, and that the cost will be greater and perpetual. There is another point I particularly wish to advert to—namely, the destruction of the regimental system, which follows the scheme of the Government according to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. The Judge Advocate (Mr. Davison) had said it did not touch the regimental system; but the right hon. Gentleman said most distinctly that it would be impossible to prevent purchase cropping up again, unless above the rank of captain promotion ceased to be regimental. If this is so, it is quite sufficient to condemn the Bill. It will be the death-blow of the regimental system—a system that has never failed when all other departments have broken down. If you make it the practice to give majorities and lieutenant colonelcies to men not in the regiments, you will destroy the corner-stone of the whole fabric. Now, a regiment is bound together by traditions, and by the affection and attachment of its members to their corps and to one another. We know one another, can depend upon one another, and all have a common interest. We look forward to commanding not a regiment but the regiment in which we have grown up as a portion of it, and in which we have acquired all our professional knowledge. Again, there is a link between the old officers and those still in the regiment, urging us, if it were necessary, to maintain the credit and efficiency of the old corps. A friendly interest and criticism is maintained most beneficial to the Army. And is this sort of feeling to be lightly thrown away? I confess I would rather see purchase abolished without compensation—an act of injustice, which would effectually prevent its recurrence (the object in view)—than that the regimental system, in its most essential particular, should be broken into. The chief reason the right hon. Gentleman gives, after his theoretical ones, is that the purchase system stands in the way of amalgamation of Line and Militia; but what has he done towards it? Nothing but what might be done before. Militia ensigns are to get commissions in the Army, and Army captains to serve as adjutants in Militia for limited periods. I think I see the difficulty that met the right hon. Gentleman when he came to deal with the very plausible idea of amalgamating the officers of the Line and the Militia. Take the cases of captains in the Regulars. What position were they to take in the Militia? Were they to rank above them, either as field officers or as senior captains; or were they to be placed below the captains of Militia? In the last case, you would not get a captain of the Regulars to serve in the Militia; in the former case, you would stop all promotion of Militia officers, disgust them with their service, and effectually destroy what the right hon. Gentleman says he is most anxious to maintain—the county character and influence of that force. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has made out his case. He urges little against the old system, which admittedly has worked so well, especially in war—after all the only test. He offers us what has been tried and failed and is disliked—the principle of selection founded on seniority. This necessitates compulsory retirement; but we have no proposal before us, and the only certainty is its large cost. As the only means of destroying purchase, he destroys the regimental system. The object of all this change is the amalgamation of Regulars and Reserves, which is impossible—except to an extent that might be accomplished under the old system—without sacrificing the county influence. Last, but very important, the cost of this, even in a manner considered illiberal by impartial authorities, will be £8,000,000, not including a large annual charge for retirements. I was sent to this House as unpledged as any Member; but I did give one assurance, and that was that I would support measures that promised increased efficiency with proper economy. I think this Bill neither provides for the one nor satisfies the other. I am desirous of doing all in my power to promote the re-organization of the Army; but I not only feel that an efficient Army does not necessarily imply a heavy and extravagant expenditure, but I do not believe that the plan before us will have the effect which all real Army reformers desire to see brought about. I do not think the Government should force this question upon Parliament. You cannot say there is any great feeling in the country, for it knows little of the matter; and if it continues to have, as its principal source of information, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, it will be some time before it understands the question. Is not the inference of all his speeches that the purchase system means that commissions are sold by auction to the highest bidder; that merit is never recognized; and that no checks exist to prevent incompetent men obtaining advancement? Nothing can be more absurd; Croesus himself could not attain the head of a regiment, unless at every step he had proved himself qualified for promotion. I wish to touch upon but one other point in connection with this part of the subject. The Prussian Army is officered on an aristocratic and exclusive principle, while the French was officered on democratic principles—any man being permitted to join the Army as an officer, provided he passed the necessary examinations and got through the military schools. The British Army occupies a position between the two; it is officered by men of all classes and greatly to the advantage of the service. Now, I ask the House to beware in passing any measure where there is danger in an approach to the French or democratic principles. That remark may be considered unwise and foolish by hon. Members below the Gangway; but it is my opinion, and I see no reason why I should not express it. To turn to the latter portion of the Bill. I do not object to the extension of the principle of short enlistment. I confess I am a convert; for last year I saw great difficulties in the arrangement of foreign and Indian service, and I did not consider that they were counterbalanced by advantages; but now I see the necessity of having a large number of trained soldiers at hand—more than is possible to have serving in the ranks. The Prussian system was brought about by the limitation of a standing Army, dictated by Napoleon, in the Treaty of Tilsit, after the battle of Jena. We, Sir, have no such disgraceful page in our history, and yet we have almost as rigid a limit to the numbers of our Army in the force of public opinion, and by the vast cost any considerable increase would entail. I wish the right hon. Gentleman had dwelt more upon this subject of Reserves, and had given us some idea of the numbers he proposes to obtain in future years. I hope he does not intend to fix as a maximum 20,000 men for the first Army Reserve and 30,000 for the second. I hope he will not rest until he has 500 men, at least, in each Reserve for every battalion in the service. I wish we had heard more of a large increase in the cavalry and a further increase in artillery. I think the localization of regiments in the associating Line with Militia is wise, and I trust it may be carried further. The taking from Lords Lieutenant the appointments and promotion is conducive to a better system, and is, I believe, not disliked by many Lords Lieutenant. And now, Sir, I conclude. There is much that I should like to touch upon; but I have already wearied the House too long. I will only say that I trust some system will be devised for making available the considerable numbers we have nominally. I do not wish—indeed, it is impossible—that we should have a standing Army large enough to vie with Continental powers; but we must have the means of rapidly filling our ranks with trained men. With a well drilled Militia to set free the whole of our regular Army, and with our Volunteer force as a last line—one which would nobly fulfil its duty if called upon, though I trust it never may—we should be free from danger and from panic. Great Britain would be enabled to pursue a dignified policy, and not that dictated to her by the Official Journal of Versailles—a policy of obliteration.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS.

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th February], "That this House doth agree with the Committee [on East India Revenue Accounts] in the Resolution which upon that day was reported from the said Committee."

Question again proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

COLONEL SYKES: Mr. Speaker—Sir, this is the third time I have been before the House in the small hours of the morning to my grief. I have a good deal to say in support of my Motion to re-commit the India Revenue Accounts; but, at this hour of the morning (12.30 a.m.), and after the exhaustion consequent upon the seven and a half hours debate on the Army Organization Bill, I must confine myself to a recital of facts, which I beg the House to bear in mind are derived from Returns from the India Office, or from Parliamentary Returns, and I am not in any way responsible for them. I have various reasons for moving that the Report upon India Accounts be re-committed; and the first is the utter untrustworthiness of the figured statements laid before the House. This I shall prove from the Budgets of Sir Richard Temple, the Finance Minister in India; from a despatch of the Secretary of State for India; from a despatch of the Governor General of India, dated 20th September, 1869, and a despatch dated Calcutta, 4th January, 1870; and from the Papers my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India himself put into our hands the other night. In 1868-9, Sir Richard Temple made a surplus of £52,000; but the Government of India made a deficit of £1,500,000, which might possibly be reduced to £600,000, and now, probably, in August, 1870, there may be a surplus of £100,000 to £200,000. The Secretary of State for India, in reply to these statements, said—

"But it should be remembered that during the last 10 or 12 years there were very few instances in which the actual out-come of the accounts was not wholly different from the figures presented in the Budget."

The third authority is the Governor General of India, who, in a despatch to the Secretary of State for India, dated Simla, 20th September, 1869, in Paragraph 3, says—

"Your Grace will remember that the Budget Estimate of 1868-9, after re-arrangements, in accordance with the principle now finally adopted in respect to the charge for Public Works Extraordinary, showed an expected surplus of £243,550, and that the Regular Estimate showed an expected deficit of £970,471. But the actual result is the enormous deficit of £2,273,862, being worse than the Budget Estimate by £2,516,912, and than the Regular Estimate by £1,302,891;"

But in the Governor General's despatch of 4th January, 1870, all these figures are changed. My fourth authority is my hon. Friend's own figures, which he has put into the hands of Members. The Budget Estimate for 1870-1 shows a deficit of £3,188,173, and the Regular Estimate of only £485,182—what the Actuals will turn out remains to be shown. In the article of salt, the Budget gives £6,177,370, and the Regular Estimate £6,069,500. The Accounts themselves, therefore, show that they are utterly untrustworthy. So much for my first objection to the acceptance by the House of the India Accounts. My second is the want of any report of the progress of taxation annually since the government of India has been assumed by the Crown, and particularly the absence of a comparison between the pressure of taxation upon the people in the last year of the government of India by the East India Company, 1856-7, and the present year, 1870-1 under the Crown. I have listened annually to the exposition of the annual Budgets by the India Minister of State; but have listened in vain for any such comparison. I did hope, however, with my hon. Friend's characteristics of generalization, comparison, and deduction, that he would have supplied the omission; but, as he has refrained from doing so, I will make the comparison for him, by stating the gross Revenue; the deficiencies; the revenue from salt; the debt in India and England; the cost of the Army, in 1856-7, the last year of the government of the Company, and the years 1867-8, 1868-9, 1869-70, and 1870-1, under the Crown, noticing also the recent imposition of the income tax and its effects.

Comparative Statement of the pressure of Taxation on India in 1856-7, the last year of the East India Company's Government, and the years 1867-8, 1868-9, 1869-70, 1870-71, under the Crown:—

Gross Income—1846-7, £26,084,681; 1856-7, £33,303,391; 1867-8, £48,534,412; 1868-9, £49,262,691; 1869-70 Actual, £50,901,281; 1870-71, £51,098,600.

Deficit, including ordinary Public Works—1856-7, £972,791; 1867-8, £1,007,695; 1868-9, £2,774,030.

Deficit, including extraordinary Public Works—1867-8, £1,610,157; 1868-9, £4,144,643; 1869-70 Actual, £2,480,095; 1870-71, £485,181.

Gross amount taxation, including deficits—1856-7, £34,276,182; 1867-8, £50,144,569; 1868-9, £53,407,334; 1869-70 Actual, £53,382,026; 1870-71, £51,583,781.

Debt in India—1846-7, £44,584,066; 1856-7, £55,546,650; 1870-71, £85,563,694.

Debt in England—1846-7, £2,299,000; 1856-7, £3,894,400; 1870-71, £40,106,083.

Total Debt in India and England—1846-7, £46,883,666; 1856-7, £59,441,050; 1870-71, £125,669,777.

Salt tax, increase 80·2 per cent—1856-7, £3,368,684; 1870-71, £6,069,500.

Cost of Army, European and Native—1846-7, £9,054,098; 1856-7, £10,641,455; 1870-71, £16,403,206.

Income tax now 7½d. in the pound, none under the East India Company. Amount collected not mentioned.

An inspection of the statement shows that in 1846-7 the revenue of the Company was only £26,084,681; but in 1856-7, in consequence of the annexations of territory by Lord Dalhousie, the gross Revenue had risen to £33,303,391, and with the deficit of £972,791, the amount expended was swollen to £34,276,182. Under the Crown, in 1869-70, the actual receipts were £50,901,281, and the deficit £2,480,095, making a total expenditure of £53,382,026. The Regular Estimate for 1870-1—not the Budget—gives the income at £51,098,600, and the deficit at £485,182—total £51,583,781. Comparing the pressure of taxation per head on an estimated number of 148,000,000 of taxpayers under the Company in 1856-7, and deducting from the income the tribute money from feudatory Princes of £504,030, the result is 4s. 5½d. per head. In 1870-1, deducting the tribute money, which had risen to £737,400, from the income of £51,583,781, the result is 6s. 10d. per head, or an increased pressure of taxation upon the people of 53·4 per cent—certainly not contributing to the satisfaction or comfort of the people. The estimated population of 148,000,000 is derived from Parliamentary Paper 308, July 8, 1869. The most important tax affecting the health, the comfort, and satisfaction of the people, is the salt tax—the vegetable diet of the masses making it a necessity of life; and its increase of price necessarily diminishing consumption, inflicts a grievous evil. Nevertheless, the revenue derived from salt, which was £3,368,684 in 1856-7 under the Company, has risen to £6,069,500, an increase of 80·2 per cent under the Crown; but if the sum of £2,685,574, from an India Office Return of February, 1867, be taken as the basis for comparison between 1856-7 and 1870-1, the increased taxation upon salt would be 124 per cent. The income tax is a recent invention of the Indian Government, hitherto unknown to the people of India, and revolting to their social habits of reticence from its inquisitorial character. It is now 7½d. in the pound, nearly double the English income tax, and is levied from classes of the community—particularly in Bengal, wholly incompetent to pay it, leading, in its exaction by processes of law, in some instances to great oppression and suffering. I have had sent to me from Calcutta a pamphlet, entitled Cries from the East, by Mr. James Wilson and John Alfred Parker, proprietors of the Indian Daily News, detailing instances of oppression in levying the income tax; many of which they have personally verified, and for the truth of which they hold themselves responsible. A miserable ryot (farmer) of Purneah, holding a bit of land, at 10 rupees rent (£1), and having only one plough, is assessed at an income of 500 rupees (£50), his whole worldly property not being worth £50! The principal investigator of the operations of the income tax is Mr. George Kerry, and the results of his investigations he published in the Indian Daily News. At this hour in the morning I cannot go into these cases, and shall limit myself to the detail of one instance, as a type of others—

“At the village of Nursy dar Chok, about 16 miles south of Calcutta, there lives a man, whom I have known for many years, named Bholanath Dass. He lives in a miserable hut, which is not worth more than 50 rupees (£5); he has not even one beegah of land; so that he is one of the poorest of the poor. He works as a day labourer, when he is so fortunate as to get employment, and I do not believe his monthly earnings average four rupees (8s.) throughout the year. He cannot read, is very ignorant, and of feeble intellect, and is, for a Bengali, an old man; and this poor wretch has been assessed to the income tax by what I must regard as a wicked blunder. Of course, he had no money to pay, and was summoned before the collector at Alipoor, some 16 miles distant.

The letter then gives lengthened details, which I cannot quote at this hour; he was summoned to the collector's office, got frightened, and came away without seeing the collector. In the end he was taken in charge by a policeman for non-payment of his income tax—and the writer of the letter applies unsuccessfully to the collector, explaining the poor man's case. The letter is signed George Kerry. The case is said to have been a blunder. Now, Sir, that any such wicked blunder, as Mr. Kerry calls it, should occur is a disgrace to British administration in India.

I come now to the debt of India in 1856-7. The debt in India was £55,546,650, and in England £3,894,400—total £59,441,050; but in 1870-1 the debt has increased in India to £85,563,694, and in England to £40,106,083—total £125,669,777, an increase of £66,228,727 in 12 years, or 111·5 per cent; the interest of which the Indian taxpayer has to pay, and ultimately the principal! The distasteful subject of opium I will not enlarge upon; it will be sufficient to say that the profit derived from it has risen from £4,689,750 in 1856-7, under the Company, to £8,022,500 in 1870-1, under the Crown. The assessed taxes in the last three years, from 1868-9 to 1870-1, have risen from £508,700 to £1,989,600, or 291 per cent; but this, I presume, must include the recently imposed income tax. There are other items of taxation and receipt which would admit of comparison; but the above figures suffice to show the pressure of taxation under the Company and the Crown.

No doubt, owing to the increased demand for employment arising from public works, the formation of railways, and other demands, wages have risen, from 6s. or 7s. a month without food, to a considerably higher rate; but the proportionally increased cost of the necessaries of life neutralizes the advantage of increased wages, and the physical and social status of the people is not ameliorated. Sir, under the preceding detailed facts, it would be equally impolitic, unjust, and unsafe—I repeat, unsafe—with these facts before us, of increased pressure of taxation upon the 148,000,000 of taxpayers under the British Government, particularly with respect to the cruel salt tax and the hateful income tax, that the people of England should be permitted to live in a fool's paradise, believing that the Government of the Crown, in supersession of that of the East India Company, is one which has either ameliorated the condition of the people, or is promoting their contentment and loyalty.

MILITIA APPOINTMENTS—ROYAL CORNWALL RANGERS MILITIA.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD VIVIAN, in moving an Address for Correspondence respecting the nomination of an officer for command of the Royal Cornwall Rangers Militia, said, that the matter which he wished to bring under their Lordships' notice was one which affected generally the nomination of officers for commands in the Militia, though it had reference to himself in particular, and to many noble Lords who, like himself, had the honour of being Lieutenants of their respective counties. The Papers for which he was about to ask related to an act of the Secretary of State for War, which act, he ventured to think, was an unwarrantable stretch of authority, and contrary to the statute which regulated these appointments. The 42 Geo. III. c. 90, s. 2, enacted that the Lords Lieutenant of counties should appoint such persons as they thought fit, being duly qualified, to be colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors and other officers, and to certify to His Majesty the names and ranks of officers so appointed; and in case His Majesty should, within 14 days after such certificate shall have been laid before him, signify his disapprobation of any person so appointed, the Lord Lieutenant could not grant a commission to the person so disapproved, but commissions shall be granted to all persons not so disapproved by His Majesty. It was, moreover, laid down by Earl Russell in 1835, and by the standard writers on the subject, that Lords Lieutenant were solely responsible for the efficiency and discipline of the Reserve forces; that the Government had only a power of vetoing improper appointments; and that this veto must not be exercised on political grounds. The appointment of an officer to command in the corps in question rested solely with him (Lord Vivian) as being the Lord Lieutenant of Cornwall. The facts were these—Four or five months ago a gallant friend of his commanding the Royal Cornwall Rangers Militia expressed a wish to resign, on account of his not being conversant with the new drill, which necessarily involved a good deal of study and trouble. It accordingly became his (Lord Vivian's) duty to select a fit successor. Now, the senior major of the regiment, Major Trelawny, as far as discipline went, was, as far as he could learn, a very competent officer; but as far as his temper was concerned, he was led to believe that his appointment would be most unpopular, and would lead to the resignation of some of the other officers. He therefore felt it his duty to seek some other man. He applied to two lieutenant colonels, efficient officers, who had lately retired from active service and lived in or near the county, to accept the appointment to the regiment in question. Unfortunately, however, for reasons held to be sufficient, they respectively refused. This would show that he was not contemplating a job in favour of a friend of his own. He then wrote to his brother, who happened to hold a subordinate office in the War Department, begging him to ask Major General Sir James Lindsay, who commanded in chief the Reserve forces of the country, to select a fit man. His brother wrote to him that Sir James had said he would find him an efficient officer; adding the observation that he thought it desirable that the commanding officers of Militia regiments should be field officers in the Regulars. Acting upon this advice, he eventually fixed on a field officer of the Line, then on full pay, a lieutenant colonel in the Guards, and a man belonging to the county, Lieutenant Colonel Edgcumbe. This officer, on being communicated with, tendered the resignation of his command in the Guards; whereupon, he (Lord Vivian) forwarded his recommendation of this officer to the War Department to fill up the vacancy. This letter was received on the 2nd of February. He heard nothing more of the matter till the 14th of February, when the Secretary for War sent him a simple inquiry, why and wherefore he had passed over the majors of the regiment in favour of the officer in question. It appeared that Major Trelawny, to whom he should have given the preference could he have done so with credit to himself, had written to the Secretary for War on the 22nd of January, protesting against the notion that he was to be passed over. The Secretary for War was therefore aware at the time Colonel Edgcumbe was recommended of Major Trelawny's objection; yet he did not exercise his veto within the 14 days required by the Act. In reply to the inquiry, he (Lord Vivian) stated that he did not regard the major's service in the Line or Militia sufficient to qualify him for the command of the regiment; that he had no knowledge of the new drill; that he was informed his appointment would not tend to the well-doing of the regiment; and that he had reason to believe Major Trelawny considered Colonel Edgcumbe's appointment a good one. The other major of the regiment, Major St. Aubyn, he added, had not for eight years done a day's duty with the Militia. On the 2nd of March the Secretary for War wrote—that with every disposition to sustain the nomination, he was unable, in view of the Inspecting Officer's Reports and all the circumstances, to do so, and must, therefore, disapprove the appointment. Now, he (Lord Vivian) did not object to Major Trelawny quoad his abilities, but he did quoad his popularity; and he had no doubt that the ground of the War Office objections to Colonel Edgcumbe's appointment was to be found in the Reports of the Inspecting Officers. The Reports of Inspecting Officers were valueless as to the character and abilities of Militia officers. When an inspection was decided on the practice was for an intimation to be sent to the regiment that on a certain day an officer would come down to inspect them. The railway took the Inspecting Officer within a mile or two of the field. He then proceeded to the ground, saw the officers and the men, put them through a few manoeuvres, and then left; and that was all the opportunity he had of forming an opinion of the merits of an officer. The Lord Lieutenant of a county had far better opportunity of ascertaining the capabilities of an officer for command, and he conscientiously believed that if he had appointed Major Trelawny to the command of the regiment the worst consequences to the discipline of the regiment from his unpopularity, both as regarded officers and men, would have ensued. The late commanding officer, to whose authority the War Department also appealed in support of its decision, had written, in reply to his inquiry, that Major Trelawny, while an efficient officer, was unpopular, he believed, through want of tact in paying full consideration to those under his command. He had no reason to suppose that the major objected to his selection, having had a letter from him begging that no personal considerations or mere sentiment should intervene, until he got a hint of it from Sir James Lindsay, a day or two before the major sent in a second protest, in terms very different from the first. His (Lord Vivian's) only object had been to appoint a fit man; but he was now placed in a very unpleasant position, and his action in the county was paralyzed, being pointed at either as the perpetrator of a gross job, or as so incompetent as to be unworthy of the post he had filled for 16 years, without, he trusted, any discredit. He was disposed at once to throw up his office, were it not that he should not like the Secretary for War to have a voice in the selection of his successor. The Secretary for War thought him incompetent to make a good selection, and he thought the Secretary for War equally incompetent to make a good selection. He would not venture to say a word about politics; but he would venture to say that if they should hereafter decide on selection in the Regular Army, the strings would be pulled by every Member of the House of Commons, and that the Commander-in-Chief, whoever he might be, would be worked upon by them. This would be the necessary consequence, and future Lords Lieutenant would be treated just as he had been. Regretting the wrong done to himself, he felt far more keenly the wrong done to Colonel Edgcumbe by the delay of the War Department in making inquiries, and in exercising the veto, which, he contended, was consequently invalid. Colonel Edgcumbe had resigned his commission in the Guards entirely with a view to the Militia appointment, and under the impression that it would be confirmed, and he was now deprived of a profession—surely a most unfair position for him, and a most unfair proceeding on the part of the Secretary of State for War. Had due diligence been used by the Department, instead of hanging up the matter for days, the injury would not have been so great. He appealed to their Lordships whether a gross injustice had not been committed, and he should like the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to say whether the Act of Parliament had been observed. He had always endeavoured to do his duty conscientiously, and the Secretary for War had no power to make appointments without his sanction.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for all correspondence relating to the nomination of an officer for command of the Royal Cornwall Rangers Militia."—(The Lord Vivian.)

THE EARL OF MOUNT-EDGCUMBE supported the Motion, but, as a near relative of one of the officers in question, would refrain from entering into the merits of the case. His chief object in rising was to speak to the fact alluded to by the noble Lord (Lord Vivian). To his knowledge Colonel Edgcumbe would on no account have resigned his commission in the Grenadier Guards, except as a necessary preliminary to the appointment offered him, without any solicitation, by the noble Lord, and to gratify his laudable ambition of commanding the regiment of his native county. He had not the smallest reason to suppose that his appointment would not be sanctioned. There was clearly, therefore, a case of hardship. Their Lordships would, no doubt, appreciate the noble Lord's anxiety to vindicate the privileges of his office, and to exonerate himself from all responsibility for a result which he deeply regretted.

LORD ABINGER rose to bear testimony to Colonel Edgcumbe as a very efficient officer, and that his appointment would have given satisfaction to the county.

LORD NORTHBROOK said, he desired it to be clearly understood that the Secretary of State had in no way, directly or indirectly, questioned the noble Lord's motives in making the recommendation. He must, however, complain that he should be called upon to discuss the merits of the case and enter into an explanation before the Papers, to the production of which there was no objection, were in their Lordships' hands. The question was, whether the action of the Secretary of State for War was justified by the statute and by the regulations of the Militia service, and whether he had exercised a wise discretion in the particular case? On the first point he apprehended no doubt could arise, as the 42 Geo. III. gave the Crown, acting through the Secretary of State, power to veto appointments. As to the latter, a Royal Commission which sat in 1859, including several Lords Lieutenant and commanding officers of Militia, recommended that promotion should, as a general rule, be by seniority, and that in those instances where any departure from it might from time to time seem advisable, the reasons for it should be sent with the nomination to the Secretary of State. Lord Herbert, then Secretary for War, issued a circular calling attention to these recommendations of the Commissioners, and accordingly requesting Lords Lieutenant to transmit reasons for deviating from the principle of seniority. This circular reached the noble Lord (Lord Vivian), and it had ever since been a standing rule. In the case, however, of the appointment to which their Lordships' attention had been directed, the noble Lord did not comply with the regulations, but forwarded a simple recommendation—which, moreover, was not in the statutory form.

LORD CAIRNS asked what statute imposed any form? The 42 Geo. III. did not.

LORD NORTHBROOK hoped the noble and learned Lord would allow him to finish his observations without interruption. He did not mean to say that any form was prescribed in the statute. But the noble Lord, in his first letter, did not use the form and words of the statute which Lords Lieutenant had been wont to use when they desired to take advantage of the precise limit of time fixed by the Act. He held in his hand such a document, sent by another Lord Lieutenant. In many cases inquiries were necessary, and great inconvenience would ensue to the public service if the 14 days' limit were formally adhered to. Moreover, the recommendation was not received till the 2nd of February, and it was answered within 14 days—namely, on the 14th, when the Secretary for War asked for the reason for passing over the senior major. The noble Lord (Lord Vivian), therefore, could not have gazetted the appointment after receiving a request based on a circular issued under the Act of 1852, and he could not suppose that he intended to insist on the technical objection as to the interval between the recommendation and the disapproval. As to Major Trelawny's first letter to the Secretary for War, it was returned to him as irregular, as an officer was bound to write to his commanding officer or the Lord Lieutenant, and not to address the War Department directly. Neither the Secretary for War nor himself ever saw this letter till after the whole matter had been decided. The delay between the 2nd and the 14th was owing to an accident in the papers passing from one hand to another. The noble Lord's explanation, however, was not completed till the 27th—the date of his last letter—which contained one of the most essential documents—namely, the opinion of the outgoing colonel. The Secretary for War replied on the 2nd March. So that from the 27th of February to the 2nd of March was not a long delay in considering the merits and communicating the decision. He much regretted Colonel Edgcumbe's position, which appeared a great hardship; but he himself personally advised his brother that he should not give up his commission. Sir James Lindsay had been referred to by the noble Lord. He would therefore read the account which Sir James Lindsay had given him of the affair—

“In February, Captain Vivian asked me whether I knew any officer fit to take command of the Cornwall Militia, as Lord Vivian wished to know, because the lieutenant colonel of the regiment was about to retire. I replied I did not know of anyone, but would let him know if I heard of any Army officer who wished to command a regiment of Militia. Some time afterwards Lieutenant Colonel Edgcumbe called on me and informed me that Lord Vivian had promised him the lieutenant colonelcy, but previous to his retiring from the Guards he wished to know if he was pretty sure to get it. I told him that I could not tell him that, but I concluded Lord Vivian had good reason for passing over the senior major, and that I knew the junior major had not attended training for a long time; that we were glad to get young active officers fresh from military service. But the claims of officers must be investigated, and that I must inform the Secretary of State, with whom the responsibility rested, upon all points bearing on this question. I recommended Lieutenant Colonel Edgcumbe not to be in a hurry, if the lieutenant colonelcy of the Militia was his sole reason for retiring. On investigation, I found that Major Trelawny had been in the Army several years; had been constant in his service in the Militia, and had been well reported on in the official Inspection Reports. On a subsequent interview with Lieutenant Colonel Edgcumbe, I told him that he must not rely on getting it, and that there were strong reasons in favour of Major Trelawny.”

The noble Lord had quoted a private letter from Colonel Coryton, the retiring officer, received by him subsequent to the decision; but that letter had not been communicated to the Secretary of State. In a previous letter Colonel Coryton had replied to the inquiries of the noble Lord by saying that Major Trelawny was unpopular, and in point of discipline was indiscreet, but that responsibility made a great difference. Colonel Coryton gave the major, in other respects, a high character. The noble Lord (Lord Vivian) had represented the major as offering no objection to the appointment; but it was only fair that the explanation which the latter had given should be submitted to their Lordships. Major Trelawny complained, in effect, that by the selection of Colonel Edgcumbe he had been practically turned out of the service as incompetent. [The noble Lord then read extracts from the Correspondence which was afterwards ordered to be laid on the Table.] He regretted to have troubled their Lordships with the Correspondence; but, at the same time, he thought it necessary to put them in possession of Major Trelawny's explanation, and it certainly appeared to him, from the Correspondence, that his noble Friend was not justified in stating to the Secretary of State that Major Trelawny had approved the nomination of Colonel Edgcumbe. After all, however, the question was this—Was the Secretary of State required by statute to exercise his judgment in those matters, and to communicate, if necessary, the disapproval of Her Majesty of an appointment recommended by a Lord Lieutenant? It appeared to him that the position was clear that such a responsibility was placed by the statute on the Secretary of State; and he might inform their Lordships that that power had been constantly exercised by Secretaries of State in many previous and similar cases. That being so, the next question that arose was whether the exercise of that power in this particular case was a wise or an unwise one? He could only say that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had dealt with that case—indeed, the position and character of his right hon. Friend were enough to ensure that—without any political bias whatever, and simply with the view of doing his duty, and he had to consider whether the opinion of his noble Friend, partially supported by Colonel Coryton, should be decisive, or whether the opinion of the responsible advisers of the Secretary of State—namely, the Inspector General of the Reserve forces and the officers who had, from time to time, inspected the regiment should also be taken. His noble Friend (Lord Vivian) had used language which had rather surprised him—because the officers that had inspected the regiment included Sir A. Spencer and Colonel Julius Glyn, who were not men likely to send in incorrect reports respecting the character and qualifications of Major Trelawny. In those confidential Reports not only was the fitness of Major Trelawny for the command of the regiment distinctly given in the affirmative in answer to the questions put to the Inspecting Officers, but the Reports also contained stronger statements in favour of his qualifications than were usual. What, then, was the position of Major Trelawny in respect to previous service? Was it such as was likely to disqualify him for a command in the Militia? He was educated at and obtained his first commission from Sandhurst—which, of itself, showed that he had qualified himself by study for his profession—and, more than that, he had received a special certificate of proficiency. He served in the 36th Regiment from 1845 to 1848, and in the Inniskilling Dragoons from 1848 to 1853. Having also served for 10 years as adjutant and major of Militia, and been reported upon as fit to command the regiment by the Inspecting Officers, he said that if the Secretary of State had passed over such an officer, he did not think that any major of Militia could feel the least certainty that his claims, however high they might be, would not be set aside if he did not happen to have had recent experience in the Regular Army. It appeared to the Secretary of State to be essential that Militia officers should feel that the recommendations of the Royal Commission would be carried out, and that officers who had devoted great time and study to their profession would not be passed over, even upon the recommendation of Lords Lieutenant, without good cause. The Secretary of State therefore felt that if the responsibility resting upon him were to be accounted of any value—however much it might be against his feelings—he could not but recommend Her Majesty to disapprove the recommendation made. In conclusion, he (Lord Northbrook) would add that he could not regard this incident as one which could be used as an argument against the principle of promotion by selection; on the contrary, it showed that, notwithstanding the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, the Secretary of State thought it would not be consistent with his duty to the public service to shelter himself under the responsibility of that recommendation, and had taken upon himself the responsibility of recommending Her Majesty not to approve of an appointment which he was of opinion would not be for the benefit of the service.

THE EARL OF MOUNT-EDGCUMBE believed he would not be guilty of any betrayal of confidence if he stated that this matter had arisen out of a question he had put to the noble Lord in connection with the proposed scheme for re-organizing the forces. He had asked the noble Lord whether it would be better for his relative to remain in the Army or accept a position in the Militia? The noble Lord had replied that it would be better if he stayed where he was, and explained himself by saying that possibly commands in the Militia would be given to officers on half-pay.

LORD CAIRNS said, that his object in interrupting his noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) was to ascertain whether there was any Act of Parliament prescribing the form of recommendation suggested by his noble Friend, in order that he might inform himself on the point before their Lordships. He did not know any of the parties to the matter under discussion, and did not take any interest in the subject as a question of military appointment; but he had been attracted to the question in consequence of what seemed to him to be the summary mode in which the Secretary of State for War had made use of the Act of Parliament in disallowing the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant. He could not help thinking that the War Office had made a most complete and palpable blunder, and his advice to the Secretary of State was that he had taken up an untenable position, and should retreat from it at once. He could only account for it by thinking that the Secretary of State for War had arrived at the conclusion that the legislation which was contemplated was already arrived at, and that the authority over the Militia regiments of the country had been already handed over by the Lords Lieutenant to the War Office. He thought the noble Lord had brought himself into conflict with one of the plainest Acts of Parliament. What was the law relating to the Lord Lieutenant's power to make such appointments? The Act of Parliament was the 42 Geo. III., c. 90, and by it the Lords Lieutenant were authorized to constitute and appoint such officers as they thought fit, having certain qualifications, to be their deputy lieutenants, and to appoint a proper number of colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and other officers, qualified as mentioned in the Act, for the purpose of training and commanding the persons referred to in the Act; and it also required the Lords Lieutenant "to certify to His Majesty the names and ranks of such officers so to be appointed." In case His Majesty should, within 14 days, disapprove the names so certified, it was not lawful for the Lords Lieutenant to appoint them; but after that time it was lawful to grant commissions to such persons only "as were not so disapproved of by His Majesty." The noble Lord (Lord Northbrook) had spoken much of the responsibility of the Secretary of State for War; but that was an entire misapprehension, for the responsibility of these appointments lay with the Lords Lieutenant of the counties. The disapprobation referred to in the Act was a disapprobation not of the course adopted by the Lords Lieutenant, but of the person to be selected. It was a disapprobation not of the manner of appointment, but of the person proposed to be appointed. What would be thought of a Secretary of State recommending Her Majesty to disapprove the appointment of a deputy lieutenant not because there was any objection to the nominee, but because the Secretary of State thought somebody else more fitted for the post? Again, the War Office was completely wrong in point of time as regards their right of signifying their disapprobation. The defence of the War Office on the point of the certificate was a very unfortunate one. He wanted to know why, if the War Office did not regard the letter which had been sent by the Lord Lieutenant as an appointment, they did not return it, saying—"This is not such a document as we can receive from you. It is for you to certify the ground for the appointment, and then we will tell you whether we approve of the certification or not?" But the War Office retained the document; and, more than that, the Lord Lieutenant wrote an official letter, recommending for Her Majesty's approval the appointment of the Hon. Charles Edgcumbe for one office, and also in the same letter recommending for Her Majesty's approval the appointment of Lieutenant Arthur Hutchinson for another. Now, the Secretary of State, in his reply, adopted the certificate of the appointment of Lieutenant Hutchinson, and acted upon it by getting Her Majesty's approval; but in the case of Lieutenant Colonel Edgcumbe, he asked the Lord Lieutenant's reason for passing over two other gentlemen. As regards the time within which an objection might be signified by the Crown, there was not intimation of disapproval in the letter of the 14th February; and the War Office had, he held, no right to signify their disapproval at a date long after the expiry of the time permitted by the Act, and he thought they ought to withdraw from their position.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it seemed to him unfortunate that a question of law should be argued before their Lordships not when sitting in the usual manner as a Court of Appeal, but as a matter of discussion and debate. And he felt it was the more unfortunate because his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) had taken upon himself to say that Her Majesty's Government had misconceived the law and were utterly wrong. Now, he (the Lord Chancellor) took upon himself to maintain, in opposition to his noble and learned Friend, that the Secretary for War had kept strictly within the limits of the law in what he had done in the present instance—and not only that he had kept within the law, but had acted in the spirit of it. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) had begun his remarks by stating that the Government had mistaken their position in giving any opinion with reference to the course taken by the Lord Lieutenant in making the appointment, and that all they had to do was to express their approval or disapproval of the person on whom it was conferred. In the very first section, however, of the Act 15 & 16 Vict., it was provided that it should be lawful for Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State to frame regulations with reference to such appointments as that in question, subject to which "any such appointment shall be made." And he had been informed that regulations had been made in accordance with that section, in which it was recommended to the Lords Lieutenant to state, when they passed over any officers in the regiment, the reasons why these officers were passed over; and he apprehended that this was extremely reasonable. But then his noble and learned Friend maintained that the objection to the appointment should have been notified within 14 days. Fourteen days after what? Fourteen days after the appointment was made and certified. But in the case under discussion no appointment was made, according to the letter of the 1st of February.

LORD CAIRNS: There are no such words in the Act of Parliament as "after the appointment was made." The Act provides that the 14 days shall run from the time when the certificate is laid before the Secretary of State. The commission was not to be granted before 14 days; but if no objection was signified within that time, the Lord Lieutenant would issue the commission.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: If his noble and learned Friend would turn to the 2nd section of 42 Geo. III. c. 90, he would find it there provided that the Lord Lieutenant should appoint a proper number of colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and other officers, and that "he shall certify to Her Majesty the names and ranks of all such officers so to be appointed." The Lord Lieutenant, therefore, was called upon to do two things. He had to appoint, and to inform the Secretary of State that he had appointed—not that he intended to appoint. Let what force his noble and learned Friend chose be given to the word "certify," it was inconsistent with every legal construction of it to say that, in writing to the Secretary of State to request Her Majesty's approval of a recommended appointment, it was certified that the appointment was actually made. He believed that the letter of the Lord Lieutenant was quite in accordance with the course usually adopted; and that that course had been adopted for the sake of allowing friendly communications between the Secretary of State and the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of every appointment before the appointment was made. Afterwards, when the names had been given and approved of, then, and not till then, the formal communication of the appointment was made. He regretted that, as legal proceedings might be taken in connection with the subject, any question of law should have been raised in the present discussion; But he could not concur in the opinion that a friendly communication, asking for the approval of an appointment, amounted to a certificate that it had been absolutely made and concluded. The course which had been taken by the Secretary for War in the matter was, he believed, one which was perfectly reasonable, as well as in accordance with the usual practice of the Office. On the merits of the question beyond the mere point of law involved he wished to say nothing, as it lay outside his Department. He would simply add that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) was quite wrong in supposing there had been no formal expression of disapproval in the case, for such disapproval was conveyed in the reply dated the 14th of February, which came within the prescribed 14 day limit.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought the question on which the noble and learned Lord had just touched was one which did not require the judgment of a lawyer, or the possession of any special legal training, to enable their Lordships to form an opinion upon it. If the letter written by the Lord Lieutenant to the Secretary of State was not an appointment and was not a certificate, he would ask the noble and learned Lord where was the certificate contemplated by the Act of Parliament? was there any such certificate in existence? What construction did he put upon the recommendation contained in the last clause of the letter, recommending for Her Majesty's approval the appointment of Lieutenant Hutchinson? That recommendation was made in the same letter, and conveyed in the same way, and the War Office had acted upon the intimation. He must also differ from the construction put by the noble and learned Lord upon the Act of 1852. There was not one word in that Act altering the express enactment of the statute of George III., that unless disapproval were signified by the Secretary of State within 14 days the appointment made by the Lord Lieutenant was valid. For these reasons he believed that the appointment made by the Lord Lieutenant of Cornwall was a valid appointment; and that Her Majesty's Government, notwithstanding all that had been said by the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack, had taken up a position which they would find it impossible to maintain.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he knew nothing of the matter beyond what he had heard in the House that evening, nor would he enter into any of the technical details referred to by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns). He must do the noble Lord on the cross Bench (Lord Vivian), who had brought forward the subject, the justice of saying that he touched but lightly upon the more technical question, and at once went faithfully into the merits of the case. The argument of the noble Lord, that the Secretary of State for War had exercised a wrong discretion in overruling his recommendation was a perfectly fair one; and he had the greatest possible respect for the judicial opinions given by the noble and learned Lord opposite, when clothed in ermine and sitting on the judicial Bench; but the off-hand opinions he frequently gave in the House upon matters of personal and political interest required the very closest watching. In listening to the argument of the noble and learned Lord, he himself perceived more than one place in it through which a coach-and-six might have been driven, and he believed the whole argument had been completely upset by that of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. However, he had not risen to argue the legal point, but to point out that if the War Office was, as the noble and learned Lord had said, totally in the wrong on the present occasion, he ought consistently to have contended that it had been wrong for many years, if not, indeed, for some generations; for it was the universal custom of all Lords Lieutenant—and himself was one—to submit for the approval of the Crown the names of those persons whom they intended to appoint. The noble and learned Lord argued that the power of the Crown was a mere power of veto, and did not include the power to overrule the discretion and responsibility of the Lords Lieutenant. He would ask the noble and learned Lord, how could the business of this country be transacted, and the duties of the Lords Lieutenant be discharged, if they were simply to nominate the persons they chose, with the bare chance of the Crown exercising a veto upon the appointments? The custom hitherto followed by Lords Lieutenant was that they should previously ask the approval of the Crown to the names of the persons whom they intended to appoint.

LORD CAIRNS: Approval of the appointment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: If the noble and learned Lord meant that it was an approval by the Crown of an abstract appointment, his proposition was altogether preposterous. It was an approval by the Crown of a particular person appointed to a particular place; and it had always been the practice to ask the previous approval of the Crown—for it would be extremely inconvenient for Lords Lieutenant to name any persons with the veto of the Crown hanging over them. If there was any doubt as to the mere technical legality of the position the Secretary of State for War had taken upon this question, let the noble Lord withdraw his letter of recommendation, let both parties withdraw their names, so that they might stand exactly in their former position and the power of the Secretary of State to issue his veto be tested. For his part, he believed the noble and learned Lord opposite was entirely wrong, and the War Office perfectly right upon this question.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that having been appealed to as the Lord Lieutenant of two counties, he desired to explain that the course which he had been in the habit of pursuing was to send in to the Crown the name of the person whom he wished to appoint. In forwarding this communication, however, he always considered that he was, in fact, formally making known the selection which he intended to act upon; and if no answer disapproving the appointment was returned by the Secretary of State, he instantly signed the commission when the proper time arrived, and sent it to the Gazette.

THE CENSUS—EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

MR. MELLY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to authorize the District Registrars in Boroughs, when taking the Census, to supply the School Boards of such boroughs with the gross totals of children between certain specified ages, to be fixed by the Education Department; such totals to be extracted from the Census Papers (before they are forwarded to London) at the expense, in each case, of the School Board of the Borough?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have received a great many communications on this subject, and I am bound to say that of the different suggestions that of my hon. Friend is the most practicable. I have been in communication with the Registrar General on the subject, who has raised difficulties, as it was his duty to do, to any proposal which might have the effect of interfering with the efficient discharge of the important and complicated duty of collecting the Census Returns. But I am authorized to say that even if arrangements cannot be made—on which point I now give no certain opinion—to give effect to my hon. Friend's wishes, this can be promised—namely, that the required information shall be furnished to such boards as desire it in the month of June or July, and I am told that that time will be early enough.

INCOME TAX—SERVANTS OF PRIVATE FIRMS.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to a Question put to him by the Member for Preston on the 14th February, respecting applications by assessors of Income Tax for statements of the salaries paid to clerks in the establishments of private firms, Whether he has received any letter from the Clerk of the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London on the subject, and if he will lay a Copy of such Letter upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, a copy of a letter received from the clerk of the Commissioners, together with a memorandum issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, should be laid on the Table of the House.

IRELAND—SHERIFFS OF WESTMEATH AND LOUTH.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reference to the recent nominations of Sheriffs for Westmeath and Louth, Whether he is prepared to state what is the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown for Ireland as to any qualification being requisite for the office of High Sheriff of an Irish County?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, he had not yet received the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the general question raised by his hon. Friend, which was one of very considerable complexity and great importance. With regard to the particular cases referred to, Her Majesty's Government had no doubt that the present sheriffs of Westmeath and Louth were legally qualified to serve. He did not think it would be well to produce any of the Correspondence on the subject until the matter had been completely investigated, and the Government placed in possession of the completed opinion of the Law Officers in regard to it.

COURT OF HUSTINGS (LONDON) ABOLITION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Attorney General, If the sanction of the Law Officers of the Crown has been given to a private Bill, intituled "The Court of Hustings (London) Abolition Bill," under which it is proposed to give to the Lord Mayor's Court concurrent jurisdiction with the Superior Courts of Common Law in matters arising within the Metropolitan district; and if the assent of the Crown has not been given, what course the Government propose to take with regard to the measure which now stands for Committee as an unopposed Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the sanction of the Law Officers of the Crown most certainly has never been given to this Bill. In fact, I never heard of it till my attention was called to the matter by this Question. On referring to the Bill, I certainly experienced a good deal of surprise at some of its provisions. I find that though it is a Private Bill sent to a Committee upstairs, it proposes to constitute a new Superior Court of Law with unlimited jurisdiction. [Laughter.] I say unlimited, because by one of the clauses it is provided that the jurisdiction of the new Court shall not be confined to the City of London, but shall extend considerably beyond it; the clause authorizing the committal of persons beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. I find that an appeal is given to the Court of Exchequer, thereby adding to the jurisdiction of one of the highest Courts in the kingdom. I have to state that, in my opinion, these provisions are altogether beyond the scope of a private Bill, and ought not to have been introduced. As to the course the Government propose to take, I may say that unless these clauses are struck out I shall certainly oppose the Bill on the third reading.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I beg to give Notice that, on going into Committee of Supply, I shall call attention to the subject.

ALLEGED TREATY BETWEEN RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I beg to inquire of the Prime Minister, Whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that a Treaty was negotiated last year, between the Courts of Russia and Prussia, referring to the war between Prussia and France; and, if so, whether they were in possession of this information when they instructed Mr. Odo Russell to repair to Versailles and consult Count Bismarck?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer, Sir, to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to state, very briefly, that Her Majesty's Government has not been informed of the existence of any such Treaty; and, that being so, I need not say that we were not in possession of such information when Mr. Odo Russell went to Versailles.

THE TREATY OF PARIS (1856.)

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What are the contingencies alluded to in Despatch No. 47 in the Correspondence of the Treaty of March 1856, where Baron Brunow says—

"On certain occasions when certain contingencies were discussed, he had stated both to Lord Malmesbury and Lord Clarendon that if they were realized Russia would reserve to herself the right to call in question some of the provisions of the Treaty of 1856;"

and, if there are documents in the office bearing on these contingencies; and, if so, whether they will be laid upon the Table before Friday?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said: I have to state that I am not aware, nor is the Foreign Office aware, of any of the "contingencies" to which the hon. Member refers; nor were there any Reports or documents on the subject in the Foreign Office.

EDUCATION—NEW REVISED CODE.

QUESTION.

MR. DODDS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether Scholars who at the last examination were presented in Standard 1 of the 1st Revised Code, are on the next examination to be presented in Standard 1 of the New Revised Code (being the same as Standard 2 under the 1st Code), or in Standard 2?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that there was nothing in the new Code to prevent children who were presented under Standard 1 in the Code of last year being presented under the same standard in the new Code. The old Standard 1 had been struck out, and a new Standard 6 had been inserted, so that the new standards from 1 to 5 corresponded with the standards numbered 2 to 6 in last year's Code. Therefore, the rule which prohibited the presentation of a child for examination under the same standard in two consecutive years would be complied with, though children were presented this year under what was nominally the same standard as that under which they were examined last year.

ARMY—YEOMANRY REGIMENTS AND RIFLE RANGES.—QUESTION.

MR. ALGERNON EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any allowance will be made to Commanding Officers of Yeomanry Regiments to cover the expense of hiring rifle ranges, rendered necessary by the new regulations?

MR. CARDWELL said, that no allowance would be made, but where it was necessary ranges would be hired by the Control department.

MR. ODO RUSSELL'S DESPATCH.

QUESTION.

SIR HEDWORTH WILLIAMSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received from Mr. Odo Russell any statement in reference to that passage in his Despatch of November 22, which has been made the subject of inquiry and comment in this House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, Mr. Odo Russell's attention having been called to certain proceedings in this House he has addressed an explanatory despatch to Her Majesty's Government on this subject, which despatch I will lay on the Table of the House; I have only to say, on the part of the Government, that the despatch is, in their view, entirely satisfactory.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. A. JOHNSTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether section 23 of the Elementary Education Act enables a school in union with the National Society to be transferred to a School Board?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that to the best of his belief, and according to the Legal Advisers of the Government, the section referred to by the hon. Member did confer the power of transfer to a school board of a school in union with the National Society, provided that the conditions required by the section were fulfilled, one of which conditions was that any person interested, including a body corporate, had the right to be heard by the Education Department against the transfer. He presumed that the National Society came within the scope of that provision.

FRANCE—REPORTS OF THE MILITARY ATTACHE AT PARIS.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, for presentation to Parliament, Copies of the Reports furnished to the War Department by the Military Attaché of Her Majesty's Embassy at Paris, during the last five years, following the precedent established by the presentation to Parliament of the yearly Reports of Her Majesty's Secretaries of Embassy and Legation for the Countries in which they reside?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, at the request of my right hon. Friend I will answer this Question. It will not be in my power to lay on the Table the Reports referred to by the right hon. Baronet. They are of a strictly confidential character, and could not be produced without great public inconvenience, and seriously compromising the persons from whom the information was obtained. The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to remind him that they differ materially from the Reports sent in by the Secretaries of Legation in foreign countries, which refer simply to questions of import, export, trade, produce, and commerce.

ARMY—SMALL POX IN THE GUARDS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that a battalion of Guards has been stopped on its way to Dublin on account of the small pox having broken out; and, whether a portion of it has been ordered to Fleetwood?

MR. CARDWELL: The battalion of Guards going off to Dublin has been stopped for the present in London, in consequence of the small pox having broken out among the men; but it is not yet decided whether they shall be sent to any other place or not.

NEW FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether a statement which appears in a leading article in "The Times" this morning—namely, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board has accepted the office of First Lord of the Admiralty, is true? The statement is so incredible—"Oh!"

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I shall distinguish in the Question of the hon. Gentleman that which is matter of opinion from that which is matter of fact. Whether the report is credible is matter of opinion, whether it is true is matter of fact. It is true, and I am glad of it.

TREATY OF PARIS (1856)—
NEUTRALIZATION OF THE BLACK SEA
—THE CONFERENCE.—NOTICE.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have to give Notice with reference to a Motion that now stands on the Paper of this House for next Friday. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), whose name stands to that Notice, is not in his place, and probably it will be convenient that I should give Notice that on Thursday I shall ask him whether it is his intention to go on with that Motion on Friday. I am obliged to state, on the part of the Government, that it is not now possible that the Conference should meet again before Friday, and it will be beyond the power of the Government adequately to discuss that subject while the Conference is sitting. I ought to add that I have no reason to suppose that the proceedings of the Conference are likely to be delayed for any considerable time before coming to a conclusion.

DURHAM CHURCH LEASEHOLDS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. STEVENSON rose to call attention to the present position of holders of Leases under the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and to move a Resolution. In order that the House might clearly understand the case of the leaseholders under the Dean and Chapter of Durham, it was necessary to trouble it with a short statement of the past history of the system. At the Reformation the extensive estates of the Priory of Durham were conferred upon the Dean and Chapter, which was then constituted by Henry

VIII. Part of the lands were then let at rack-rent, but nearly all the rest were of a tenure similar to copyhold, being renewable every 21 years on the payment of three years' rent. Disputes arose between the Chapter and their tenants, the Chapter seeking to convert all the leases into ordinary tenancies; and in 1626 the Dean and Chapter passed an Act, in which they plainly laid down the principles of the management of their leasehold estates. The leases were to be for 21 years; but at the end of seven years they were to be renewed, on payment of one year's improved annual value. On the back of each lease there was an endorsement in a peculiar form—under the year of the date of the lease the figure 7 was written and a line for addition drawn, and the date reckoned on which the seven years would expire. That arrangement had been carried out with such perfect good faith that the utmost confidence existed between the Dean and Chapter and their lessees, and for the last 250 years no tenant had ever been deterred from expending his capital on his holding from any distrust of renewal. No doubt it might be said that the tenant paid the fine on renewal on the basis of his own improvements. But the Dean and Chapter met this by allowing two renewals to elapse before calculating the improved value. On the other hand, the renewal fine had been raised from one year's improved value to one and a half. That, however, was no substantial increase, for the annual reserved rents had not been increased; so that the respective interests of the Dean and Chapter and the lessees had not been substantially altered. He would illustrate the working of this system by the case of South Shields. Two hundred and fifty years ago it was a mere fishing hamlet; afterwards, owing to the cheapness of fuel, extensive salt works came into existence, and to these had succeeded quays, graving docks, shipbuilding yards, forges, and all the manufactures connected with an important seaport town—extensive glass works, bottle works, and chemical manufactories; so that in 1849 there was property of an annual value of £40,000 a year, wholly created by the capital and enterprise of the lessees, on ground of which the lessees had nominally only a tenure of between 14 and 21 years. But while the revenues of the Church were thus largely increased by the outlay of the lessees' capital, the Dean and Chapter never pretended to expend a single shilling of their own or do any single duty that fell on a landlord, except the collecting of their revenues. Now, he could not conceive a stronger case of tenant-right, or any defence whatever for now turning round on these lessees and telling them when the first seven years of the leases had expired that no more renewals were to be granted. Yet that was what had now been done by the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and that was the present position of 600 leaseholders in the town of South Shields. The Church lessees were spoken of as a body of men fattening on the property of the Church, which was thus defrauded of a large share of her rightful revenues, and it seemed for a time as if no regard was to be paid to the claims of the lessees, who had themselves created the property of which they were accused of despoiling the Church; and much alarm prevailed among the lessees in consequence. A Committee of that House inquired into the matter and took evidence on the subject, and recommended that consideration should be given to the customary confidence of renewal. No legislative action followed, and the confidence of the lessees was restored, and they went on without fear to expend their capital on their leaseholds. In 1849 a Royal Commission was appointed. They were directed to pay due regard to the rights of the lessees, while inquiring how the property might be improved for the benefit of the Church and the public. The evidence they took proved the restoration of confidence. Mr. Ingham stated that he had sold, for 20 years' purchase, a farm of which the lease had 18 years to run. It was shown that since 1840 new streets, manufactories, and some hundred houses had been built in South Shields, and the Royal Commission reported that in the case of Durham it had been proved that leases with 17½ years to run, had been sold for two-thirds of the value of the fee. They recommended a settlement on the basis of continual renewal, subject to a revaluation every 21 years. Those Commissioners reported in 1850, and in 1851 a Bill was introduced into the other House to carry out their recommendation. The Lords referred it to a Committee. In their Report they said that the lessees had an "expectation of renewal sufficiently definite to be treated as a certainty;" also, "that any injury should be considered and compensated," and they desired that a system of voluntary enfranchisement should be established, which might be made the basis of future compulsory enfranchisement. The Act of 1851 established that system of voluntary dealings under the direction of the Church Estates Commissioners. That Act had been most successful in its operation. The annual Reports of the Church Estates Commissioners showed a large amount of transactions which, being voluntary, were necessarily satisfactory to both the lessee and the Church; and to refer again to the case of South Shields, the rateable value of the borough had increased 70 per cent in 10 years, mainly under the operation of the Act. Lessees had been ready to enfranchise, and the proof of the successful operation of the Act had been shown by numbers of cases in which persons who wished to erect buildings bought the lessee's interest at prices far beyond the value of the mere 14 or 21 years' possession, relying on the continued operation of the Act. For several years the Church Estates Commissioners, in their annual Report, congratulated themselves on the success of the Act. In 1868 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners pushed through a Bill at the very end of the Session, taking power to make arrangements with those Chapters which had not previously transferred their estates. Few of the lessees were aware of the Bill; but they attempted to obtain in it the insertion of clauses requiring consideration to be given to the claims of the lessees. All that they could succeed in obtaining was a recognition of the right of calling for an arbitration of the fee simple and annual value, in cases in which a negotiation for sale or surrender had been actually entered into, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had refused to confirm it. By the Bill the lessees were handed over to the full powers of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and they had already had an indication of what they feared was in store for them by the Dean and Chapter having, under an arrangement with the Commissioners, refused to renew any leases that fell for renewal after the 29th of last September; so that many of the lessees were now reduced to a bare enjoyment of 14 years of the property which they had created. He scarcely thought that "confiscation" would be too strong a word to apply to this proceeding. He might be met with this objection — the lessees knew that this was coming — they should have anticipated it, and provided for it; and he had been referred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Act of 1860, which defined the consideration to be given to the tenants' claims of renewal to be an extension of the leases up to 1884. But that Act referred to estates then transferred to the Commissioners, and did not meet the present case. They already had leases running on to 1891; or seven years beyond 1884, and as he had said already, leasehold interests had been freely bought since 1860, in expectation of enfranchisement on the basis of the terms of the Acts of 1851 and 1854—a process which would have wound up the system without any hardship. The Church Estates Commissioners were charged with the duty of doing justice between the Church and its lessees in cases of enfranchisement; but it appeared to him that after the estates should have been transferred, the functions of that body would cease, and their dealings would be with Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with leases running out, and no remedy against any hardships, except what that body might be pleased to allow. He was addressing a House that was elected to do justice to the tenantry of Ireland, and a Government which, with so bold a hand last Session, remedied its land grievances. The Irish Land Bill of last Session created a presumption of law in favour of all improvements being considered as having been done by the tenants. He had shown that in these Church lands the whole value had been created by the tenants. There were Church leaseholds in Ireland; and in the Irish Land Bill the lessees were declared to have the right of perpetual renewal. He was not asking that right for the lessees in the North, for he preferred an equitable system of enfranchisement; but he quoted the Irish case as a reason for doing like justice to English lessees, and they believed that justice might be done without injury to the interests of the Church. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. PEASE seconded the Motion. If discontent existed in the north of Durham on this subject, it also excited very lively interest in the southern division. The case of the holders of agricultural leases there had repeatedly been before Parliament; because, while there was no active dissatisfaction with the management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the uncertainty of the tenure of these lands gave rise to a good deal of feeling. He hardly thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Stevenson) went far enough. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners might say that they were only doing what the law required of them; so that a Resolution would have very little effect, and it should be supplemented by a Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in order to prevent hardship being inflicted on Lessees of the Church property of the Dean and Chapter of Durham by the running out of their Leases, on which they or their predecessors have invested capital on the faith of the continued renewal of such Leases, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in fixing the terms for enfranchisements or for the purchase of Leasehold interests, ought to have regard to the just and reasonable claims of Lessees arising from the long continued practice of renewal."—(Mr. Stevenson.)

MR. ACLAND, as one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, said, it was his duty to reply to the hon. Mover of the Resolution who, he was confident, was not in the slightest degree influenced by personal considerations in introducing it, but was simply discharging a public duty. As to what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who had seconded the Motion, naturally his (Mr. Acland's) own feelings would lead him not to treat lightly anything affecting the agricultural progress of the country; but that question would be discussed on another occasion. The words of the Resolution were the very words of the Act of Parliament, which 30 years ago resolved that the just and reasonable claims of lessees arising from the long-continued practice of renewal should be duly regarded. The real question was what are the just and reasonable claims of the lessees? On this the opinion of the lessees might be referred to. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners had dealt with 6,000 leases in all parts of England, being a considerable majority of the cases required to be arranged when Parliament took the matter up. They had enfranchised 400 cases in the diocese of Durham alone; and the Church Estate Commissioners had sanctioned 600 enfranchisements on the property of this very Dean and Chapter. With the exception of the agricultural cases, the question narrowed itself to some important property in South Shields. The lessees were a small body, who had benefited by the postponement of the period for seven years longer than Parliament had intended. In 1851 the "just and reasonable claims of the lessees" were recognized by Parliament; and in 1860 the terms were finally fixed and defined. The House of Commons' Committee had advised that the system of renewal by fines should cease in 1880; but Parliament gave four years more; some of them, indeed, are now actually extended to 1891. If any cases of hardship were brought before the Commissioners, it was their constant habit to take them into serious consideration, and if they were unable to come to terms with the lessees who had an adverse interest, they had the remedy by Act of Parliament to go into arbitration. When the lessees had purchased a freehold right in the surface of the ground, they were restrained from going below the surface without consent. It was simply a question of terms. Some 6,000 lessees had willingly accepted the terms offered them, on the assumption that the year 1884 would be the extreme limit of the system. Sufficient ground had not been shown for placing them on a new footing, and he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion.

MR. MOWBRAY trusted the hon. Member would not press his Motion to a division. Having for a great number of years been connected with Durham, he was pretty well acquainted with the subject. The object of the hon. Member appeared to be to reverse the policy of the Act of 1860; but the question had been carefully considered by Parliament, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had done no more than carry out their legislation. If the hon. Member's Resolution were adopted, it would not carry the matter one step further. From his experience as a Commissioner he could state that all questions of renewal were fully considered and dealt with, and he objected to any re-opening of the question.

MR. STEVENSON, in reply, said, that the case of Durham was not met by the Act, which was intended to give an extension of terms to those whose leases expired at an early period. Accepting that principle, the final extension for Durham ought to begin from 1891, to which period they already ran. He would, however, withdraw his Resolution.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE PATENT LAWS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. B. SAMUELSON, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the Law, practice, and effect of grants of Letters Patent for Inventions, said, he was induced to bring this subject before the House because, from an experience of more than 20 years, he was aware of the great evils attendant on the system of Patent Laws. He proposed a Committee of Inquiry in preference to asking leave to introduce a Bill, on account of the great diversity of opinion prevailing as to the best mode of dealing with the subject. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie), the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), and other great authorities, were of opinion that the only mode of dealing with the Patent Laws was to sweep them away altogether. Others thought that by considerable alterations the system of patents might still be maintained; while there were those who maintained—and he confessed himself to be among the number—that the present laws, if administered in the spirit of their original promoters, would be sufficient, and that all that was required was to consider the spirit of the law and act upon it. To ascertain that spirit he might be permitted to refer to the Act of 23 James I., the primary object of which was to abolish monopolies, while at the same time it reserved those granted by the Crown in favour of new manufactures. The whole mischief of the Patent Laws had arisen from the interpretation given to the expression "new manufactures," which had been extended until they had been made to include any new invention whatever. He would not argue the question whether there was any inherent right in inventors to obtain patents; because he thought that patents should be granted on grounds of public utility. Inventors were frequently poor men, who were not in a condition to carry out their inventions without the assistance of capitalists, who, of course, if they advanced their money, expected to be recouped. Many very important inventions could never have been carried out without a system of protection. He would mention, in the case of two important inventions, the sums expended before any return was obtained. In reference to the self-acting mule, upwards of £30,000 were spent before a single farthing was returned to the capitalists; and upon Bessemer's improvements in the manufacture of steel £100,000 were expended by the patentee and his licensees, and seven years of the patent expired before any return was obtained. He might also mention—though it was not a case with which the Patent Laws were concerned—that the Ordnance experiments, exclusive of those which had reference to the Armstrong and Whitworth guns, cost the enormous sum of £250,000 in 10 years. This showed how hopeless it was to expect that experiments of that nature could be carried out by individuals without some protection of the results. There was, however, a great difference between the encouragement of new and important inventions and granting a patent to every frivolous matter which might be brought forward. It might be said of frivolous inventions that they would soon find their own level. He knew from experience that was not the case; and the practical effect of such patents was that they were a decided hindrance to the progress of manufactures, and there was this further evil—that in trades where great competition existed rival manufacturers took out one frivolous patent after another to protect themselves and injure their neighbours. He had in his own case to protect himself in matters in which, if any choice had been presented to him, he should have refrained from doing so. But there was another view to be taken of these small patents. In this country patents for small though not necessarily frivolous inventions were granted. But there were other countries which run us very close in manufacturing competition where they were not allowed. Consequently when our goods went into markets to which those other countries traded, our commerce was impeded by these small patents, to which our rivals were not subjected. There was another evil—patents were recklessly granted again and again, without any examination whatever, for the same inventions which had been before the public for, perhaps, 20 or 30 years. These became stumbling-blocks in the way of the progress of manufactures. The Crown granted a monopoly or privilege, and the individual aggrieved must come forward and at great expense undo what the Crown never ought to have done. If matters remained as they were, abolition, he was convinced, must come, and that he did not think desirable. They must alter the law and change the mode in which it was administered. The first thing done by the change in the law effected by the Act of 1852 was to cheapen patents. To that he had no objection; but it pre-supposed that patents should only be granted where there was really an invention and one of some importance. The intention of Lord Colchester, who introduced the law into the House of Lords in 1851 was that precautions should be taken. Examiners were to be appointed to ascertain two points—whether inventions were sufficiently described and whether they were new; but that clause in the Bill was struck out after it left the other House. Words, however, were inserted to give the Commissioners power to appoint other Commissioners, who, it was presumed, would be scientific men and would perform the duty of examiners; but from 1852 learned societies and inventors had been soliciting the appointment of those additional Commissioners down to 1868, when the Master of the Rolls offered to make three appointments, with this extraordinary condition annexed—that the persons so appointed should have no remuneration. Now, that might be very well if the whole business of the Patent Office were carried on gratuitously. But was that the case? Why, in 1869 the Law Officers of the Crown received, in respect of patents, no less a sum than £10,100; while their clerks received £946. He hoped the Attorney General would explain what were the duties for the performance of which these large sums were received. The Law Officers of Scotland and Ireland received compensation to the amount of £2,850 per annum; while their clerks received £600. There was a strong party, both in and out of that House, who maintained that there would be no remedy for the abuses of patent legislation except the abolition of patents. Now, he was not of that opinion; but he thought it would still be useful that this view of the subject should be fully considered by the Committee. That was the opinion of the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie), who would probably second this Motion, and it was the only point in connection with this subject in which he agreed with him. For his own part, he believed that all that was required to be done could be accomplished by better administration of the present law with probably some slight changes. If the Patent Laws were to be maintained, it was necessary that there should be, in the first place, an examination to ascertain that the invention was new, that it was sufficiently described, and that it was useful. The present law was, on the whole, sufficient to protect all interests if administered in the spirit of those who brought in the Bill, if not of those who passed it into law. With regard to the expense and uncertainty of patent litigation, he felt that it would be difficult to provide any specific remedy for it. It was a difficulty not confined to patents, but inherent in all contentions affecting technical subjects. Hence, whilst he was quite willing that an attempt should be made to render patent litigation easier, or to improve it, he would rather rely on a diminution of the subjects of contention. Patents should not be needlessly multiplied, nor given for processes which were never intended originally to be made the subjects of patents. Without detaining the House longer, he would conclude by moving the appointment of a Select Committee.

MR. MACFIE, in seconding the Motion, said, that the House would, no doubt, remember that two years ago he had had the honour of bringing the question of patents under the notice of the House, and at that time entered so fully into the subject that it was not necessary for him now to go over the whole matter. He was glad to think that there was a greater amount of unity in judgment as to patents and the operation of the present law between himself and the hon. Member (Mr. Samuelson) than he had anticipated. Both desired that what was just should be done, and that what was the truth should be ascertained. But they went further together, for the hon. Gentleman said that if the Parliament of this country were to make certain the proper administration of the law, there would be no necessity for an agitation for the abolition of patents. In that opinion he (Mr. Macfie) almost entirely coincided. A great change had taken place with regard to the administration of the Law of Patents, and especially as regarded the interpretation of the Statute of Monopolies. Originally it was provided that patents should not be given where they were hurtful to trade; but as patents were now administered, they were in a great many instances not only hurtful to trade, but to the general community. Then formerly it was held that mere processes of manufacture and additions to inventions could not be made the subject of patents; patents were only granted to the true inventor; whereas now they were granted to the assignee or the importer of foreign inventions. As much as £200,000 was at this moment asked by a foreign inventor for the right to vend his invention merely in this country. No doubt there was a great difference between the present state of matters and that which existed in the reign of James I., when the Statute of Monopolies was passed. Trade at that time was only carried on on a small scale, and if a patent was granted it was obviously for something of advantage to the public, and if it was used it was seen that it did not interfere with any existing interest. At present, however, the reverse was the case. Let them look at the increase in the number of patents which had taken place of late years. It would be seen from a Return, for which he moved two years ago, that in 1700 there were only 2 patents granted in England; that in 1750 there were only 7; and in 1800 only 96. From that year, however, the number went on increasing, till in 1855 250 patents were granted; in 1860, 523; and he had learned from the Patent Office that for last year the number amounted to no less than 2,491. The increase was much more marked in Scotland and Ireland, because in these countries there were fewer patents granted in the olden times. Thus a vast number of monopolies had been created. He contended that the patent system was unquestionably a great obstacle in the way of our manufactures. He held in his hand the specification of a patent in connection with frills, which had lately attracted notice, and it had recently been decided to be law that where any article has been manufactured on a system patented in this country, or if any part of an article is such, the article could not be sold in this country. For instance, in the case of Betts' capsules, if it had been proved that bottles had been capped by capsules made in conflict with the patent abroad, the articles contained in the bottles could not be sold. His hon. Friend (Mr. Samuelson) had spoken of the many obstacles encountered by a manufacturer from the working of the present Act. In confirmation of that he (Mr. Macfie) need only appeal to the evidence of such men as Sir William Armstrong and Mr. Scott Russell. In the memoirs of Brunel they would find the opinion of that eminent engineer recorded against the Patent Laws. He considered them the great curse of the day, both to the inventors and to the public, and argued that they should be done away with, for the more competition there was the better was it for the public. It was very interesting to observe how the views of men of eminence had become modified and enlarged in reference to this question. He would point to Earl Granville, who was Chairman of the Committee of the House of Lords in 1851 on the Patent Laws, and is strongly against them. His Lordship, in his Report, said—

"The last witness was the Master of the Rolls, who, notwithstanding the experience he had had as one of the Law Officers of the Crown, was decidedly of opinion that the Patent Laws were bad in principle, and no advantage either to the public or to the inventors."

All the evidence brought before the Committee—both by those who opposed the Patent Laws and those who were in favour of them—had tended to confirm Earl Granville's opinion that the Patent Laws were indefensible, not useful to inventors, and disadvantageous to the public. In the Reports by the International Jury on the French Exhibition, hon. Members would find a very long and well-reasoned article, in which the most eminent authorities of France declared themselves against the patent system. Mr. Cobden was decidedly opposed to Patent Laws. ["No!"] Well, he had in his hand a transcript from a letter written in 1862, in which Mr. Cobden declared that he had a growing doubt as to the value and justice of the system, whether as regarded the interests of the public or of the inventors. The Earl of Derby, when Lord Stanley, declared in the House of Commons that the Patent Laws did more harm than good, and if called on to say "aye" or "nay" for their continuance, he would say "nay;" but that as the question was one that required careful handling he thought it had better be left in the hands of the Government. In Belgium the feeling was most decidedly against patents. In Germany Count Bismarck had also declared against them, and in Holland patents had been completely abolished. Some might say—Cross the Atlantic, and see that model country, the United States. Well, he (Mr. Macfie) did not quite think that America was a model country—it was a highly protectionist country, and behind the age. But, at the same time, he was glad to see that there was a change of opinion going on, and that the question of the policy of patents was being agitated there, and free-trade principles were beginning to occupy the minds of the people. In England the larger Chambers of Commerce had petitioned the House in favour of an inquiry into the policy of the existence of patents. Liverpool, Newcastle, and Edinburgh had asked the House to go to the root of the matter—that was not to the amendment of the law, but to ascertain whether such a law as this ought to exist at all. From a private letter which he had received from a patent agent, he was told that the reason why Holland abolished patents was that it wished to get an advantage over Belgium. Well, what was good for Holland was certainly good for England; and if Holland was encumbered in the race of commerce and manufactures by the existence of patents, how much more so must be a great country like England. If it was a just principle for Holland to abolish patents, he could not but come to the conclusion that it would be a just thing for England to follow its example. In Prussia there were only 103 patents in a year, while in this country the number was 2,500. Nature intended that men should be mutual benefactors; but the Patent Laws contravened this great principle and induced men of science to conceal their knowledge instead of using it for the advantage of mankind. A licence or royalty was a much worse tax upon industry than an ordinary tax, for whereas the latter was fixed and certain the former was arbitrary and uncertain. Patents, in reality, constituted that property which would not be property without them; but he believed that other incentives might be found to stimulate men to benefit their fellows by means of their inventions. Most manufacturers were inventors, but very few became patentees. The professed inventors were very few, and it was for their benefit that the Patent Laws were maintained. He knew that many working men had been inventors and had taken out patents—perhaps one patent out of five was taken by a working man. The trouble and time which was required to bring an invention into notice was generally more than it was worth—to say nothing how men's minds were distracted, and drawn away from their proper occupations. But were they, for the sake of benefit to perhaps 500 of these deserving persons, to inflict injury on 20,000,000 or 30,000,000? On the other hand, a foreign manufacturer might defy our Patent Laws, or a foreign inventor might license his own countrymen or grant licences in Belgium or Holland, while he withheld them from our manufacturers. If licences were permitted at all they should be made compulsory. The effect of these restrictions was to diminish competition and so to restrict employment; and, on the other hand, to raise prices so as to diminish consumers. His argument was this—that if the nation got the use of inventions without granting patent rights the price would be considerably lower; and that these rights should not be granted, because there were better means of obtaining the knowledge of use of new inventions. He was free to admit that much might be said for well-constituted Patent Laws; but the real question was whether something better still might not be devised. In other words, the question was whether we should not have a system of money rewards for inventors? Another matter for consideration was whether by international negotiation we might not get rid of the injustice to manufacturers in a country where a patent existed when there was no such patent in other countries. It was this country that had led the way in instituting these monopolies called patents; and he trusted that this country would also lead the way to free trade in such matters without, at the same time, doing any injustice to inventors.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he rose at that period of the debate because, without going into the merits of the Patent Laws, it might be convenient for him to state the course which the Government proposed to adopt. Last year and the year before, when asked their views as to the appointment of a Committee, proposed by the hon. Member for Leith Burgh (Mr. Macfie), the answer of the right hon. Gentleman then President of the Board of Trade and of the Prime Minister was that the Government would be ready to agree to it. The Government had not changed their opinion. It seemed to them that the position of the question was such that it would be very unwise to discourage further inquiry. The Patent Laws were sure not to be left untouched; there was certain to be legislation, or attempts at legislation, with respect to them; indeed, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hinde Palmer) had given notice of his intention that very evening to move for leave to bring in a Bill on the subject. On the other hand, it was evident that the question was not ripe for effective legislation without further inquiry. There had been no Committee of the House of Commons on the question since 1864, and the Commission which reported a few years ago had by no means exhausted the subject. He hoped, therefore, the representatives of the various opinions entertained on the question would think it advisable that this inquiry should be held, and that the appointment of the Committee would conduce to the settlement of this long-vexed question.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, that though not prepared to object to the appointment of a Committee, he was not very sanguine of any beneficial results. We had had inquiries before, and if the state of the Patent Laws was so unsatisfactory as had been described, he saw nothing for it but total abolition. As to what had been said by the Mover of the Committee, that patents should be granted only when three conditions should be fulfilled—namely, that there should be novelty, a sufficient description, and utility—what tribunal could be established to determine things which were matters of opinion? How could any body of men properly determine the question of utility? Then an invention which was not useful now might at a future time, and under other conditions, become useful. The question of utility really must be one of opinion merely, and yet it was to be absolutely decided before a patent could be granted. The number of applications for extension of the 14 years showed that many patents only came into use so closely as not to pay the patentees during the 14 years, and his experience in past time led him to the conclusion that a patent-right was little more valuable to a manufacturer than a trade mark which was now protected.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that our Patent Laws were probably in a more anomalous state than those of any other country, and might be a very proper subject for inquiry. At the same time, he did not see what was to be gained by it. He was convinced the proposed Committee would furnish them with no more information on this subject than they had already received from the Committee of the House of Lords and the Royal Commission which reported in 1864; and there had been various inquiries outside Parliament. He thought, therefore, that the whole subject of the Patent Laws was ripe for legislation. There was no doubt in the country in what direction that legislation should proceed. The evil was a crying and notorious one, and what was wanted was courage on the part of the Law Advisers of the Crown to apply a remedy. His hon. Friend (Mr. Macfie) had cited the case of Switzerland. It was true that Switzerland had refused to establish a Patent Law, and in Holland it had been abolished. But why? There was not a ton of coal or iron in all Switzerland, and she could not construct a machine there. Every machine which the people of Switzerland required had to be imported from a foreign country. Under these circumstances, it was not to be wondered at that she should be willing to steal from France, Germany, and Italy whatever she could to aggrandize her own manufacturing districts. But who ever heard of the artizans of this country going to Switzerland or Holland for employment? He believed the American Patent Law was superior to any which existed in any other country. The cost of a patent to an American inventor, which was guaranteed to him for 17 years, was 35 dollars; while the cost of a patent to an English inventor for 14 years was 875 dollars. That was the first great secret of the defect in our Patent Laws; for he agreed with the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) that the greater proportion of the inventors in this country were working men; but no working man could pay the enormous cost of a patent, and he was obliged, therefore, to associate himself with the capitalist, who too often made the bargain on terms not of equality or of mutuality. His hon. Friend had referred to the insignificant inventions for which patents were granted in this country—or even for slight improvements on existing inventions. It was said that the Attorney General examined into the matter before he sanctioned the grant of a patent; but he (Mr. Mundella) would engage that if 10 men applied in different terms for a patent for really the same thing, they would all get it. In America, on the other hand, there was a real previous inquiry, as was shown by the fact that last year the Commissioners refused 5,285 applications for patents, this being about 28 per cent of the whole number applied for. So real was the examination, that of 13,000 patents granted about 12,500 were refused in the first instance, and were only granted upon material modifications being made in the specifications. He agreed that there should be reform in the Patent Laws; but he thought that the greatest blow they could inflict on English industry would be to destroy property in inventions. He hoped that the Government would take care that every shade of opinion should be represented upon the Committee. The condemnation of monopolies ought not to extend to patents by which an inventor was allowed to enjoy for a limited period the exclusive use of his own invention. Were they going to deny to the inventors, who for years had devoted themselves to the perfection of machinery, that they had a right of property in that which they had produced? He could point to hundreds of poor men who had risen to affluence through the property they enjoyed in their inventions. Sir David Brewster once said—"If you once open this question you will find that there are other questions opened at the same time;" and there were other rights created by the law besides patent rights. They ought not to go into the inquiry pledged to any particular view of the question, and when the Committee reported, legislation ought immediately to follow.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE wished to say a few words in excuse of the system of granting patents for inventions, which he would separate altogether from the Patent Laws. The opponents of the system seemed to take this position, that the law was such a hopeless deformity on the statute book that no amendment could make it any longer tolerable, and this appeared to be the conclusion of the Commission which sat in 1864, which, he agreed with the President of the Board of Trade, seemed not to go into the root of the matter, but to make certain recommendations of a palliative nature, and to conclude, as if in despair, with an indirect condemnation of the system. So, again, the Law Officers of the Crown—if they followed one of the most eminent of them the hon. Member for Richmond—seemed desirous of getting rid, at a very considerable sacrifice of income, of what they could not but consider an abuse. He hoped the Committee would not deem themselves so much bound by this weight of authority as not to take an independent course; but that they would weigh well the advantages of the present system, and the possibility of amending the laws which regulate it, before they decided to sweep it away altogether. We were too apt in this country to swing like the pendulum from one extreme of opinion to the other, and the British public, feeling the evils of the present practice of taking out patents for every conceivable thing, from a telegraph or steam-engine to the collar of a shirt or the button of a glove—feeling the mischief of trivial, useless, and fraudulent inventions, so called, were just now in a humour to make a clean sweep of the whole system. He could not see the distinction, on principle, between copyrights and patents for inventions, though he admitted that the inconvenience they might occasion to the public might be great in one case, and scarcely appreciable in the other. He could see no reason, on principle, for refusing protection in one case more than in the other, unless we were prepared to say that the owner of any kind of property ought to surrender it to the public, when the public fancied it, without compensation. It should be remembered that the proprietor in this case could protect himself by keeping his invention secret. Who could say that many of the arts which were now lost might not have been preserved if there had been rewards to inventors for communicating their discoveries in earlier days? Might not the everburning lamps of the Rosicrucians; the old art of painting on glass; the artists' colours of Flanders and Tuscany, as vivid now as they were 500 years ago, have become the common property of the world? His impression was that at the root of all the mischief of the present Patent Laws lay the want of a proper tribunal, the members of which, combining legal and special knowledge, should refuse patents which ought to be refused, and, if they did not constitute the Court before whom disputed cases were tried, should act as assessors to the Judge who tried them. He could hardly imagine a system more calculated to enhance the evils complained of than one which, admitting almost every claim, left the opposition to interested individuals, and committed delicate and difficult questions to a jury hopelessly puzzled by counsel. No one could deny the hardship to manufacturers of having to buy up a mass of obstructive patents of modifications of machinery which would naturally occur to those engaged in working it, and of patents which, like bubble companies, were only meant to be bought off. We knew how long the best sewing machine was excluded from this country, and annoyance and obstruction had arisen from patents for various modes of making sugar, the principle of which had long been known and acted upon in the Colonies. He was most desirous to stop this levying of black mail, which might be done by better previous examination and a more competent Court for the decision of cases. He could not, however, reconcile it to himself to take away from the poor inventor what was so often his only possession, and to which he was as fully entitled as the manufacturer to his trade mark, without at least trying the experiment whether a tribunal could not be constituted which would be able to confine the granting of patents to cases of great ingenuity and merit and great public utility. Such a tribunal would cost the country nothing; there need only be a transfer of those fees now paid to the Law Officers, besides which, there was a surplus fund of from £40,000 to £60,000 a-year now paid into the Exchequer. He had no great faith in Government rewards to inventors. However carefully dispensed, they would give rise, as selection of another kind probably would, to great dissatisfaction. The Committee should bear in mind two things—first, that an attempt to amend the Patent Laws, even if it failed, would only cause a brief delay, after which a proposal for their abolition would command, in a much greater degree, the public assent than if forced on at the present moment; and, secondly, that the system of granting patents, if not the cause of, was at any rate contemporaneous with, greater activity and fertility of invention, and that in the most useful and important directions, than had been recorded at any former period of the history of the world.

MR. SAMUDA thought that an investigation of the point would reveal the fact that, on the whole, inventors were losers by their inventions, and this was a point which required very careful looking to, and if inventors gained nothing while the public lost, our system of patents was a failure. He would much like to see the inventors protected in their inventions if this could be done without disadvantage to the public; but he confessed that his doubts as to this being possible were, as in Mr. Cobden's case, "continually growing." The effect of patents, as a general rule, was to embarrass the true inventor, and to give—not a great, but still to some extent—an advantage to an unfair inventor; for whenever an invention was patented which attracted public notice a number of persons made it their business to apply for patents so worded as to interfere seriously with the results which the inventor might have obtained and be working out. If some plan could be devised for preventing the grant of patents to adventurers of this sort, and which were generally known as "fishing patents," which blocked the way of the true inventor, and were only applied for that they might be bought out of the way, and if at the same time you could insure some reward to the real inventor, there would be much to be said for the patent system; otherwise patents would be much better abolished altogether. In any revision of the present Patent Laws, he thought it indispensable to require the full and complete specifications to be lodged at the time of applying for the patent, and thus do away with all limit of time for complete and subsequent specification as now, and again it would be most important to revise and restrict the subjects of patent, and not allow a trifling variation in combination of old and well-known appliances to be patentable. Some such changes as these might work advantageously. He was, however, quite opposed to a special tribunal, sitting in judgment, on the novelty and usefulness of the patent applied for. That must be left wholly to the care and responsibility of the patentee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he quite agreed that this Committee should be appointed without any foregone conclusion. It should be free to inquire into the great question whether or not patents should be altogether abolished—a point which was not referred to the Commission of 1864—and, if not, what alteration and improvement could be made in the law? He would not disguise from the House that he very much concurred in the concluding paragraph of the Report referred to—that some of the evils complained of were inherent in the nature of the Patent Laws, and must be considered as the price which the public paid for their use. But, at the same time, he thought that the evils of the Patent Laws were very much exaggerated by the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie); and he would call the hon. Member as a witness against himself. The hon. Member was asked whether he had personally experienced any inconvenience from the 400 patents that existed in his own trade? and he replied—"Not in the smallest degree." Therefore, he (the Attorney General) could not help thinking that the views that had been expressed on that part of the subject were much exaggerated. No doubt manufacturers had an objection to new inventions, because they found it inconvenient when machinery, that had cost them much money, became out of date, and had to be replaced by newer inventions; but, on the whole, he must say—though he did not wish to prejudge the question—that his impression was against the abolition of the Patent Laws. The object of those laws was the benefit of the public. What were the advantages supposed to be conferred by them? Their purpose was to encourage men to invent, and to publish their inventions. Suppose there were no Patent Laws, what would be the consequences? Let the House remember that there were three classes of inventors—the purely scientific men, who made discoveries from the love of truth, and were quite willing to throw them open to the world; the manufacturers who invented for their own benefit, and took uncommonly good care to keep their inventions secret; and a third class, which the Patent Laws had called into existence—namely, professional inventors, whose avowed business was to gain by their discoveries, and who naturally not only published the results of their efforts, but made very vigorous attempts to overcome obstacles to their general adoption. This class were the creatures of the Patent Laws, and he believed they owed the greater part of their most valuable inventions to them. It seemed to him that it would be a strong and unwise course to destroy those laws, and with them to destroy the class. What were the objections to the Patent Laws? That their influence had been too great—that they had produced a surfeit of inventions, good, bad, and indifferent. On the same ground a farmer might complain that his manure had been too vigorous in its operation—that in the heavy crop of corn there were so many weeds. Well, the weeds were there no doubt; but could he have had the wheat without them? His opinion was that the inconveniences occasioned by bad and useless and obstructive inventions were more than counterbalanced by the good wrought by the useful ones. But if the Patent Laws were to remain, their mode of operation was susceptible of great improvement. The tribunal for the trial of patent cases might be amended by abolishing the jury and substituting scientific assessors. It was a further question, whether it would or would not be well to establish a special tribunal for the trial of patent cases? The process of repealing patents might be facilitated and cheapened. There was another point that had not yet been touched upon. As the law now stood the provisional specifications alone were liable to supervision. As soon as the inventor had filed them it was the duty of the Law Officers to see that they clearly and fully described the nature of the invention. If satisfied on that point the patent was granted, and the inventor could afterwards file any complete specification he pleased, without any control or supervision whatever. Now, it seemed to him that the filing the complete specification, fully and clearly describing the nature of the invention, should be a condition precedent to the granting of the patent, and not subsequent to it. Indeed, he was disposed to think that by doing away with the provisional specification altogether they would get rid of half the useless inventions now patented. There was another question in reference to the nature of the preliminary investigation prior to granting the patent. It was confined, in ordinary cases and in the absence of opposition, to seeing that the provisional specifications clearly described one invention, and only one; but those persons were in error who thought that the task was an easy one. He and his learned Friend the Solicitor General had each a clerk exclusively employed in the work, who reported to them. It sometimes happened that specifications were sent back again and again for correction. His duty involved him in an extensive correspondence with inventors, which was not always of the most agreeable kind, for when they insisted in putting forward inaccurate specifications he always refused to pass them. If they did not describe in his opinion a real invention, he took it on himself to refuse the patent—he had done it very often. Again, persons often tried to crowd half-a-dozen things in one specification—a practice that had to be vigilantly repressed. Frequent attempts were also made to conceal the nature of the patent by the title; but he considered it to be absolutely necessary that the title should give due notice of the nature of the specification, and he always took care that that was done; otherwise persons who might desire to oppose the invention, on the ground that it was not a really original one, would be at a serious disadvantage. An important question arose, however—whether the examination should not be carried further, and comprise, in every case, an inquiry as to the novelty and utility of the invention? A different tribunal would be requisite if that were done; but if the examination was not to be extended beyond its present limits, he thought that the existing tribunal was sufficient. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had described the working of the system in America. It was, however, right that the House should be in possession of the other side of the picture—because it was not true that England in this matter had much to learn from the Americans, or that the preliminary inquiry was of any advantage. With reference to preliminary examinations by the Court, he could not do better than cite the testimony of Mr. Carpmael, who said—

“If such were the practice” (preliminary examination) “there would be many cases of trades and individuals in trades constantly opposing, so that none but a rich inventor could ever hope to get a patent against such a phalanx of opposition.”

And in answer to the question,

“Would there be any disadvantages arising from it?” he said, “I should say that it was all disadvantage, and no possible benefit.”

He might also call attention to what had been said by Mr. Woodcroft, at the head of the Patent Office, who said—

“The Americans pay about £23,000 a-year for preliminary examination, and they are very much dissatisfied with it.”

He added—

“The system of preliminary examination has been tried and found wanting. It is in operation in Prussia, but does not give satisfaction. It was tried in France, Austria, Sardinia, and Belgium; but, being most unsatisfactory, was abandoned in each country. It is now going on in America at an enormous expense, and the Chief Commissioner wrote to me to say that it was a very inadequate system, and a very unfair one.”

He would also read an extract from The New York Tribune, which appeared in The Scientific American, December 3, 1870, as follows:—

“The New York Tribune, in a recent editorial referring to patents and inventions, says our Patent Laws seem to need an amendment which will assimilate them in an important respect to the British. The Patent Office here, as there, should simply register claims to have made inventions or discoveries in their order, without undertaking to pronounce upon their novelty or value, and all questions thence arising should be taken directly to the Courts, and there settled. This is the British rule on the subject, and it is much better than ours. Let the inventor make what claims he will, and let the Court determine their validity. Our laws give the Commissioner and his examiners entirely too much power—power which the best functionaries might abuse through defect of information or error in judgment; which the worse certainly do and will use most unrighteously.”

He had called attention to these extracts in order that there might be no foregone conclusion in favour of this inquiry. It was just as well it should not be supposed that the arguments were entirely on one side. Of course, they all agreed that it was extremely desirable that the Committee should represent both sides and different opinions of the House. He trusted the inquiry would be comprehensive and satisfactory, and that it would furnish very valuable data for legislation.

MR. HINDE PALMER, who had given Notice of Motion for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Law relating to Patents for Inventions, said, that the Bill of which he had given Notice had been prepared by the light of the information derived from the previous investigations that had been held into the subject of the Patent Laws; and his opinion was that if his Bill, after being read the second time, was referred to a Select Committee, or went into Committee in the ordinary course, it might easily be made amply sufficient to meet all the objections now urged against the Patent Laws and their administration. What he desired to see was their amendment, not their abolition. When he reflected that the greatness of England was so eminently attributable to her manufacturing genius, which depended so much on her improved machinery, and that the improvements in her machinery were coeval with the existence of the Patent Laws, he felt that they ought not lightly to be abolished. The Attorney General had already refuted his hon. Friend the Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie) out of his own mouth; but he had omitted to state that the hon. Member had solicited the opinion of a number of leading manufacturers on the question of useless and obstructive inventions, and they had declared that little or no inconvenience had been occasioned by them. In a former debate, the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) cited, among the authorities in favour of the abolition of the patent right, the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Platt). But that hon. Gentleman, in presiding, in January, 1870, at a meeting of the Manchester Institute of Engineers, had said that, though there were defects in the Patent Laws, there was no reason why they should not be amended, instead of being abolished. Again, while the Royal Commissioners said there were inherent objections in the system, which they did not see could well be got rid of, yet they did not go so far as to recommend abolition; which

Sir William Fairbairn, one of their number, and than whom there could be no better authority, thought would be ruinous to the industrial prosperity and inventive talent of the country. Although he signed that Report, it was with the qualification that, in his opinion, it was essential to the wants of the community and to the progress of practical science that the laws should be maintained. While his hon. Friend the Member for Leith (Mr. Macfie) was anxious for a Committee, with the view of reporting in favour of abolition, he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) hoped the Committee would not be of such a complexion as would indicate a foregone conclusion. The working men, from whom had sprung many of the grandest inventions which had enriched and improved this country, were mainly interested in the question. A meeting of skilled artizans had recently been held in Aldersgate Street, presided over by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond, the hon. Member for Leith being present, and both of them advocating abolition. Mr. Galloway, of Newcastle, was to have proposed that the Patent Laws were a hindrance to genius, science, and progress; but, after the discussion, Mr. Galloway moved that protection was absolutely necessary by which the inventor should be secured a legitimate right in his inventions—a resolution which was carried almost unanimously, only two hands having been held up against it. That, he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) believed, was the opinion of the working classes throughout the country, the vast majority of whom were against abolition. Then Mr. Stuart Mill, in his well-known work on Political Economy, had expressed his opinion to the effect that—

“It would be a gross immorality in the law to set everybody free to use a person's work, without his consent and without giving him an equivalent, because it would be practically making the men of brains still more than at present the needy retainers and dependents of the men of money-bags.”

But the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) himself was of opinion in 1851 that it was as complete a fallacy as was ever uttered to say that the grant of a patent was a concession of monopoly, and he said that patents should be dealt with the same as copyright, to which they were analogous. The Bill which he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) had prepared would grapple with the present defects in the Patent Laws, and if the Committee were granted it would supersede the progress of the measure. He should, nevertheless, persevere with it. The Bill, indeed, might be referred to that Committee, who might find it a very useful foundation for the amendment of the laws. It had not been drawn with the view of providing the substitute which was a favourite idea of the hon. Member for Leith, who thought inventors might be rewarded by the State, instead of being granted patents. That was, in his (Mr. Hinde Palmer's) opinion, an utter fallacy, as shown by the present Earl of Derby, the Chairman of the Patent Law Commission, who, at the British Association in Manchester in 1861, pointed out that no tribunal could be found satisfactorily to decide the claims of inventors, some being rewarded too highly, and vice versa; while the value and merit of other inventions might not be recognized till after the death of their authors. The Prime Minister himself, too, last July had said that such a system, besides being a heavy demand upon the public purse, would lead to universal confusion. If the House adopted improvements in the existing laws it would meet, he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) was sure, all the objections on which the abolitionists relied. Instead of continuing the preliminary investigation in the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown, his Bill would entrust that duty to three special Commissioners, as was done so successfully in America—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not in Order in entering into a detailed description of a Bill which was not yet before the House, and which was on the Paper for a later hour. The hon. Member's remarks should be reserved for his Motion.

MR. HINDE PALMER resuming, expressed his hope that, in the interests of commerce and manufacture, as well as skilled artizans, the House would pause before it did anything to sanction the total abolition of patent rights, and thereby deny all protection to inventive genius.

MR. PLATT, as a patentee and user of patent inventions, avowed himself in favour of the Patent Laws, and that all objections would disappear if a proper preliminary examination were instituted. It was quite notorious that patents were often granted, embodying improvements similar to those already patented; and it was almost impossible for the Law Officers, in regard to matters of a technical character, to find out the distinctions from the language of the specifications. Owing to her patent system, England was now the best market for inventions, so that English manufacturers were often in possession of important improvements many years before those of any other country. That was a great advantage. He believed it was in the interest of the public that patents should be retained, believing that their tendency was to reduce the cost of manufacture. Many parties engaged in the manufacture of patented articles were strangers to the invention—as for example, Mr. Bessemer, in his invention in regard to steel, had never any connection with the manufacture of steel, and without the security of the Patent Laws the probability was that we should never have heard of that invention—at least for many more years to come. It did not follow that by the abolition of patents they would abolish secrecy. He knew a gentleman who had an invention which he kept to himself for 25 years, and this monopoly he would perhaps retain for another 25 years. But under the Patent Laws an invention was certain to become the property of the public after a certain limited time. He maintained then that, with a proper discrimination, the granting of patents was a benefit to the public. What was called a combination patent in a mechanical sense was one of the most dangerous that could be granted. In such cases the parties never disclosed the parts which were new until perhaps in the course of some trial, at a ruinous cost to a manufacturer; and, indeed, it was possible, even in the course of the trial, that the combination might be changed. To prevent such an abuse, the parts in the specifications which were claimed as new should be coloured to distinguish them; and he agreed also that it would be well to do away with provisional specifications, and insist on complete specifications at the time the patent was granted. As to the trials of patent causes, these were almost mockeries. It was next to impossible that the Judges should understand the technical questions that came before them without the help of experts; but if experts sat with them, no other alteration in the tribunal would be necessary.

MR. B. SAMUELSON, in reply, said, he would give every assistance to make the Committee perfectly impartial.

Resolution agreed to.

NATIONAL DEBT.—RESOLUTION.

MR. CANDLISH rose to call attention to our National Debt, and to move a Resolution—

It was, he considered, a solemn obligation of the country to get rid of the National Debt. On a former occasion the hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. Illingworth) said that as long as money could be borrowed by the State at 3½ per cent, and employed at 5 per cent, it would be an improvident arrangement to pay off the National Debt. Of that statement he disputed the accuracy. Real property, of which half of the wealth of the country consisted, did not pay, on the average, more than 3 per cent; and railways, in which about £500,000,000 were invested, only yielded an average rate of interest of about 4 per cent. Taxes, again, were not ordinarily paid with money borrowed for the purpose. On all grounds, therefore, he demurred to the statement of the hon. Member for Knaresborough. Another favourite theory was that the National Debt afforded a secure investment to persons unwilling or unsuited to invest money in business avocations. Probably the whole number of our public creditors did not exceed 150,000; but, surely, it would not be said that their wishes and convenience were to be considered at the expense of the 30,000,000 forming the population of this country? It was but reasonable to deal with the National Debt in precisely the same way one would with private property—namely, discharge it from any incumbrance as soon as the means of doing so came within reach. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a speech delivered last year, admitted most distinctly that it was our duty to keep an eye on the National Debt and to go on reducing it. Accordingly, the right hon. Gentleman concurred in the following Resolution, which was adopted by the House on the Motion of the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Lambert):—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable substantially and gradually to reduce the National Debt.”

As, however, the engagement then entered into by the House and the Government was indefinite, and might result in nothing, he (Mr. Candlish) had ventured to bring the subject once more under the notice of Parliament. During the last 40 years they had literally done nothing in the way of paying off the Debt. On the accession of William IV., in 1830, it amounted to £784,000,000; on the accession of the Queen in 1837 it had increased to £787,000,000, and at the present time it stood at £801,000,000. Between 1832 and 1868 the Debt had seemingly increased by £27,000,000, though he believed there was not an actual increase, because, prior to 1855, the Government made no appraisement of the capital value of Terminable Annuities, and their value, therefore, did not enter into the account of our National Debt. If these were taken into account, he thought it would be found that the Debt had remained substantially the same. In 1855 the present head of the Government took a more rational view of the manner in which the Terminable Annuities should be dealt with, and appraised them, adding the capital value to the Funded and Unfunded Debt. That course had been pursued since, and they were now included in the present Debt of £801,000,000. It seemed a matter of great regret that a reign so illustrious for legislative and fiscal achievements should have been barren of any effort to pay off the National Debt. It was perfectly true that the Debt had had its ups and downs during that period; but it was in the last degree deplorable that such petty incidents as the expedition to Persia, China, and Abyssinia should have arrested the purpose of the nation to pay off that heavy national obligation. It might be asked—“Can the Debt be paid?” Of course, there was no obligation unless there was the power. But we had the power. We had utterly lost sight of the vastly-increased wealth of the country by means of which the Debt might be reduced. We had, indeed, displayed so much apathy on the subject, that we might seem gradually to have acquiesced in the notion that it could not be done. To pay off of the Debt had become a standing type of the impossible. But what had our fathers done? Surely, in energy, and effort, and self-denial, we were still their equals. Now, between 1815 and 1820, our fathers paid for interest £31,500,000, and as principal £5,100,000—making a total of £36,600,000 per annum. Between 1820 and 1830 the average annual payment was £29,440,000 as interest, and £4,300,000 as principal—making a sum total of £33,740,000 per annum. Yet in 1870 we only paid for interest and on account of Terminable Annuities £27,000,000, and as principal £4,000,000—or a total of £31,000,000 a-year. Now, while we had been thus diminishing our payments on account of this Debt, the population of the country had been increasing. Our population was 18,000,000 in 1811, 21,000,000 in 1821, 24,000,000 in 1831, 27,000,000 in 1841, 29,000,000 in 1861, and last year it was estimated at 30,830,000. He was aware that it might be said that increase of population did not necessarily mean increase of wealth. But during all this period the wealth of the nation had likewise gone on increasing. According to the estimates made by Professor Levi, an eminent authority well known to the House, the wealth of the country in 1811 was £2,100,000,000, or £116 per head of the population; in 1841, £4,000,000,000, or £150 per head; in 1861, £6,000,000,000, or £206 per head; and in 1870, it had advanced to £7,000,000,000, or £230 per head, and those calculations were substantially confirmed by Mr. Dudley Baxter. With that increase of capital we had become relatively to our Debt richer—it had become less relatively to our means. In 1801 the Debt was 26 per cent of our capital; in 1841 it was 19 per cent; in 1861 it was down to 13½ per cent; in 1870 it had fallen to 11 per cent. Relatively to the population our Debt in 1821 was £39 10s. per head; in 1831 it was £32 10s. per head, and last year it was only £25 10s. per head. As our property had increased so also our annual income had increased. In 1801 our annual income was estimated at £230,000,000, or £14 7s. per head; in 1841 it was £450,000,000, or £17 6s. per head; in 1861 it was £600,000,000, or £20 15s. per head; and in 1870 it was reckoned at upwards of £700,000,000, or £23 per head. Our total income for one year was now nearly equal to the whole capital of our National Debt. Our growing wealth, too, had been evidenced by our improved living. As we have got richer we have lived in a better style. In 1820 we consumed 17lbs. of sugar per head, and in 1869 it rose to 43lbs.; in 1820 we consumed 1lb 4oz. of tea per head, and in 1869 it rose to 3lb. 10oz.; in 1820 the consumption of tobacco was 12oz. per head, and in 1869 it rose to 20oz. per head; in 1820 the consumption of wine was a quarter of a gallon per head, and in 1869 it was three-fifths of a gallon. In 1821 we paid 29s. per head for interest; in 1831 23s. per head; and in 1870 we paid only 17s. 6d. per head. Whilst the interest on the Debt had been diminishing, and our means increasing, the general taxation of the country had been reduced. From 1811 to 1821 it was £3 14s. per head, and in 1870 it was £2 5s. per head; but in point of fact it was now under £2 per head. In 1801 we paid 8½ per cent of our income for interest; in 1840 we paid 6½ per cent, and in 1870 a little over 3·8 per cent. Five per cent of our income, or 1½ per cent less than we paid for interest alone in 1841, would realize a sum of £35,000,000 a-year—a sum sufficient to pay the present, and extinguish the entire Debt in less than 40 years. Comparing ourselves with our ancestors, it was clear that our ability to pay off these burdens had greatly increased, and at the same time we had been diminishing our contributions. And let us, for a moment, compare ourselves with two other countries—the one the great Republic of the West, and the other a small kingdom in the East. The United States and Denmark furnished illustrations of what might be done in reducing National Debt. Since September, 1865, in the United States, a sum of $437,000,000 had been paid off, being at the rate of £16,000,000 sterling per annum. In the year ending the 1st of March last £23,000,000 sterling were paid off. In connection with that fact it was important to inquire what were the relative means of the two countries. From the Report of the Special Commissioners for Revenue in the United States in 1870, it appeared that the wealth of that country was estimated at £4,700,000,000, or £120 per head of the population, whilst ours was estimated at £7,000,000,000, or £230 per head; being very nearly double that of the United States. Were we less capable than the United States of sacrifice and self-denial, or were we not so high principled in reference to our obligations? If we had made the same sacrifices as the United States we should in the past 5½ years have paid off about £30,000,000 of Debt per annum, or a total of £165,000,000. Then one word respecting the little kingdom of Denmark. In 1867 the Debt of Denmark was £14,500,000, and in 1869 it was £13,200,000, having been reduced £1,300,000 within that short space of time, being at the rate of 7s. 6d. per head per annum of the population. If we had paid in the same proportion we should have paid off £11,500,000 per annum. When France entered into war with Germany, she had a Debt of £600,000,000 sterling; he presumed there was no exaggeration in assuming her Debt to be now £900,000,000 sterling, which would entail an annual payment of between £40,000,000 and £50,000,000 for interest alone. If France was capable of enduring such an amount of heavy taxation for the interest of her Debt it was not too much to expect the people of this country, who were certainly as rich as the people of France, to be able to pay £35,000,000 a-year for principal and interest. The Debt of Prussia when she began the war was £100,000,000 sterling: this had probably been increased by another £100,000,000. She would, however, receive £200,000,000 war indemnity from France during the next three years, which sum would extinguish the Debt of Prussia. Which European Power was now stimulating us to enhanced Estimates and increased armaments? It could not be France; and if there were any reason at all for our augmentations it must be apprehension of Prussia—a country who had neither the desire nor the power to land a single soldier on our shores. But if it was otherwise, and we had to enter into a warlike conflict with Prussia, she, at the end of three years from the present time, would be free from Debt, whilst we should enter upon the strife with a Debt of £800,000,000. The question arose—How was the sum of £35,000,000 a-year to be raised? Many ingenious schemes had been suggested for paying off the National Debt. One of which was the reclamation of waste lands here and in the Colonies; another that the State should become its own banker; and another that it should withdraw all its gold circulation, and substitute for it an inconvertible paper currency: but all those schemes were as inadequate as they were ingenious. He knew of no other feasible scheme than the simple one of raising the money by the old-fashioned mode of taxation, and paying off the Debt in hard cash. But was it necessary to increase our taxation in order to do this? The right hon. Gentleman last year was able to put a very glowing Financial Statement before the country, and he at once both answered this question, and gave the key to the position which we then enjoyed in two short sentences. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“I need say nothing of the reductions in the estimated expenditure for the Army and Navy. They speak for themselves, and as the Committee will perceive, it is mainly to them that we owe the financial prosperity which I hope I am not too sanguine in saying now exists.”—[3 Hansard, cc. 1613.]

And the right hon. Gentleman added—“The secret of all this financial success is the simplest in the world—it is nothing on earth but economy.” The prescription he (Mr. Candlish) would recommend was exactly the one adopted by the Government up to last year—that we should set ourselves to work rigidly to economize. But was there room for economy? A few figures would speedily show. From 1831 to 1840 the Army and Navy of this country cost, on an average, £13,400,000 a-year; from 1841 to 1850 these two services cost £15,800,000 a-year; and during the three years immediately preceding the Russian War, their cost united was only £16,000,000 a-year. But last year the Army cost £15,851,000, and the Navy £9,781,000, or together, £25,632,000; being an increase of £9,632,000 over the cost of the Army and Navy just previous to the Russian War. Within those two margins of cost in 1853 and 1871, the resting-place of efficiency combined with economy might, he believed, be found. Then, again, annuities, pensions, and compensations for the non-effective service amounted to no less than £5,300,000 a-year; and though that sum could not be reduced in hot haste by the mere exercise of the will, still there was room for a large, gradual, and early diminution in those enormous figures. A very considerable reduction might be made in these various items, in order to deal with the National Debt; but even if we had to increase our taxation to do it, that taxation, large as it was, was neither excessive nor onerous. The estimate of expenditure for the current year was £67,113,000, and that was generally accepted as the measure of the taxation imposed on the country; but the idea was very much exaggerated, for several of the items coming into this total amount did not spring from taxation. The whole of our Miscellaneous Estimates, amounting to £3,200,000, were not in the nature of taxation at all. There was, in these Miscellaneous Estimates, £1,000,000 for the sale of old stores from the naval and military Departments; £773,000 as a contribution from the revenues of India for military charges; £350,000 for extra receipts in the civil Departments; £21,000 derived from the London, Dublin, and Edinburgh Gazettes; and £594,000 from fees in public offices for specific services rendered. None of these items were derived from taxation. Then there was a sum of £4,650,000 obtained from the Post Office, and about £500,000 from the Woods and Forests, which, with other items, made a total amount of £8,675,000 to be deducted from this gross expenditure as the sum not contributed by taxation, and leaving a balance of only about £58,000,000 as the sum raised by taxation. But of that £58,000,000 at least £30,000,000 was the product of taxes on luxuries—spirits, malt, wine, and tobacco; the total receipts on these and other articles of luxury amounted to about £40,000,000, not a farthing of which could be said to press upon the industry of the country. We were not, therefore, so over-taxed as to be unable to deal with our formidable weight of Debt. If the Government would set itself to the work of retrenchment in the expenditure on the Army and Navy, and curtail the non-effective charges, he did not think it would be necessary to add anything whatever to the taxation of the country to reduce the National Debt. But if it was made to appear absolutely essential, he thought the country generally would acquiesce in the imposition of an extra 2*d.* of income tax for the purpose of achieving the great object he had in view. It would redound to the honour of the present household-suffrage Parliament if it took up and carried out the work commenced before the Reform Act, and abandoned by the middle-class Parliaments from 1833. A great advantage accruing from the payment of the National Debt would be that the vast capital its payment would set free would find employment in recruiting the industry of the country; but a yet greater good would be gained to the country by the moral strength resulting from the self-sacrifice necessary to attain so great an end. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK seconded the Motion. He said, national indebtedness is one of the three great dangers which threaten Europe—namely, pauperism, war, and debt. Poor Laws, in many respects, appeal to our best sympathies against our better judgment. Military enthusiasm rouses some of our deepest passions against our calmer reason; while, as regards Debt, the love of present ease stifles the voice of prudence and the sterner dictates of duty. Most European nations had immensely increased their Debts during the last 50 years. Thus, North Germany, in 1815, owed £100,000,000; in 1870, £150,000,000; France, in 1815, owed £70,000,000; in 1870, £518,000,000; Austria, in 1815, owed £99,000,000; in 1870, £300,000,000; Russia, in 1815, owed £80,000,000; in 1870, £300,000,000; Spain, in 1815, owed £100,000,000; in 1870, £225,000,000; Italy, in 1815, owed £50,000,000; in 1870, £257,000,000; and the United States, in 1815, owed £25,000,000; and in 1870, £477,000,000, making a total of £524,000,000 in 1815, and £2,227,000,000 in 1870; and if they included other countries the grand total, according to Mr. Dudley Baxter, was no less than £3,845,000,000 in 1870, against £1,530,000,000 in 1815, showing an increase of no less than £2,300,000,000, of which by far the greater part had been incurred during the last 20 years. Their own Debt, indeed, had, happily, not increased during the last half-century, but it was even now much heavier per head than that of any other country. Thus, in England the interest per head was 17*s.* 5*d.*; in the United States, 12*s.* 6*d.*; in Holland, 12*s.* 3*d.*; in Italy, 11*s.* 10*d.*; in France, 8*s.* 7*d.*; in Austria, 7*s.* 3*d.*; in Spain, 7*s.*; in Belgium, 6*s.* 10*d.*; in Russia, 2*s.* 10*d.*; and in North Germany, 2*s.* 9*d.* per head. Moreover, if they looked further back in England's history they found that the Debt had, on the whole, been increasing with terrible rapidity. In 1689 it was £664,000; in 1691, £3,130,000; in 1700, £9,407,000; in 1720, £54,000,000; in 1750, £77,000,000; in 1775, £127,000,000; in 1800, £471,000,000; and in 1815, £861,000,000, without including the value of the Terminable Annuities. From that date it began to decline. In 1825 it was £810,000,000; in 1830, £785,000,000; in 1840, £789,000,000; and in 1850 it was £787,000,000. In the Crimean War it rose, and in 1858 amounted to £805,000,000. The subsequent figures were not comparable with the preceding, because they contained the calculated value of the Terminable Annuities. The total Debt, then, in 1860, was £821,900,000; and in 1870, £800,700,000. Political enonomists had long urged the necessity of reducing Debt in times of peace. The practice of funding, said Adam Smith, in the Wealth of Nations, "has gradually enfeebled every State which has adopted it." David Hume, in his Essay on Public Credit, said, roundly, that if the nation does not destroy the Debt, the Debt will destroy the nation. More recent writers, as, for instance, Mr. Dudley Baxter and Mr. De Meschin, have taken the same view. Sir George Lewis expressed his conviction that—

"It is certainly incumbent upon Parliament to take such means as are at its disposal to prevent us from imposing a perpetual burden upon our successors."

The present First Lord of the Treasury, during the Crimean War, made a noble effort to meet the expenses of the war out of the services of the year. Speaking of the National Debt, in 1854, he said, in eloquent terms—

“Any man who has had to do with the administration of the finances of the country must feel how many sore evils it has given rise to—how many grievous burdens you are compelled to keep upon the people, because of the demands of the enormous, almost overpowering, mass of our Debt; how many good works you are obliged to defer, or, if commenced, brought to a stand; how you are obliged to narrow and pare; and cut down the assistance you are desirous of offering to civilized and honest pursuits, because of the immense and crushing weight of this great, permanent, and standing Debt.”—[3 Hansard, cxxx. 373.]

The present Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once spoken in similar terms; and no wonder. The average interest on the Debt since 1815 had been £30,000,000, in round numbers, making a total of £1,600,000,000 paid since that date for interest alone. In 30 years they would again have paid an amount equal to the whole Debt; and yet, as far as such payments were concerned, they would still owe as much as ever. In fact, not paying the Debt practically meant paying it over and over again. But it was said that if the money which would be required to reduce the National Debt was left to fructify in the pockets of the people, they would make a better use of it, because it would then be applied to increase the national wealth. This argument, if good for anything, is good against any reduction of Debt. But it is obvious that, as it has always been found necessary to borrow in times of war, if we do not repay in times of peace, we shall go on increasing our Debt until it crushes us, and national ruin would be only a question of time. Moreover, it must be remembered that taxes were paid out of income, and that the savings of the people were only a fraction of their income. It was estimated in 1866 that out of an income of £650,000,000 a-year the saving was only £140,000,000. But it was urged that the National Debt was mainly borrowed in Three per Cent Stock, and that individuals can get more than 3 per cent for their money. Three per Cents at 90, however, paid $3\frac{1}{2}$, and to that must be added the expense of collecting the sum required for the dividends. The total Revenue last year was £68,850,000, and the expense of collection was £5,000,000. If, then, it cost £5,000,000 to collect £69,000,000, the expense of collecting the £27,000,000 required to pay the interest on the National Debt would be £2,000,000; and, consequently, the real annual cost of the National Debt was £29,000,000, and not £27,000,000. It was unnecessary to observe that even this did not fairly represent the cost to the taxpayer, which, even under the best system, was greater than the gross sum received by the State. Without, however, dwelling on this, it was obvious that the real cost of the National Debt was not 3 per cent, but more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Now, hon. Members knew that for the last three years the rate of discount on mercantile bills had averaged less than this; depositors in private and joint-stock banks received on an average less. The capital invested in railways, and which amounted to £233,000,000, receives, on an average, barely 3 per cent; and how about land? He should like to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether land, after deducting all the local charges, of which the House heard so much a few nights ago, paid a clear $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent? If this last argument, then, against the repayment of the National Debt broke down—if the arguments in favour of doing so were so strong—then came the practical question—what course ought they to pursue? He need hardly say that he was not going to advocate a sinking fund. No doubt money when allowed to accumulate at compound interest did increase with surprising rapidity. Many proposals to take advantage of this had been made from time to time; and perhaps the most extravagant ever seriously contemplated was that of a Frenchman, M. Ricard, who left 500 livres by will, 100 to accumulate for 100 years, and then to be spent on essays on the lawfulness of interest; 100 to accumulate for 200 years, to form a fund to reward virtue and literary merit; 100 for 300 years, when it could have increased to 226,000,000, to found banks and museums; 100 for 400 years, when it would have amounted to 30,000,000,000, to build 100 towns in France, each with 150,000 inhabitants; 100 for 500 years, when it would have reached four millions of millions, and was to be devoted to various miscellaneous objects—namely, to abolish fees for masses; increase revenues of clergy; maintain all French children till three years of age; found workhouses, hospitals, and asylums; and pay off the National Debts of England and France; and, lastly, the surplus was to be spent at the discretion of his executors. A sinking fund was, indeed, proposed now by no one. But neither was our present system satisfactory. We were slightly diminishing our Debt in two ways—by accidental surpluses and by Terminable Annuities. Of the first he need say nothing; but the latter—that was to say, Terminable Annuities—seemed to him to contain many of the objectionable features of a sinking fund. He objected to them on five grounds—

1. They must be continued during war, even if we are borrowing at higher rates;
2. They tie up the hands of Parliament;
3. They are inconvenient to holders, and consequently are an expensive mode of borrowing; but this objection does not, of course, apply to those held by the Government on account of savings banks, &c.
4. They assume that the people have not energy or resolution enough to look the Debt boldly in the face;
5. They diminish greatly the moral effect of a reduction of the Debt.

Apart from the mode of dealing with the Debt, he maintained that we were not doing enough to reduce it. Taking the most favourable period, we had, since 1857, paid off £35,000,000, being at the rate of considerably less than £3,000,000 a-year. His hon. Friend (Mr. Candlish) had shown how much more had been done by some other countries. To the cases quoted by him he would only add that of Holland, which, from 1850 to 1868, reduced its Debt by £22,000,000, or at the rate of £1,220,000 a-year—equivalent to £10,000,000 in our case. His hon. Friend proposed that we should set aside £10,000,000 a-year to the reduction of our Debt. Now, was that an unreasonable proposition? Adam Smith, writing when the national income was £10,000,000 and our population only one-third of what it was now, proposed to raise the revenue to £15,250,000, and to devote £6,250,000, or much more than one-third of the whole amount, towards the reduction of the Debt. Sir George Lewis, in 1855, thought that £5,000,000 a-year was “little” to devote to that purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer himself said—

“As far as I am concerned I should be very glad if the House would consent to put on a shilling income tax for the reduction of the Debt.”

A shilling income tax would produce far more than £10,000,000. That was what the right hon. Gentleman considered ought to be done. But what had been done? Last year he had a surplus of £4,337,000. Yet he only proposed to devote £337,000 to the reduction of the Debt, and of this paltry amount he postponed £147,000 to the present year. He (Sir John Lubbock) did not deny that the reduction of the sugar duties was a good thing in itself. A free breakfast table would be a great boon; but his idea of a free breakfast table was the table of a man who was not in debt. Cheap tea and cheap coffee were very desirable, but tea which was not paid for was dear at any price. Moreover, he scarcely thought that our Chancellors of the Exchequer realized the inconvenience of continual changes in rates of duty. Great changes, such as those associated with the name of the present Prime Minister, might be great blessings; but constant changes were very injurious to trade. For weeks before a Budget speech we knew in the City that business was deranged, commerce checked, and speculation encouraged. He wished that for some years our Chancellors of the Exchequer would try how little, instead of how much, they could alter. Moreover, he maintained that we had now a favourable opportunity of reducing the Debt. From 1855 to 1869 not less than £23,000,000 of annual taxes had been repealed, and yet we had a surplus amounting to more than £4,000,000, and continually increasing. Under these circumstances, he ventured to urge on the House that the liquidation of Debt was a national duty and a high moral discipline; that it would be an example to other nations, and would influence the action of individuals. If the nation was indifferent to its Debt, how could we expect that private persons would exercise an exceptional prudence? The course he recommended would also greatly strengthen the country in the eyes of foreign nations, and he did not think the sum proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Candlish) was excessive. If adopted, the advantage would be soon felt; in three years we should have relieved the country of a permanent burden of £1,000,000 a-year, and many of us might hope to see the Debt reduced within comparatively narrow limits. The Government had a large majority, and in his judgment deserved their support; but there was a feeling in the country that in some respects they were too humble—that they underrated the power of the country. England was conscious of strength, and, though not anxious to be feared, was determined to be respected, or, at least, to deserve respect. Now, as regarded the National Debt, he had, he thought, shown that, in the opinion of our greatest political economists—nay, in that of the Government itself—the Debt ought to be reduced, that we had the means of doing so, and that the amount proposed by his hon. Friend was not excessive. If it was to be maintained that the reduction of Debt was inexpedient, let us consider the arguments on which this opinion was based; but it was evident that, on the contrary, it was admitted by all competent authorities that the Debt ought to be reduced; then let us not trifle with this duty—let us not be satisfied with paltry amounts and accidental surpluses, but let us at once make such an effort as might be necessary to effect our object, and let us do so on a scale worthy of a great, a wealthy, and a prudent people.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to make early provision in the Estimates for reducing the debt not less than £10,000,000 a-year.”—(Mr. Candlish.)

MR. J. WHITE was quite sure that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted the advice of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), or that so feelingly addressed to him by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), he would soon lose the majority he had at his back. He demurred entirely to the comparison which the hon. Member for Sunderland had made of the debt of the nation with the debt of a private individual. The difference between the two cases was this—a private individual was bound to pay the amount of his debt some time or other; the nation, on the contrary, only granted an annuity, it might be a perpetual annuity. If the nation, in its present condition, were to pay off the Debt that was now owing, it would be somewhat in the position of a gentleman who possessed a large landed estate that was heavily encumbered, and had a large number of children to provide for, and yet allowed those children to starve, in order that he might be able to pay off his debts. That was our position. One in 20 of our population was a pauper, and how many millions were there just on the confines of pauperism? Recollect that a vast and disproportionate amount of our Revenue was extracted from the poorer classes. The total Revenue now derived from tea, sugar, coffee, spirits, malt and tobacco was £38,300,000, or £11,500,000 more than the whole amount required to pay the interest of the National Debt. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had very wisely begun the removal of the obstructions that were in the way of trade by making an important reduction in some of the taxes on locomotion. That right hon. Gentleman knew very well that taxes on locomotion were taxes on the products of the country. When we had a very formidable competition with neighbouring States in many articles of export, it was the bounden duty of the Government to do all they possibly could to reduce the cost of living and the prime cost of production. Owing to the natural increase of our population, the normal accumulation of our wealth, and the inevitable diminution in the purchasing power or value of gold, our National Debt every succeeding year must press less and less hardly upon the people of this country. Indeed, his hon. Friend (Mr. Candlish) had made a speech which entirely confirmed that view, and the statistics he cited must thoroughly convince the House that his Motion ought not to be adopted. His hon. Friend told the House that in 1811 the amount of the National Debt was estimated at 26 per cent of the aggregate value of the property of the country, and now, in the course of a few years, it was computed to be only 11 per cent. If we did not diminish our Debt, and did not embark in any war, under the process now going on, this national burden might, he (Mr. White) thought, be reduced at the end of this century to 5 per cent of the aggregate value of the whole property of the country. His hon. Friend had spoken of sugar, tea, and coffee as luxuries, but they had become actual necessities of life, and any Government which would abolish the duties on them would be entitled to the highest praise. He had risen to address the House merely in consequence of the transparent fallacy of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and to point out to the Government that they would have very few supporters if they followed the advice of the hon. Gentleman. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to turn his acute mind to see how our fiscal system might yet be so modified as to afford greater facilities for the development of the commerce and industry of the country, he would be richly rewarded not only by the magnificent results, but by the gratitude which he would earn from the people.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, the words of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. J. White) seemed to imply that taxation must be removed from everything before we could apply ourselves to the payment of the National Debt. When the question was discussed last Session, the Chancellor of the Exchequer accepted the proposition that the Debt ought to be substantially reduced. The advantages that would follow from the reduction of the Debt had not been fully appreciated. When we saw what was being done across the Atlantic, how the United States were reducing their Debt at the rate of £20,000,000 per annum, the question of reducing our own Debt could not fail to repeatedly occur to our minds. In 1855 our funded Debt and Terminable Annuities amounted to £805,411,000, in 1870 they amounted to £800,681,000—so that in 15 years we had reduced these branches of the Debt by less than £4,800,000—a very poor result for a great country like this. He was not prepared to advocate an additional income tax for the purpose of paying off the Debt, nor ought any special tax or any special kind of property be selected to bear the burden—it would be most unfair to call upon any one interest only to contribute to this object; but he should be glad to see provision made in each Budget for paying off some portion of the Debt in an open, straightforward manner. What he would like to see was this—every year, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward his Budget, he would be able to mention that a certain amount had been devoted to paying off the Debt, besides what was now required by Act of Parliament. Under the Act, each quarter it was the duty of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to add up the sums of receipt and expenditure, deduct the latter from the former, and apply one-fourth of the balance to the extinction of the Debt. But Chancellors of the Exchequers had rather evaded the Act, and the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt had not always devoted one-fourth of their surplus to the prescribed purpose. No doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought he might use the money in a more profitable manner, and, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman could explain to the House how he had kept within the Act of Parliament. Not possessing the acumen of the right hon. Gentleman, he confessed he did not see how it was done. It seemed to be assumed that 3 per cent should be the minimum rate of interest in this country, and in this way the National Debt was in one sense a protection to the capital of the country—it prevented interest from being less than 3 per cent, because any man could obtain that interest for his money by placing it in the Three per Cents. But was the labour of the country protected in any shape on that account? There was no minimum price of labour. But if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to apply £3,000,000 a-year to the reduction of the Debt; if the Government broker were 300 days in every year to purchase £10,000 worth of stock, what an effect it would have on the securities of the country. The exchangeable value of railway stock and all our various securities would rise to the great advantage of the community. But if, according to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), the National Debt was so good a thing, why not increase it? Notwithstanding its great advantages, however, according to the hon. Gentleman himself, every man in 20 was a pauper, and in this metropolis we had 150,000 or 160,000 paupers. While wealth, therefore, was increasing at one end, poverty was increasing at the other. In order to decrease that pauperism it was, he maintained, essential that some portion of the taxation of the country should be expended in reducing the Debt which would have the effect of fostering its industry. It was contended by some hon. Gentlemen that the National Debt was a benefit, because the country was bound over in a vast sum of money to keep the peace. He feared that the subject of the reduction of the Debt must come many and many a time before the House before any impression would be made upon the amount of the Debt. But he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would begin the custom of providing in the annual Budget a sum to be applied to the reduction of the Debt; although he did not desire to see the income tax increased for that purpose.

MR. ILLINGWORTH held that the present time was inopportune for proceeding with the reduction of the Debt, as the question of the incidence of taxation, showing on whose shoulders the burden of taxation should lie, was still unsettled. Both the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution had referred to the case of America; but it should be remembered that there was this peculiarity in the case of the United States—that its public Debt had been incurred by the existing generation for war purposes, and that it was but right they should recognize the moral obligation to pay it. Happily that obligation did not lie upon us, for it had been incurred two generations back. The hon. Member for Sunderland, in moving the Resolution, had also adverted to the fact that the wealth of this country was pro rata much larger than that of America; but he (Mr. Illingworth) wished that the hon. Gentleman had entered into the question whether the amount of poverty in England did not exceed that of the United States—whether, in fact, there was not among our population ten times the extent of pauperism; for it was clear that those who were in the position of paupers, and immediately above it, must be exonerated from bearing any charge for the purpose of liquidating the public Debt. He objected, he might add, to the analogy which had been drawn between public and private debt. In the case of the National Debt there was no obligation to pay the principal—it was a question of national expediency whether that should be done or not—while in the case of an individual it was a matter of the clearest prudence to pay the sum in which he happened to be indebted as soon as possible, for otherwise the claim for its liquidation might come upon him at a most inconvenient moment. Circumstanced as we were, it was, he maintained, incumbent upon us to remove the restrictions which pressed on the shoulders of industry, and to impose the taxation of the country more generally upon its realized property. For these reasons it would, in his opinion, be inexpedient to take at the present moment steps to discharge the National Debt in the manner proposed.

MR. LIDDELL thought there was scarcely any feature in our national life so remarkable as the torpor which seemed to pervade the mind of the country with respect to the discharge of our national obligations. He thought it, therefore, incumbent upon Members of this House—and especially those representing large and wealthy communities—to express boldly their opinions with respect to it. He was quite aware that many of the most sagacious thinkers in this country inclined to the opinion that it was a wiser policy to relieve its industry by lightening the burden of taxation than to make sacrifices by imposing or retaining taxes for the extinction of the Debt. But he would venture to ask, with the greatest possible deference, was there no limit to this policy? This policy had been going on now ever since Sir Robert Peel so successfully carried the repeal of the corn laws. Sir Robert Peel's policy was directed to free the commerce of this country from restrictions. He succeeded; and the result had shown the sagacity and foresight of the great statesman. The right hon. Gentleman who now presided over the destinies of this country, following in his steps, and working out his great scheme, set his mind to work to relieve labour; and, though a political opponent of the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Liddell) congratulated him upon the result. But we had been engaged in relieving commerce and labour from the weight of the restrictions imposed upon them by taxation for years, and he should wish to learn, from some high financial authority, whether there were any taxes which were now hampering the productive power of the country? He did not believe that there were; and he was, therefore, of opinion that the time had come when some greater effort should be made to relieve the nation from the great obligation under which she laboured. And when was that Golden Age of financial prosperity to arrive when we should be enabled to relieve—or, at any rate, to diminish—the burden of our Debt? He was afraid that, like the Golden Age of Literature, it had come and gone. Twelve months ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer held a position which he was afraid they would have to wait some time before seeing again. Then he had a magnificent surplus, and he reduced the income tax by £1,250,000, and took off half the sugar duties amounting to £2,350,000 more, and of which nobody complained, thus throwing away, in his opinion, a great opportunity; because, if he had retained these taxes, he might have made a considerable impression on the National Debt in a very few years. A good deal had been said in the course of the discussion of what had been done by America to reduce the charge which she had incurred in the late war, and he admired her efforts in that direction. But if America, with her restrictive tariff could pay £16,000,000 or £17,000,000 a-year, in how much better a position ought not we to be who were subjected to no such incubus? He did not wish that taxes should be imposed for this purpose, but only that when there was a surplus, it should not be applied to remitting taxes which did not hamper the industry of the people. They had heard much of the loss of the prestige of England—in language which he believed to be very much exaggerated; but it would be curious to trace how far the influence of England abroad was lessened by the existence of this Debt, and the absence of any commensurate effort to reduce it. Foreign statesmen might say—"England is a noble country, and we have no wish to quarrel with her; but we intend to vie with her commerce, and for that purpose a seaboard is necessary. We do not mean to be very scrupulous how we get one. We shall listen to no remonstrances from England, because she is hampered by the dead weight of £26,000,000 a-year of interest on Debt, and will not therefore go to war." It had been said that the Debt prevented us from engaging in war; and, if so, that was the best argument he had heard in its favour. The fact, however, was we had slumbered under our Debt, and had not made the patriotic efforts to reduce it which had been made by other nations. Successive surpluses, when they accrued, had been frittered away in remitting taxes which did not press upon the national industry. If hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were sometimes fond of agitation, would agitate for the payment of the Debt, he believed they would find a response from the working classes, for it interfered with their social comforts, by enhancing the cost of many articles of almost prime necessity, and thereby lessened the real value of their labour in the markets of the world.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, he thought it would be difficult to convince the working classes that they would be benefited by paying every year, not only the interest of the Debt, but a considerable portion of the capital. He was confident that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not propose the reduction of the Debt without fully considering the circumstance of the time when it was proposed to do so; and would consider whether we had sufficient money which we could not employ in a preferable manner, and whether our position in a future emergency would be injured by the largeness of the Debt. He denied that the Debt, large as it was, affected the credit of the country; on the contrary, we were in a much better position to bear the burden than we formerly were. Our annual income had increased so enormously that the public creditor had now three times the security that he formerly had, and if the country had to borrow any large sum he was sure that it would be obtained with greater facility than at any former time. For instance, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have no difficulty in raising the debt to £1,000,000,000, if he could show that he had a good investment for the additional money—such as the purchase of the railways for the State.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have listened with much interest, and I hope with much instruction, to the debate; and I must say that, in a great deal that has been said, I cordially concur. If I ventured to criticize the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), I should say that I feel more certain of the general conclusion at which he arrived than I do of many of the premises by which he supported it; for I do not feel the most implicit confidence in all those estimates by which he calculated to a million the income and property of the country; nor in the various divisions, subdivisions, and multiplications to which they have been subjected in his acute and ingenious brain. Nor can I follow the hon. Member in some of his statements with respect to the remissness of former Parliaments in dealing with this subject. The fact is, that within a few years past, we have had statements made of the amount of our Debt entirely erroneous and misleading, from the simple fact that while a considerable portion of the Debt has been paid off by Terminable Annuities, it used to be the practice, from some inexplicable reason, to omit that portion from the calculations of the Exchequer, and thereby to represent the Debt in former years as less than it really was. I therefore venture to point out to the hon. Member for Sunderland that at the time of the peace our Debt, instead of being £800,000,000, was nearly £900,000,000. Since that time we have added £80,000,000 to the Debt—namely, £20,000,000 for the emancipation of the slaves, £40,000,000 for the Crimean War, £10,000,000 for the Irish Loan, and £9,000,000 for the Abyssinian War. I have provided myself with an accurate account of the state of the Debt at the present time. The funded Debt is £738,000,000, and the unfunded, I am proud to say, only £4,000,000. The Terminable Annuities, estimated at 11 years' purchase, amount to £50,000,000—making altogether about £793,000,000. It follows, therefore, that since the close of the War, and adding the £80,000,000 I have mentioned, the Debt has been reduced from £980,000,000 to £793,000,000—a reduction not very far short of £200,000,000. Consequently, it is not fair to accuse those who went before us of having done nothing for the reduction of the National Debt. Nor can I admit that we are doing nothing in that direction, for we are paying off £50,000,000, or rather more, by Terminable Annuities; and during the course of this year we have paid off £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 of Debt, not including in that the payment of the £1,000,000 which were expressly set aside for the purpose of repaying advances made by the Bank of England. Still, I agree with the general view of the hon. Member for Sunderland as to the propriety of always reducing the Debt as far as circumstances permit. The counter proposition seems scarcely arguable. Erasmus wrote an Encomium on Folly; but I can imagine no task more hopeless than delivering an encomium on debt. When the hon. Member for Sunderland says that it is the duty of the Government to place £10,000,000 a-year on the Estimates for the purpose of paying off the Debt, he stopped short of the difficult task of demonstrating how that amount was to be raised. Nor am I much moved by the example of America, quoted by the hon. Member. It certainly is not the duty of the Finance Minister of this country to indulge in criticisms on the finance, of our neighbours; but I venture to submit to those who are struck with the boldness and vigour of American finance that it may be a question whether it would not have been wiser for the Americans first to restore her currency to the metallic basis, and then endeavour to lower the interest of the Debt, rather than have asked the country to pay off the Debt rapidly. I apprehend that that that would have been the course adopted by an English Finance minister. Then the real question is not whether we ought to do what we can towards the payment of the Debt, but whether the hon. Member for Sunderland counsels the House well, when he advises us to place on the Estimates £10,000,000 every year to pay off the Debt? That proposal seems to me liable to many objections. Admitting the expediency of paying off the Debt, I am for the easiest and least offensive manner possible of doing so, and I think the mode proposed by the hon. Member the most difficult and most offensive. We have had a proof of this in the course of the present discussion, for many hon. Gentlemen have mentioned numberless taxes which they would rather have repealed. The hon. Member, therefore, whenever he made his proposition would, instead of meeting with a ready assent to pay off the Debt, find everyone who had in his mind a tax which he thought ought to be repealed, running his tax against the paying off of the Debt. Then there is another objection to any such way of paying off the Debt, and that is that taxation presses very much more heavily in one year than another; that the country is not only in a different state, but that the demands on the Revenue are greater or less in one year compared with another; but the cast-iron process of the hon. Member, for making a certain annual reduction, makes no allowance for those varying circumstances. The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) appeared as a mediator between the two controversial parties; and while agreeing with the hon. Member for Sunderland that it is the duty of the Government to reduce the Debt, is equally of opinion that it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make no provision for meeting that obligation. The comparison of public and private finance made by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), does not hold good. With regard to a nation, you might increase or diminish the revenue, but the expenditure is in some degree fixed. The case, however, is different in respect to private finance, for there the revenue is fixed and the expenditure is variable, according to circumstances. With a nation, paying off the Debt is increasing the burdens of the people, whereas an individual can discharge his debts merely by the exercise of economy and self-denial. My hon. Friend also raised another question—whether the Government does more wisely in attempting to pay off the Debt by means of Terminable Annuities, or by placing this sum upon the Estimates; and my hon. Friend threw his authority into the scale in favour of the course recommended by the hon. Member for Sunderland. I will answer my hon. Friend's arguments seriatim. In the first place, he contends that Terminable Annuities go on in time of war, so that we are at the same time paying off Debt on the one hand and borrowing money on the other. But that is by no means necessary, because such are the advantages of Terminable Annuities, as we now employ them, that it is within our power, in any time of emergency, to stop those annuities and arrest payment altogether. I also apprehend that the advantage is considerable in regard to the payment of Debt, as we can put the thing in a train that goes by itself, almost as a matter of course, and we thereby avoid quarrelling when we come to ask for the sums to be voted. Then it is said the affair is removed from Parliamentary control. In a certain sense this is not so. No doubt, Parliamentary control is not invited, because the sum to be paid off the Debt is mixed up with the interest; but if this were carried beyond a certain limit, Parliament would soon find that Government played fast and loose with it, and Parliamentary control would not fail in such a case. My hon. Friend said, also, we lost the opportunity — if I understood him, of showing that energy that would be displayed by having a Parliamentary fight over the question every Session. That, Sir, is quite true; but I am quite sure that he is too good a political economist not to know that energy is not a good thing in itself, but only good when you cannot get a good thing without it. So, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland also thought we might lose the moral effect of a great effort and noble spectacle in paying off all our debts. No doubt it is a very fine thing to give a great moral spectacle. When people get into distress and misery they have the opportunity of showing a great moral spectacle, and the results no doubt are great; but, for my own part, I prefer giving no such spectacle, simply because the calamities which give the opportunity of developing those high qualities do not exist. I shall continue to think we do not unwisely by paying off our Debt in a moderate way by Terminable Annuities. The truth is, that of all economical and financial authorities the worst are those who, ignoring the existence of any alternative, strive to make out a splendid case for themselves; but it appears to me that the right management of financial affairs consists not in this adoption of a certain particular theory or view, but of that sort of tolerant moderation that tries to accommodate them all, carrying none to any excess or violent extremes. I am, therefore, in moderation, for the reduction of taxes; I am, in moderation, for the reduction of Debt. The problem of the reduction of Debt is really this—how to get into the hands of the Government a large quantity of stock which they can cancel and pay off. That may be done in various ways, and if my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, content with the discussion he has raised to-night, will give me his confidence for about six weeks longer, I will undertake to show him, when the proper time arrives, that I have had the opportunity of making some slight impression on the Debt of the country.

MR. CANDLISH said, he was satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, and would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION—SCHOOLS (DRILL AND GYMNASTICS).—RESOLUTION.

MR. R. TORRENS moved a Resolution for instruction in military drill and instruction in rate-aided schools. The hon. Member, in support of the Resolution, referred to the example of Switzerland, which adopted this practice of giving military instruction and drill to young men attending school, which became the foundation of a general system of military efficiency and economy; and referred to the important aid to the national defence which would ultimately be afforded by the adoption of his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, instruction in military drill and gymnastics should be given in all State-aided and Rate-aided Schools to boys over eight years of age; and that a Rule to that effect should be introduced into the 'Revised Code.'"—(Mr. Robert Torrens.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he did not suppose that the object of his hon. Friend was more than to draw attention to the advisability of encouraging drill at the elementary schools. But, in fact, the new Code was more favourable to the scheme than he supposed. The Government was fully aware of the advantages of drill to the children themselves, apart from any possible ulterior advantages to the country; but they must remember that the large sums of money voted for the purposes of education were primarily for such purposes. The Code acknowledged for the first time the usefulness of drill, and by the 24th section they allowed two hours of drill per week for 20 weeks in the year to be equivalent to the amount of attendance at school; but he could not consent to make drill compulsory in state-aided schools. As soon as they were satisfied that "the three R's" were taught in their schools, the Government would be glad to encourage additional instruction in the other elements of education.

GAME LAWS (SCOTLAND) AMENDMENT
BILL—[BILL 4.]

(Mr. Loch, Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Parker.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LOCH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the object of the measure was to remove the grievances that now existed in connection with the game laws in Scotland. Though this was the third Session in which he had introduced a Bill of this nature, it was the first opportunity he had had of making a complete statement concerning the object of the measure, of justifying the principles on which it was founded, and of stating his grounds for believing that, if passed into law, it would effect the objects in view. The two years which had elapsed since he first brought the question forward, had made him aware of many difficulties surrounding it. One of those difficulties arose from the extreme sensitiveness exhibited whenever the subject was discussed, not only in the House of Commons, but out-of-doors. This sensitiveness, however, was not, as might have been expected, found to exist chiefly in the owners of land, but was exhibited in an even greater degree by the lessees of shootings. Nor was the reason for this difficult to find. Between the owners of land and their tenants there existed the bonds of mutual kindness and goodwill, and mutual interests; whereas the lessees of shootings, whose sole object was to obtain the utmost value for their payments, had no obligations of mutual consideration towards the tenants of the ground. Nevertheless, it was the owners of land who had to bear the opprobrium of a state of things injurious to the public, and he might, indeed, say that it was in their interest, equally with that of the tenantry, that he asked the House to pass this measure. The House must not suppose that because quietude existed in Scotland in regard to this subject, therefore it was regarded with indifference—the real fact was that that quietude arose from the settled conviction that the question was in course of being settled. The strongest opinions were, in fact, entertained on this subject in Scotland; not by an ignorant, uneducated set of people moved by agitators, but among the élite representatives of perhaps the most intelligent class in Scotland—the great tenant-farmers—the men who, by their enterprize and capital, had converted the stubborn soil of the country into what it now was, and had raised the poor lairds of that country into the condition of wealthy country gentlemen. It was on their behalf that he now took up the question, in the hope that the Bill might lead to the removal of the grievances they were now liable to experience under the present state of the law. The necessity for a change in the law was admitted by almost everybody who spoke on the subject; he would at present only refer to the evidence given by Lord Hatherton before the Committee of 1846. Lord Hatherton, an English nobleman, who had formerly been a great game preserver, stated that the tenantry knew well that game did them very extensive damage, and that it made a great difference in coming to terms with their landlords whether the game on their lands was destroyed, or they had the power of destroying it; and he added that since he had destroyed the ground game on his property his tenants had shown an increased willingness to make improvements, and he said that he was quite confident that improvements of various sorts, in the destroying of old fences and the making of new fences, extensive drainage, and in the introduction of root crops not hitherto cultivated, would not have been undertaken if the tenants had believed that their improvements would have been subjected to the former depredations by game. Now, that evidence of Lord Hatherton appeared to him (Mr. Loch) to involve a point of the greatest importance as regarded the progress of agriculture. Ingenious calculations had been made as to the quantity of food actually consumed or destroyed by game; but, in fact, the real injury done to agriculture was caused not so much by the actual devouring of food by game, as by the state of the law deterring farmers from making improvements; for it was an admitted axiom that no branch of commerce could be advantageously carried on which was not founded upon an entire confidence in the probability of reaping due reward from it. Lord Hatherton's opinion, therefore, fully justified the proposition of the present Bill—that hares and rabbits should no longer be allowed to increase for the benefit of the landlord at the expense of the tenant. Another piece of evidence in favour of his views was the amusing speech delivered by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt) last year on the Motion for the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor). That Bill, it should be remembered, proposed the total abolition of the game laws. The hon. Member said—

“ Having said this much against the Bill, he desired to give some friendly advice to his brother preservers of game, for he believed they would take advice from him in a better spirit than they would from the Member for Leicester. Now, he confessed he did not think that everything in regard to the game laws was in a satisfactory state. The long list of convictions for poaching made him very uneasy, and was a sort of disgrace to the civilized age in which we live.”—[3 Hansard, cci. 1400.]

And the hon. Member for Dorset proceeded to describe the measures taken by him for the comfort and wellbeing of his labourers, by which he secured their goodwill and their co-operation in preserving his game. Now, if such results could be brought about by treating people well, what need was there for the game laws in their present shape? The hon. Gentleman, after other lively and sensible observations, proceeded to give his brother landlords another piece of advice, in which he (Mr. Loch) must say he fully agreed—

“ He was not anxious to bring his own individual case before the public; but he might mention that he reared 4,000 pheasants the year before last, and that during the last 23 years there had not been on the average more than one case of poaching per annum on his estate. This was because every labourer on the estate voluntarily constituted himself a keeper of the game, as he was treated like a Christian, and, in fact, considered himself as one of the family. He wished every landlord would have all the rabbits on his estate killed, and see that his tenant-farmers were not eaten up with hares. If they took his advice they would do what was still more important, and refuse to let their places for shooting, in order to put a few dirty sovereigns into their pockets. If the landlords built cottages for and made friends of their tenants, and if they declined to make the game the subject of a money transaction, they would be able to withstand for many years the onslaughts of such men as the hon. Member for Leicester, and to keep up a noble sport and amusement which brought about and cemented those feelings of friendship and cordiality which ought to exist between all classes, and more especially between the owner and the cultivators of the soil. Nothing can be more grating to the feelings of men who occupy land, and who expend their time and their money in the cultivation of it, than to have strangers breaking through their fences,

Those were the only two pieces of evidence with which he would trouble the House as regarded the necessity for some change in the existing state of the law. A condition of things which so moderate a man as the hon. Member for Dorsetshire deemed unjust ought not to be allowed to continue. He (Mr. Loch) would now proceed to show why he thought his Bill would afford a better solution of the question than any of the other propositions which had been brought forward. The first of those propositions was that game should be made property. Now, he could not understand what benefits could follow from a mere change of names. He was unable to perceive how making game property could put an end to the evils which at present existed, nor how a poacher would be deterred in any way because hares and rabbits had acquired a higher legal status than they now had. Another much more sweeping plan proposed to abolish the game laws altogether. There was a plausibility in proposing to abolish the game laws altogether, and this seemed one of those slap-dash attempts at legislation which took with people who thought that strong measures must be the best. But he (Mr. Loch) did not believe that public opinion generally, even among farmers, was ripe for any such change. At any rate, that was not the opinion of the farmers of Scotland. Nor must it be forgotten that if they abolished the game laws they must institute new and more stringent trespass laws. No man could sit down and draw a trespass law which should be so effectual as the game laws. In point of fact, the game laws constituted the very best trespass laws that could be devised. The consequence of simply repealing those laws would be to afford extra facilities for poaching, and not to advantage of tenants. The next proposal was of a somewhat similar character. It did not go to the length of proposing the entire repeal of the law. It simply proposed to take hares and rabbits from under the operation of the game law. For some reason, however, it did not appear to receive a great deal of attention, either in Parliament or in the country. He thought, indeed, the attention it received was less than it deserved from the honesty of purpose of its promoters,

The only effect of the change would be to relax the law against poachers so far as hares and rabbits were concerned, and the right of the tenant to kill these animals would be no further advanced than at present. By the law of Scotland the right of the landlord to kill hares and rabbits was not created by what were commonly known as the game laws—those laws were a mere code for the regulation of the rights given by the law of the land. The exclusive right of the landlord to kill hares and rabbits upon his estate was vested in him by the common law, and the right which he possessed gave him also the authority to prohibit any other person from killing hares and rabbits on his property. Therefore, if hares and rabbits were excluded from the game laws, it would not interfere in the least degree, so far as Scotland was concerned, with the inherent right which was now possessed by owners of property. Accordingly, if this proposal had been carried through Parliament, it would have left the tenants in the same position they now held, with this additional disadvantage—that their farms would be liable to be infested by poachers and other unauthorized persons in search of hares and rabbits, the search for which, under the existing law, rendered the person so searching liable to be prosecuted for trespass. Another proposition to which he (Mr. Loch) attached great importance had been suggested by some of the most influential bodies among the agriculturalists of Scotland. They proposed to give a joint right to kill hares and rabbits to the landlord and the tenant. Those gentlemen, however, thought that all arrangements of that kind would be liable to be defeated by means of contracts into which the tenants might be compelled to enter. They therefore proposed to provide that contracts under which tenants handed over their rights should be prohibited. When he (Mr. Loch) first came to consider this question, he confessed that he was somewhat startled by the proposal to limit the power of entering into private contracts, and he hesitated to give his approval to a scheme which would interfere with rights inherent in property; but being satisfied at length that there was no better proposal before the public, he had to consider whether there were no real grounds for divesting landlords and tenants, to a certain extent, of their power of freely contracting together in that respect. The first point to which his attention was directed was with regard to the quality of the right to game. There was no property in game conferred by the statute law of Scotland, the only right which existed being that to which he had referred as having been conferred by the common law—the right of proprietors to kill game upon their own property. As an illustration of the fact that there was no property in game, if a tenant found a man poaching upon his farm, he would be able to procure the poacher's punishment as a poacher, but he would have no right to deprive him of the game which he might have killed; and that that was the law was stated in the most explicit terms by the late Lord Advocate in the debate on his Motion for a Select Committee, in 1869. The Lord Advocate said that nothing could be done in the way of legislating on the game laws, without keeping clearly in mind that they were the creation of statutes and of statutes alone. There was then no property in game in Scotland, and therefore there could be no interference with the rights of property if Parliament stepped in and legislated on the subject. In fact, Parliament for centuries past had gone on dealing with game, and the regulations affecting it, in such a manner as to meet and suit the changing circumstances, interests, views, and feelings of succeeding generations, beginning with the Act of 1551, which imposed confiscation of property and death as a punishment for the killing of game, on the principle, as candidly stated, that the law was enacted for the protection of the sport and pastime of great lords and landowners, whose diversions must not be interfered with. But still there remained the difficulty with regard to contract. He need not remind the House that property was not enjoyed absolutely by anyone; but was held subject to various obligations and restrictions. No person, for instance, was entitled so to use his property as directly to damnify his neighbour. But with regard to contract, when he went into the question he was surprised to find the numerous cases in which the law had sanctioned interference with the right of contract out of regard to public interests. For instance, the Truck Act not only prohibited certain forms of payment of wages, but declared any contract for such payment "illegal, null, and void." The Factory and Workshops Act and the Nuisances Act both contained clauses interfering with the same right. The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Act, passed last Session, made inoperative any contract entered into between attorney and client as to the amount and manner of payment for his services—at least so far that it required that the amount should not be paid until it had been allowed by the taxing officer. The Usury Laws—though no doubt they were now repealed through the progress of onlightenment—formerly made contracts for an usurious rate of interest void. Another Act, passed by the present Secretary of State for War, and known as Cardwell's Act, interfered with the right of carriers to make contracts of a certain description. The State also interfered to restrain a contract of the most delicate kind—he alluded to the marriage contract. Those contracts, it was true, had no direct reference to contracts in respect to the holding of land; but he could not hold that, looking at the abstract principle, any greater sanctity existed with regard to contracts relating to land than existed with regard to any other contracts of a commercial character. If Parliament was justified in interfering with regard to those relations of life to which he had referred, it would surely be equally justified in dealing with contracts relating to land. Now, in fact, Parliament passed last year a measure, some of the provisions of which were remarkably pertinent to the point—the Irish Land Act. He was aware that in referring to that Act he was taking a precedent to which many hon. Members on both sides of the House would object; but, nevertheless, it was passed by Parliament, and he had a right to refer to it. One of the principles of that Act was that there ought to be certain limitations put upon the power of contracting between landlords and tenants. Among the provisions of the measure were the following:—

"Any contract made by a tenant, by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to make any claim which he would otherwise be entitled to make under this section, shall, so far as relates to such claim, be void, both at law and in equity."

"Any contract between a landlord and a tenant, whereby the tenant is prohibited from making such improvements as may be required for the suitable occupation of his holding and its due cultivation, shall be void, both at law and in equity."

"Any contract made by a tenant, by virtue of which he is deprived of his right to make any claim which he would otherwise be entitled to make under this section shall, so far as relates to such claim, be void, both at law and in equity."

Thus they had in a Bill passed only last year on a most momentous subject, a direct sanction for the principle he was now contending for. But more important than the Bill itself he held to be the expressions of opinion by great Ministers and eminent lawyers. [The hon. Member proceeded to read passages from the speeches of Mr. Gladstone and Sir Roundell Palmer in the House of Commons, and of Earl Granville and the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords.] Therefore, in all relations, and under all circumstances, Parliament had thought it right to interfere in certain cases, with the view of preventing contracts being entered into, if the entering into such contracts would, in their opinion, be an interference with public policy. Having got so far, he thought that if he could bring home this principle, so as to show that it was expedient to apply it to the case of the over-preservation of game, he should be justified in proposing to Parliament a measure which was founded upon giving a joint right to tenants with their landlords, and binding both parties against contracting away that right. He would ask—Were the bargains between landlords and tenants equal even in Scotland, where the status of the tenant was high, and the intelligence of the tenants was as great as in any other part of the country? He said distinctly that the contracts were not made upon equal terms; that the tenant was never asked whether the game clauses should be admitted into his lease; that it was assumed he would agree with them, for the reason that if he were to hesitate for a moment, the negotiations would come to an end. A contract presupposed some equality and reciprocity of conditions between the contracting parties; all sorts of unforeseen circumstances might arise to prevent the carrying out of a contract originally based on a perfectly good understanding between parties, but in which certain points were rather understood than expressed. An estate might change hands; a new agent might be appointed; or one of a number of things might happen—so that a tenant might find himself, in the course of a very few years, in a position altogether different from that in which he stood at the commencement of his contract. It might be said that the tenant had his remedy; but that remedy consisted in the issue of a trial at law, and nothing could be more hateful or detrimental to a tenant than to be placed in legal antagonism to his landlord. It might be said, indeed, had been said, that a tenant possessed the right to refuse to enter into those contracts; but that was a choice involving consequences, in case of refusal, which the tenant would not, and in many cases dared not, accept. There was therefore no equality of contract between landlord and tenant, especially in reference to the game clauses in the leases, those being the clauses upon which the landlord was usually and naturally most determined, and on which the tenants had less to say than on some of the other conditions. What was, after all, the value and the nature of the contract into which many of these men entered? He thought that not half-a-dozen Members in that House, except representatives of Scotch constituencies, were aware of the onerous terms proposed in the farm leases of Scotland upon tenants. Such a lease from Ayrshire, for instance, reserved

“the whole of the game, hares, and fishings of every description, with the exclusive privilege of fowling, hunting, sporting, and fishing on the lands hereby let by himself, or others having authority in writing from him or his aforesaid, the tenant having no claim for any damage that may be occasioned by or through the exercise of the privilege abovementioned, and being bound to preserve the game, hares, and fishings on the lands to this extent that he shall not himself disturb, or destroy, or allow his servants or others to disturb or destroy the same; but shall inform the proprietor of all persons who shall fowl, hunt, sport or fish on the said lands without liberty, so that such persons may be prosecuted according to law; and, if necessary, allow prosecution to be instituted in his name, either separately or jointly with that of the proprietor, for all trespass on the said lands, the proprietor guaranteeing him against any expense that may be incurred thereby.”

[The hon. Member also read articles from leases from Fifeshire, Invernesshire, Berwick, and Aberdeen, containing reservations of game, accompanied by restrictions on the tenants of equal severity.] It was hardly possible to conceive anything more shameful than that contracts of such a kind should be permitted by law to exist between landlords and tenants. They were examples of a state of things which would not only permit, but which called for interference with reference to the making of contracts. It was a state of things which militated against the public advantage in a great variety of ways, and its operation was so unfair with regard to the tenant class, as to justify him in saying that not only ought the tenant to have the right to protect himself hereafter by killing the game upon his farm, but that it should not be competent for him to enter into any contracts or arrangements with his landlord by which he should be deprived, or deprive himself, of that right. He would not add much to what he had already said, except that the Bill which he had submitted to the House provided merely and solely for the objects he had stated. If it should ever reach Committee, it would then become desirable to consider clauses seriatim, and possibly to make such improvements as might suggest themselves. As it stood, the Bill proposed to confer upon the tenants, jointly with their landlords, the power to kill ground game, with a clause to prevent the tenants depriving themselves of the rights so conferred. There would be no necessity for either parties exercising the powers proposed to be given by the Bill in an objectionable manner. All he wished was that in every change of circumstances relating to the ownership or letting of farms, the tenants—in case they were injured by such change of circumstances—should have the power of remedying their grievance, and protecting themselves from wrong. He assured the House he had only brought the Bill forward from a deep conviction of the serious necessity of the question with which it proposed to deal—a question which affected social arrangements no less than economical considerations. He would now conclude by moving the second reading.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Loch.)

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: I shall trouble the House but for a few moments while I give my reasons, or I would rather say my excuses for supporting the Bill brought forward by my hon. Friend. As the House is aware, I have strong opinions in regard to the game laws; they are, to my mind, an absolute anachronism; most injurious to the country at large; damaging and insulting to the agricultural community; and tending directly to the wholesale demoralization of the people. That being so, it can hardly be satisfactory to me, or to those who vote with me, to support a Bill that does nothing, as one may say, but touch the fringe of the question, and which for any real amendment of the system I believe to be altogether feeble and inefficient. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Loch) said he should discuss the Bill as one of mere dry business, which he described as the only light in which it should be considered; but when we know from our judicial statistics that upwards of 10,000 of our fellow-countrymen are now annually tempted into poaching, I cannot feel that the subject is adequately described as one of dry business; and I noticed that my hon. Friend himself recognized this when in noticing the speech of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt) he endorsed his opinion that the convictions for poaching in this country inspired him with alarm, and were a disgrace to the community. I observe, too, that my hon. Friend, in criticizing what I may well call the anti-game law speech of the hon. Member, went far outside the narrow limits of his own Bill, and uttered sentiments in perfect harmony with the views I have expressed in favour of abolition of these laws. The hon. Member for Dorset had said that practically the game laws were not in existence on his estate, so good was the understanding between himself and the farmers and labourers about him; he did not allow the crops to be eaten up by ground game, and they, for their part, had no desire to interfere with his reasonable sport. Upon this my hon. Friend exclaimed—"Where, then, is the need of game laws at all?" I must say I thought I never heard better thunder in my life, but I must take leave to tell my hon. Friend that I claim that as my thunder. Perhaps the best reason I can give for supporting the second reading of the Bill is that its provisions are so entirely small, and it would not stop any more thorough measure—of course I mean my own—from passing even this very Session. My hon. Friend expressed his opinion that his measure had received the unanimous approval of the farmers of Scotland. I confess I heard that statement with astonishment. From communications which I have had from farmers, and from reading some of their organs of the Press, I have no hesitation in saying that my hon. Friend, in describing their adherence to his measure as unanimous, was led into a great exaggeration. Why, it was only the other day that I received a copy of a Caithness paper giving an account of a meeting of the Caithness Agricultural Association, in which Mr. Purves, a tenant-farmer, came down, as it seemed, like a clap of thunder, upon the meeting—which was not intended for a discussion of the game laws—and taking advantage of some casual pro-game law remarks on the part of the chairman, declared that, for his part, he considered that there was no use saying one thing and doing another, or endeavouring at agricultural meetings to blind people by clap-trap as to the real position of matters, and that of the various Bills under consideration, he had no hesitation in saying that nothing would do but total abolition. Still I am aware that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Loch) has persuaded—or shall I say misled—a certain proportion of tenant-farmers to imagine that his Bill would give considerable relief, and it would have an appearance at least of being ungracious and unkind if one opposed a Bill, honestly intended to go in the right direction, because one was in favour of a more complete scheme. There is, however, one portion of the Bill to which I can give my unqualified adhesion, and that is the transference of jurisdiction from the justices of the peace to the sheriff. I need hardly say that in my opinion, anything which takes the administration of the law out of the hands of the unpaid magistracy, is a great advantage to the community. It is on these grounds that I shall give my uncordial support to the Bill.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he objected to this Bill, because it was perfectly impracticable, and because there were in it clauses which were entirely opposed to fair transactions and fair equality between man and man. He looked upon an agreement between a landlord and tenant as a binding covenant, entered into between two persons, each upon considerations of his own interest. It was now sought to set aside this covenant for the benefit of one of the parties. Such an interference with the rights of private contract, by an act of the Legislature, should have his most strenuous opposition. He had described a clause in the Bill of last year as a profligate clause—he thought this clause just as profligate. It was quite a mistake to suppose the tenant had no remedy for any oppressive act of the landlord in respect of the game. Only last year the Court of Session had determined a case in which the tenant obtained damages against his landlord for having inconsiderately increased the game on his farm. Did they suppose the tenants in Scotland were such slaves that they dared not appear against their landlord? They were among the most intelligent and best educated men in Europe, and he could not believe such an assertion. This Bill was a sham and a delusion, due to an agitation which had been got up in that House. He should oppose this Bill in every way he possibly could, and he should do this the more readily because the Lord Advocate intended to introduce his Bill next Thursday. He believed that Bill proposed to deal in a fair way between man and man on this question; and now that the people of Scotland had got it before them, they were beginning to think better of the agitation. There was already a split in the camp. That being so, he thought the Lord Advocate would have a fair chance to pass his Bill. He would, therefore, recommend his hon. Friend (Mr. Loch) to withdraw his Bill, and to allow the right hon. Gentleman, who had the authority of Government, to bring in his measure—because they might depend upon it that no private Member would ever be able to compete with a Government Bill on the game laws in that House. When he was a young man he remembered the late Duke of Gordon told him he never remembered a young Scotch Member who did not bring in a Salmon Bill. It was the mode he had of introducing himself to that House. The Scotch Members, it seemed, now adopted Game Bills for the same purpose.

MR. M'COMBIE said, he should vote for the Bill of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Loch), but only as an instalment in the right direction. It must be distinctly understood he would only accept total abolition as a final settlement of the question. That was the determination of himself and of all the tenant-farmers of Aberdeenshire. The tenant-farmers of that county—the largest cattle-breeding and cattle-feeding county in Britain—had sent him there to speak for them. They did not ask to have a duty on foreign corn; they did not ask for restriction on the importation of foreign cattle free of disease—his constituents, the tenant-farmers of Scotland, feared no competition provided they would only preserve their crops from being destroyed by game, and relieve them of the law of hypothec and the malt tax. They asked for relief from these grievances that they might be able to compete successfully with the foreigner with their cattle and corn. They trusted the Government would give them their support; but he feared they need not expect much assistance from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, either against the game laws or any other grievance. The tenant-farmers of Scotland would never forgive him for three or four things—the imposition of the tax on shepherds' dogs; the tax on farm horses let out for hire for the improvement of our roads; the gun tax; and charging duty on a farm servant if he should take the saddle from his horse only once in a year; and he took that opportunity of informing the right hon. Gentleman that he was the most unpopular man in England with the tenant-farmers of Scotland, and that he had done the Government a great deal of harm. But the question now before the House was the protection of the crops from game; and in this, as he said before, he trusted the Liberal Government would give them their support.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, the House had heard with evident interest the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire, who was entitled, if anybody was, to speak for the tenant-farmers of Scotland. Like his hon. Friend the mover of this Bill (Mr. Loch), he must ask the indulgence of the House, because though this was the third time his name had been on the back of the Bill, it was the first time that he had had the opportunity of speaking on it. The Bill was for Scotland alone, and was directed solely to putting down over-preservation of ground game; and that he thought it was universally admitted was a grievance that required a remedy. The only difference in opinion was that some thought the grievance very serious, while others thought it comparatively small. For himself, he was one of those who thought it a serious grievance. First, as regarded the destruction of food. He did not know that he quite believed in the large calculations of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) last year; but there could be no doubt that there was a great consumption of food by hares and rabbits. But he (Mr. Parker) wished to draw the attention of the House to another thing—namely, that the principal objection was not to what hares and rabbits eat, but to what they destroy and spoil. Before the Committee of 1846, Mr. Pusey said—

“It has been often asked how many hares were equivalent to one sheep upon a farm, but that appears to me to be a perfectly unjust view of the question. If you had a score of hares folded like a score of sheep on any part of the farm they would eat all they could find, and it would be but a small loss; but the question is what the loss would be if the sheep were allowed to wander over the whole farm to help themselves where they pleased.”

The loss, therefore, from the preservation of ground game was very considerable, and was aggravated by the modern system of farming, which rendered the crops more liable to injury. Over-preservation of hares and rabbits was incompatible with high farming. No wonder then that in Scotland it created irritation between the landlords and tenants. The Lord Advocate said it was a question of rent and bargain only. But it was difficult to estimate beforehand the amount of damage done by game on a farm—it differed from year to year, and from season to season. In England, where the tenure was usually from year to year, this was less difficult of adjustment; but in Scotland, where the tenure was generally a 19 years' lease, it was different. His next objection was that this large breeding of game encouraged poaching, which, in a county magistrate's point of view, was almost worse than theft, but it might rather be regarded as the half-way house to thieving; indeed, it was more than half-way, because the honest man, with an inherent love of sport, would go out on what he considered an innocent poaching expedition, and would get more and more into the habit until he was really little better than a thief. At the same time, public opinion would not support the law in dealing with him as a thief. That was the difficulty in the way of making game property. Public opinion would abide by the present doctrine of the law, that there can be no property in animals wild by nature; and instead of regarding poaching in the light of thieving, the farmer is likely to look upon the poacher who did not break down his fences with leniency, if not with considerable favour. [“No, no!”] Many hon. Members thought a legislative remedy was not required. No doubt many landlords—of whom the hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Robertson) was a good type—so dealt with their tenants that this question of ground game was kept quiet; and of late there had been more of this considerate conduct in consequence of the agitation which had arisen. No doubt, if such conduct should become universal, there would be no need for legislative remedy. But it was not so. A minority continued to push their rights as landlords to extremes, and thereby do practical injustice to tenant-farmers. This injustice must be stopped; and indeed the number of Bills on the game laws which had been presented to the House showed that the public opinion was that a legislative remedy was required. He would divide those Bills into two classes. There were those which permit the number of hares and rabbits to remain as at present, but provide compensation for the damage sustained; and there were those which put an end to the damage, instead of giving compensation. To the former class belonged the measure of the Government, the Lord Advocate being still of the same opinion as he was in a former year. But supposing that measure passed, and granting even that it would be efficient, still it would not diminish the wanton destruction of food, nor even the temptations to crime; all it would do would be to afford the tenant compensation for damage done. Moreover, what prospect was there of the measure being efficient, if it placed no limit on oppressive contracts? Let the remedy in the Act be ever so good, if the lease might forbid recourse to that remedy, would not the intention of the Act be defeated by the contract? To pass to the other class of legislative remedies, there was first the extreme measure of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), who proposed to take away absolutely all artificial protection of wild animals by law. Next came the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan), who proposed not to sweep away the whole of the present legal provisions, but only so far as they protect rabbits and hares. According to that scheme, the public came on the land, subject to the ordinary laws of trespass, and might beat down the number of hares and rabbits to such an extent as to get rid of the grievance. Now, he did not think that tenant-farmers preferred to have that done by trespassers—they would much rather see the game which destroyed their crops diminished by the landlords, or still better by themselves. But supposing this Bill, or supposing even the Bill of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) became law, repealing artificial protection, the contracts would remain the same, and the anomalous position of the tenants would be very unsatisfactory; the farmer being bound by his contract not to touch hares on his own farm, while the public would be free to take them, subject only to the ordinary law of trespass. It was the consideration of these alternatives which had induced the hon. and learned Member for Wick (Mr. Loch) to introduce a measure which contained the somewhat startling provision for the prohibition of all contracts of the character indicated. Three objections had been urged against this innovation in Scottish law and practice. The first was that brought against it on the ground that it was immoral and profligate. This, however, he thought was owing to a misconception, and arose from an error in the original draft of the Bill. This had been remedied, and the Bill, as it now stood, did not propose in any way to touch existing contracts, except by equitable arbitration, and only prohibited contracts of the description referred to in the future. Next, it had been said that the course proposed was unprecedented, and thirdly, that the Bill would be evaded. Evaded he did not think it could be, unless the tenant chose to evade it. And his hon. Friend the Member for Wick had shown that it was not unprecedented. He had quoted from the statute book clauses precisely similar in character from the Irish Land Act, and the Truck Act. From the latter Act his hon. Friend read the clause making contracts for the payment of wages other than in the current coin illegal, null and void; and he (Mr. Parker) would remind the House that the recent inquiries into the truck system pointed towards renewed approval of that interference with contract; and he would ask why, on a like principle, should not the Legislature extend to oppressive contracts between landlord and tenant, in respect of game, the same illegality which they attributed to such contracts of employer and workmen in respect of wages? That point, however, could be further dealt with in Committee. The principle of the Bill was that they should endeavour to deal with this question by legislation; and it applied to ground game, and did not touch winged game. There was another principle in which it agreed with the Bill of the Government, which would propose, he believed, to transfer the right over ground game from the landlord to the tenant, who however was intended to transfer it back again in the lease. The point where difference began between the Bills was the interference with contract; and that was a question which would have to be considered when they had the alternative presented by the Government. For the present, inasmuch as this Bill recognized the substantial grievances of tenant-farmers and dealt with them by transferring power over the ground game to the tenant, he trusted that the Government would show themselves in earnest by assenting to the second reading. If they would do this, he was prepared to say that the future stages would not be pressed forward in an inconvenient manner.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that there was so much in the Bill of what he approved that it was with some reluctance (he rose to state why he opposed this legislation. He took exception especially to the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Loch) regarding the great unanimity, the universal approval with which his Bill had been received in Scotland. [Mr. Loch said he had not gone as far as that; what he said was that it had received almost universal assent.] On the contrary, from indications he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had witnessed among his own constituents, and from communications he had received, and from what he had himself read in the newspapers, the general opinion seemed to be that this was a Bill which, interfering with contract, was one which should not be sanctioned by the Legislature, unless there was no other mode of remedying the grievances complained of. Now, speaking for his own district, the grievances were exceptional, and did not call for the extreme remedies which the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Loch) proposed. Now, with regard to the stringency of the clauses respecting game in leases, such as those the hon. Gentleman had read, the reason why they were so readily signed by the intended tenant was very well known—it was because the tenant knew that however stringent they might be in words, so as to preserve to the landlord all his rights—that the game would not, in fact, be preserved so rigidly as would interfere with the crops, be injurious to cultivation or in any degree vexatious to himself. Admitting all this, he was nevertheless bound to admit that there was a substantial grievance, that the tenant-farmer had a right to complain, and that they ought to apply a remedy. One of these was one which his hon. Friend had pointed out. Circumstances might change; his landlord might change; and the tenant might find himself in a position in which he might be cruelly used. It was a matter for the fair consideration of the Legislature, and it was one with which the Legislature should deal. But then came a very formidable difficulty—that of defining what was excessive preservation, and what was the remedy, and how to apply it. But such a difficulty ought not to discourage his hon. and learned Friend (the Lord Advocate). If he dealt with the subject boldly, as he had done last Session, it was probable he would carry both sides of the House with him, because he would give effect to the opinions entertained by many hon. Members, and secure the goodwill of both sides of the House. He believed there was a great evil in the preservation of hares and rabbits; but it could be modified by wise legislation, though not of the character proposed by the hon. Member for Wick. His hon. Friend said that the great evil of the game laws was that they tended to encourage bad relations between landlords and tenants. But the leading provision of his own measure was so startling, inasmuch as it interfered with freedom of contract, that it could not be justified except on stronger grounds than any he had advanced. His hon. Friend had cited the case of Ireland in connection with the Land Bill, as an analogous case. He (Sir Edward Colebrooke) understood, however, that that Act was passed with reference to the peculiar condition of Ireland; and he was quite confident that had it been understood at the time that it was to form a precedent which might be applied to all cases throughout the length and breadth of the land, that Bill would never have been passed. Ireland had peculiarities which made the legislation recently provided for her necessary; but it did not follow that such legislation was applicable to other parts of the United Kingdom. The farmers in Scotland were an independent body, and were quite capable of making a bargain for themselves; and they might depend upon it that this question of the preservation of game was not likely to be overlooked. The presumption was that it was not passed over when they were signing their leases. Beyond this, he said, and he felt strongly upon the point, that that Bill, instead of improving, would embitter the relations between landlord and tenant, and that, so far from promoting it, would discourage that cultivation which was the honour and glory of Scotland. If it were only on the ground of its interference with the freedom of contract, it was equally desired on both sides of the House to get rid of it. The very Bill of the hon. Member for Linlithgow was preferable.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE desired to say a few words as one who never suffered politically from the game question, and never profited by agitation on the subject. He did not wonder that his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire (Mr. Parker) had spoken warmly on this subject, for it was to this question more than to anything else, that he owed his seat in the House. He therefore did not blame his hon. Friend for his warmth, and it was worthy of notice that his hon. Friend had never promoted agitation about the game question; while he had never failed, when occasion arose, to press it on the attention of the Government, which was more than could be said for others who had equally profited by the agitation. For himself he was heartily desirous of having any grievances—and there was a grievance—from which tenant-farmers might suffer, removed; but unfortunately there were not a few persons in Scotland who would not be satisfied with moderate legislation, because it would take out of the way a fruitful source of agitation, especially at the elections. The grievance was, in his opinion, confined to a few districts of the country; and a few of the large proprietors were responsible for the state of things. He would like to ask the hon. Member for Perthshire what he meant by saying that farmers looked with favour upon poachers who relieve them from superabundant game? For every such farmer as his hon. Friend could produce, he (Mr. Dalrymple) was confident he could produce a dozen or 20 who would look with far more favour on the sport of their landlord and his friends, even although they might have suffered some damage from game. Really his hon. Friend must not so misquote the farmers of Scotland in that way. He entirely agreed with the hon. Baronet who had just sat down that there was nothing like a universal approval by the farmers of the Bill of the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs. He should be sorry to tell the hon. and learned Member for Wick the expressions he had heard used towards him and his Bill; and it was not to be supposed that many of the tenant-farmers of Scotland wished to repudiate contracts into which they had entered with their eyes open. He wished, in passing, to point out the very remarkable circumstance that deer were omitted from all mention in the Bill. He commended that to the notice of the hon. Member for Wick, and hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would explain the omission. He did not think the reason was far to seek; but so vigorous a game law reformer ought surely to have made some mention of deer, for it could not be denied that deer committed a great amount of damage on cultivated land. He merely threw out the suggestion that the hon. and learned Gentleman might have the opportunity of considering it in Committee—if, indeed, the Bill should ever reach that stage. The word “profligate,” which was used by the hon. Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone), was not contained in his (Mr. Dalrymple’s) vocabulary; but he did say that the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend was of a very serious character. He appeared to glory in the interference with the rights of contract which he contemplated in his Bill. They had had the Truck Act quoted, and the Irish Land Act was now to be cast up to them, and that was exactly what he (Mr. Dalrymple) expected. They were told last Session that the Land Bill, which was admitted to initiate some extraordinary principles, was applicable to Ireland only; but he (Mr. Dalrymple) never doubted that it would soon be thought applicable to other parts of the kingdom. He was, however, most of all surprised at one instance of interference with the rights of contract which the hon. Member quoted, in regard to marriage with a sister-in-law. The hon. Member would, he supposed, vote that day against this interference (for the Bill was one of the Orders for the Day), and it was strange that he should quote the law as a justification of another interference which his Game Bill contemplated. He protested against the view of the hon. Member for Wick that Scotch farmers entered into contracts either in ignorance or carelessness as to the terms of their leases. That certainly was not the case in the Lothians, where he had the good fortune to hold some property. He knew very well that there the tenants went very carefully through the clauses of their leases. The reservations as to game were accepted as a matter of course, and nobody would be more surprised than the tenants themselves, if they were told that they were to be set free from this part of their leases. The game question was not a subject on which he felt strongly; but his indignation was sometimes roused at the tone adopted by some law reformers, for they often misrepresented the feeling of the farmers of Scotland, who, though they might have a sense of irritation, would be sorry to see such a Bill as that of the hon. Member for Leicester pass into law. He should be quite satisfied if the question, as a whole, were left in the hands of the Lord Advocate. In the course of the winter the right hon. Gentleman made a most remarkable speech in Edinburgh; in fact, he thought the speech was somewhat too Conservative. It would be a matter of astonishment if, as rumour had it, the right hon. Gentleman consented to the second reading of this Bill. Possibly he might do so, with the intention of referring it to a Select Committee; but, by assenting to the second reading, he would give his assent to a new interference with the law of contract, and directly in the teeth of his own speech during the winter.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he must express his regret that when any discussion took place on the subject of the amendment of the Scotch game laws, the discussion always seemed to have a tendency to degenerate into personalities. He was afraid he must himself come under the class of Members to whom the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) had referred, for he had himself set the ball rolling by the Bill which he introduced into the House some years ago; but he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that no man could be more sincere than he in trying to get the game laws of Scotland amended. This Bill was called "the Game Laws (Scotland) Amendment Bill;" but three-fourths of the lengthened and laboured speech of the hon. Member for Wick was taken up in proving that they had as much right to interfere with contracts in regard to game as they had to interfere with the truck system, and other matters of that kind. The truth was, that instead of being "the Game Laws (Scotland) Amendment Bill," this Bill should be called the Land Contracts Amendment Bill. There was very little change in the game laws involved in this Bill. The principle of the Bill was that of interference with contracts about land. The hon. and learned Member might just as well have introduced a Bill prohibiting contracts for the growing of potatoes, turnips, or anything else raised on the land, as a Bill prohibiting in the manner that he proposed to do, the raising of hares and rabbits. He should like to draw attention to the Preamble of the Bill, for he questioned very much whether many hon. Members had read the Preamble. It said—

"Whereas, in various parts of Scotland, serious evils have arisen from an excessive increase in the numbers of hares and rabbits, which has been encouraged or permitted to take place in the midst of cultivated districts; and it is expedient that the game laws be amended with a view to the removal of these evils."

What evils? The evils caused by an excessive increase in the number of hares and rabbits in the midst of cultivated districts. Were they, then, to understand that this Bill was to apply only to the cultivated districts? Were those extensive moors of Scotland, where hares and rabbits "accumulate and men decay," to be left entirely out of sight. In the Preamble they were left out. The hon.

and learned Member for Wick stated that there was a general and almost universal approval of his Bill in Scotland. Now, six months ago he (Mr. M'Lagan) had taken the trouble of issuing circulars to the agricultural societies of Scotland, with the view of obtaining information on that point. He issued about 50 circulars, and received about 20 replies, and one only of those replies approved entirely of the principle of this Bill. The greater number of the persons who replied were in favour of striking hares and rabbits out of the game list, and then making contracts illegal. The hon. and learned Member for Wick quoted to-day largely from a nobleman who at one time farmed about 2,000 acres of land in England, who began cultivating as a great game preserver, and who found by experience that extensive game preserving was quite incompatible with good cultivation. Now, Lord Hatherton's evidence was altogether in favour of striking out hares and rabbits from the class of game, and that was the principle of the Bill he had introduced two years ago. He was glad that the hon. and learned Member was such an admirer of Lord Hatherton, and he was glad to be able to quote his Lordship in favour of the change which he advocated. If this Bill were passed, it would, in his opinion, prove perfectly useless. It would not be worth the paper on which it was printed. What did they in Scotland want? They wanted a diminution of the number of hares and rabbits. This Bill proposed to interfere with game contracts—that was, to prohibit a landlord from entering into any agreement with his tenant in reference to game. But how was this object to be accomplished? They would find that this Bill left open a back-door, by means of which the tenant would be enabled to enter into an agreement with any other person than his landlord. The Bill divested the landlord of the privilege of entering into a contract with the tenant, but it left the tenant at liberty to contract with any other party. Now, what would be the result of this? Suppose a farm to be offered on lease, and a person to be willing to take it—what would the landlord do? Before entering into any contract with a tenant, he would insist upon the tenant divesting himself of his right of killing hares and rabbits in favour of his butler or factor; and afterwards the butler or factor could assign the right back to him. So that matters would be in exactly the same state as before. Now, he had heard an argument in favour of this Bill which struck him as being very remarkable. There was a tenant-farmer who was strongly in favour of this Bill. He got up at a meeting of tenant-farmers, and said that he objected to the Bill introduced by Mr. M'Lagan, because it would reduce the number of hares and rabbits too much; but he would support the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Wick, because he was very fond of sporting, and he wanted to have plenty to shoot. What was the use of our passing the Bill which would have no effect? The Bill would fail in its object and introduce a worse state of things than now existed.

MR. FORDYCE said, that as Aberdeenshire had been referred to more than once during that discussion, he desired to say a few words. His constituents took a keen and lively interest in everything relating to the game grievance and game law reform, not because he was one of those noisy agitators alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone), but because, unfortunately, there existed a curse of hares and rabbits under which the tenant-farmers of Scotland groaned. He should support the present Bill; but, at the same time, he doubted whether his hon. Friends were advancing the cause of game law reform by again introducing their rival schemes during the present Session. He thought such a measure, introduced by private Members, had small chance of success; in his humble opinion, the time had come to throw the whole responsibility on Government. Circumstances had changed since these two Bills were last introduced. During last year the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, which represented the views of Scotch farmers generally, had held a meeting to discuss the game grievance, and its proper remedies. The hon. Member for Wick thought it so important that he took the trouble to come all the way from London and make a long speech in defence of this Bill; and the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) delivered another long speech in favour of his scheme. The result of the discussion was that the Chamber of Agriculture recommended the amalgamation of those Bills—a resolution which had been quite disregarded by the two hon. Members who were present. There were three reasons why Government should take the subject in hand—first, because only a strong Government could carry a satisfactory measure; secondly, because they had now got an authoritative declaration of what was wanted by the Scotch farmers. There was another consideration to the force of which, as a county Member, he could not be insensible, and that was that the Scotch farmers had discovered that the Government was so strong that they did not care to pay attention to their claims, and they were likely to try the other side at the next election. If this Government would do nothing, he hoped the right hon. and learned Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. Gordon), who, when he was Lord Advocate, did so much for Scotland, would introduce the Bill of the Chamber of Agriculture; and if he did he was sure he would be well supported on both sides of the House.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY was understood to oppose the Bill, on the ground that the principle of interference with the right of contract was most objectionable. He hoped it was not true, as was reported, that the Government were about to support that Bill—especially as they were about to bring in a measure on the subject themselves.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER rose to protest against the application of the word "profligate" by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) to a clause of this Bill. [SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: It is quite Parliamentary.] He did not dispute that; but was sure a majority of the House would agree with him in objecting to the use of the word in reference to the clause limiting contracts. He could not understand the fear which was manifested in all parts of the House of dealing with contracts between landlord and tenant. There was nothing peculiar in such contracts to distinguish them from contracts between master and servant. It was amusing to hear hon. Members on that side of the House, who voted for the Irish Land Bill last year, now turn round and attempt to show that they intended the operation of that Bill to be confined to Ireland. He repudiated such a doctrine. The principle of the Irish Land Bill was either sound or unsound. If it was unsound, then the hon. Members near him ought to have voted against it. If, however, the principle of limitation of contract was right, why should it not be extended to Scotland? The law of hypothec gave such great powers to landlords in Scotland that they could put whatever clauses they liked with regard to game into the leases which they granted to tenant-farmers, and the latter had no chance of making a fair bargain.

MR. DYCE NICOL said, that he thought nothing could show the increasing gravity of this question more strikingly than the great change of opinion which had recently taken place among a large portion of the landed proprietors of Scotland, and among those particularly who were formerly opposed to any concessions; and this was evinced at several of the county meetings of last year, when it was stated that the measure introduced by the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), of omitting hares and rabbits from the game laws, was inadequate to meet the grievance arising from ground game, and that almost any sacrifice would be made to attain the settlement of a question which was every year assuming a more serious aspect, as destroying all that sympathy and good feeling between landlord and tenant which was essential to the interests of both. He said that this was not exclusively a tenant-farmer's grievance, as he held that any landowner who desired to turn his estate to the best account suffered, as the law now stood as to hares and rabbits, when any of his neighbours were disposed to over-preserve them. No doubt the strongest repugnance was felt as to any interference with the freedom of contract; but he could not shut his eyes to the difficulty experienced by their enterprising and industrious tenantry in Scotland in getting farms, except subject to a contract which was injurious to them, which necessitated a wilful and wanton waste of the soil; and any law which enabled a landlord to exercise his privileges oppressively was inconsistent with public policy, and could not, in the face of household suffrage, be long maintained. He hoped the House would allow him to read a few words from a speech of a landed proprietor who held an office under the late Government, and whose political opinions would on any subject be considered sound by Gentlemen opposite except on this question, on which he had recently been obliged to change his opinion on retiring to his estate. So intolerable had the agitation become, that at a late county meeting he said—

"It is not possible to settle the game question and remove from between landlord and tenant those unkindly and dangerous feelings which may bring forth most dangerous fruits, without a declaration on the part of Parliament that, in regard to ground game, the right must be given to the landlord and tenant—I mean that either of them shall be entitled to kill the ground game on his farm; in fact, that the ground game shall be, in the language of the old Roman law phrase, extra commercia—that is to say, that it shall no longer be a lawful matter for bargain, and that a tenant shall be entitled to kill such ground game."

That was the opinion of a gentleman brought up to the legal profession; and he trusted that the Lord Advocate would be able to get over the difficulty which he desired to make out as to drawing a distinction in law between winged and ground game, for it was only in regard to the latter that remedial measures were at present urged. He was satisfied that nothing short of protection under statute for such loss and nuisance would be accepted by the tenant-farmers, and a large portion of the landowners of Scotland.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. Fordyce) in the observations he had just addressed to the House, in thinking that the responsibility of effecting a radical reform in the game laws ought to be thrown upon the Government, who alone had the power of adequately and satisfactorily dealing with the question. He considered that Scotland had been rather harshly dealt with by the Government, for they had imposed a tax upon all guns even when used for the protection of growing crops, and also upon horses used simply for agricultural purposes; and last, though not least, upon the shepherds' collie dogs, which were of prime necessity. The least, therefore, that they had a right to expect from the Government was a thorough and effective protection for agriculturists against over-preservation of game in general. The hon. Member for Portsmouth had said that the agitation against the game laws was a dishonest agitation kept up by worthless agitators. He appealed to the result of the last Perthshire election in disproof of such an unwarrantable assertion, and were this not sufficient, he would recommend him to confer with his Friend (Sir William Stirling-Maxwell) on the matter, and to inquire of him whether the electors of Perthshire deserved to be thus designated by him.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, said, that speaking on behalf of the Government, he acknowledged the importance of the subject with which this Bill professed to deal. It had been a subject of much interest out-of-doors, causing a good deal of agitation, and he might almost say of excitement: and the interest which had been felt in it for years had been shown by the introduction of a variety of measures proposed by several hon. Gentlemen. The variety of opinions as to the remedies to be applied to the alleged grievances was strikingly manifested among the tenant-farmers themselves. Her Majesty's Government showed last Session their opinion that the subject was one which might be, and ought to be, dealt with by the Legislature, by proposing a measure dealing with it; and on behalf of the Government, he had given Notice of the introduction of a measure this Session which he hoped to have the opportunity of submitting to the House to-morrow. Had that measure been before the House now, he should, in all probability, have taken the course of actively opposing the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Wick; but under the existing circumstances, considering the importance of the question, the interest that had been manifested on the subject in Scotland, and the variety of opinions that had been expressed, he should refrain from offering any opposition at the present stage. But he assured his hon. Friend the Member for Bute (Mr. C. Dalrymple) that his opinions on what had been called—not altogether accurately according to his view of it, the game question, were altogether unchanged; and that being the case, he was necessarily opposed, and opposed in principle, to what appeared to him to be the most prominent and characteristic feature of the present Bill. He would characterize the leading clause in it as a clause disabling men of great intelligence, men perfectly able to conduct their own affairs, and to manage business of great importance, from entering into such contracts with their landlords as they pleased. As he was not now offering opposition to the second reading of this Bill, he would not enter into any criticism of its provisions; but he would say—while admitting the competency of Parliament to place restraints upon the freedom of contract—he was not satisfied that the case in question—that of landlords letting their farms, and of tenants taking them—was a case in which the Legislature was called upon to interfere. The case was not analogous to the case of the Truck Act. The object of the Truck Act was the public object of preventing workmen being defrauded by the power of the employers; and the other cases referred to were all cases in which the Legislature interfered for the public interest. But altogether he thought that this was not a case of a similar character. If he were a game-preserving landlord—and he should say that those who had been preserving game indiscreetly, and without that regard to the interests of the tenants which they ought to feel, had little to answer for, because he believed them to be exceptional cases—but if he were a game-preserving landlord not only willing, but anxious to oppress a tenant-farmer by multiplying game on the farm for his own sport, he should not desire a better clause than that which was contained in this Bill, for that was a clause which would be a most powerful engine in the hands of every landlord in Scotland who wished to preserve game. For the provision of that clause was that if in any case a clause should be inserted prohibiting the tenant from killing hares and rabbits, the lease should be immediately void; so that the effect would be that the tenant would be immediately turned out of his farm. Certainly that would be a most powerful engine of oppression to put into the hands of landlords. But without entering further into the provisions of the Bill, which he believed was not calculated to attain the end which his hon. Friend had in view, he would not now, for the reasons he had stated, offer any active opposition to the second reading. But he reserved to himself, at a future stage, when the Government measure was brought before the House, to take such a course as he should consider expedient.

LORD GARLIES said, he had certainly hoped that it would not have been necessary for him to say a word on this subject; but there had been a debate going on for the last three hours and a half, which had been almost entirely confined to Members sitting on the Government side of the House. But after what had occurred; after the strong objections offered to the Bill—and the objections of the Lord Advocate were as strong as any—he felt he should not be discharging his duty unless he were to move an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. He had hoped that when the Lord Advocate said he was entirely opposed to the principle of the Bill, he would have ended by saying that the Government intended to give the second reading an active opposition. But to his surprise the hon. and learned Gentleman took exactly the opposite course—he was opposed to the principle of the Bill, and would support the second reading. Now, it appeared to him (Lord Garlies) not becoming for Her Majesty's Government to take a course such as that which they had announced. They should either say they would support the principle of the Bill, and go into the Lobby if necessary in support of that principle; or, on the contrary, if the provisions of the Bill were such as the Lord Advocate had described them to be, they should be prepared to divide the House against the measure. He believed it was as distasteful to the Lord Advocate to take that course, as it was for him to complain of it; but he supposed his hon. and learned Friend had a "tip" from some higher authority to act in the way he had done. He felt that the only course which the House could take, after the remarks which had fallen from the Lord Advocate, was to reject this Bill; and he therefore called upon hon. Members to support the Amendment.

MR. CRAUFURD seconded the Amendment of the noble Lord. He did so because he thought it was desirable to make it evident that it was not a party question. He was fully prepared to remedy such grievances as were capable of remedy, but the Bill, instead of remedying them, would only create ten-fold greater grievances. It was unnecessary for him to detain the House with further arguments against the Bill. His right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate had already demolished it in language which expressed, far more ably and more cogently than he could have done his objections to the measure. He gathered from his speech that it was simply a matter of delicacy that he had not opposed the second reading, because his own measure on the subject had not yet been introduced. It could only be a motive of that kind that had caused him to say that he would not at once extinguish the Bill, and he therefore thought the kindest thing they could do was that which he was sure he wished in his heart—namely, reject the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Lord Garlies.)

MR. GORDON said, he was anxious that there should be a remedy applied to any alleged grievance arising out of the game laws, in order that an end might be put to an agitation which had been got up in Scotland on the subject. He was therefore glad when he saw on the Notice Paper that the Lord Advocate was going to introduce a Bill for the purpose of settling the question. The question was one which pre-eminently called for the interference of Government, and no party could effectually settle it except the Government. That, indeed, was the view taken by the predecessor of the present Lord Advocate in 1869. When last year a Bill similar to the present was brought before the House by the hon. and learned Member for Wick, the course adopted by the Government was to ask for a postponement of the second reading till the Lord Advocate had introduced his own Bill on the subject; and he (Mr. Gordon) ventured to think it would have been much better if, on the present occasion, the Lord Advocate had made a similar request, instead of not opposing the further progress of the Bill. If he had done so, it would have rendered a Division unnecessary. It was perfectly obvious that if they proceeded to a vote on the second reading of this Bill, there would be opposition not only from many hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, but also from many on the other side, who objected to what some of the clauses enacted—such clauses being, in reality, an interference with the right of contract. Now, he himself was extremely anxious that there should be a settlement, and was unwilling to vote against a measure which professed to do something towards that end; but in the event of there being a Division, he should feel it his duty to vote against this Bill. He would venture, as a compromise, to propose that the second reading should be deferred until the Lord Advocate's Bill was before the House, when they could consider both measures at the same time. That was the course which was followed last Session. He was satisfied there had been great exaggeration in reference to the operation of those laws, and that a general case had been endeavoured to be made out, because of exceptional grievances. He believed there was a good feeling between landlord and tenant generally in Scotland, and he regretted that the Government did not grant the inquiry which some time ago was asked for upon this subject, because he was satisfied that if it had been brought home to the landlords that alterations in the law were required, they would have been ready to agree to them. If the Lord Advocate's Bill was to settle this question, he thought they should have that Bill before the House before they assented to the second reading of a Bill which contained a principle such as that embodied in the measure now under consideration.

EDUCATION OF THE BLIND, DEAF, AND DUMB BILL—[BILL 14.]

(Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Mellor, Mr. Ward Jackson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that whether the second reading was agreed to or not, he was sure the object of the Bill was one which would obtain the sympathy of every hon. Member in that House. The object was to secure, so far as it was possible, education for every deaf and dumb, or blind child in the kingdom. He believed that every other country in Europe and America recognized the claims of this unfortunate class; in England alone, to her great scandal, the State did practically nothing for them. Yet in England one person in every 1,600 was deaf and dumb, and one in every 1,000 or 1,200 blind. Such of these unfortunate persons as belonged to the pauper class necessarily shared in the provision made for the relief of the poor; but the State had practically made no provision for them beyond and apart from that class. There were, indeed, one or two Acts of Parliament which enabled Boards of Guardians to send pauper children to voluntarily supported institutions; but it was not the duty of those officers to spend the money of the ratepayers in seeking out persons so afflicted; nor could they attempt to do all that was possible for such persons. Even, however, if they did all they could, there would still be a wide space left unoccupied. Suppose a poor man, with eight or nine children—and he (Mr. Wheelhouse) knew unfortunately too many such cases—one of whom was deaf, mute, or blind, would it not be a gross injustice to the others that the father should spend more than a fair share of his money upon educating that one? The whole cost of such education ought not to fall upon the parent in that case; but the child should be treated as it would be in other countries, as the child of the State. There were in the three kingdoms 40,000 or 60,000 individuals, one-sixth or one-eighth of whom were of an educationable age, of the afflicted classes for whom the Bill sought to provide, who, with a few exceptions, where the Guardians were zealous in their duty, received no education whatever. Why, he would ask, was no provision made for them in the Bill of last year? Surely if it were necessary to legislate then for the education of children who were not deprived of sight, speech, or hearing, it was much more necessary that provision should be made for the education of these poor creatures. If a blind child were educated, it could do much for its own assistance; and an educated deaf and dumb person often made a better workman than one who was not under any such deprivation. They were very easily taught certain trades, and it was not only for their own advantage that they should be educated in fit branches of industry, but it was for the benefit of the State. It might be said that the measure would not work, and that it was inopportune; but precisely the same thing had been said against the Factory Acts, which were now the law of the land. The House would deal with the Bill as they thought fit; what he wanted was not so much the passing of this Bill as to secure the immediate recognition of the claims of this class. He, however, thought that the Bill was adequate for its object. The 1st clause rendered it compulsory on the Guardians, on application from the parents, with the approval of the Poor Law Board, to send any such child to some suitable school, whether certified or not, at an expense not exceeding £24 annually; the 2nd clause enabled the Guardians to send the child to school in the same manner, in cases where no application is made by the parent; and the 3rd clause authorized the Guardians in cases where the parent, or other person, should offer to pay a portion of the support of any child in any such school or institution, to pay the residue of the expense; the selection of the institution being left with the Guardians. There were certain subsidiary clauses; one providing that the child shall be sent to a school established for the reception of children of the religion to which such child shall belong; another enabled the Committee of Privy Council to appoint a special Inspector for deaf and dumb schools; and another that the school, on being certified by the Inspector, shall receive for each pupil specified payment. He might be told that there was nothing in the Education Act, or the Revised Code, which could prevent the instruction of these children; but still there was no positive provision there for teaching them, though surely there might at least have been a provision that books with raised type should be provided for the use of the blind in the ordinary "sighted" schools, under the recent Act, a matter which would have done much towards ensuring the spread of education among them, since it might be taken to have been proved, by experiments lately tried in Scotland, that many, if not most, of such children could be thus effectively instructed. Would it be believed that even now—in 1871—there was only one single institution throughout England for the education of the blind sons of gentlemen, an establishment of which he (Mr. Wheelhouse) could not speak sufficiently highly, but it was quite right and only due that it should be named—the College at Worcester—but beyond this, there was not the slightest provision, save such as was made by voluntary effort alone, for the education of any person, either blind or deaf, mute, above the rank and class of a pauper. Surely some remedy for such a state of things ought to be at once provided by the State. He (Mr. Wheelhouse) could assure the House that by affording such instruction, the rates would be lessened, not increased, by following out the course he indicated. He moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wheelhouse.)

MR. HIBBERT said, he regretted that he was obliged to oppose the Bill, because everyone must sympathize with the object the hon. Member had in view. There was, however, a good way and a bad way of effecting the object, and he conceived that the hon. Member had taken the very worst way. It might be supposed, from the speech of the hon. Member, that children of the class included in the Bill had hitherto been entirely neglected by Parliament. That was not so. In the year 1862 an Act was passed, giving power to Boards of Guardians to send deaf and dumb or blind children to certain schools certified by the Poor Law Department. A number of such schools had in consequence been certified—namely, 11 schools for the blind; 9 for the deaf and dumb; 1 for idiots, and 19 as industrial schools, and a number of these afflicted children sent to them; and in 1867, at the instigation of the Poor Law Board, a Bill was passed extending the Act to adult persons. Therefore, to induce the House to pass such a Bill as the present, the hon. Gentleman ought to show that the Boards of Guardians had failed in their duty. Last year the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Wheelhouse) brought in a Bill for a similar purpose, which compelled the Boards of Guardians, on the application of the parents of an indigent blind or deaf and dumb child, to send such child to school—it also authorized the Guardians, where the parents neglected their duty, to step in and provide the necessary education; and that the expense should be borne in part by the Guardians, and in part by the parents. The measure of last year referred to the children of poor persons; but in the present Bill the word "poor" was omitted; and the 1st clause referred to the children of all classes; so that under its provisions Boards of Guardians might be compelled to send to schools of the description mentioned in the Bill the children of well-to-do people, and the expense of their maintenance there would fall on the ratepayers. If the Bill passed, the Poor Law Department would be placed in a position it had never occupied before—that of controlling the Guardians in the amount of relief to be given in any individual case; and that was one of the grounds on which he opposed the Bill. The 2nd clause empowered Boards of Guardians to take the afflicted children from their parents, and to send them to any schools fitted for their reception; and though pauper children were at present maintained and educated for £14 or £16 a-year in workhouse schools, the Bill provided that whenever the Guardians exercised that power they should pay a sum of at least £24 a-year for every child they sent to school. The provisions of the Bill would very soon add another grievance to those already complained of by those who objected to the heavy burden of the local rates. He trusted the House would not break through the principle of Poor Law relief—namely, that the Guardians were the persons to decide what was the proper relief to be given, and that it should not be left to the central authority to decide matters of this kind. If the Bill applied to the pauper class only, there was a provision already for the pauper class of such children; if it did not apply to the pauper class alone, then the whole duty should be referred to the Educational Board. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. SYNAN opposed the Bill on the ground that there was no reason whatever why the cost of this compulsory education of the deaf and dumb and blind should be thrown on the local taxation rather than on the Educational Department. The hon. Gentleman who had moved the second reading had failed to show that the machinery at present provided was ineffective. Moreover, he seemed to be unaware that the Act of 25 & 26 Vict., which was the basis of his present Bill, did not extend to Ireland. But the Poor Law Boards there had power, under a special law, to send such children to special institutions and to pay for them.

MR. M'LAREN said, that in Scotland the practice of sending blind children to school and giving the teachers a little gratuity for teaching the children to read by means of raised characters had worked well. Such a system was well worth trying in this country, especially when it was recollected how very small a proportion of the blind were educated at all.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH opposed the Bill. It was one which would certainly fail in practice. He was not prepared to say that some amendment of the existing law might not be made; but with regard to the afflicted children of the class that were not paupers, the effect of the Bill would be to give a right to relief to persons who otherwise would have no claim. One evil effect, therefore, would be its tendency to pauperize persons who, at present, had neither the necessity nor the wish to ask for public relief. Moreover, he thought it would introduce a very dangerous principle of legislation, by imposing on the public a duty which properly attached to individuals. Again, the 7th clause appeared to him very objectionable. It provided that the children should not be sent to any school which was not conducted according to the religion to which they might be supposed to belong. This could only be carried out by the foundation of a great number of schools for a comparatively few children who were deaf or dumb, at an expense quite out of proportion to the necessities of the case.

MR. C. S. READ admitted the advantage of educating these unfortunate children; but that was a duty which was better performed by good and charitable institutions than by Boards of Guardians and by public rates. He maintained that the purpose of the Poor Law was simply to relieve absolute destitution; to relieve unavoidable cases of misfortune and distress was the legitimate office of the humane public. With regard to Ireland, he would point out that the Act for disestablishing the Church of Ireland provided that a portion of the surplus property of the Church should be applied to the relief of this class of persons. His principal objection to the Bill was that it overrode entirely the authority of the Boards of Guardians, and added further power to the Poor Law Board.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S
SISTER BILL—[BILL 2.]

(Mr. Thomas Chambers, Mr. Morley.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Thomas Chambers.)

MR. COLLINS rose to enter his protest not against the question whether it was desirable or not desirable to legislate on this subject, but against the very exceptional manner in which the Bill proposed to deal with the restrictions at present forbidding persons related in certain degrees by marriage from intermarrying. [The hon. Member here read, at some length, extracts from papers on the subject published in a Manchester journal.] The legislation proposed appeared to him to be arbitrary and one-sided—for instance, the children of a man by his sister by marriage would be legitimate, while the children of a man by his niece by marriage would be illegitimate. Again, the marriage of a man with the second of two sisters would be perfectly valid, while the marriage of a woman with the second of two brothers would be void. If the House thought that affinity by blood should be the only bar to marriage, let them say so in a direct and consistent manner; but he objected to this half and half legislation.

MR. SPEAKER having put the Question, "That I do now leave the Chair," declared the Motion to be agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

MR. HUNT immediately rose, and said that he and a great many more Members said "No" to the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair. He should now move that the Chairman of the Committee leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Hunt.)

MR. BRUCE said, he failed to hear that anyone had challenged the decision of the Speaker.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. Dodson) pointed out that it was irregular to review in Committee proceedings which had taken place in the House.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 (Marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister not void or voidable).

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved an Amendment to omit the first part of the clause, giving a retrospective effect to the Bill. The Committee ought to hesitate long before they admitted retrospective legislation into a question of this kind. Retrospective legislation was contrary to the general principles by which our legislation was usually carried on, and when Parliament dealt with a subject like this, so thoroughly mixed up with the social history of the people, they should exercise very great caution indeed. He also objected to the 3rd clause of the Bill, and intended to move its omission, because it was unjust and inequitable. The effect of that clause was to provide that where a child had been born of one of these marriages and was therefore illegitimate, its birth should be legitimized, but yet that child should not inherit any property or title as heir-at-law. In reality, such children were to be declared legitimate by birth, but illegitimate by social position. The retrospective clause gave, in fact, the true history of the Bill. It was not sought for by the majority of the people; it was not asked for by the women of the country, but was promoted by a small number of the wealthier classes, who insisted that Parliament should condone their former errors, and legalize their deliberate infringement of the law.

MR. M'LAREN said, that as a statement had recently been made that the opinion of Scotland had been changed on this question, he wished to say that that was not correct. The people of Scotland were strongly opposed to it, notwithstanding the fact that a regular paid agency, supplied with money from London, had been at work there in order to get up Petitions. With all their efforts they had only got Petitions from 11 Town Councils out of the 80 Scotch boroughs.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he wished to ask if the House on any former occasion had ever been called upon to sanction a deliberate breach of the law? It was quite clear—it was written in letters of fire which no one could misunderstand, that these unions were prohibited. In spite of that fact certain persons related in this way had entered into what they called marriage, but what, in reality, was no marriage. Had they done so under any misapprehension or mistake? Certainly not. Counsel were constantly being applied to to suggest means by which the law could be evaded; but the law was too well known—it had been the law of this country for 1,200 or 1,400 years, and should not be abrogated unless it could clearly be shown that it was contrary to the law of God. Why should Parliament go back to sanction the breach of law which a man had knowingly and wilfully committed? Who were those who sought to have the law changed? Why did they not show themselves? Why was there a secret agency at the bottom of this movement; and why was it that the people who professed to be the sufferers from this grievance, as they called it, never came before the public themselves, but applied to others to get the work done for them—they supplying only the money? It would be a grievous wrong to sanction a breach of law which had been openly and wilfully committed, and if that sanction were given there would be no end to the complications and quarrels and litigations it would occasion. But if the law were to be altered, it should be altered openly and fairly, and those who had contracted these marriages should be married again under the new law. In that case there would be an intelligible point to start from. If this retrospective action of the Bill were permitted, no one could tell what results it would bring about. No one knew what children had been born, or what rights had been acquired by others, and an immense field would be opened for litigation. He had a strong opinion on this question. He believed, in spite of all that had been said about the religious question, that marriages of affinity were forbidden in the same degree as marriages of consanguinity. He believed that to be the law of God, and he was sure it was the law of the land. However much one might sympathize with the children of these marriages, as born in a state of concubinage, it should be remembered that it was the fault of their parents, for there could be no doubt that they had wilfully violated the law. For his own part, he would never, either as a matter of feeling, or as a matter of duty, sanction a proceeding by which a woman would make her sister's grave a stepping-stone into her brother's bed.

MR. T. CHAMBERS desired to point out that the proposal for retrospective legislation contained in this Bill had its precedent in the Act of 1853.

MR. COLLINS said, that while the Bill sanctioned marriages which had already taken place with deceased wives' sisters, the 2nd clause declared that these second marriages should not be considered valid, if either of the parties had subsequently married again. That was an important point, which deserved attention.

But it being now a quarter to Six of the clock—

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 9th March 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—County Property * (35).

IRISH LAW REFORM.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked, What Bills for the Improvement of the Administration of Justice in Ireland the Government intend to propose to Parliament this Session, especially in regard to the Common Law, Bankruptcy, Matrimonial Causes, and County Courts? Reforms in this direction were urgently required, and would encounter little or no opposition—particularly the extension of the Bankruptcy Law to non-traders, and the extension of the jurisdiction of County Courts.

LORD DUFFERIN, in reply, said, that the legislation intended to be proposed by the Government relating to Ireland would exceed, he believed, even the expectations of his noble Friend. Her Majesty's Government would be prepared in the course of the present Session to introduce five Bills relating to Ireland on the following subjects:—a Bill for the abolition of Imprisonment for Debt, one for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, a Bill to amend the law relating to Matrimonial Causes, one to amend the law respecting the execution of decrees in the County Courts, and, lastly, a Bill having reference to the law respecting Juries. It was impossible for him at present to give his noble Friend more information than the mere titles of the Bills, for as a layman he was unable to judge more than the general scope of them by their names.

PRUSSIA AND RUSSIA—ALLEGED SECRET TREATY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he ventured to ask the noble Earl opposite the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question, the urgency of which justified his putting it without Notice. The day before yesterday the Prime Minister was reported to have stated in the House of Commons that he was not informed of the existence of any secret treaty between Prussia and Russia, either immediately previous to or during the continuance of the late war. The question had been raised whether the words "not informed" referred merely to official information. This morning a very specific statement appeared in one of the London morning papers, asserting the existence of a secret treaty or engagement, concluded between the two Powers named just prior to the outbreak of the war, and with reference to certain contingencies to which the war might give rise. Now, inasmuch as to-morrow was appointed for the last meeting of the Conference, when a certain portion of the public law of Europe would come under revision, he hoped it was not too much for him to inquire whether his noble Friend was, directly or indirectly, officially or otherwise, aware of any such treaty, convention, or understanding between the two Powers in question?

EARL GRANVILLE: It would have been more convenient if the noble Earl had given me a longer Notice of the Question he proposed to ask me. His Question relates to the truth of a statement which appears in The Morning Post of this morning. I have no knowledge of any such treaty as that referred to by The Morning Post. As to rumours on the subject, I have heard rumours of every sort and description, some of the most contradictory character; but I have no knowledge of the existence of anything of the kind. Perhaps, as the noble Earl has put a Question to me, he will allow me to ask whether the treaty described by The Morning Post is the treaty of which Members of the Opposition seem to have some knowledge?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I know nothing of the treaty beyond what is stated by The Morning Post.

CONVICTS FOR POLITICAL OFFENCES —RELEASE OF FENIAN PRISONERS.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

EARL GREY: My Lords, your Lordships will remember that in the debate on the Address at the opening of the Session, reference was made to the release of the Fenian prisoners, and that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) did not give more than a very slight and general reply to those observations. I have no complaint to make of his so treating the subject, as it had only been cursorily referred to; but, as I think a very serious mistake has been committed by Her Majesty's Government in the matter, it appears to me only right that they should have an opportunity of offering a fuller explanation in this House. I am aware that the amnesty is now an accomplished fact, and cannot be recalled; but it is not without its use that any mistakes which may have been made by the Government in the exercise of their powers should be noticed in Parliament, for such notice is no unimportant check on the commission of similar mistakes again. The facts of the case are very simple. Your Lordships are aware that two years ago a considerable number of persons who had been convicted of treason-felony and other offences received a remission of their sentences, but that 32 prisoners were reserved. We learn by the newspapers that since the end of last Session all—or, at all events, the majority—of those prisoners have been released. I trust not all—because one or two of them were concerned in murders of a very aggravated description, and I cannot suppose that they have been pardoned; but this will be shown by the Return for which I am about to move. It appears to me that the discharge of these prisoners was a measure which requires explanation. It has for many years been almost an axiom among all who take an interest in the effectual administration of the criminal law, that there should be the utmost certainty of punishment; nothing being so mischievous as that criminals should be led to believe that, when convicted for crimes, and the punishment duly awarded by the Courts of Law, they have a chance of escaping the infliction of such punishments. So strongly has this been felt that of late years the Government, with the full assent of Parliament, have acted on the principle of reducing the remission of a portion of the sentence of persons condemned to penal servitude—a remission which had been usually made as the reward of good conduct—to such strict and stringent rules that there should be no doubt or uncertainty as to the amount of punishment every convict was to undergo. Now, the discharge of these prisoners seems to me to be a direct violation of this first rule of criminal policy. And yet this was a case in which it was peculiarly important that the rule should be adhered to. I would remind your Lordships that these men had been the objects of very great and unusual clemency. In olden times men who had been concerned in such an attempt to overturn the Government would undoubtedly have expiated their offence on the scaffold. I believe there is hardly a country in the world in which even now the Government would abstain from inflicting capital punishment on persons guilty of such an offence. But Her Majesty's Government acted, as I think, with a wise clemency in proceeding against these men not for treason, which would have made a capital sentence the necessary consequence of their conviction, but for treason-felony, and they were consequently sentenced for the most part only to long terms of penal servitude. Now, the necessary effect of the course taken by the Government of releasing them after the expiration of a comparatively short portion of the punishment to which they were sentenced, is to lead other persons disposed to engage in similar treasonable plots to say — “Oh, there is no reason to be alarmed if we fail in an attempt to overthrow the Government, hanging is out of the question, and though penal servitude for life sounds very terrible, we know very well that after a time we shall be discharged; so that if we succeed there is a grand prize for us, and if we fail we run, after all, no great risk.” Observe, moreover, how difficult it will be to future Governments, in case of the recurrence of similar attempts against the safety of the State, to practise the same clemency as has been shown in this instance. For the vindication of the law, for the creation of that wholesome fear which is necessary for the safety of the State, the measure now adopted will tend to compel future Governments to have recourse to capital punishment much more largely than would otherwise be necessary. Such is the tendency of the measure; and I find it the more difficult to understand why such a step can have been taken by the Government when I remember the description given of these very men by a right hon. Friend of mine who lately held the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland. Two years ago, after a part of the prisoners had been discharged, the O'Connor Don pressed on the Chief Secretary in the House of Commons the claims of other prisoners; and Mr. Chichester Fortescue gave his reasons for declining to entertain the application. He stated that all the cases of the Fenian convicts then undergoing punishment had been carefully considered, and that 49 of them would be unconditionally released, while 32 were still to undergo their sentence. In justifying the refusal of the Government to include them in the list of those who were to be pardoned, he thus described the latter class—

“This list of thirty-two prisoners included almost all the main founders, leaders, and organizers of the Fenian movement. It included men who were deeply responsible for the attempted revolution of the last two or three years, and men whom the Government and the Lord Lieutenant felt it would not be consistent with their duty to discharge, or whose freedom would be compatible with the public safety—men, he might add, with regard to whom the Government had no reason to believe that they might not, if discharged, attempt again to renew their unhappy and criminal, although desperate enterprize, and to whom, therefore, the Government, while rejoicing, as they did, and as Lord Spencer did, that they had been able to reduce the lists so largely, felt that the clemency of the Crown should not be extended.”—[3 Hansard, exciv. 159.]

That was the opinion of the Government in February, 1869, and I shall be anxious to hear from my noble Friend opposite why they have altered it? It appears to me that, while the release of these prisoners was in itself injudicious, the mode in which it was carried out was, if possible, still more injudicious. If they were to be discharged, the reasonable course would have been to discharge them freely, requiring no other condition than the simple one of their taking the oath of allegiance, and binding themselves in writing not to engage in any future attempts against the peace of the kingdom. Had they been discharged in that manner, and allowed to remain here, the bad example of the remission of punishment would have remained, but the men themselves would have been powerless for evil. They would not have even a plausible case of grievance against the Government, they would not have been raised into any factitious importance, and had they attempted to renew their treasonable proceedings they must have committed direct perjury; and I cannot but think that this would have diminished their influence even among the Fenians. The Government, however, thought fit to act differently. They would not allow the prisoners to remain in the United Kingdom, but they gave them first-class passages in the finest vessels which cross the Atlantic to the United States. They sent them to the very place where they were most able to injure us, bound to no engagement whatever. They had raised them into consideration by showing them that they were afraid of their influence at home, and by treating them in a special manner, and they sent them to the United States, where the large Fenian societies work infinitely more mischief than in the United Kingdom. I will not trouble your Lordships with an account of what you remember followed the arrival of those persons in America. It is sufficient for me to say that those occurrences furnish conclusive proof that the mode of discharging them was a mistake. We have had as yet no explanation from the Government, of their reasons for the course they have taken, and the main object of my Motion is to elicit one; but, judging by the few words which have been said, and by what has been stated out of Parliament by those who have defended the measure it appears that the grounds relied on by the Government are these—It is argued that persons who have committed political offences are by common consent to be looked on in quite a different light from persons who have committed ordinary crimes against the law of the land; it is urged that in the United States, for instance, the persons engaged in the great Civil War were not punished as criminals, and that we have on various occasions taken upon ourselves to recommend to other nations clemency towards persons suffering punishment for political offences. Now, it is true that the common feeling of mankind has long decided that when nations are unhappily divided so that civil war breaks out, both parties probably believing their cause a just one, it is not right to treat the large number of persons engaged in such a war as criminals and rebels; and the United States only acted on that view in not punishing the Confederates with severity. I admit, also, that, when men conspire against some Government, under which the people have been suffering grievous wrong, and fail in their attempt, sympathy is often felt for them. I admit, moreover, that in countries where there are continual revolutions, in which hostile parties successively drive each other from power by violence, it is felt that those who, for the moment, by a turn of the wheel are brought down, are hardly fit subjects for extreme punishment. I believe it is true, too, that the Government of this country has in some cases taken upon itself to recommend such persons to clemency—though I am not sure that the propriety with which this has been done has been in all cases unquestionable; and I doubt very much whether such remonstrances or representations have been addressed to powerful States, or to Governments of a stable and respectable character. Admitting that to this extent allowance is, in certain cases, to be made for political offenders, I utterly deny that any principle on which such indulgence has hitherto been thought proper applies to these men. They were not honourable adversaries in civil war, for there was no civil war in question; still less were they patriots, risking their lives to free their country from some detestable and grinding tyranny. Whatever may have been the faults of the English Government towards Ireland in bygone centuries, nobody can deny that for many years past it has been the sincere desire of the English people, and of the Imperial Parliament, to do justice to Ireland in the fullest sense of the word and to raise it to happiness and prosperity. There may still be bad laws in operation, but it is not true that those laws could not be got rid of by peaceable means. Now, one of the first conditions which is indispensable to give any claim to indulgence to men who incur the responsibility of risking all the calamities of civil war in a country which is enjoying peace and tranquillity, is that there should have been no fair chance by peaceable means of obtaining redress. That was certainly not the case with regard to Ireland. The attempt of these men was one of a very different character. It was an attempt to upset by violence the settled government under which the people of Ireland were enjoying peace and political liberty in as full measure as ourselves, at the price of bloodshed and confusion. Nor is this all. They have avowed in various writings and speeches that they were prepared to attempt this object by the most atrocious means—by the secret assassination of the civil and military servants of the Crown, the burning of barracks with soldiers in them, and the most cruel and barbarous modes of destruction that could be devised. All these things were deliberately recommended, and not only recommended, but, in many instances, put into operation. Your Lordships know that constables have been secretly shot at night in Ireland, and that murders of other kinds have been committed. We know that the persons engaged in the conspiracy prosecuted their object by such acts as the murder of a policeman engaged in his duty at Manchester, and by that most fiendish outrage the explosion at Clerkenwell. We know, moreover, that the men engaged in these atrocious crimes have been treated by the Fenian body not as criminals and persons whom they ought to disavow, but as martyrs in the cause of their country and as men entitled to honour and glory. Their acts have been adopted by the Fenian society, and that brotherhood, as they call themselves, must be regarded as art and part in all these proceedings. I say, then, that the persons convicted of participation in this conspiracy have incurred far greater moral guilt, as they have also done far more injury to the State, than any ordinary robber or murderer; and that, instead of being entitled to special consideration and indulgence, they ought to have been subjected to special severity. By the discharge of these men in the present state of Ireland, you have taught the Irish people to believe that an attempt to overthrow the authority of the Crown by force is regarded by Her Majesty's Government as a venial offence. You are teaching them that a rebellion or a conspiracy of such a description is not regarded as depriving them of a claim to indulgence on the part of the Government. They are looked upon as on the same level with the Neapolitan patriots, who suffered imprisonment in loathsome dungeons for endeavouring by very different means to get rid of a system of dreadful tyranny, and with any of the men who in recent years have been punished by other Governments of the same kind. Now, this, in the present state of the country, is a most dangerous lesson to have taught the people of Ireland. What is the real condition of Ireland? Your Lordships have been told, on very high authority, that the general condition of Ireland is highly satisfactory, although it is admitted that in one particular district the state of things is "intolerable;" and we have been told on the high authority of a Chief Justice that the state of things in that part of Ireland is getting from bad to worse. But then we are told that all this is purely local, that in general the country is prospering, that the remedial legislation of the last two years is beginning to produce its effect, and that prosperity, peace, and loyalty are general throughout the country. I fear that even with regard to agrarian outrages this is too favourable an account of the state of Ireland; already these outrages are not so strictly confined to one locality, as Her Majesty's Government have assumed. I am afraid that in at least two or three other counties similar atrocities to those which have disgraced Westmeath have been committed. I am, however, willing to leave agrarian outrages out of consideration; but I want to know what is the evidence to justify the description given by the Government of the present condition of Ireland? It is correct, indeed, in one respect. I believe that there is at this moment great material prosperity in every part of Ireland, and that good harvests and good prices have made the farmers generally highly prosperous; though I am afraid that that prosperity is not what it might be, and that the feeling of insecurity which still exists prevents that great development of the resources of the country which ought to occur. Still, compared with former years, Ireland, I believe, may be said to be prosperous. When, however, I come to inquire about loyalty and the effect of recent legislation in reconciling the great bulk of the population to this country, the answer is not so satisfactory. Instead of proofs of increasing loyalty I see a change in the other direction. We cannot look to the result of recent elections, to the language used at public meetings, or to the tone of the Press, without seeing that there are graver symptoms than I remember at any former period of a disposition among the Irish people to sympathize with any who are supposed to be the enemies of England, and to rejoice at anything which appears like danger and misfortune that befalls us. I see a greater disposition than ever to struggle for a disruption of the British Empire. We have against the Imperial Government not merely those who call themselves Nationalists, who have become increasingly powerful, but other parties, which while they disclaim any desire for the disruption of the Empire, have for their object measures which would inevitably lead to it, and include in their ranks men of character and standing in the country, who did not formerly espouse these views. Under the guise of "Home Government," or other names, these persons are putting forward proposals for measures which would result in the disruption of the Empire. Some of your Lordships are old enough, like myself, to remember that 40 years ago when there was the great agitation for the repeal of the Union, those who promoted it professed loyalty to the British Crown, but said they must have a separate Parliament. English statesmen of all parties however agreed that this was a mere pretence — that were repeal granted separation must inevitably follow, and that separation and every step towards it must be resisted to the last. I trust that is the opinion of statesmen of all parties still. I trust Her Majesty's Ministers and all of your Lordships are prepared to resist to the utmost not only the rending asunder of the British Empire, but every minor measure which would by the surest steps conduct us to that result. There ought to be no mistake about the feelings of Parliament, of the Government, and of the country on this point. Are we not all convinced that the separation of Ireland from this country would be even a greater calamity to Ireland than to ourselves? When we observe the manner in which Ireland is distracted by rival factions, and the bitterness of their hostility towards each other—when we observe that even among those who concur in the object of pulling down British authority, and who unite in the United States or Canada for this treasonable object, the disposition to division is so strong that the Fenians across the Atlantic have become two hostile bodies, bitterly assailing each other—when we look at the passions which prevail, and the difficulty experienced by the Executive Government in preventing rival factions from flying at each others' throats, does anybody doubt that if these men were to succeed in their object, and to throw off the connection with the British Crown, Ireland would speedily become a scene of internal anarchy and bloodshed? This would almost inevitably lead to some foreign Power being called in to govern them, and we should see the establishment close to our own shores of some Power hostile to this country. Our duty, then, to the large number of loyal Irishmen, as well as regard for our own safety, will not permit us for a moment to tolerate such a state of things; any attempt at the disruption of the Empire must be resisted to the very last, and nothing but such a complete overthrow by a conquering enemy as that which France has lately suffered would be sufficient to justify us in submitting to such a result. This being the case, is it possible to disguise from ourselves that there are symptoms now in Ireland of a state of feeling which threatens, sooner or later, to produce a fearful struggle, and that those feelings are becoming spread among the population to a dangerous extent? I wish I could doubt that this is an accurate account of the existing state of things, and that I could see any grounds for believing with Her Majesty's Ministers that the disaffection to the British Crown which prevails in Ireland is only the consequence of former misgovernment and is now gradually dying out. I admit that among nations the effects of long-continued errors cannot be removed in a short period of time, and that the healing influence of a wise policy must at first be slow. I admit that rapid improvement from a change in the system of government is not to be looked for; but if our measures have been wise, whatever change they have produced ought to be for the better, and I do not see any sign that this is the case; on the contrary, I believe that so far from tending to improve, things are getting from bad to worse. In 1868 a Motion was made in the House of Commons for a Committee on the state of Ireland, which gave rise to a very remarkable debate, in which men of very great ability on both sides of the House took part. All the most eminent speakers on that occasion concurred in giving a description of the then condition of Ireland, which we cannot compare with what now exists without seeing that the comparison is greatly to the disadvantage of the present state of things. And this, I venture to say, is no unnatural result of what has since occurred. There has been a change for the worse from the time when, by the introduction of Mr. Gladstone's Resolution, the Church of Ireland became a party question, and an instrument for overturning the existing Administration. I do not deny that Ireland had grievances to complain of both in regard to the Church and the land; but you have unfortunately dealt with those subjects in such a manner as to deprive the concessions you have made of their real value. With regard to the Church, it is almost 40 years since in the other House I avowed my conviction of the necessity of an entire change in the policy of England in that respect. I never receded from that opinion, and I am persuaded that had the question been dealt with in a statesmanlike spirit

a measure might have been passed which would have had a most beneficial influence. Unfortunately, however, it was made a party question, and the Irish people have been impressed with the conviction that they owe what they have gained, not to your good will, but to these very Fenians, whose outrages were said by Her Majesty's Ministers to have opened the eyes of the people of England to the necessity of a change of policy. With regard to the land, a great reform of the law was necessary; but I greatly fear that the measure you adopted departed far more than was necessary from most important principles, and the result will hereafter be difficulties and inconveniences, of which symptoms are already perceptible. I need not, however, go back to these old topics. For good or for evil, the Church Bill and the Land Bill are now law. All I wish to point out is that however beneficial you may think your legislation to have been, however confident you may be that by degrees it will have a good effect on the temper of the Irish people, for the present, at all events, it has not done so; and that, on the other hand, there is a feeling which makes it in the highest degree dangerous that by such a measure as that which I have brought before you we have taught the Irish people this fatal lesson—that a conspiracy to overthrow by violence and by the most atrocious means the authority of the Crown is regarded by the Government as only a venial offence. Those who have taken a step calculated to produce this impression on the minds of the people have incurred a responsibility of the heaviest kind. I am far from imputing to my noble Friends opposite, or their Colleagues, that they have wilfully done that which they knew to be injurious to the nation for the sake of any temporary convenience, or of gaining favour with any section of their supporters—I could not for a moment dream of imputing to them such guilt as would be involved in such conduct; but I can only acquit them of it by attributing to them an error of judgment so flagrant and with so little to justify it as to leave them little claim to the confidence even of those who have hitherto been the most ready to repose confidence in them.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

Return of the names of any convicts who may have been specially discharged from custody since the 1st of August 1870 as having been political offenders; together with a statement of the crimes of which they had severally been convicted, and the dates of their conviction: Also,

Copy of any instructions given by Her Majesty's Government with respect to the conditions on which such convicts were to be released, and to any arrangements made for sending them away from the United Kingdom."—(The Earl Grey.)

LORD DUFFERIN: My Lords, no objection will be offered by the Government to the production of the documents for which the noble Earl has moved; and in making this announcement my task might have been considered at an end, had not the noble Earl indulged in such severe criticisms upon the Government not only as regards the amnesty extended to the political prisoners, but their general policy towards Ireland, that I must bespeak your Lordships' indulgence while I endeavour—not, I am afraid, to modify his opinion, to which I am quite unequal—but to submit to the House arguments which, in my opinion, militate against it. I do not propose to follow the noble Earl into those topics which, though having reference to Ireland, have no reference whatever to the subject of his Motion; for I do not see what benefit could arise from re-opening ancient controversies as to the Land Bill and the Church Bill, on which your Lordships during the past two Sessions expended so much time and attention. Still less do I see what benefit could arise from a premature examination of the effect of recent legislation, the good effects of which, its warmest advocates admitted, would, in all probability for some years be only partially apparent. I will pass from what I may call these extraneous subjects with only this observation, that as far as my own observation goes the operation of one at least of those measures, the Land Bill, has exceeded my anticipations. In proceeding to combat the noble Earl's opinion that the amnesty granted to the Fenian prisoners was ill-advised, mistimed, and likely to be fraught with disastrous consequences, I wish to assure him and the House that no man is more sensible than I am of the heinous nature of the crime of treason. It is a crime which carries, as it were, in its bosom

the guilt of almost every other crime which can be committed, and its evil consequences on the unfortunate population in whose midst it is committed are such as words can hardly describe, or any lapse of time obliterate. I am quite at one with him also in thinking that it is the bounden duty of every Government to exact from those unhappy persons who may have been betrayed into such offences the utmost penalty which the law demands, so far and so long as the exaction of such penalties is likely to prove conducive to the maintenance of tranquillity and the restoration of order among the people amongst whom they are committed. I submit, however, that by the common and universal consent of mankind—as admitted, I think, by the noble Earl—the moral guilt of persons convicted of political offences is not of the same type or character as that of ordinary criminals, and that every Government called upon to deal with them is at liberty so to deal with them as not merely to satisfy what are technically called the ends of justice, but it is bound to consider what may best effect the main object to be kept in view—namely, the assertion of their authority and the restoration of peace and order. Let us for a moment consider the exact circumstances of the case with which the Government had to deal. A few years ago a certain number of persons, many of them possessing considerable literary ability, and all, I believe, men of unblemished private character, brought themselves within the power of the Treason-Felony Act by a series of seditious newspaper articles. They were arraigned, convicted, and sentenced to different terms of penal servitude. A few months afterwards the seeds of disaffection, which they had thus disseminated, bore disastrous fruit in various abortive and insignificant outbreaks in different counties of Ireland. Immediately the Government put forth its power, and in the course of a very few days it—I will not say reasserted its authority, for that was never for a moment questioned—but, re-established perfect tranquillity and security from one end of the country to the other. In the meantime all the leaders and principal agents in those disturbances were relegated to prison, where they were allowed to remain for a considerable period. Last year, however, Her Majesty's Government, acting on its discretion, extended the clemency of the Crown to a certain proportion of those prisoners who, in their individual capacity, were perfectly insignificant, and who had taken but a very subordinate part in the transactions in which they had been engaged; and I cannot but think, in reference to this event, that the completeness with which they, and their agitation, have disappeared is in itself a sufficient confirmation of the advisability of that step, and a proof that no disastrous consequences whatever, at all events as far as those persons are concerned, have resulted from it. At the same time, pari passu with the total extinction of that agitation and those demonstrations in every part of Ireland, Parliament entered upon a course of remedial legislation in regard to that country such as was entirely unparalleled in its annals, and it also armed the Government with ample powers for the maintenance, north, south, east, and west—of political tranquillity. I especially use the word “political tranquillity,” because it would be most unfair and unreasonable—and I do not think that any person acquainted with Ireland would do so—to attempt to confound the Riband confederacy, and the unhappy circumstances now existing in the county of Westmeath, with any movement of a political character or with the Fenian conspiracy. On the contrary, I am prepared, from my knowledge and experience of the circumstances of the case—and in this matter I hope I may be thought to speak with some authority—to say that never for many years has political tranquillity reigned so completely and so undisturbed in Ireland as at this moment. In the first place, the whole of that military organization which had such extensive ramifications in many of the western and southern counties has entirely vanished, the notion of a Fenian rising has become simply ridiculous, and I believe that the expectation of being able either to assault or overthrow the constitutional union of the two countries has altogether disappeared from the minds of its most enthusiastic partisans. Of course it is very difficult to prove that this is a correct description of the state of Ireland at the present moment; but, at all events, there are two circumstances which I may adduce in confirmation of the view I have taken. I believe it is well known that for several months during the present winter the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in Ireland has been able to give his attendance in England, and to reside in London without the slightest misgiving as to anything that might happen in his absence. That, certainly, is not a circumstance that could have occurred for many years previously. In the next place, Her Majesty's Government, after consulting the Lords Lieutenant of the various counties in Ireland, and acting, as I believe, on their advice and recommendations, and on their appreciation of the state of the country, have determined in every county in Ireland to call out the Militia. These two facts, I think, speak pretty plainly as to what is the condition of Ireland as respects its political tranquillity. It was in the presence of such circumstances as these that the question of what was to be done with the Fenian prisoners who still remained in their hands forced itself upon the attention of the Government. At the same time a very strong interest—a very intense feeling as to their future fate was expressed by the great mass of the Irish people; and that feeling was exhibited not merely, or in the greatest degree, by those who might be supposed to sympathize more or less with their unfortunate proceedings, but was shared by men of every class and creed in the country, and by persons of the highest respectability, who, I am sure, entertain as great a horror of the treasonable and felonious acts committed by these prisoners as any of your Lordships. Meanwhile, however, years had been rolling on, and those unfortunate men who were incarcerated in 1867 and 1868 had been subjected to all the inevitable rigour and discipline that are inseparable from imprisonment under penal servitude. And here there is a consideration to which I do not myself attach very much weight, but which ought not to be left wholly out of sight in the discussion of this subject. When, in 1848, the Treason-Felony Act was passed, the punishment contemplated by it was transportation either for life or for various terms; but when that punishment ceased to exist under a subsequent Act of Parliament, nothing but penal servitude in this country could be substituted. Now, in the mode in which transportation was applied in our penal colonies a certain amount of elasticity existed under regulations which enabled political prisoners, whose antecedents were of a particular character, to be treated in a way which was universally admitted, where it was possible, to be desirable. But the moment that method of punishment was changed into penal servitude at home, any consideration of that kind was, of course, no longer practicable; and for the sake of their security, as well as from the necessity of maintaining discipline among the whole batch of prisoners confined within the walls of the same prison, it was impossible to distinguish in any degree between men with such antecedents as these political prisoners and the grossest and most brutal criminals who had committed murderous acts. And further, so exceptionally was this discipline thought to tell on those very persons whose case we are now considering, that the Commission appointed to investigate the truth of the allegations preferred by their friends in Ireland, as to the harsh treatment to which it was said they had been subjected—although they fully exculpated those who had them in charge from any undue severity, yet they called the attention of both Houses of Parliament to the fact that, from the nature of the case, it was impossible but that such persons should be subjected to greater rigours than might be desirable; and I believe they recommended to Parliament that if these unfortunate persons were to continue to be incarcerated, or if others should afterwards take their place, they should be relegated to a separate place of confinement, and their imprisonment regulated according to somewhat different rules from those hitherto adopted. I merely mention this circumstance to disprove the allegation of the noble Earl that these persons have got off almost scot free. But, be that as it may, and quite independent of any reference to this consideration, but taking into account the complete suppression of the attempted insurrection—taking into account the perfect political tranquillity which has been maintained for some time in Ireland—taking also into account that the demonstrations formerly made on behalf of these prisoners had ceased—remembering, further, the general feeling prevalent on the subject in Ireland itself, and looking likewise to what in all probability would be the effect of their liberation in assisting to maintain the future tranquillity of that country, Her Majesty's Government determined to commute the sentences of these prisoners not into an absolute pardon, but into a qualified pardon, subject to their removal from the United Kingdom, rather than to retain them in prison to be objects on whom, perhaps, would be concentrated a considerable amount of agitation in future, and a great deal of sympathy on the part of a large body of their fellow-countrymen. In arriving at this conclusion I believe the Government came to what, on the whole, was a right conclusion. At all events, they merely followed the precedents set not only by other European Governments, but by every Government which has had to deal with a similar case in this country. In 1848, Mr. Smith O'Brien, Mr. Martin, and their companions were convicted of treason, and condemned to transportation for life; but in a few years afterwards—I believe in 1856—their sentences were commuted, and two years later a free pardon was granted to them; and at this moment one of those persons is the representative of an Irish county and a respected Member of the other House of Parliament. Questions of this kind must be left to the discretion of each successive Government, and certainly the question under discussion was one of the most anxious that could be submitted to any Government. But, on taking into consideration the points which I have submitted to your Lordships, I cannot help thinking you will come to the conclusion that the clemency extended to these unfortunate persons was most wisely conceived, and was eminently calculated to compose the agitation which the proceedings of the Fenians had created. There is but one other topic upon which I shall venture to address your Lordships. The noble Earl (Earl Grey), in concluding his speech, described in language very weighty, and very eloquent, what, in his opinion, would be the consequence of separating Ireland from this country. I cordially concur in all that he has said upon that point. I am glad also to express my entire concurrence in all that the noble Earl said respecting the movement for "Home Government." I see by the papers that this question is occasionally agitated in Ireland; but, living in the neighbourhood of Belfast, and being in continual communication with persons residing in all the northern counties of Ireland, I find that movement has attracted, so far as I have been able to learn, not only no sympathy, but no attention whatever. I cannot but think, therefore, that the noble Earl has greatly exaggerated its importance, and greatly overstated the consequences which are likely to arise from it.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, it was hardly to be supposed that an act of the Executive Government, such as that referred to by the Motion of the noble Earl (Earl Grey), should pass unnoticed by Parliament, and it was hardly to be supposed that it would be possible to refer to or comment upon that act of the Executive without at the same time referring to the condition of the country to which that act especially related. I am therefore somewhat surprised at the complaint made by the noble Lord (Lord Dufferin) that the field of discussion had been widened by the noble Earl who commenced the debate beyond the scope of his Notice of Motion; and I am the more surprised, because Her Majesty's Government are avowedly at present in search of a policy for Ireland. They have appealed, we are told, to a tribunal "elsewhere" to obtain suggestions and advice upon that head; and I cannot see why Her Majesty's Government should not be willing also to accept suggestions at the hand of any of your Lordships who may be prepared to make them. The question introduced by the noble Earl is, I venture to think, one of extreme importance not merely as regards the condition of Ireland, but as connected with the whole system of the administration of our criminal law. I have endeavoured to inform myself of the grounds upon which Her Majesty's Government has proceeded in this case. I am aware what are the grounds stated by the Prime Minister, and I will presently refer to them; but before doing so I must remark that the ground stated by the noble Lord (Lord Dufferin) this evening, is one which, upon reflection, the Government would be scarcely prepared to support. The noble Lord has gravely told us that one of the leading reasons which led to the release of the Fenian prisoners was that the prisoners found the system of prison discipline extremely disagreeable. That reflection would have applied with equal force as a reason for not putting them in prison at all. But what is the ground on which the Prime Minister based this act of the Executive Government? Mr. Gladstone says—

"What we have done is this; we have acted upon the principle which we have invariably recommended to every other country in Europe; we have acted upon the principle which every truly civilized country in the 19th century has never hesitated to act upon, and that is that a political crime, when it has ceased to be dangerous, and when suffering has been undergone, should be treated with the utmost leniency."—[3 Hansard, coliv. 1181.]

If I were to complain of a certain vagueness in the expressions used in this passage it would be only repeating what is often said with regard to statements coming from the same source. What is the meaning of the term "undergone suffering?" Does it mean imprisonment for one, two, or three years, or imprisonment for life? And what is meant by "treated with the utmost leniency?" Does it mean commutation of the sentence of imprisonment or absolute release, with an outfit of clothes and a supply of money? But let us consider the advice which it has been our habit to render to other countries. There have been and, I believe, are countries in Europe where, according to their system of laws, it has been in the power of the Executive Government to imprison offenders without bringing them to trial; there have been other countries where it is in the power of the Executive to conduct those trials in a manner entirely at variance with our ideas of justice to the prisoner; and there are some countries which include in the catalogue of political offences acts which we do not regard as criminal, and which have for political offences a scale of punishment which any of us would regard as entirely excessive. I believe it has been the case that, when we have found countries so circumstanced dealing with political prisoners in a manner different from that in which we should deal with them ourselves, we have interfered to remonstrate, and to solicit some remission of sentence or some speedy trial. In doing so we have been quite right; but I do not believe we have gone further than that. If we have gone further, and in dealing with a constitutional Government like our own, with a system of laws as wide as ours, and fixed principles for conducting the trial and punishment of offenders, we had interfered to deprecate the severity of the punishment inflicted, we have overstepped our duty. The true principle is this—We should not eliminate from our criminal law all offences which ought properly to be found there under the head of political offences or under any other head; we should take care that our system of law provides most speedy and fair trial of those charged with the offence contained in it; we should take care that our punishments are not excessive—and our course for years past has been to diminish the severity of punishments; but when we have done all that, I maintain it is of the essence of a good and wholesome system for the administration of law to maintain the certainty of the law—to insist upon the certainty of the law and the certainty of the execution of the punishments when once pronounced. Now, my Lords, I would assume for a moment that the persons of whom we are speaking are political prisoners, and I would ask your Lordships to consider for a moment whether, upon the principles laid down by the Prime Minister, the release of these prisoners was a politic or reasonable act. Had the dangers represented by these prisoners passed away at the time of their release? Was there no danger to be apprehended from the prisoners themselves? I answer that question by calling your Lordships' attention to a fact which the noble Lord relied on who has just sat down (Lord Dufferin). These prisoners were not pardoned unconditionally—they were obliged to leave the country; and if no danger was to be apprehended from their liberation why was that condition imposed? I will, in further illustration of this point, take a description of these prisoners from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). Two years ago, on the 18th of March, 1869, a conversation arose in this House upon the release of the Fenian prisoners who were at that time liberated, and the noble Earl described the condition of those who were detained in these words—

“The Irish Government made repeated scrutinies into every single case, and there were three classes of offenders whom from the first they determined not to release—the criminal, if I may so distinguish them, as against the purely political offenders—the class which comprised those who were known to be habitual conspirators, and those who, from their energy or talents, as soldiers or men of letters, might, if released, prove a source of danger in the present dormant state of Fenianism.”—[3 Hansard, exciv. 1638.]

That was the description given two years ago of persons from whom it is now said no danger can be apprehended. But I will go further. We have had a still more recent description of these persons from the Prime Minister, in a reply to Mr. Moylan, of the Canadian Government Emigration Office in Dublin, who addressed a letter to the right hon. Gentleman, by way of remonstrance on behalf of Canada, in relation to the liberation of the Fenian prisoners, cramped, as that act of grace is, with the condition of exile. The following is Mr. Gladstone's reply:—

“December 22.

“Sir,—I am directed by Mr. Gladstone to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst., which he has read with attention. Mr. Gladstone has every confidence in the motive which dictated it, but does not consider that Her Majesty's Government would be responsible for allowing persons, of whose future obedience they have no assurance whatever, to remain in the midst of the community whom they had sought, and probably would seek again, to disturb.

“I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

“J. G. Moylan, Esq. ALGERNON WEST.”

Therefore, as to there being an absence of danger, as far as the character of the persons released is concerned, we have the authority of the Prime Minister that they are dangerous persons, and that the Government had no information which could lead them to believe in their future obedience to the law. But where were these men sent? They were sent to the United States. You remember the history of the Fenian insurrection, and I ask, where was our greatest danger to be looked for? It was not so much in this country, because here these persons were under the control of the law; but the place which was the greatest source of danger was to be found across the Atlantic, where Irishmen, as the centres of the movement, were conducting machinery which was developing itself in Ireland. Therefore, as regards the persons released, I do not think it can be said that they were set at liberty because no danger could be apprehended from them. I do not go into the mode and form of their release. The noble Earl who spoke first (Earl Grey) has reminded your Lordships, with great justice, that if the prisoners were to have their release they could hardly have had it in a more inconvenient and unhappy way. They were released and sent out in a body to that place where it was known they had thousands and hundreds of thousands of sympathizers. They were sent out in a sort of state, and it was the mere accident of the delay of a week which prevented the occurrence of their being in the same ship which carried out the noble Earl the President of the Council, and the other Commissioners; in which case—if he had found himself along with those gentlemen in the steamer which carried them across the Atlantic—one reception at Washington and one triumphant meeting at Brooklyn would have sufficed. As to the danger to the country, let me ask your Lordships to go back a few months, because here, again, I do not want any further information than that which I have from the Prime Minister himself. Exactly 12 months ago, the Government introduced into the House of Commons a measure for the better preservation of the peace in Ireland, on the ground of the state of three counties—Meath, Westmeath, and Mayo—not, observe, their state as regarded Fenianism, but with respect to the Riband conspiracy, which the noble Lord who has preceded me has said is so entirely distinct from Fenianism. It was upon the ground of the Riband conspiracy in these three counties that the Peace Preservation Bill was brought in. And I remember that when it was suggested that the county of Tipperary was not in a healthy condition, the Chief Secretary said he only sought for powers on the ground of the state of those three particular counties. I may remind your Lordships that we have heard of three counties being now in a similar condition as regards the prevalence of the Riband conspiracy. Mayo has been dropped out, but King's County has been put in. But, passing by that, what was the statement of the Prime Minister? On the same night that the Peace Preservation Bill was brought into the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone had to answer the application which was then made for the release of the Fenian prisoners, and he said—

"The hon. Member asks whether we think the time has now come when the amnesty which was partially conceded not by an arbitrary choice, but upon particular grounds of selection, somewhat more than 12 months ago, may be extended to the whole of the political prisoners taken up in Ireland. I am sorry to say that my answer must be most repugnant to my inclination; but, at the same time, most imperatively imposed by duty. I must point to the state of Ireland, where we are engaged in what I hope is materially and morally important remedial legislation, but are compelled to interrupt this beneficent, and, at all events, well-intended process, by a Motion which will presently be submitted by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) for special powers with a view to the security of life and property in Ireland. I do not think it would be possible for us to announce in this House, or to hold out elsewhere, any hope whatever that it would be consistent with our duty to open the doors of the prison on behalf of those prisoners, until we can see a different and better state of things in Ireland. . . . It would be cruel to encourage the friends of these prisoners to cherish any hopes whatever with regard to their release, until we are able to see a state of things in Ireland when Her Majesty's peaceable and well-conducted subjects may be enabled to pursue the ordinary avocations of life with that degree of comfort and confidence which is the best test and criterion of a civilized and a Christian country."—[3 Hansard, cc. 80.]

This was 12 months ago, at the time when the only disturbed districts of Ireland were said to be the three counties I have mentioned, and the only disturbance complained of was their connection with the Riband conspiracy. I ask your Lordships—What is the difference between the danger that now prevails and that which prevailed 12 months ago? What is the state of things in Ireland now? I am sure your Lordships were pleased to be told in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech that the state of Ireland was peaceful and satisfactory, and that if there was an exception to that general condition, it was a spot so isolated that—we might gather from the tone of the Speech—it was scarcely worth referring to. We were told that all Ireland needed was repose, and that no measure was intended to be brought forward regarding Ireland which could provoke controversy or animosity. Unfortunately, we have received very different information since that Speech was pronounced in this House. I do not intend to enter into any statistical examination of the number of offences in Ireland; neither do I wish to enter into any controversy as to the effect that may be expected from the legislation of the last two years. The noble Lord (Lord Dufferin) said what was very fair when he remarked that even those who were opposed to these measures must admit that the time had hardly come for us to judge of what their operation would be. He also said they had succeeded beyond his expectations. But when I remember that the noble Lord told us last year, in words of great eloquence and solemnity, that he expected the reverse from the passing of the Land Bill, I do not think the success beyond his expectations manifests, on the whole, a great result from that measure.

LORD DUFFERIN: I beg pardon for interrupting my noble and learned Friend, but I must emphatically say that was not the effect of my speech. If my noble and learned Friend did not hear my remarks, I will send him a copy of my speech.

LORD CAIRNS: My noble Friend need not send me a copy of his speech, for I heard it with the greatest pleasure. I do not pretend to remember or to quote the words; but it certainly left in my mind the impression that the noble Lord performed somewhat the reverse of the part of the prophet in the Old Testament—he was brought to bless the Bill, but he ended by cursing it altogether. However, I will not go into that which is debateable ground, nor will I occupy time in canvassing the two reasons which the noble Lord assigned in proof of the improved condition of Ireland at the present day. Those two proofs seemed to me to be singular ones. The first was that the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland was able to spend the greater part of his time in London; the second was that the Government intends to call out the Militia regiments in Ireland. The first is, no doubt, a matter of fact; the other is only the intention of the Government, and we shall be better able to judge of that by its result, whatever that may be. I will turn to things as to which there can be no dispute, and which cannot give rise to controversy. But before I do so, allow me to ask your Lordships to bear in mind two reflections with regard to the condition of Ireland, which all who are acquainted with that country will know to be well-founded. In the first place, more numerical calculations as to the number of crimes in particular districts of Ireland are by no means a complete test, but are very frequently an entirely fallacious one of the state of the country. If it be the case, as the Government have announced, that there is a conspiracy in a particular district of Ireland affecting life and property—a conspiracy against law and order, and one which seeks to substitute rules of its own for the laws of the country—the absence of crime in that district may indicate nothing but the complete and perfect triumph of the conspiracy. It is when a conspiracy seeking to assert its own rules, comes into collision with those who have not succumbed to its power, and when the latter appeal to and insist upon the law of the country that crimes occur; and, therefore, crime is or may be a proof that the conspiracy is not so triumphant as it would be if no crime occurred. Another observation to be borne in mind is this—very great emphasis is laid by Members of the Government upon the isolated spots in Ireland where they think the conspiracy exists. I do not think a greater mistake can be made. The Riband conspiracy is not a local organization—it is general throughout the country—it crops out and makes itself known for particular reasons in this place or that; but those who are acquainted with Ireland know perfectly well that almost as a universal rule the perpetrators of Riband outrages are not persons who live on the spot where the outrage occurs, but are brought from a distance, and that circumstance shows that the conspiracy has ramifications throughout the country and has the command of agents in all parts. What is the state of the country? I will refer shortly to the state of Westmeath—but I am greatly afraid that it is not by any means in Westmeath and Meath and King's County only that outrages are occurring. What do we read in the newspapers? I find that on Tuesday night, in Tipperary, five men attacked the house of Mr. Howes, a resident in the district, and fired five or six shots into the house, fortunately without injuring any of the inmates. The next day, in Donegal, a steward was shot dead. Only the other evening the President of the Board of Trade, till recently Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, stated officially that Ireland never was more contented, never more tranquil than at the present moment. But at the very time that he was speaking, the house of a tenant of one of your Lordships in the County Clare was attacked by an armed party. Fortunately they did not succeed in committing murder. But in the County Limerick, at the same hour, the steward of Mr. Conyers was shot dead. This was at 7 o'clock in the evening—the very moment that the President of the Board of Trade was speaking in the House of Commons. Let me refer to the County Mayo. I do not know whether your Lordships read in the newspapers the history of what occurred in that county; but I confess it impressed my mind with deeper feelings of pain than anything else which I have perused with regard to the state of Ireland for many months. At Foxford, in the county of Mayo, there was a man whose name was Davis; he seems to have been a respectable peasant, having a servant in his house, and living with his wife and children. It was night time, and he was in bed; his wife was sitting by the bedside nursing a child. A shot was fired through the window which fatally wounded him in bed; he raised himself up and showed his wife that he was shot, and she was so paralyzed with fear, that she was unable to give the alarm till next morning. After a couple of days the poor man died, and a coroner's inquest was held. I will read to your Lordships what we find as to the proceedings in the leading London newspaper—

"Sixteen of the jury returned a verdict that the deceased was killed by the accidental discharge of his own gun. There were joyous demonstrations in Foxford when the verdict became known, and it is stated that some friends of the man who was shot were warned to return home as quickly as possible, as violence was apprehended from the populace. Satisfaction is felt in the district at the verdict. Had it been one of wilful murder, as was expected, a tax would have been levied to compensate the family of the deceased."

What do your Lordships suppose was the evidence on which the jury proceeded? There was the evidence of the wife, who stated that she was in the room when her husband was shot; the evidence of the servant, who, hearing the shot, ran into the room and saw the window broken, which had not been broken before, through which the shot had entered; there was the evidence of a man who had been getting water from a well outside the house, who heard the shot and saw two men running rapidly away, men whom, of course, he did not know; and there was the evidence of the constable of police, who had found broken pieces of metal and glass scattered about the bed, who also found the gun of the deceased standing in its accustomed place, without any symptom of its having been discharged, and who, in fact, drew the charge from the gun upon the day of the inquest, and stated that he believed the gun to be at the time in exactly the same condition as it was on the night of the murder. Upon that evidence I blush to say that 16 men, with the widow and orphans before them, found that this man had come to his death by the accidental discharge of his own gun, lest the neighbourhood should have to compensate the orphans and the widow. That, be it observed, is away from the disturbed and disaffected part of the country; that is in the peaceable and calm and well-regulated part of Ireland. These things are done in the green tree; now let us see what is done in the dry. What does the Chief Justice Monaghan say at the assizes which are now going on in the county Westmeath? These are his words—

"I feel it my duty to say, looking over the returns which have been furnished to me by the constabulary of the county, that the county is in that state that must be a source of annoyance and grief to everybody interested in its welfare. When I was last here it was in an unpleasant state; but I indulged in the hope that things would mend. I find now, on the contrary, things have got from bad to worse, and the very deplorable state the county is in it is almost impossible to conceive or to describe. One cannot wonder that it has engaged the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and I can only trust and hope that the proceedings that are now being taken in Parliament will result in devising measures that will be productive of improvement, and will afford some safety to the inhabitants of this county. In the list that is before me I find that in the months of November and December last two men were shot. One of the name of Dowling was shot, and died immediately from the results of the wound. A man named Waters, a police constable, was also shot. Another man of the name of Heney or Hyney was wounded and assaulted, which terminated with his death."

Then the Chief Justice goes on to describe other offences, which had not terminated fatally, but offences committed in the light of day, witnessed by scores of persons, without anyone being brought to justice for those crimes. I will pass from the Chief Justice, who, no doubt, was shocked by the state in which he found the county, and I will take the evidence of the Roman Catholic Bishop, who, from living in the county, is intimately acquainted with all the people. And what does Dr. Nulty say. He says—

"Every man now fears that scores of assassins are secretly and stealthily lurking about in the very midst of us. The mystery in which they have shrouded themselves, and with which they have hitherto successfully concealed themselves,

And then the Roman Catholic Bishop goes on to say—what hardly shows a grateful spirit on the part of one in his position—that he thinks the Government a very weak and pusillanimous Government. Bad, however, as the state of the country is, according to the language of the Chief Justice in his Charge to the grand jury, I am sorry to say that the result of the assizes just held in that county seems to be even more alarming. For what do we find? I have taken four cases almost at random, and they show it to be utterly impossible to obtain a conviction in the district. Four men were indicted for attacking a corn mill, and assaulting a man who had taken a situation from which another had been dismissed. The prosecutor had identified all the prisoners at the petty sessions; but, when confronted with them at the assizes, said he did not know them, and they had to be discharged. A much worse case, I think, was one which your Lordships may have observed—that of Constable Supple, whom a man named Bray had tried to murder. The case proved to demonstration was this—Constable Supple was standing outside his barracks, beside the yard of the chapel, there being a wall between: a man fired at him from over the wall. Though wounded the constable was able to jump over the wall, and saw Bray making off. Bray again fired, but missed him; and the constable grappled with him, wrested the revolver from him, and threw him down. While struggling on the ground Bray pulled out another pistol and snapped it in his face, but it did not explode: the struggle continued for some time, and ultimately, the constable becoming exhausted, Bray got away—but I think it was one of the most manly endeavours to arrest a criminal that I ever heard of. But now observe. Bray was no stranger to the constable, who swore to him positively, and had known him for five years; they were face to face, at one time their faces almost touching each other, and he had seized him by the hair of his head. There was not the slightest doubt that he was the man who had tried to murder him. Not only that, but a labourer of Bray's had left Bray standing in the chapel yard shortly before the time of this occurrence. An attempt was made to prove an alibi; but it was no alibi at all. Somebody came forward, and said that they had seen Bray about the time of the attack, but not at any very great distance from the place. Moreover, the person had neither clock nor watch to tell him the time. The Judge evidently disregarded his evidence; nevertheless, the jury, after a few minutes deliberation, acquitted the prisoner. In the next case, in which a man was charged with breaking into a house and assaulting the inmates, an alibi was set up and the jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." And then occurs this remarkable circumstance—the Chief Justice cautioned the prisoner to be more careful in future, as the great probability was that if tried again he would not escape. In the case of Robert Black, who was indicted for firing at Mr. Blagrove, with intent to murder him, the jury disagreed. The prosecutor swore positively as to the identity of the prisoner, whose father held a farm from which he had been evicted. These cases, I contend, show a state of things which is even worse than that which would exist if those prisoners had not been apprehended at all. It is deplorable if, when they commit crimes, they cannot be arrested; but I believe it would be better for ten criminals to escape in that way than for one man, duly arrested and having had the crime clearly brought home to him, to escape either through sympathy or through fear on the part of the jurors. And this, my Lords, leads me to ask why the powers which were entrusted to the Government last year have not been exercised with regard to offences of this kind? One power, and a very valuable one, which was given them was to remove particular trials from the county which was the scene of the offence and to have the cases tried elsewhere. I want to know why the Government did not remove those trials to Dublin, where a proper jury might have been obtained, free from feelings, on the one hand, of sympathy, or, on the other, of fear. I venture to think the Government, from that point of view, have been chargeable with very great neglect in the manner in which these prosecutions have been conducted; and I therefore am justified in asking the Government what it is they now propose to do? From the records of the other House of Parliament, we are given to understand that a Committee has been appointed on the subject of the Riband conspiracy in a particular district in Ireland. I will not enter into what those same records tell us of the alterations which from time to time have been made in the proposals of that Committee—how it was at first to have been a Secret Committee, and to have suggested the best mode of remedying the condition of that country; those parts of the Motion, wisely or unwisely, have dropped out, and I will not discuss a matter which is more properly for the other House of Parliament. But now we understand that the matter is reduced simply to this—that a Committee of the other House has been appointed to inquire into the condition of this disturbed district of Ireland. Is that, I will ask, to be a substitute for legislation, or a prelude to legislation; or is it to supersede all legislation on the subject? Here is the view taken by a Member of the Government, who ought to be well informed on the subject—I mean the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who is now President of the Board of Trade. Mr. Chichester Fortescue says—

"It is perfectly well known in Ireland that we have succeeded beyond expectation, and almost beyond hope in improving the condition of the country, and that at no time within memory has Ireland been so prosperous, so calm ["Oh, oh!"]—I know what I am speaking of—I repeat, so prosperous, so calm, so confident of the future, so contented, so loyal as she is at the present moment."—[3 Hansard, colv. 1020.]

No qualification, you will observe. The right hon. Gentleman went on—

"Although I readily admit that the information so to be obtained will be of value to the Government, still I believe it will be of equal value to the House as enabling them to ascertain beyond dispute the facts and causes of this want of success, which, as I have said, has been limited and exceptional."—[Ibid. 1021.]

Therefore, according to him, the object of the inquiry is to show that although the Government have failed in their legislation with regard to Ireland, yet their failure has been most exceptional. And now let me direct your Lordships' attention to the opinions expressed by a legal Member of the Government. What does the Solicitor General for Ireland say?—

"I do say that it would afford to me, and that it would afford to Her Majesty's Government, the greatest satisfaction if, as the result of the labours of the Committee, it should clearly appear that Westmeath may be safely left to the operation of the law as now existing. . . . When the facts are reported to the House, and the House and the Government have seen and considered them, whatever the Committee may then recommend—even if it should be legislation of the most penal character, or no legislation at all—the Government will bring an unbiassed judgment to bear upon the question, and will deal with it as they have dealt with all measures relating to Ireland, from a broad and statesmanlike point of view. And if it should be shown that no necessity for exceptional legislation exists, no one will be more gratified than the Members of Her Majesty's Government. They will rejoice if Westmeath can be safely left to yield to the same healing influences that have made themselves felt in all other parts of Ireland."—[Ibid. 1241-3.]

Well, judging from these declarations alone, I should have supposed that the Government were quite at sea; that they were equally prepared for legislation or no legislation; and that they had no opinion as to what the legislation ought to be; but I am bound to say that the expressions which fell from two other Members of Her Majesty's Government were more satisfactory. The present Chief Secretary for Ireland, after referring to his "painful dismay" at being obliged to introduce the subject, went on to say—

"Now, if this state of things really exists—and it can be too readily proved—the Government say, and I say to the House, that it is an intolerable state of things. The Government are prepared to admit it, and we say that we are determined to apply to the House for a remedy. . . . We have no desire to ask the Committee to suggest a remedy. Upon the facts so established, as I believe they would be before a Committee, the Government will be prepared, as I have said before, to legislate. The Government think the state of things intolerable, and a remedy they are determined to find, if not within, then without, the ordinary limits of the Constitution."—[Ibid. 995-8.]

That is a declaration of the most explicit kind on the part of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I have not a word to say against it. Neither is there much exception to be taken to the view of the Prime Minister, who says—

"I, for one, am not prepared to allow, and my Colleagues have at no time asserted, that the state of Westmeath at this moment, taken all in all, is worse than it has been in any former years. We do not found ourselves on that allegation. I will not, even for myself, presume to say that it is worse than it was 12 months ago. But we do say that the state of Ireland, and of the Government of Ireland, is, and has been—I am speaking of the Executive Government—necessarily in many respects defective and even deplorable. The Government have been obliged to wink at a state of crime or intimidation which, in well-governed countries, is intolerable. . . . It is not so much because we assert that the state of Westmeath is now worse than in former times that we propose a Committee of Inquiry; but it is because we think that the state of Westmeath is a disgrace to a civilized country, that we are of opinion its condition demands the attention of Parliament. . . . But, independently of that, there is another matter which we should wish to examine by aid of the Committee, and that is, how have the Government used the powers given them under the Peace Preservation Act? Seeing that Parliament last year entrusted us with large stringent powers, and seeing that we declare that still more stringent powers are required in reference to the state of Westmeath, is it not right that the House of Commons should inquire whether or not we have neglected properly to use the powers given us?" —[Ibid. 1192-4.]

From these declarations I gather the following conclusions:—that the Government find in Ireland a state of things which is described as intolerable; that the Government are obliged to wink at a system of crime and intimidation; and that they may, perhaps, ask Parliament for further and more stringent powers. But when are they going to do that? Do they mean to wait for the termination of the inquiry by the Committee? And what is the Committee to do? Is it to take evidence? Why, whatever evidence can be procured from members of the police, from magistrates, and from civilians who are in office the Government are already possessed of. They have at the present moment the means of examining all the evidence which from these sources can be obtained. Besides, the Government in Dublin Castle possesses secret information which they could not disclose, and which it would be their duty not to disclose to a Committee of the House of Commons, for the simple reason that the disclosures of the information would defeat the object for which it was given. Under the Act passed last year, and by means of the stipendiary magistrates, the Government possess powers more stringent than was ever before given to the Executive in this country. When an outrage occurs, and even before anyone is accused, the magistrates are empowered to summon any or every person in their district, to examine such person or persons on oath with reference to all subjects connected with the outrage, and to commit them to prison if they refuse to answer. These are powers which a Committee of the House of Commons cannot have; and, therefore, for the Government to say that they are waiting to obtain information is to make a suggestion which will not bear examination for a single moment. Is it an answer to people who reside in these unfortunate districts, and who are in the state which Dr. Nulty and the Government describe, to say—"You must wait one, two, or three months, or perhaps till nearly the end of the Session, before we can venture to propose any legislation to Parliament?" Then it must be borne in mind that there are some Members of Parliament who do not think any legislation of this kind is necessary, and they, of course, will endeavour to prolong the investigation. Therefore the Government will be confronted with a rival movement in the Committee, which will lead to a prolonged inquiry, with a view to procure evidence which, after all, the Government does not want. I have now to ask your Lordships to consider the effect upon this Riband conspiracy and on the disturbances in this particular part of the country, of the doctrine which the Government has manifested by the release of the Fenian prisoners. We have heard a great deal to-night of the distinction between Fenianism and Ribandism. Well, I have no doubt there is a difference in the details of organization; but both Fenianism and Ribandism are organizations having for their object the overthrow of our rule and of our laws, and the substitution for them of the laws and rule of the organization itself. I have often heard it said that the two cannot be the same, because when Fenianism prevails Ribandism droops down to a minimum. I have no doubt of the fact; but I take it to be a proof that the two societies are cognate and allied. Fenianism is the larger organization of the two, and when it is in the ascendant Ribandism falls into abeyance, as it were; but only to be resuscitated and to rise in fuller vigour again after Fenianism has disappeared. Lord Hartington said in the speech to which I have referred that the origin of Ribandism was political, and Dr. Nulty said very much the same thing. The original object of the organization was to bring about a change in laws considered at the time to be injurious to Ireland. Now, if this were its original character, remember what a tendency there is in Ireland always to elevate crime into politics, and to convert every criminal, if possible, into a political martyr. The other day I noticed a statement that when one of the released Fenian prisoners was bidding farewell to his friends at Cork, he said—"I am going to America, but I have one consolation. The Prime Minister has admitted that all the good legislation for Ireland is owing to the Fenians." I do not know whether he was referring to any particular expression of the Prime Minister, or to the current of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman—but the observation is important as showing the way in which people in Ireland reason in these matters. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) spoke of the "National Party"—God forbid I should suggest that the National Party are Fenians; but what I would call attention to is this—that crime is committed in order to attain a political object, and in that way it becomes a political crime. It seems to be assumed that if a political criminal becomes a political prisoner, he must be treated, as the Fenians were, with the utmost consideration. Hence these men say "Let us take the strongest steps we can to oppose English rule; our first chance will be the grand jury won't find a true bill; our second chance will be a jury won't agree to convict; if we miss both these chances, we shall be convicted, and we shall become political prisoners. But Mr. Gladstone says we must be treated with the utmost leniency while in prison; and in a short time we shall receive an outfit, and, with a supply of money in our pockets, we shall be put on board a first-class steamer and sent to the United States, where we shall be received with acclamations by the populace, thanked by the House of Representatives, and interviewed by the Press. After all, it is not so bad a career, and we will at once engage in it." I ask the Government, in all sober seriousness, what is the course they mean to take in regard to legislation for these disturbed districts? Parliament is ready to give them all the power they require. I only lament that the power they possess and the power that may be conceded to them may be found to be so much weakened by the acts of the Executive which are the subject of the present notice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) has undoubtedly evinced the greatest rhetorical talent in passing "from grave to gay, from lively to severe"—by placing in juxtaposition two subjects which are essentially different, with the view of throwing upon the course which has been taken with regard to one set of political prisoners that degree of obloquy which would naturally attach to similar leniency adopted towards those guilty of the crimes instigated by Riband associations. I shall not attempt to rival my noble and learned Friend's humorous description of the voyage of the liberated prisoners to America, in a steamer possibly conveying one of Her Majesty's Ministers, for I think the subject is really a very grave one. I entirely sympathize with the feelings of the noble Lord who introduced the subject (Earl Grey)—it deserves the gravest discussion; but the two classes of crimes referred to ought to be entirely separated in argument as they are in fact. No doubt, it was a dexterous move on the part of my noble and learned Friend to tack on to the Motion of the noble Earl a question which intimates a species of connection between Ribandism and Fenianism, which is so wholly imaginary that it could be scarcely attempted otherwise than as a rhetorical juxtaposition: in attempting to connect the two he signally failed. I will advert for a few moments to the release of the Fenian prisoners. My noble and learned Friend, at the outset of his speech, assumed that the Government are on the look-out for a policy, and that they ought to be thankful for any assistance which discussion may afford them, and thereupon my noble and learned Friend himself volunteered argument and evidence on the subject of the Riband conspiracy. It is not difficult to state exactly the course the Government propose to take; indeed, I thought it had been sufficiently expounded in that discussion "elsewhere" from which he made quotations. With regard to Fenianism, the Government found prevailing in Ireland a tranquillity which might be called all but absolute. They found a great improvement in general feeling towards the Union with England and towards the Government, which they attributed to the good impression produced by the legislation of the last two years. But, as stated in the Queen's Speech, there existed in a certain part of Ireland, as there has existed for 40 years, a system of Ribandism that forces itself on the attention of the Government, now that remedial legislation has eliminated discontent, and the exercise of exceptional powers has extinguished Fenianism. Last year separation from this country was advocated by the organs of the Fenians in no measured and gentle terms, and a main object of exceptional legislation was to meet this evil. Incidentally, it would affect other secret societies and other forms of violence besides those of Fenian origin; but these being got rid of, it found there was a remainder of a spirit of insubordination, which has existed for a long time in a particular part of Ireland, and which has not been eradicated. It became the duty of the Government to make full and complete inquiry as to the character of these Riband associations, and to consider the best remedy to be applied. But this is an evil which has existed nearly for a century, and has engaged the attention and foiled the efforts of every successive Administration. Last year large powers were granted to the Irish Executive; but it was found they were not sufficient to deal with this evil—though they bore excellent fruit in that thorough suppression of Fenianism which, no doubt, was mainly due to them. What, then, became the duty of the Government? It is certainly a proper question to ask—Have you used the powers with which the Legislature intrusted you? It is right this question should be answered before new powers are applied for. The Committee to be appointed will very properly inquire whether these powers have been exercised; if so, with what result, and in what respect they have been found deficient. They will also inquire into the extent of the evil, and whether it is limited to a certain district, or whether, as the noble and learned Lord seems to think, we are in error in supposing it is confined within certain limits. The noble and learned Lord has taunted the Government with their original intention of making the Committee a secret one; and with asking for its advice. But he also said that these points had been raised and discussed in the other House. My Lords, they were raised, and the taunt was triumphantly answered by the majority in favour of the appointment of the Committee; by a Resolution conformable to that which was explained to have been from the first the intention. It was not the intention of the Government to ask the Committee for any special directions to govern them with regard to the course of legislation. They ask the Committee to sift to the bottom the existing condition of Ribandism, but they reserve to themselves the full power, immediately when it is thought necessary, and without waiting for further inquiry, if new circumstances should arise to render it necessary, to apply at once to Parliament for measures of a remedial character. We are in no way fettered by the inquiry, and in no way bound to wait for it. On the other hand, assuming the evil to be limited, as we believe it to be, we do not think it right to ask immediately for those measures of which we do not perceive necessity so urgent as to prevent due inquiry. It is probable the result of the inquiry will be that the Government will ask for such powers in excess of those granted on a former occasion as shall, in their judgment, be absolutely necessary to meet the occasion. So far, the Riband question may be considered as being separate from Fenianism and Fenian prisoners. Ribandism is so entirely antagonistic to the principle of Fenianism that my noble and learned Friend's laboured attempt to connect the two was, in the state of facts, an entire failure. It is not only that where Fenianism has prevailed Ribandism has not prevailed; but it is well known that the Riband conspiracy is of a totally different character from Fenianism—not directed to any change in the Government, and not seeking foreign aid to accomplish it, but confined to one special object, an alteration of the law with regard to the occupation of land, which has now become no longer a desire on the part of the large mass of the people of Ireland, who are well content with the measures that have been passed on that subject, but which still remains a fixed idea with those who have been bred up to it from infancy, and who, as members of the Riband association, have taken strong vows and religious obligations of a specific character. Those who belong to the Fenian organization, on the other hand, take no oaths. There is no religious element associated with it. My Lords, I now come to a much graver question—the exercise of the Royal clemency in the case of the Fenian prisoners. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) laid down certain principles which are correct as far as they go—that law should be certain, and punishment certain, speedy, and defined. No one will dispute these principles; but if they were not modified in practice, their mischievousness would be equally undeniable. The proposition is no doubt true in the abstract, but there is another proposition of equal truth—that punishment should never be excessive, so as to enlist the sympathy of the governed on the side of the offender rather than of the law. That is a principle of human nature which no wise statesmen will forget. Let me point out that, with regard to punishment, you had formerly the system of transportation, which afforded an adequate and far more convenient remedy than imprisonment. When you were driven back on imprisonment, you had to place these men in prison for a certain term of years. You could not sentence them to a life term of imprisonment; but the sentence must be for a considerable number of years. During that period, as years run on, the offence has passed by, the danger has passed by, the public forget all the alarm and distress occasioned by the conspiracy, and the tide of sympathy turns towards the offenders, and their sufferings are more remembered than their crimes—thus showing how essential it is that the prerogative of the Crown should be exercised, even at the risk of their being some outcry on the score of uncertainty of punishment. These persons had been placed in custody, they had been punished, they had suffered, their punishment was definite and certain; but when the tide begins to turn, and when, from the nature of the offence, there is no probability of its repetition, then is the time for exhibiting leniency and relieving them from their imprisonment. My noble and learned Friend asked—What is suffering? Does it consist in being sent out to America with new clothing, with money in pocket—in being made martyrs of, and fêted on arrival? But is that, I ask, a fair description of the facts? The crime of which these men were convicted was political. However mischievous, it was not of a sordid character—persons accused of political offences, bad as they may be, and great as the evils they may produce, are generally by comparison men of education, of high moral sensibility, and of good feeling towards those with whom they were not brought into immediate political antagonism. Are these men to be placed in the condition of common felons, thieves and murderers? [“Hear!”] The noble Duke cheers; but does he know of any country in the world which, within the last half-century, upholds consistently that doctrine? It has been tried in more countries than one, but abandoned. Austria tried it, and acquired a bad reputation for her treatment of political prisoners; but I am happy to say there is not at the present moment a single political prisoner in Austria. It is, I hold, simply a play upon words to speak of political offences and thefts and murders being placed in the same condition. When, therefore, you have fearlessly punished the political offences, you must take care that the just measure of punishment is not exceeded. This was the principle acted upon in 1849. Again, I say that imprisonment to men of education is a much severer punishment in every way than it is to the common felon, who often finds in prison that regular food and lodging which he never enjoyed when in freedom. The universal instinct of modern civilized nations draws a line of distinction between the two classes of offenders. Do we not all know a case in which an attempt was made to overthrow a great monarchy, and a homicide was committed in the course of it? Failure took place, and the author of the attempt was not executed, but he afterwards escaped, and attained the highest station in his country. His life was justly forfeited, and perhaps no one could have blamed the authorities if they had taken it; but they abstained. If we turn nearer home, I may remind your Lordships that this is not the first Government, or the only one, that has treated Irish political offenders with leniency. The noble Duke who now presides over the fortunes of his party in this House was, I believe, concerned in the liberation of four of the prisoners of 1849; and one of them, named Doran, was, if I am not mistaken, implicated in a homicide.

LORD CAIRNS said, that he had a list of the prisoners, and no charge of felony was associated with Doran's name.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: You had the crime in its worst form in the Manchester case, where an unarmed man was murdered in a cowardly and atrocious manner. The guilty men were justly condemned to death. But, even in that case, processions were formed, sidered everything they could for the good of those prisoners, and all that they could find out in the way of harshness practised towards them was that hot rations had not been invariably issued to them for their Sunday's dinner. The Fenian prisoners should have received not only meat every day, but hot meat every Sunday—and cold rations had been occasionally substituted. The Commissioners also found that the tea supplied to them was not quite so good as it might be; not that the tea was of bad quality, but because it was kept too long in the cauldron before it was used. He believed that many of their Lordships at that moment were in a condition to appreciate the grievance of food being kept a little too long before it was used, and therefore they could sympathize with the Fenian prisoners. On the ground of that cruel treatment some wonderful speeches were made in "another place," exciting the minds of the Irish people on that subject. He wished the Irish people to know—in case there should be any more Fenian outbreaks, such as an attempt made to blow up Dublin Castle, or any other venial offence—that the guilty persons when imprisoned would be very well treated, and would always have hot roast beef on Sundays.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, in the very few words which I shall address to your Lordships, I hope I shall make the fullest allowance for the difficult position in which those are placed who have to administer affairs in Ireland. I do not complain that they have at all overrated or exaggerated that difficulty. On the contrary, I confess that I should have been very willing if, in the only speech delivered to-night from the Bench opposite, my noble Friend (Lord Dufferin) had recognized more completely than I think he did what I fear is the real gravity of the situation of affairs in that country. My noble Friend said that never was the political tranquillity of Ireland more undisturbed than it is now, that the very idea of a Fenian rising is ridiculous, and that, in fact, all danger and all apprehension on that score are at an end. Well, I should be very glad if I were able to take an equally rose-coloured view of the situation. I quite admit that there have been many times when the anti-English feeling in Ireland was more violent than it is at present, and many times when the surface of society was more disturbed; but I doubt if there ever was any time when that which lies at the bottom of the feeling against England—the desire for a separate nationality—was stronger or more deep-rooted than it is now in Ireland. Unfortunately, you have deprived yourself of the means of knowing what the strength of that feeling really is. The state of the Irish Press became such last year that the Executive had to appeal to Parliament to put upon it a restraint totally at variance with our ordinary practice; but nevertheless necessary under the circumstances. But that is a state of things which cannot last for ever. It is in the nature of the case a temporary expedient, and when it ceases you will have a recurrence of this treasonable writing. It is an inseparable inconvenience of what you have done, that you cannot really gather the state of feeling in Ireland, and you have not sufficient warning of what may occur. I will put it in another manner. Is there a public man in this or the other House of Parliament who would at the present time more than at any other time in the memory of man like to submit to a plébiscite the question whether the two countries should be separated? You know perfectly well you could not do it; you know that the lower classes would vote for separation. And I am sure that feeling would not be confined exclusively to the lower classes. The feeling cannot be ascribed to want of material prosperity, because never has the material condition of Ireland been more satisfactory than it is at present; it cannot be ascribed to a State Church, because that grievance has disappeared; you cannot ascribe it to unjust land laws, because if the laws are unjust in any direction they are certainly not unjust in the way of refusing any reasonable claim made by the tenant. The Legislature, by the Bill of last year, has put an end to every grievance on that score. I am afraid, my Lords, the cause lies deeper, and is one of a more enduring type. We cannot fail to see that ever since 1782—or rather, I should say, ever since the beginning of that movement which culminated in 1782—there has existed in Ireland a belief in an incompatibility of feeling between the two races, which leads the people of Ireland to desire independence. While that feeling exists, and while it is widely felt, I say that, whatever you may have done in the way of relieving the people of burdens, the Irish difficulty still remains, and the Irish problem is still unsolved. Look at the various classes in Ireland, and consider the attitude they bear towards this country. You have, indeed, with you the Protestant clergy; they are wealthy and energetic, but they are not, perhaps, in particular good humour at this moment, or disposed to feel very cordially towards the English Parliament; but, still, their interests are identical with ours, and they will come round in time. You have the Roman Catholic hierarchy, a great social and political power, to which great concessions have been made; but considering that the United Kingdom, of all countries in Europe, most emphatically opposes itself to ecclesiastical pretensions in any form, and insists upon ideas of social organization widely different from what we suppose the Roman Catholic hierarchy to maintain, we cannot look to the representatives of that power for cordial co-operation. I do not mean to say they are, as a body, in favour of separation, or endeavour to promote it by violent means—indeed, I believe they are thoroughly frightened by the power of the Fenian agitation; but I say your relation with them must necessarily be one rather of political calculation than of sympathy. The landlords of Ireland, though by no means satisfied with the measure passed by the British Legislature last year, are, I believe, generally speaking, warm friends to British connection. The middle classes, however, in Ireland, being unhappily, almost everywhere the centre of all political agitation, feel strongly interested in this question of separation, and they are ranked against you. Unhappily, that party in Ireland, which is everywhere the steadiest opponent to all agitation, whether political or religious, is neither numerous nor powerful; and if you come to the peasantry they have only two guides—the one, the priesthood, of whom I have spoken; the other, that Press which you have, at this time, put under restraint, and you know that restraint cannot be permanent. When I look at the situation generally, I see something painfully hostile to this country, and I see mere force on the other side. It is clear, my Lords, that, in the way of political conciliation, there is nothing more to be done—there is no other interest in the sister country to be satisfied. The one thing which so very large a proportion of the Irish people want is, unhappily, the one thing which it is utterly impossible for you to give them. They want nationality; they want, at least, legislative independence. A great deal of that marked hostility to law, traceable in the act of the Ribandman quite as much as in the act of the Fenian, is due not to the feeling that the laws are bad or unjust in themselves, but to the feeling that they are laws made for you and not made for them. If you ask me in what manner this should be met, I would say I see only one way. In the long run—though I admit it is often very long first—men give up schemes and ideas which protracted experience has taught them to be utterly impracticable. If you could once convince the Irish people that they might just as well sigh for the moon as ask for Repeal, then in the course of generations—I can hardly hope for it earlier—that longing might die out. But if you take that line, there should be no mistake either as to the policy or the language you hold. This is not a time, with this feeling to which I have alluded deeply felt and widely spread, when you can afford to allow yourself the gratification of branding those who are styled political offenders by exceptional denunciation. You have but to create in Ireland a feeling, not existing there now I am sorry to say, that rebellion, or attempt at rebellion, is a dangerous game for the individual who plays it, and a grave offence against society. You are dealing with a nation where, as we have had abundant proof, law is not respected, where order is not desired, where human life is not held sacred, and where the general sympathy of the population go with the assassin and not with the law. I say for that very reason, in dealing with these men as a class, you should punish them not in a spirit of undue severity, but certainly not in a spirit of exceptional leniency. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack argued this question at some length, and in the course of his remarks he said—“If you are too severe in your punishment of political offenders, you will defeat your end, because you will create a feeling of sympathy for the offender; whereas by more merciful dealing, you will have public sympathy with you." I accept that argument where it is applicable; but I do not believe it is applicable in a country where, to begin with, all popular sympathy is with the offender. The noble and learned Lord proposed to justify the course pursued by the Government in another way. He told us that when the punishment inflicted had produced a sufficient effect upon the country, the remainder of that punishment might be safely remitted. I take the liberty of dissenting altogether from that view. It is not very wise to say you will punish a man not for what he has done, not in proportion to the magnitude of his offence—but in consideration of the state of feeling which may exist among the people after the sentence has been passed. The noble and learned Lord has expressed sympathy for the political prisoners of foreign countries, and I should be quite prepared to justify such sympathy as a general rule. No doubt some Governments run to excess in dealing with political offenders; but the prisoners with whom the British people have always been so ready to sympathize have been men sentenced without trial, at the arbitrary will of the Executive, often for acts which we should not regard as offences at all. Now, we have to contend with the feeling that, although the British Government could not, for decency's sake, avoid giving the prisoners some punishment, still they pitied the offenders, and thought them persons deserving of great commiseration, and in whose favour much might be said, that they were persons not so much morally guilty, as that they were persons who had shown their patriotism in an indiscreet and undesirable manner. I know that many persons are inclined to take that view of political offences in general, though, of course, the term "political offences" is a very wide and vague one. Any man who undertakes to subvert a Government by means of armed force contemplates as a matter of course and as a necessary incident to the execution of his plan murder, or many murders, according to the resistance he meets. For my own part, I confess I do not see that the offence of murder is in any way expiated or lessened because the crime is committed in the prosecution of treason. If there is any sympathy at all to be shown, I confess mine would be given to those who are the innocent victims of attempts of this kind. Let us look at the state of things which exists. Take the case of any man who has made himself conspicuous on the loyal side; and in the streets of Cork, or perhaps of Dublin, his life is not worth a week's notice. Putting aside, however, this general question of the degree of demerit belonging to the political offenders, I think there is something peculiarly unfortunate in the circumstances of the release of these men. I have heard many people, on all sides of politics, say that what has been done during the last two years in the way of remedial legislation for Ireland has been done at such a time, under such circumstances, and in such a manner that the universal feeling in that country is that these concessions have been granted not as a matter of justice or policy, but as a matter of fear. The bulk of the Irish people maintain that if it had not been for Fenianism they never would have got rid of the Irish Church Establishment, and that if an agrarian war had not been carried on they never would have had a Land Bill passed. Though we may know perfectly well in our own consciences that the feeling of fear which they impute to us is entirely imaginary, still we cannot deny that there is an amount of plausibility in the statement that neither of these measures would probably have passed, or not so soon, had it not been for the continual direction of English attention to Irish affairs by the disturbances and disorders that were continually occurring. They argued from these premises—and not without some plausibility. They said—"Let us go on as we have begun; let us keep the game up a little longer; let us wait till we have rendered government in Ireland impossible; we have got a good deal, and by-and-by we shall get the rest." That is the feeling you have to dissipate if you can, and I think you can only do it by making them see that insurrection is regarded by the Legislature of this country as a serious crime, and one which will involve a heavy punishment. I have heard in discussions outside this House reference made to what occurred after the American Civil War. It is said—"Look at what the Americans have done after the gigantic struggle in which they were engaged during four years; they have ended with an almost complete amnesty." That argument would be good if the cases were parallel to any degree. But in America there had been a gigantic civil war, in which hundreds and thousands of lives had been sacrificed, and the whole country had been desolated. The American Government might very reasonably say that after the punishment which had been inflicted there was not the slightest danger that the attempt would be renewed. But we cannot say that heavy suffering or penalty has been inflicted upon or endured by the Fenian leaders or followers, and we cannot speak so confidently about their not renewing their attempts. As to the reception at Washington I say nothing, because, considering the great honour with which they were treated by our own Government, I do not admit that there is anything unfriendly in the House of Representatives having continued that courtesy and honour to them. In the next place, it is more a matter for them than for anybody else to judge what kind of company it suits them to keep; and if they are willing to give a similar measure of cordiality to the too numerous body of persons who issue from our gaols, they will help us very materially in solving the difficult and perplexing question—"What are we to do with our criminals?" I find no fault; but I regret the act of our Government, because we often see that those who spare themselves the pain of punishing—and pain it is—when punishment is necessary very often undergo it because they have to punish over and over again. I hope, rather than expect, that it will not be so in this case.

LORD O'HAGAN: My Lords, my only reason for rising to address your Lordships is a supposition that you would naturally expect someone to speak who has a personal acquaintance with the subject which is now under your consideration. The noble Earl who has just spoken (the Earl of Derby) has taken a disheartening view of the condition of Ireland; but to my mind it does not precisely bear upon the question before your Lordships at this moment. With reference to that view I shall only say this—assume that the feeling to which the noble Earl had referred does exist to a large extent in Ireland, the fact is—and I can say it with a perfect knowledge of the evidence—that that feeling which was heretofore exhibited in forms of sedition and violence, now, at least, if it continue to exist, has ceased to wear those forms. What the Government ought to do in the first instance is, I apprehend, to put down all external force, all resistance to the law; and when that has been accomplished, and when, whatever may be their view, the people proceed to assert it constitutionally and within the law, the Government has accomplished that which is much for the benefit of the country. And I say further that, when that has been accomplished, whatever may be your view as to the remaining feeling, which may not be dissipated all at once, you have advanced a great and an important step towards its extinction. And I shall say this only upon this part of the matter, before I approach what seems to me to be the real question in dispute—that it is a very disheartening view of the case to say that you are at the end of your remedial measures—that all the measures you have taken have produced no good result, and that you are to despair of the country with which you are connected. I confess I am of a different view. In 1782, 1798, and at various other periods of Irish history, we have read of Coercion Acts, Special Commissions, and abridgments of the liberty of the subject. Now we have begun to try the remedy of justice. It was time that that beginning should be made. I believe the experiment has actually succeeded as far as it could within the time; and if that experiment succeeds, and if justice is administered to Ireland as it never has been administered before, Irish nature is human nature, and justice will succeed in pacifying Ireland. It is not very long ago since the condition of things which has existed in Ireland prevailed to a more flagrant degree in Canada. You had in Canada those Catholic Bishops with peculiar views; you had Bishops on the other side with their peculiar views also; and you had a divided population in a state of open and flagrant rebellion. The country was dealt with in a certain way which the Imperial Government considered was necessary. Justice was done according to the views of the Canadians, and I believe that England has now no more loyal defenders. I do not see why that which was accomplished in Canada should not be accomplished in Ireland, and I for one do not despair. Let justice be tried, and completely tried, and I believe you will not be sorry for the experiment. There are two points which appear to me to be legitimate subjects of discussion in this House. The first is with reference to the question of the liberation of the political prisoners, and the next is my own convictions as to the condition of Ireland, and as to the measures to which so much reference has been made in the course of this discussion. I differ from my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) as to the identity of Fenianism and Ribandism, because I know historically that the origin of one was wholly different from the origin of the other; and I know practically, from having had the conduct of affairs in Courts of Justice, that the nature and objects of the two organizations are absolutely different. Ribandism originally grew up in Ulster as a form of combination among the Roman Catholics to resist the combination of Orangemen upon the other side.

LORD CAIRNS was understood to say that Orangeism was itself an organization of defence.

LORD O'HAGAN: From that view I venture to differ. But no doubt there were hostile organizations—"Hearts of Oak" and "Hearts of Steel," and a number of other things—previously. Ribandism, however, originated in Ballymena, some time before the commencement of this century. The object of Ribandism is a social object—or, I should rather say, an anti-social object. But it has assumed, as all secret societies will assume, various forms at different times; at one period it has worked as a species of trade union, at another it has taken the form of agrarian combination; it has assumed all sorts of shapes for the purpose of influencing the better classes of society, and accomplishing the purposes of its abettors. Fenianism, on the other hand, is essentially a political combination for political purposes—framed expressly and exclusively for the purpose of separating the two countries, England from Ireland. Anyone familiar with Courts of Justice in Ireland must at once appreciate the difference. You cannot deal with one as you would with the other; you may even put down one without putting down the other. It is no very long time since, in the north of Ireland, in the neighbourhood of Newry, Fenian and Orange lodges actually came into collision, and fought it out like men in the open field. I give that as a matter happening within my own experience, and which I have on the best possible authority. As to the charges brought against the Government with reference to the liberation of the Fenian prisoners, I will not repeat the able and elaborate observations of my noble and learned Friend upon the Woolsack; but this I will say, that I know of no country in which civilized men have dealt with political prisoners, in which it has been found possible to maintain in its integrity and fulness the doctrine that if, on particular occasions, and under special circumstances, you allow a mitigation of punishment, you thereby interfere with the reasonable certainty of punishment. Every case must be dealt with on its own merits; and, in this case, you have to consider whether the Government had sufficient reason for the course which they adopted. Some of these men had undoubtedly been guilty of very grave offences, and of these the worst have not been released; others, who were enthusiasts—"Oh!"—one or two of them were not I admit; but to the mass I think the term applies—have been liberated. And, although these men were guilty of treason—the highest crime on account of the evils which it brings in its train—they yet were enthusiasts, men who looked only to a political object, and were prepared to sacrifice themselves to its attainment. And when you come to consider this question in connection with their discharge, although they were men who forgot their duty to the Crown—although they forgot the absurdity of opposing and encountering the full power of this mighty Empire, and forgot that, within the Constitution and the law, the people of Ireland have the fullest opportunity of achieving everything which they can legitimately desire—still you must remember that these men had an object which was pure and good to them at the time, and in considering whether they are to be dealt with mercifully or hardly you must take this circumstance into account—otherwise it seems to me that you shock the common feelings of humanity. These people had been convicted in numbers and very heavily punished, and the result was a complete subsidence of seditious organization and a great peace in Ireland at the time.

Application was thereupon made to the Government to release these people. The Prime Minister, having at the beginning of last year two measures, admittedly of the highest importance, either in actual operation or in immediate prospect, said—"Let us observe what will occur within the next 12 months, and if during a certain period the condition of the country appears to be peaceable and quiet, I think it will be for the benefit of the country that an act of mercy should accompany the passing of great legislative Acts of such moment to the country." This occurred about April or May last year. Time passed on, and the country undoubtedly got into a better condition. With the exception of the black spot to which reference has been made, Ireland undoubtedly became exceedingly tranquil and quiet. Whatever sentiment may have continued to exist in the country, it undoubtedly did not continue to manifest itself in a seditious form. When that state of things had been brought about the Premier had to consider this question—Had the time arrived when these men might safely and beneficially be discharged? I need not repeat what has been said so often, that what we have done was in accordance with the ordinary custom of different countries of the world; beyond a doubt what has been done in this instance by the Cabinet has been done by France over and over again, by Austria repeatedly, and by America upon a late occasion. I am unable to understand the force of the argument used by the noble Earl who opened the debate (Earl Grey) and of the noble and learned Lord who followed (Lord Cairns) that it is proper to release men who have been engaged in open conflict, slaughtering their fellow-men, and burning and destroying all before them, as men must do who engage in civil war, and yet that it is wholly improper to release men who have committed no acts of open violence, however evil their intentions may have been. That argument does not appear to me to carry much weight or force. What was done in this case was done undoubtedly with the cordial consent and concurrence of the country most to be affected by the step. Beyond all question the policy of the Government in releasing these prisoners from detention was sustained by the great body of the Irish people. Anybody who read the Irish newspapers at the time must know that the step was not condemned by any important section of the Irish people; and that circumstance, which is perfectly and absolutely true, goes far to sustain the view of those who express approval of the conduct of the Government. Taking a low and merely utilitarian view of the matter, what was done was really a relief to Ireland. A nucleus of agitating disturbance had grown up in connection with the amnesty movement, and this was injurious in many ways. No doubt it may be said that what was done was, to some extent, a yielding to pressure; but, taking this step in connection with other matters, we believe that the yielding in this particular has resulted in very great advantage to the maintenance of the public peace. It is easy to say that one ought not to yield under any circumstances to combination or agitation; but when by doing a certain act you have a fair prospect of advancing the peace and prosperity of the country, the mere existence of agitation ought not to restrain you from doing what you would do under other circumstances. To take higher ground—when two great measures were being launched in Ireland, and you desired that they should become practical working measures, was it an undesirable thing to appeal to the generosity of the people, and to show that you were disposed to trust them? I believe that in the appeal to their generosity conveyed in this act of mercy you did a great deal to advance the peaceful solution of those troublesome questions which have formed so great a check upon the progress of the country. Much serious misconception, I think, exists as to the legislation of the last two years, and it is desirable that discussion upon them in this House should be carried on with an entire absence of party feeling. This is a question which ought to be discussed solely on its own merits; for however much the two great measures I have referred to were debated in their passage through Parliament, they have now become accomplished facts and have passed from the region of political discussion. It now becomes the duty of every man, however much he may have formerly battled about those measures, to say that they constitute part of the law of the land, and to endeavour to derive from them the greatest possible advantage to the general community. That, in my judgment, is true statesmanship and true patriotism. This being so, let us consider for a moment what has been said about the effect of those measures of concession. It has been asserted that the Church Bill has produced no effect on Irish crime; but surely it was never intended to operate in that particular way. Again, the Land Bill was never intended to operate upon those who were engaged in committing these offences—it was intended to draw together the farmers and the higher classes, and in that way to operate indirectly upon the lowest class of the community. In Ireland, as in other countries, public opinion descends from above to below; and if you can by such a measure induce habits of peace, order, and respect for law in the middle class you will eventually reduce to order and prosperity that low and debased class of wretches who are now perpetrating outrages in the county of Westmeath. I believe Ireland is in a better condition now than at almost any time within living memory. If you take the judicial statistics, and the charges of the Judges generally at the present Assizes, you will find—although there may be exceptions here and there—the mass of the counties in Ireland are in a healthy and prosperous condition. It was said by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) that Ribandism is not a local conspiracy; but I must beg to correct him on that point. There was an inquiry instituted in 1852 as to the state of the counties of Armagh, Louth, and Monaghan. These three counties were at that time exclusively the seat of Ribandism in Ireland. But there is no longer any trace of Ribandism there. It passed from county to county, and I believe that at this moment its head-quarters are in Westmeath, and portions of the neighbouring counties. Therefore, though I admit outrages have occurred in certain districts, I deny that there is any such thing as general outrage in Ireland. I will now revert for a moment to the great measures recently passed. First of all I may say that the Church Bill has been an infinitely more successful measure than could have been reasonably anticipated at the time it passed. It was natural to suppose that a sword would have been brought into the country and not peace; but I believe the measure has been accepted by all parties in a spirit of calmness, temperance, dignity, and moderation, and that it will tend to break down the barriers which have too long divided Irishmen. Then the Land Bill, which only came practically into operation in August last, is working fairly and well; and I believe there will be none of the difficulties which were anticipated while the measure was passing through Parliament. We must not, then, despair of Ireland. The country is in a transition state, and whatever may be the issue of the experiment, it is, at all events, worth trying. We are only beginning to make that experiment, and I would appeal to my noble Friend (Earl Grey) not to interrupt the progress which has already commenced. When the people of Ireland are saying that they believe what you have done for them will be of advantage to them, do not let us here or “elsewhere” tell them that it will be of none. I think it is a great duty of legislators, and of those who hold high positions in society, to encourage the peaceful revolution which is being wrought in Ireland. If it be allowed to proceed—if the people be taught by self-interest to respect the law—you will find them a loyal and a law-respecting people. In modern times loyalty is founded not merely upon sentiment, but upon substance. What makes people loyal is that they will derive advantage and protection from the Government and the institutions under which they live. As sure as you make them believe that they derive these advantages under the existing system, so surely will they cling to that system, and so surely will law prevail and peace exist in Ireland. If that be only done—if the experiment which has been made be allowed to proceed—you may hope to see falsified that prophecy which was recorded by Edmund Spenser long ago—that it seemed as if Ireland had been left by the Almighty to be a secret scourge to this country; you may hope to see the people of Ireland, contented by justice, and by fair and equitable laws, adding greater security to the Throne, and more and more manifesting a disposition to be comprehended in a consolidated British Empire.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I yield to no one in admiring the eloquent speech to which we have just listened ; but the noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan), while he began by saying that it was too early to look for beneficial results from recent legislation, closed by attributing to that legislation the condition of Ireland, and by expressing the hope that the experiment just begun would be allowed to proceed. That remark was unnecessary, because no one on this side has manifested any desire to interfere with that experiment, as he calls the passing of the two measures affecting the Church and land. But while the noble and learned Lord anticipated the greatest benefits from the Church Bill and the Land Bill, I, for my part, consider the former a most wanton destruction of the Irish branch of our Church, and the latter, one of the most revolutionary measures ever passed by this or any other Parliament. I listened in vain to the speeches made on the part of the Government for the special reasons which induced them to liberate the Fenian prisoners, and it was not until the Lord Chancellor for Ireland spoke that I learned that their release was a relief to the country, inasmuch as it terminated the agitation which had been got up for their release, and that in yielding to that agitation the Government found themselves extricated from a difficult position. But was it wise to yield, in opposition to the belief entertained that too much concession should not be made to agitation in Ireland? Agitation has taken a very wide range for many years, and I had hoped that we should not have heard agitation adduced on the part of the Government as a reason for releasing Fenian prisoners. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack told us that, as regarded Fenianism, there was absolute tranquillity in Ireland, and that the Government measures which have been passed during the last two years had pacified the country; but other authorities tell us it is too soon to look for the fruits of those measures. To my astonishment the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack credited the Peace Preservation Act of last Session with some share in the extinction of Fenianism; but in introducing the measure in the other House Mr. Chichester Fortescue stated that it was designed to put an end to agrarian outrages in Meath, Westmeath, and Mayo; and the measure was passed through both Houses as one directed against agrarian outrages and not against Fenianism. Attempts have been made to distinguish between what are called political offenders and ordinary criminals. I confess I cannot draw the distinction in these cases. There is a distinction, no doubt; but unfortunately within the last few years there has been a very slight demarcation between political crime and ordinary crime. I am justified in making this remark, when I reflect that the political offenders have not stopped at any crime in order to gain their ends—they have not been deterred from perpetrating some of the most heinous and outrageous crimes. What description of crime do you call shooting the policeman at Manchester? Was that a political or an ordinary crime? No doubt it was murder, but it was in connection with the Fenian conspiracy. What was the crime of attempting to blow up Clerkenwell Prison, and involving in death, or injury, hundreds of persons who had no connection with Fenianism? Was that political or ordinary crime? What was the attempt to seize the arms stored in Chester Castle? What is the shooting of policemen in their barracks? Political and ordinary crime seem to be so mixed up that you cannot distinguish the one from the other. But I will go further and will ask what would have been the condition of Ireland and of this country if the Fenian movement had been successful? Would there not have been bloodshed all over Ireland? Was not its avowed object civil war against law, order, and government? If so, I cannot draw the distinction between political and ordinary crime that has been suggested. I cannot recognize the distinction in the type of one crime from that of another which has been alleged. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack holds that there is tranquillity in Ireland due to the absence of Fenianism; but the First Lord of the Treasury still thinks it may be dangerous. The noble and learned Lord who has just spoken referred to what was said by Mr. Gladstone last Session. I conclude that he referred to an answer given to the late Mr. Moore to the question whether he would grant a general amnesty. The answer has been already quoted to-night, but I will read it again to correct the misapprehension as to what Mr. Gladstone really did say. He said he could not hold out any encouragement to the expectation of the release of the Fenian prisoners until they were able to see a state of things in Ireland when Her Majesty's peaceful and well-conducted subjects might enjoy that degree of comfort and safety which is the best test and criterion of a civilized Christian country. Is that the state of Ireland now? Is that the condition of the "black spot," as the noble and learned Lord described it? Is that the state of Limerick, of Clare, of Tipperary, of Donegal, of Mayo? I apprehend not. Can the description of the right hon. Gentleman apply to a country in which crimes, such as the noble and learned Lord has referred to, can be committed with impunity? The crimes are bad enough, but the inability of the Government to procure any punishment for them is certainly no criterion of a civilized and Christian country. The noble Lord who spoke second (Lord Dufferin) took credit to the Government for calling out the Irish Militia; he stated, with some triumph, that the state of the country was such that the Government were justified in calling out the Militia, which had not been done for some time. Judging from what I have read in the newspapers I could not help feeling some surprise. I observe in the newspapers that in the county of Donegal, when a noble Lord holding a commission in the Militia was doing what he could to assist the recruiting for one of the regiments, which had not been so successful as he wished, he received a letter threatening that he should be shot if he continued his efforts. I do not think that an example of the benefit of calling out the Militia in Ireland. The fact is, the Government have played fast and loose with Ireland. Their system has been one of alternate indulgence and punishment. They first indulged the country with a Church Disestablishment Bill, and then came down to Parliament with the Peace Preservation Bill, which the late Chief Secretary for Ireland described as one of the most severe enactments that has been passed within the memory of man. The Land Bill followed—a measure, as I think, very revolutionary in its character; and having alternately passed these measures of concession and coercion, they now come down to the other House and ask for a Secret Committee of Inquiry into the state of part of Ireland, to know how they may govern it. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack tells us that parts of that proposition have been departed from; but why they have been departed from Her Majesty's Government can alone tell. If Ireland is in the condition described by the Prime Minister, who tells us it is "deplorable"—in the condition described by the Chief Secretary, who tells us it is "intolerable," the Government are bound to come forward with measures of their own, and not fall back on a Committee of the other House. The Government, on this occasion, have endeavoured to answer the speech of the noble Earl on the cross Bench (Earl Grey) with regard to the reasons for releasing the Fenian prisoners; but they have given no answer whatever to the question put by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns). I wish Government had followed on this occasion of dealing with the "black spot" of Westmeath and the other counties, the doctrine laid down by the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) during last Session of Parliament, who, with reference to the Peace Preservation Bill, in the course of a very eloquent speech, used these words—

"I think the House will admit that there is no duty more specially the province of the responsible Government of the Queen to determine than at what particular period it may be necessary to ask Parliament to pass measures of extraordinary coercion and repression."—[3 Hansard, cc. 817.]

My Lords, I entirely agree with the noble Earl in that. It is the duty of the Government to come forward and ask the House to pass those measures of coercion and repression that may be necessary to meet the present state of things. But I venture to say that the mode in which they have governed Ireland has not been successful. They have released these Fenian prisoners, and have sent them to a country where they can do us more harm than anywhere else. In assuming office the present Government also assumed that they were the only body of Gentlemen capable of dealing with the subject of Ireland. But is their policy one which is likely to succeed with a clever, keen, sharp-witted people like the Irish—they are not so easily deluded. They are taught that they have only to clamour loud enough and long enough to obtain what they desire; and that if, in the pursuit of their object, they should unfortunately wander out of the paths of ordinary crime, and roam into the regions of treason, they will still

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I wish, my Lords, to say a very few words on this occasion. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) has quoted some words of mine—and no doubt he quoted them accurately—with respect to the duty of the Government specially to determine at what period measures of coercion should be introduced into Parliament. Now I entirely adhere to that doctrine, and I believe the Government undertakes entirely the responsibility of determining when such measures should be brought forward; but at the same time they think they have a right to introduce them if they think proper after an inquiry by the other House. That, I apprehend, is not inconsistent with the doctrine I laid down in the extract quoted by the noble Duke. The noble Duke spoke as if the whole of Ireland was in a disturbed state; but I need hardly remind your Lordships that that statement is entirely unsupported by the facts; for the testimony that has been brought forward shows that, with the exception of one county, and two small portions of the adjoining counties, the country is decidedly improved. No doubt agrarian crimes have been committed; but it is not a fair inference to draw from occasional crimes of that kind that the general condition of the country is not improved. Whatever opinion your Lordships may entertain in regard to recent legislation for Ireland, all must admit that it is all important that those measures should have a fair trial; and never was it more important than it is now that you should be able to suppress those peculiar crimes which interfere with the well-working of such a measure as the Land Bill. Nor can anyone deny that such a state of things as now unhappily exists in Westmeath—even although I believe it is not so bad as it has been at some periods of Irish history—is peculiarly dangerous, because it interferes with that on which the future well-being of the country so much depends. What is the situation of Westmeath? It is placed in the very centre of Ireland; and I confess my own fear is that just as a small sore may extend by mortification until it involves the whole body, so the gangrene now prevalent in the county of Westmeath may, if not effectively dealt with, gradually spread into the other parts of the country. I know it may be said—"Then why does the Government not come down to Parliament at once and propose to apply a sufficient remedy to the evil?" Well, last Session we proposed a very severe Act, which was passed; and I am told it has failed in its effect in Westmeath, where the state of intimidation is most complete. It therefore, I think, becomes especially requisite that we should be able to bring forward all the facts, and examine all the evidence on the subject, in order that Parliament, if it should be called upon to adopt such measures as may be necessary, and such measures as, perhaps, were never adopted before, should understand fully the state of things with which it has to deal. I think that a great confusion of ideas exists when it is commonly said, as it is in this case, that the Government are called upon to deal with this Riband conspiracy, as they have been called upon to deal with other conspiracies before, by bringing in some such measure as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act to put it down. Now, in the case of political conspiracies, to which the remedy of a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act has been applied, the Government, being aware that the conspiracy exists, and knowing that it may break out at any moment into rebellion, comes down and asks Parliament immediately to pass a measure to prevent the conspiracy so breaking out into rebellion. But the present is not such a case at all. I regret to say that the malady that now afflicts Westmeath is a chronic one, which has existed for a long course of years. This, therefore, is not a sudden emergency, calling upon us not to allow four-and-twenty hours to pass before we come down to ask for exceptional powers from Parliament; but the evil is one of long standing, and the measures requisite for dealing with it may be such as would have to be continued in force for a considerable length of time.

LORD STRATHNAIRN was understood to say that the very first proclamation issued by the Fenians, on the occasion of their rising, declared it to be necessary for the good of Ireland that the Duke of Leinster and the Marquess of Ormonde should be sacrificed and their property confiscated. The noble Lord also related one or two instances which had come under his own observation, while in Ireland, to illustrate the cruelty and the intimidation practised by the Fenians.

IRELAND—MR. DALY AND THE COMMISSION OF THE PEACE FOR DROGHEDA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX, before putting his Question, said, that certain words had been struck out of his Question since he gave Notice of it. He was not sorry for that, as he had been informed by a Friend that the retention of the words would have given offence to his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, which was the last thing he desired to do. His Question was to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has thought it desirable to make any further inquiry into the appointment of Mr. Robert Bedford Daly, publican, holding a retail licence for the sale of beer and spirits, to the Commission of the Peace for the borough of Drogheda; whether it is true that up to the 1st of this month no application has been made to the Clerk of the Peace for that borough for the transfer of his licence by the said Robert Bedford Daly to any person; whether it is not necessary under the Acts of Parliament thereunto referring, that a publican's licence should be transferred before the Magistrates at Petit Sessions; and, if so, at what Sessions and before whom did the transfer take place; whether, if the alleged transfer did take place, the person to whom it was granted was Robert Bedford Daly, who by the parish registry appears to have arrived at the age of twenty-one years on the 19th December 1870; and, if so, if this individual is a near relative of the new Justice of the Peace; whether he is aware that the President of the Board of Trade was misinformed in regard to Mr. Robert Bedford Daly, viz. That Mr. Daly is not a publican and retail dealer in spirits and beer, that the Lord Lieutenant of the county recommended him for the Commission of the Peace three years ago, that the "Irish Times" newspaper withdrew the paragraph in reference to the appointment, and that they inserted a highly complimentary article; whether this Mr. Robert Bedford Daly is the same person who, at the Spring Assizes in 1866, had an action brought against him by one Thornton for work and labour performed, and money paid for hiring mobs at Mr. Whitworth's Election, and who lodged £15 in Court; and, whether, under all the circumstances, he is prepared to sustain the appointment of Mr. Robert Bedford Daly as a magistrate for the borough of Drogheda?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had made further inquiries in reference to the appointment of Mr. Daly since the hon. and gallant Gentleman gave Notice of his Question, and he found that in all essential particulars his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade was correctly informed when, in answer to a similar Question a fortnight ago, he said Mr. Daly was not a publican in the ordinary sense of the word. Mr. Daly had a large business as an auctioneer, and was also a member of a grocery firm carrying on an extensive business, in which was included a wholesale and retail wine and spirit trade, but this was managed entirely by Mr. Daly's partner. Mr. Daly was under some misapprehension in regard to the transfer of the licence. He took what he supposed to be the requisite steps, with a view to procuring the transfer; but it turned out that all the necessary formalities had not been executed, and the transfer had not been completed. The President of the Board of Trade was not misinformed when he said that the Lord Lieutenant of the county recommended Mr. Daly for the commission of the peace three years ago, and it was true that The Irish Times published a complimentary article in reference to the appointment. It was true that an action was brought against Mr. Daly by a person named Thornton; but the jury found no verdict. With regard to the Question as to whether he was prepared to sustain the appointment, he had only to repeat that, as the result of inquiries he had made, he agreed with the opinions of his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, that Mr. Daly was a fit person to receive the commission of the peace, and he believed the appointment had been received with very general support and favour by politicians on both sides in the borough.

FORTIFYING WINES IN BOND. QUESTION.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether 10 per cent of proof spirit is allowed to be mixed with wines in bond for the purpose of "fortifying;" whether the Board of Customs can allow and have allowed a greater proportion than 10 per cent of spirit to be mixed with wines; and, whether also it be true that during the years 1868, 1869, and 1870, numerous cases have occurred of persons receiving permission from the Board to mix with sherry and other wines in bond 15 per cent of spirit, amounting in quantity to 17 gallons of spirit to each butt of wine?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The duty of the Customs as to the fortifying of wines in bond is regulated by the State. It is necessary to distinguish between wines in bond intended to be imported into this country and wines meant for exportation. In the case of the former the Customs may, under the Act, permit them to be fortified to the extent of 10 degrees of proof, provided that the whole strength of the wine does not exceed 40 degrees. In regard to the latter, the Customs are allowed by the Act to go beyond the 10 degrees, if it shall appear to them to be necessary in order to prevent the wines fermenting on the voyage. Under these powers, wines meant to be exported are frequently allowed to be fortified three or four—or in some cases perhaps as much as five—degrees additionally. No limit is placed on the discretion of the Customs in the matter; but all that they do is in strict accordance with the powers conferred on them.

SIR JAMES LAWRENCE: I beg to give Notice that I will ask, Whether the Board of Customs also have equal powers over the trade to authorize the introduction of substances other than spirits, and whether special sanction cannot be obtained for adding ether and other chemical preparations to wines in bond, provided that the owners satisfied the Board of the necessity of such preparations to refine the wine?

COURTS OF JUSTICE AND APPEAL. QUESTION.

MR. HEADLAM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Bills on the Courts of Justice and Appeal, mentioned in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech at the commencement of the Session, will be introduced; and, whether, if it be intended to introduce them into the other House of Parliament, they will be pressed forward without delay so as to give this House full time for the consideration of them?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that the Bills were in a forward state of preparation, and it was the present intention of the Government that they should be introduced by the Attorney General at an early date; but that must depend upon the state of Public Business. He would promise, however, that if the Bills were introduced in the House of Lords, such progress should be made as would afford the House of Commons ample time to consider them.

IRELAND—EXTENSION OF THE POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the Postmaster General, When we may expect to have the post office telegraph system extended to the different country post offices in Ireland; and whether it is intended that the town of Borris, in the county of Carlow, which is a money order office and a railway station, should have the benefit of that system?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that in the course of about three months from 80 to 90 additional post-offices would be opened in Ireland, and that by the end of the year all the county towns and the larger villages would have telegraphic communication. As to the second Question, with regard to Borris, he was happy to inform the hon. Gentleman that telegraphic extension had been made to that town; but, at the present moment, the office of postmaster was vacant, the postmaster having been dismissed, and until the appointment of a postmaster the telegraph wires, of course, could not be put into use.

CLERKS OF CONVICT PRISONS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL GILPIN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Upon what grounds the Treasury refused the payment of money voted by the House of Commons to the Clerks of Convict Prisons?

MR. BAXTER said, that the sum had been inserted in the Estimates without the sanction of the Treasury, and refusal of payment had been made because the Treasury was not satisfied with all the particulars of the account.

THE BALLOT.—QUESTION.

MR. PIM asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the provision of the Elections (Parliamentary and Municipal) Bill, for taking the votes of the Electors by ballot, are intended to be applied to the election of Commissioners for Towns under the Local Government Act, and the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, or under private local Acts; and, if not, whether he will consider the propriety of extending the scope of his Bill so as to include all elections for Town Commissioners as well as Town Councillors?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I think it will be scarcely possible to extend the scope of the Bill so as to include any elections except the Parliamentary and municipal ones. But I have little doubt that if the principle of the Ballot is—as I hope it will be—adopted in those elections, it will ultimately be extended to others.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION— CLASSIFICATION OF PUBLIC OFFICES. QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to the Order in Council of the 4th June last, and the recent announcement of the Civil Service Commissioners detailing the names of persons who had passed the preliminary examination to enable them to compete for appointments in the First and Second Class Public Offices, whether the Public Offices have yet been classified; and, if so, which offices it is proposed to include in the First and Second Class respectively: what steps have been taken towards carrying into effect the intention expressed in his speech of the 25th February 1870, of and, whether there will be any objection to laying upon the Table of the House any Correspondence which has passed between the Treasury, the Civil Service Commissioners, and the various public Departments on these subjects?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Baronet would allow him to answer, as these details fell rather under his eye than that of his right hon. Friend. The hon. Baronet had been led into an error with regard to the public offices. What the Civil Service Commissioners had done had been to recommend that the preliminary examinations should be divided into a first and a second class. Accordingly, the examinations were divided, one being a higher examination than the other. But there had been no intention to divide the public offices into a first and a second class, and, of course, he could give the hon. Baronet no information as to their division. As to carrying into effect the intention which had been expressed of re-organizing the Departments of the Public Service great progress had been made in that work, which was one of much time and much labour. The re-organization of a great many of the present Departments was completed; but the work was not yet finished, and when it was he should be very happy, in the most convenient form he could devise, to lay the result before the House, and he ventured to think it would be satisfactory to them. He could not produce the Correspondence between the Treasury and the different Departments, because it was entirely of a confidential nature.

THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in conformity with the Notice which I gave on Tuesday, I wish to put a Question to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea, as to his intention with respect to the Motion which stands in his name for to-morrow relating to the Conference now sitting in London, or, rather, relating to the conduct of the Government in having agreed to the appointment of that Conference. I think it is right I should repeat what I then stated—that we have reason to anticipate a speedy conclusion of the labours of the Conference, and, what is more directly to the purpose—but it is entirely for my hon. Friend to judge what course he may think most consistent with his public duty, that we ought to inform the House beforehand that it will be impossible for us to state our views completely, and lay the matter in a satisfactory manner before the House during the time when the Conference is sitting, and its labours are unfinished. I have also to inform my hon. Friend and other Members of the House that they will have some difficulty in obtaining a day for the discussion of Motions; but, of course, if my hon. Friend tells us that he considers it his duty to propose a Vote of Censure on our conduct, so far as depends on us a day shall be found for bringing forward his Motion.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Of course, in a matter of this importance, I am entirely in the hands of the House. The Question of the right hon. Gentleman is not strictly accurate. He states that my Motion relates to the Conference now sitting in London. My Motion relates to the conduct of the Government in having accepted that Conference. While the Conference was still sitting there were two discussions upon it, and the right hon. Gentleman has taken part in those discussions. At the same time, I am entirely in the hands of the House; and if it is thought that the subject will not suffer by being postponed for a short time, of course I do not object to a postponement.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

MR. CORRY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he is aware that the Navy Estimates for the ensuing financial year do not bear the signature of the late First Lord of the Admiralty, but are signed by the Junior Lords only, who, under the Order in Council of 14th January 1869, do not form part of the responsible Government of the Navy, but are executive subordinates under the First Lord; and whether, as the Estimates have not been presented on the authority of a responsible Minister, he will undertake to give them a careful revision, and to satisfy himself that they have been prepared with due regard to the national interests, before proposing them to Parliament?

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is somewhat premature in addressing me as First Lord of the Admiralty, as I have not yet formally received that appointment. However, I am prepared to answer his Question. If the Navy Estimates, which have been laid on the Table, do not bear the signature of the late First Lord of the Admiralty, he was responsible, to a great degree, for the policy embodied in those Estimates; and not only that, but he submitted that policy to his Colleagues in the Cabinet, and the Government are responsible for that policy. As regards the details of the Estimates, the right hon. Gentleman may rest assured that I shall propose nothing to the House without being satisfied myself that it has been prepared, as he expressed it, with a due regard to the national interests.

IRELAND—WESTMEATH, &c. UNLAWFUL COMBINATIONS COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Select Committee to inquire into the state of Westmeath, and certain parts adjoining of Meath and King's County, and the nature, extent, and effect of a certain unlawful combination and conspiracy existing therein, will be authorized to inquire into the causes thereof?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON I beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that the Order in reference to this Committee has been decided by the House, after full discussion, and I do not think it would be proper on my part to give any further interpretation of it. I will only say that it is not the intention of the Government to propose any alteration in it.

DEFENCES OF CANADA.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in completion of our engagements to Canada, the works at Quebec are being armed and the north works in progress; whether Canada, on her part, is fortifying Montreal, for which her Parliament voted a loan Imperially guaranteed; what progress has been made with the Canadian Militia; and, how soon the Intercolonial Railway may be expected to open their communication between Halifax and Quebec?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that the Estimates for the present year would contain an item of £9,000 for the completion of the fortifications of Quebec. The guarantee for the loan passed the House in August last, and he had not received any information of any steps that had been taken by Canada, as to entering upon the fortifications of Montreal. The condition of the Militia was very satisfactory. In March of last year the number of active Militia was something over 43,500, which, by this time, had risen to about 45,000; and if any emergency should arise—which he was far from anticipating—to call for their services, the Commander-in-Chief would only have to give the order, and in a few hours upwards of 40,000 thoroughly efficient men would be able to take the field, and they would be hourly augmented by a large number of Reserve Militia. There were six or seven training colleges for the Militia, which were in an excellent condition. With regard to the last Question, he was able to state that the works—extending over about 400 miles—were in a most satisfactory state of progress. More than half the line would be completed before the end of the year, and they had every reason to hope the whole would be finished before the end of 1872, or within a period of only four years from the commencement of the undertaking.

EDUCATION—THE NEW CODE—MUSIC.
QUESTIONS.

MR. REED asked the Vice President of the Council, Why it is proposed in the New Code to omit Music from the extra subjects included in the Fourth Schedule?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied that he had to state that after careful consideration the Education Department had decided that the best mode of encouraging music in elementary schools was not to include it in the extra subjects. Music was taught to a considerable extent in elementary schools, and the New Code might be said to encourage it, because it increased from 4s. to 6s. the sum given for average attendance for instruction in secular subjects, including music. Hitherto it had been permitted to the schoolmaster to send up pupils for instruction in music as a special subject; but that power had only been made use of to a very slight extent. In only 43 schools last year was music sent up as an extra subject, and in only 37 even children passed, and the whole sum paid was £77, scarcely any of which was earned by special examination of individual scholars. It had been found desirable to make the premium for special subjects depend upon the special examination of the scholars; and on that ground it had been resolved to exclude from the special subjects for this year drawing and music. Drawing was excluded because it was better attended to by the Department of Science and Art, which had a large number of elementary drawing schools; and with regard to music, the difficulty was that the education not merely of those who attended elementary schools, but of the upper and middle classes, had been neglected, and it was difficult to find gentlemen competent to examine in the notation of music. Therefore, though the Education Department were most anxious to promote the study of music, they could not make it a condition of the appointment of an Inspector, so many other qualifications being required. He would consider whether any other mode of promoting the study of music could be introduced into the Code next year; but at present he thought the object would be better attained by encouraging singing classes throughout the schools than by including music among the special subjects.

MR. DIXON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Government will arrange for a Morning Sitting for the consideration of the Motions for alterations in the New Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of Privy Council on Education, on the ground that the power of Parliament to modify the said code will expire on the 17th of March?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that though the Code would not come into legal operation till it had been a month on the Table of the House, it would afterwards be in the power of Parliament to modify it through an Address to the Crown. There was every reason to hope that the hon. Member would have an opportunity to-morrow night of bringing forward the points with reference to which he had given Notices.

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to bring in any measure with reference to the purchase of Irish Railways this Session?

MR. GLADSTONE replied that Her Majesty's Government had not prepared any measure for the purchase of Irish railways, nor was he sanguine that it would be in their power to make a proposal in any form on the subject this Session.

WESTERN COAST OF AFRICA—SIERRA LEONE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, in consequence of the Governor Generalship of the whole of the Western Coast of Africa having been conferred upon the Governor of Sierra Leone, the latter Colony has not been taxed to the amount of £2,000 per annum for the maintenance of a yacht for his Excellency's use?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was under a complete misapprehension as to the Colony of Sierra Leone having been taxed to the amount of £2,000 a-year for the maintenance of a yacht for the Governor's use. The fact was that the Committee which sat on the subject of the African Settlements in 1865 recommended, among other things, that those several Colonies should be brought under one head — Governor at Sierra Leone. That recommendation was adopted, and was part of an economical arrangement which enabled the Government to withdraw troops from those settlements, and save expense in other ways. But inasmuch as the expense of the local governments was thus increased, it was thought right, in carrying out that arrangement, that steam communication not at the expense of the Colonies, but of the Imperial Exchequer, should be provided, and a charge of £5,000 for that purpose had appeared on the Estimates ever since.

ARMY REGULATION BILL—REPAYMENT OF REGULATION PRICE.

QUESTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, In what way he has taken powers, in the Army Regulation Bill, with reference to the repayment of the customary price of an Officer's Commission, who is either dangerously ill or who has died, as intimated by the honourable and gallant Member for Truro to the honourable Member for Bedford on Monday evening?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, he had taken no powers in the Army Regulation Bill to give any sum of money out of the public funds which would not have been received by officers under the circumstances if the Bill should not pass into law. What his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Vivian) meant to say the other evening was, that a provision in the Bill which imposed a limit on the number of sales, operating in connection with the regulation with regard to those who died or were sick, might possibly inflict upon officers inconvenience and loss to which, under present circumstances, they were not subject, and that the limitation would, with the sanction of the Treasury, be open to consideration. For his own part, he wished to say that the limit would be open to consideration in Committee. It certainly was not intended by him to inflict any inconvenience or loss upon any officer to which he would not be subjected if the Bill did not pass.

RINDERPEST IN FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, considering the prevalence of the rinderpest in France, he is prepared to take any extraordinary steps to prevent its introduction into this Country?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the matter had received the constant and anxious attention of the Privy Council, because we certainly had been in very considerable danger from the introduction of the cattle plague. France and Prussia, in which, from good administration, the cattle plague had before scarcely existed, had, in consequence of the fearful war, become exposed to its ravages. Up to a year or two ago Prussia, by its excellent administration, had kept out the cattle plague almost entirely; France had done so altogether; and, consequently, France was not included among the countries from which animals coming would have to be killed. Germany was included not on account of danger from Germany itself, but because it was the country from which the Steppe cattle might possibly arrive in England. But upon the cattle plague breaking out, and evidently following in the track of the German Army in the autumn, the Privy Council found it necessary to issue three Orders one after the other. The first was on the 9th of September, which put France among the scheduled countries, the cattle from which were liable to be killed at the port of landing. The second was issued on the 20th of September, which extended the provisions with regard to cattle, to sheep and goats, from both Germany and France, because it was possible, and even probable, that the infection might be conveyed by these animals. At the same time, a very strong restriction was put on—which was done with the greatest possible reluctance by the Government, because it might have considerably interfered with the food supplies of London—that cattle landing in London should be killed at the place of landing, and not be taken to Islington Market. On the 28th of November the same Order was applied to animals from Belgium, which appeared to suffer from proximity to France and Germany. The House would understand that the Government felt a great difficulty in the matter. On the one hand, it was necessary to take every step to prevent the introduction of the plague; on the other, it was a very serious matter to interfere with any trade, especially the trade of food for the people. But the accounts the Department had received, both from public sources and also from private inquiry, made them come to the conclusion that they should now take the strong step of prohibiting altogether for the present the importation of cattle from France, and also, he was sorry to say, from Belgium. However, there would be no real interference with the trade, because there had been scarcely any importation of cattle from France, and not much from Belgium of late. The French Government, within the last few days, had repealed their prohibition to export, which was another reason why it was thought necessary on our part to prohibit the import.

INDIA—NORTH-WEST FRONTIER MEDALS.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the North West Frontier Medals of the 81st Regiment are likely to be given, and what has caused the long delay in their distribution?

MR. GRANT DUFF: The medals about which my hon. Friend asks were sent to the War Office for distribution to the 81st Foot on the 7th of March. The delay has arisen partly at the Mint, partly with the contractor who mounts the medals.

ARMY—BREECH-LOADERS. QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked, When the Returns which he had moved for on the 10th February with respect to the number of Regiments armed with breech-loaders will be ready?

SIR HENRY STORKS said, the Returns were ready as far as regarded the troops serving in the United Kingdom and the Colonies; but, as his hon. and gallant Friend intimated that he wished to have the Return extended to India, it was necessary to send to that country for information. He had been informed by the Under Secretary that a letter was written on the 23rd of February to the Government of India requesting the information to be sent home with the least possible delay.

HIGHWAY BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. G. BENTINCK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, and to proceed with, during the present Session any Bill relating to Highways?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had already stated that it was his intention to bring in a measure making compulsory the provisions of the Highway Act.

ARMY REGULATION BILL—[BILL 39.]

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [6th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the expenditure necessary for the national defences and the other demands on the Exchequer do not at present justify any Vote of Public Money for the extinction of Purchase in the Army,"—(Colonel Loyd Lindsay,)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD ELCHO: The narrow issue to which, as I think, unfortunately, this question has been confined on the matter raised by my hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), to whose liberality and exertions during the late war suffering humanity owes so much, has placed it, in my opinion, on too limited a basis. The consequence has been that this debate has run almost entirely upon the question of Army purchase. Now, though the abolition of the system of purchase may form a very large part of the Government measure, I venture to say that it is but a very small part of a very great subject. The question at issue before the country is the passing of a Bill for the purpose of placing its military resources on a proper footing, and it is therefore a question affecting the honour, power, influence, nay, even the very safety of England; and I venture to think that in comparison with this question not only does purchase sink into insignificance, but the questions which engaged us for two Sessions of Parliament, momentous though they were—I mean the measures dealing with the Irish Church and the tenure of land in Ireland—are also questions that sink into comparative insignificance. The House will therefore, I trust, bear with me while I endeavour to place this question—which my hon. and gallant Friend behind me, though representing a broad-gauge county, has shunted, I cannot help thinking unwisely, on to a narrow gauge—upon its true basis. I cannot say that I was either pleased or disappointed at the speech made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War in introducing his proposals to the House. It could not have pleased me, notwithstanding the ability and clearness of his statement, to hear him shadowing forth measures which I believed to be totally inadequate to the occasion. I was not disappointed, because, knowing the turn of my right hon. Friend's mind, and being aware of what was thought by that gentleman who is acquainted with everything—I mean "the man in the street"—as to the course which the Government would take in this matter, I was in that state of beatitude which is the condition of those who expect nothing; therefore the measure shadowed forth, so far as I was concerned, was no disappointment to me. It seems to me, having read the comments which have been passed on this scheme by the public prints—comments which, in the case of the leading journal, went to the extent of saying that the speech of my right hon. Friend was received with enthusiasm, desirable to ascertain, if possible, what are the grounds for that enthusiasm: I have read that speech line for line; I have searched the provisions of this Bill diligently, and I must confess I can find in neither sufficient cause for any such feeling. In order to ascertain the value of this measure we must, I think, first of all establish an adequate gauge. My right hon. Friend has given us his gauge. He stated that the measure was intended to lay deep the foundation of a system—and I beg the House to mark this—"which would render danger, or the apprehension of danger, altogether unknown in the future." Now, that is a magniloquent, but a somewhat vague mode of expression; and the worst of it is that you cannot apply my right hon. Friend's gauge to his Bill until the danger has actually arisen; in short, until it is too late. "Too late!"—those unhappy monosyllables which were written up over the doors of the War and Commissariat Departments during the Crimean War, and which have been written on almost every page of our military history. I, for one, reject this gauge, and seek for some other. What, then, should be the proper gauge of a measure for the organization of the military forces of the Crown?—for that is what the question comes to after all. In answer to that question, I contend that you must establish, in the first place, a proper standard for your Army; you must severally see what your present armaments are; and, in the third place, find out what are your chief wants. As to a proper standard for our Army, I would, in dealing with that point, though I may refer to our foreign policy, not say a single word which might alarm any hon. Member, especially the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). I am not going to open up the question of the Conference, or of British interference, but this question of what should be our foreign policy lies at the root of the whole subject of Army organization, and it may, I think, be discussed and dismissed in a very few sentences. The events which have occurred in Europe during the last six months have brought to the front the views entertained by different sections in this country as to what should be the character of the foreign policy which we should adopt. We have, on the one hand, the advocates of non-intervention, and first comes the Peace Society, of whom I see a distinguished representative sitting on the Benches opposite. Now, do not imagine that I am going to speak sneeringly of the members of that society. On the contrary, I have the greatest respect for those gentlemen, because they are men who have opinions, and who are not ashamed to own those opinions, at the risk of being laughed at by their fellow-countrymen when they advocate disarmament, which they are always prepared to do even in time of war. But the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), favourable though he is to peace, has told us that he is not prepared to secure it at any price, and that he is ready to pay for it the price of war. This party, however, cannot, I think, be said to represent anything like the majority of the people of this country. We have also among us men who are at one time for non-intervention, and who petition the Government against intervention, but who, at another, are found assembled in fantastic garb round the base of Nelson's Column dancing a moral war dance and whooping like Red Indians in their desire to urge on the Government to engage in hostilities. I am glad the Prime Minister has had the courage to bar the door against his allies in Trafalgar Square and Hyde Park. Again, we have a more literate and philosophic class of Englishmen, who are fond of giving utterance to sentiments no less bloodthirsty in the pages of some popular reviews. Now, I do not believe that any of those parties represents the deep-seated feeling of the people of this country. But there is another class of men for whom much is to be said. The views of this class are most ably put forward in a pamphlet called Happy England, which I recommend hon. Members carefully to read. The author is Sir Edward Sullivan, a man who has written admirable articles on social reform, and his view is, that the people of this country ought not to be the sole policeman of Europe; that we should have nothing more to do with treaties; and that we should content ourselves with maintaining such a fleet and such a number of marines as would enable us to protect ourselves and our colonial possessions. That also is a view which, in my opinion, does not represent the real feeling of this House, or of the public out-of-doors. On the other hand, we have interventionists of the purest and bluest blood, who are ready to interfere on every occasion in the affairs of the nations beyond that "silver streak," for which, as I do not happen to look upon it from the serene battlements of Walmer Castle, I venture to suggest "lead" would be a more appropriate epithet. The class of interventionists of whom I am speaking would have us maintain such a military force as would enable us to renew the glories of Agincourt and Cressy; but neither is theirs, in my opinion, the view of the majority of the people of this country. I now come to what I believe to be the real feeling of the majority of Englishmen on this subject. It is this—They hate war as much as the Peace Society; they remember what the wise man has said, that "he that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." They at the same think that the safety and honour of England may sometimes oblige us to interfere, and that we might be bound by the faith of treaties to take part in struggles which we would give almost anything to avoid. While hating war, they are men who,

when honour is at stake, may always be appealed to with success, for they feel that, though death may be a fearful thing, a shamed life is hateful. That I am right in this view is shown by what occurred at the close of last Session, when we showed our readiness to interfere for the defence of Belgium, and Parliament was asked to vote a sum of money for the purpose of increasing our military force. Such being our policy, we must place ourselves in the position of keeping our Army in such a state of efficiency that, without waiting for five or six months, we might be enabled effectually to carry out those treaty obligations in which the honour of England is engaged. As to our colonial policy, it may be wise to bring troops home in time of peace; but in the event of war, unless you are prepared to give up your Colonies, you must send troops to defend them. In case of war you must be prepared to increase the garrisons of fortresses like Malta, Gibraltar, and Halifax. It is, therefore, a mistake to say you are strong because you have in this country a certain number of men, when, in the event of the outbreak of a war, you would have to send abroad a considerable number of them for the purposes of your colonial garrisons. Then there is India. I suppose no one wishes to give up India. But you may have to put down a mutiny, or, in case of differences with Russia about the Black Sea question, you may have to defend the frontier of India. Looking, then, to foreign and colonial policy—I say nothing at present about home defence—you must have an Army, small, indeed, but easily and rapidly expanded. Now, such an Army at the present moment we certainly have not got. As regards our home policy, I need not speak of our home defences, because the wish of every Englishman must naturally be that we should be absolutely unassailable at home, and that if we think it right to adopt as our foreign policy, a policy of concession instead of resistance, it should not be supposed that our concession is caused by the weakness of our military armaments. I come now to the second part of my gauge—the state of our Army. I am not going to weary the House by entering into Army statistics. I will ask it to accept certain things as accepted facts. Now, what is the state of our Army? I have jotted down certain facts which I believe to be indisputable. We have an Army organized in regiments only. I do not call your district organization anything as yet. It may become so; it is not so now. You have an Army organized in regiments only; and those, skeleton regiments and cadres. You have no Reserves—that is to say, nothing worthy of the name. You have a Militia Reserve of 20,000 men, to get which you have reduced the standard, and have not insisted on medical examination, so that many of these men, if examined now for re-enlistment in regiments, would be rejected, whereas, by going into the Militia Reserve, they escape medical examination, and can be re-attested without it. You have no certain supply—I mean no absolute supply—of men. The men you get are not of sufficient physique—that is to say, they are too young. I have extracts from the Report of the recruiting officer laid on the Table, which my right hon. Friend has quoted with reference to enlistment and other matters in his own favour, though if I wanted a document which shows the rottenness of our system, especially in the matter of recruiting, I should take this as a textbook. It seems that these boys enlist nominally at 18, but really often at 17, and sometimes—though the Report does not say so—at 16 years of age. The Report says they increase one inch in height, two inches round the chest, and 16 lbs. in weight in the course of one year. On the other hand, a most able pamphlet has been written by Major-General Sir Lintorn Simmons, than whom, from the variety of his knowledge and experience, no higher authority exists, and this officer points out that what with the boys who are unfit for long marches and hard service, and what with the comparatively old soldiers who re-enlist in order to obtain their pensions, you must, for actual, reliable service in the field, make a deduction of from 15 to 20 per cent from our Army, 20 per cent being, as he says, much nearer the mark than 15. Then what is it you may have to meet? Every correspondent, and every private individual who has seen the troops engaged in the war, has been struck by the physique of the German soldiers. Their active, mobilized war Army consists entirely of men from 20 to 27 years of age; and it is against this Army that you might possibly have to send your raw youths of 16 and 18, along with men who, towards the close of their 20 years' service, are only fit for garrison duty. As regards the class of men, you do not get the right quality. Our Army is not during peace trained for war as the Prussian Army is. The Militia, like the Regular Army, exists only in regiments. It is not formed into brigades, with officers attached to learn their duty. They, too, have no certain supply of men; and they, too, have the same class of men I have referred to as being in the Regular Army. Then, again, I can refer to the Report of the recruiting officer, to which I have already alluded. He points out the evil of the competition which now exists between the Militia and the Line for the same class of men—a competition attended with great injury to the service; and, owing to the localization of the force, the Militia recruiting sergeants, on the whole, get better men than those of the Regular Army. The training of the Militia is admittedly insufficient; the force is also, to a certain extent, short of officers. Now, as to the Volunteers. They also exist only in regiments. They are insufficiently trained; their officers, as a whole are also not up to the proper standard; and, above all, the Government have no hold over the force, in consequence of which you cannot compel that degree of training and discipline which is absolutely essential to make it a reliable weapon for the defence of England. This is what is; I do not say what might be. I come now to probably the most important of all the branches of our military forces, and that is the artillery. At the close of last Session my right hon. Friend—I do not blame him, for he went to his present office new to the work, and naturally says on such questions what those in his Office, or the authorities whom he consults, tell him—spoke in this House in the most contented manner about our armaments, and the House went away satisfied. My right hon. Friend was not only satisfied; he spoke proudly and boastfully of the state of our artillery. And what did he say? That we had artillery sufficient for 60,000 men—not a gun more. It was upon this assurance that Parliament separated, with the chance of having to drive the Prussians or the French out of Belgium.

It turned out that, according to our field equipment, we had not artillery for 60,000 men with Reserves on a war establishment, but only had artillery for 40,000 men. I again say that I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman. He spoke as he was told. But it is desirable that the House should know accurately what is the real state of our artillery. The result of further deliberation during the Recess was this—that whereas my right hon. Friend was satisfied with the state of our artillery at the end of August, he doubled it in the course of the Recess between September and February. Here is a statement made out from various sources, upon which the House may rely as absolutely correct. The proportion of artillery in the Prussian service is 2·7 per 1,000 men. In our service, according to the field equipment, with Reserves, the proportion was set down at 3·10, showing, on paper, a larger proportion than that in the Prussian Army; but a Committee which investigated the subject lowered the figures to 3 guns to every 1,000 men, including the artillery themselves. I take this as the standard. My right hon. Friend says we have this year 336 guns and 72 dépôt guns—in all 408 field guns. At 3 guns per 1,000 men this is equal to an Army of 136,000 men. The artillery got 1,456 of the 20,000 men voted in August of last year, with 724 horses, to complete the then existing batteries, so that they were not complete at the time my right hon. Friend comforted the House. A further increase was made on February 1, 1871, of 3,798 men and 2,110 horses, to form six new batteries of horse artillery and 20 new batteries of field artillery. This increase in the artillery has been made not simply by raising men, but by converting to a certain extent garrison batteries into field batteries; so that of 20 new batteries, 8 are wholly formed from garrison batteries, and 2 are wholly officered from garrison batteries; the result being that the garrison batteries are short of officers, consequent on last year's reduction of one subaltern, and the raising now of garrison brigades to 162 men per battery. Let it be remembered that a garrison gunner is a mechanic, who has to raise from the ground the 35-ton gun, place it on the carriage and work it; and, therefore, by converting the garrison artilleryman into a field

artilleryman, you put a skilled workman to do inferior work. These garrison gunners when made field artillerymen will have to discharge stable duties and teach riding and mounted drills, though I believe not one of them has been on horseback. Notwithstanding this absorbing of garrison artillery, an increase of 2,512 men and 5,440 horses is required to place our artillery on a foreign war establishment. We have a foreign war establishment and we have a home war establishment. To complete the home war establishment we require 1,192 men and 3,088 horses. To complete these batteries the Government would have to take the whole dépôt brigade of 2,600 men, and those will have to meet the whole of the Indian drain and the requirements of the Colonies. Of the 72 guns in dépôt or reserve, only 30 are now horsed and manned, and those on the peace establishment. When the House is told of these things it may well shiver at the state of things existing, knowing what the expenditure would be to place matters on a proper footing. However, considering what has recently been going on abroad, it is desirable that these figures should sink deeply into the minds of hon. Members. We require on the standard of 3 guns to 1,000 men for the home forces alone, 135,000 men, 405 guns; for the Army of Reserve of 60,000 men of the first and second class, 180 guns; and 60 guns for the Militia Reserve of 20,000. Therefore, you require 645 guns for the Army alone, and you have now only 405. There is no difficulty in the manufacture of the guns, for they can be turned out at Woolwich at the rate of a battery a week; it is the men and the training of them that are wanted. You should have a sufficient Reserve, and not have to wait for six months to get 18,000 men. My right hon. Friend boasts of his battalions of Reserved forces—the Militia and Volunteers. Now, how many guns would they require? The 120,000 men of the Militia would require 360 guns; the 14,000 Yeomanry would require 42, and the 170,000 Volunteers would require 510 guns, or, altogether, 912 field guns if they were put into the field on the footing you have supposed as proper for meeting an enemy having 3 guns to 1,000 men. I admit that a certain amount of the men would be locked up in dépôts; but to say that you have the requisite number of guns in reserve would not be doing justice to the Army, and would only be throwing dust in the eyes of the country. We ought to take care that, in applying this test to the Bill, we have a Reserve force of artillery. The great secret of success abroad has been this—that, although the proportion is under 3 guns to 1,000 men, considering the mass of artillery in the German Army, they can concentrate it, and bring the fire to bear on certain points; so that the Duke of Mecklenburg had guns in the proportion of 6 to 1,000 men in his Army. Besides all this, we have no general field organization, and we have forts comparatively without guns. My right hon. Friend boasts of a 35-ton gun, and says we shall have the best guns in the world. But we have only got one of them, and I am not sure that that has been proved. My right hon. Friend also said that we have the best field gun in the world; but how many guns of that kind have we got? Only two. As regards the rifle, my right hon. Friend stated that we likewise possessed the best specimen of that arm. I have the satisfaction of saying that the Snider is better, or, at least, as good as the Chassepôt. My right hon. Friend also referred to the Martini-Henry; and I will accept his statement, that it is the best arm in the world. But the pattern of this arm has not been decided upon, and further experiments are being made to make it lighter. But you must recollect that you have got to arm your troops with this weapon. What is supposed to be the proper stand of arms in this country, exclusive of those in the hands of troops? There ought to be 800,000 in store. No doubt the Snider will be the store arm for emergencies, and that other arms will be put into the hands of the troops for service. Whether we regard the big guns or the small arms, the whole matter must be admitted to be in a state of transition; and, unless money is spent on these primary objects, it will be years and years before we get into a satisfactory condition. We have only one arsenal, and our system of supply is very unsatisfactory, and would entirely break down in time of war. My right hon. Friend referred to the expedition into Canada, and quoted the letter of Colonel Wolseley; but that was no test whatever. That expedition to the Red River was nothing like an expedition in the ordinary war sense—it was a mere caravan going out into the desert, carrying all its supplies with it, having no base, and requiring none, and there was no expenditure of ammunition attending it, so that, therefore, it is absolutely worthless as a test. I now come to show what our state is as regards our wants. There are two kinds of wants. There are wants which are secondary, and there are wants which are primary and essential. What I call a secondary want, assuming it to be a want at all, is such a matter as that which occupied the attention of Parliament a week or two ago for a whole night; it is a secondary point in military reform whether the Military Secretary is to be appointed for life or for only five years. I hold his salary to be equally a secondary matter in the question of military reform. I hold it a secondary question whether the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief should be for life or for five years. Those are all secondary as compared with our really primary wants. Individually, I believe that the present Commander-in-Chief, from his knowledge of all military details, is the fittest man in this country to hold the office which he now fills; and what I see, on the part of those who are agitating this question, is a wish, a desire, an attempt to degrade the Commander-in-Chief into the mere creature of the Secretary of State, whom they may, perhaps, some day succeed in making—what he is not at present—the slave of the House of Commons. To show the House that I am not wrong in that view, I may say that three years ago, after the discussion on purchase, I met an ardent young Army reformer, and expressed to him my surprise that there was such an anxiety to get rid of the Duke of Cambridge, who, on every Committee and Commission, had shown that he knew more of the details connected with the administration of the Army than any other man, civil or military, in the country. What was the reply of this ardent young military reformer? “That’s it!” he said. “That is why we must get rid of him. He is too powerful.” “Why?” I asked. “Because, under our Constitution,” replied my friend, “we are enabled to have a Secretary of State who is not very well versed in military matters, and, therefore, he may become a mere tool in the hands of such a Commander-in-Chief as the Duke of Cambridge.” I shrugged my shoulders, turned on my heel, and said—“I am glad to have learnt your views on this question, and it comes to this—that because by the Constitution you are able to have an ignorant Secretary of State, you must therefore saddle the Army with an incompetent Commander-in-Chief.” I think the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) will not deny that this is a correct statement of the views of Army reformers at the time I speak of, three years ago. I say, nevertheless, the tenure of the Commander-in-Chief, whether for life or for five years, is secondary, as a question of military organization. Then another question which I deem to be wholly and absolutely secondary is the question of purchase. Does anyone deny it? No, it is not denied; but, in case it should be, I will anticipate the denial and prove that my view is right. Suppose that when this war broke out, and the nation was in an excited and alarmed state, the Secretary of State had come down to this House, and told us that he had added 20,000 men to the Army, and a certain number to the artillery, and had said further—“This is an European crisis of the gravest character, and we shall meet it by altering the tenure of the office of Commander-in-Chief to five years, by similarly altering the tenure of the Military Secretary’s office, by reducing the Secretary’s salary, and by abolishing the system of purchase.” If he had done no more than that, should we have accepted such proposals? No. We should have said—“This is all very well in theory, and it is, no doubt, a right thing to make our house sound in all its joints and crannies, but these are all secondary questions; what we want to do is to make arrangements for our primary and essential wants, or otherwise the country will not be secure.” Now, what are our primary wants? They are, in the first place, men for the Army, a certain, absolute supply of men of proper physique. We want Reserves for the Army, and that these Reserves should not come in by dribblets of 1,000, 2,000, or 3,000 a-year, and taking 10 or 20 years before an Army of Reserve is formed, but that steps should be taken to bribe men to come into the Army at once; otherwise where would you be if another emergency should happen? Then, with regard to the Militia, we want a certain supply of men to stop the competition with the Army, and these men should be sufficiently trained to meet foreign troops, in case, at any time, we should be invaded. As to the Volunteers, the whole matter may be summed up in one word—you want to get a hold of them which you have not yet got. And, now, having got my gauge, let me apply it to this measure. I have made an analysis of this Bill. It consists of 36 clauses, of which eight go to purchase, 16 to the auxiliary forces. There remain power to take railways one clause; barracks and land, five clauses; penalties and saving clauses, three; definition, one; preliminary one. There is only one clause relating to the question of Reserves; yet the title of the Bill is "Army Regulation." Now, it appears to me that the whole of this Bill deals recklessly and wantonly with what is secondary, while it almost ignores, as I shall show, what is primary and essential in what this country needs—military organization. An hon. and gallant Friend of mine the Member for Bewdley (Major Anson) asked the Secretary of State to divide his Bill, but he very naturally refuses; because if he did divide it into measures affecting purchase and its other questions, there would be nothing left of it, and my right hon. Friend naturally and wisely objects to bring that result about. The question of purchase is the very pith and marrow of this Bill. I am not a defender of purchase in the abstract; no man is; but I find that it works well in practice. Three years ago I ventured to address the House on the question. I never thought of the subject till then; but I read during the Easter Recess all that had been said in the House on the subject, and I came to the deliberate conclusion before I made my speech that, perhaps, the only sound thing in our military organization is this regimental system, of which the life-blood is this question of purchase. I do not defend purchase in theory; but as a practical man wishing to do the best for the Army, for my country, and for my constituents, I am forced to the conclusion that it works well—I shall not discuss the details of the matter at all. I assume that the interests of the officers are safe, and that the House of Commons, if it abolishes purchase, will do full and ample justice to the vested interests of the Army, and that over-regulation, as well as regulation prices will be paid to clear this debt which you have allowed to grow up. I will only say a few words on the general question. I think purchase can be defended on the broad question of principle. What is the good side of purchase? It is this—that it gives you young and physically efficient officers, so that you have a great deal younger officers in your Army than are to be found in any other Army, and you get this at no cost to the State, and on the very small payment which you make to your officers. Our officers, there can be no question, are very badly paid; but as they are willing to serve it is not for the House or the country to complain. You get the very best and most efficient officers, and they are not discontented with their position, but are proud of it. The purchase system also gives you a check against anything like favouritism, and it is the very root and basis of what is called the regimental system; but that is the wrong expression; we should rather call it the esprit de corps, or regimental esprit, as it was well termed by the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Talbot) who spoke the other night immediately before the adjournment. It is impossible to set too high a value upon this regimental esprit, and your new scheme proposes to destroy it. An hon. Member whose reputation for ability stands high in this House—the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread)—has spoken of the hardships to officers under the existing system. Why, whether purchase or non-purchase, all officers alike are in favour of the purchase system. The hon. Member also said that no officer under the purchase system could be passed over without his consent, and that in cases where he was unable to purchase his step promotion must of a necessity come to a stop. But the answer to the objection is a very simple one, because I maintain that such a man will get to the head of his regiment sooner under the existing system than he would do under the proposed one. Well, those are some of the good results of the purchase system, and now let us see what are the objections which have been raised against it. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) who has shown so much ability and perseverance in connection with this subject, maintains that by abolishing the purchase system we shall obtain these five advantages. In the first place, he says, we shall obtain efficient officers in every grade of rank. Admitted. Secondly, he says that no man will be able to obtain the command of a regiment who is not efficient; thirdly, that there should be an opening afforded to non-moneyed men who have ability and zeal, and who wish to get on, but who cannot afford to pay for promotion. Fourthly, that under the new system we shall have promotion from the ranks of non-commissioned officers. We have heard very little on this subject lately, and I shall have something more to say upon it by-and-by; and, lastly—and this is the Government reason for asking us to spend this enormous sum of money—that we cannot officer our Reserves or amalgamate our forces without the abolition of the purchase system. [Captain VIVIAN: No.] I am in the recollection of the House; but if it is denied that this is the Government reason, I say they have no reason at all for it. I maintain that every one of these advantages can be obtained without our going to this expense; if they could not, I should be the first to support it. Let us consider the first of these advantages which it is said we are to obtain under the new system. It is said we shall obtain efficient officers under it. Now, I maintain that under the existing system you can train your officers up to any standard you choose. You can, if you wish, screw them up to the Prussian standard, or even above it. Therefore, there is nothing in the argument that you can obtain efficient officers by the abolition of the purchase system. But it is most important that our officers should be trained on a war footing. You have never done that, and you make no provision for it under your new system. Thus you have absolutely neglected the most important part of the training your officers ought to receive. Then it is stated that under the new system the command of a regiment will be prevented from falling into incompetent hands. But under the existing system the Commander-in-Chief has a veto upon the appointments to the commands of regiments, and he has confidential reports placed in his hands which tell him the character of every officer in the Army. If you choose to do so, you can say at the present time to every officer that they shall undergo a general examination before they are appointed to the command of regiments. Then as to the veto possessed by the Commander-in-Chief. It may be said the Commander-in-Chief does not exercise that veto; but if you find he fails to exercise it where he ought to, withdraw his letter of service, and be thankful that you are enabled to do so, as he has not got a five years' tenure of office. Appoint some other Commander-in-Chief, and go on appointing fresh ones, if necessary, until you get one who will carry out his duty properly; for it is the duty of the Commander-in-Chief not to be deterred by the "Dawkinses" of the service, but to exercise the veto intrusted to him by the Constitution in such a way as will add to the efficiency of the service. As regards the opening of the Army to poor men who cannot afford to buy their promotion, there is nothing in the present system which prevents that being done. The Artillery and the Engineers are open at the present moment to that very class of men. I need not read the figures I have in my hand, because it is needless to weary the House by doing so; but here is a statement of the number of commissions given at Sandhurst without purchase, and of the number at the Universities which are paid for. Therefore it is absurd to say that you cannot throw open the Army to poor men under the present system. Then comes the question of the promotion of non-commissioned officers. But did not the hon. Member for the Border Burghs himself point to what occurred in the Crimea, and say that upwards of 100 non-commissioned officers had been raised from the ranks then, and had received commissions. That statement begs the question on my side, because it shows that, under the present system of purchase, you can give commissions to whatever number of non-commissioned officers you think right. I said just now that we heard very little now about commissions being given to non-commissioned officers, and with good reason. What was the sort of language used upon this subject three years ago? The hon. Member for the Border Burghs said—

"If we could once prevail upon the War Office to set aside some fixed proportion of vacancies, say one-third or one-fourth, for men promoted from the ranks, all else would in good time follow."

But the French and Prussian War has occurred since then, and the non-commissioned officer question "won't wash" now; and, consequently, we have heard nothing in this debate about the giving of commissions to non-commissioned officers under the new system. It would certainly be a great inconsistency to say that while our great want is trained officers, we intend giving commissions to non-commissioned officers. We need not enter into the aristocratic question—do not let us talk such rubbish as that—but the class of officers we want is that which we find in the Artillery and in the Engineers. Sir Robert Anstruther took up this question rightly when he said that we want officers from the middle class of society. But the object of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs is to democratize the Army. Three years since the hon. Member said—"We could not go on much longer officering our Army from the froth, and manning it from the dregs of society." That was said by the hon. Member in this House three years ago. But he finds it desirable and convenient to change his tone now. [Mr. TREVELYAN: No.] The hon. Member adjured his friends to "provide us with a national and, in the truest sense, a democratic military force." It is not for me to stand up here to defend the officers of the Army—God knows they want no defenders. Looking at their acts, whether before regular armies or savage tribes, or in the Indian Mutiny, is there a man in this House who will say that our Army is officered by the froth of the nation? Even in the heat of debate such language would be strong; but when the hon. Member calmly reiterates the charge, I can only say that I do not take the view of the question which he does—my nature, thank God, does not fit me for it. There remains, then, but the fifth point for me to deal with—namely, that which relates to the officering of the Reserved forces. I maintain that the Reserved forces can be officered without getting rid of the purchase system. Glancing over the Army List yesterday, I found that in the Essex Rifles out of a total of 15 officers eight, including the honorary colonel, are men who have served in the Army, and that in the Royal Glamorganshire Regiment, which has no honorary colonel, out of 16 officers nine have served in the Army.

Those were the only two regiments I looked at; but I dare say they were a fair sample of the rest. Therefore it is a mistake to suppose that in the Militia we have not numbers of officers who have served in the Regular Army. If you have not enough now, why do not you get more? You have only to say that officers on half-pay shall serve in the Militia as a condition of their half-pay, and you would obtain any number you thought fit to accept. I know numbers—I am afraid to say how many—of officers who have asked over and over again for employment in the Militia, and have been refused. As regards the Volunteers in like manner, I am proud to say that officers in many of the regiments have been in the Regular Army. I myself have the honour, unworthy as I am of it, of commanding the holder of a Victoria Cross in the person of one of my majors, who was aide-de-camp to Sir Hope Grant, and my other major was aide-de-camp to Lord Clyde during the whole of the Indian campaign. Therefore, upon all these points the difficulty can be met, if the Secretary of State chooses, without doing away with purchase. Now what are the sums that will have to be paid. The Secretary of State has given an estimate of from £7,000,000 to £8,000,000, but he did not touch upon the question of retirement. And why did he not do this?—because, as he said, he was no prophet. Non meus hec sermo. Far be it from me to say whether he is or is not a prophet; but I will say it is a thing almost unheard of for a Secretary of State for War to ask the House to sanction an expenditure of £8,000,000 for the abolition of purchase, and to add that there would be a further charge for retirement, but he had no notion what it would be because he was not a prophet. There have been many extraordinary things spoken in this Session from the Treasury Benches, but none of them have been more extraordinary than the statement I have just quoted. If there is one parallel, it is to be found in what my right hon. Friend said last year. He was trying to get rid of purchase by buying up the first steps in promotion; and in the course of his speech he said that the whole system of purchase was one which no man could understand. My right hon. Friend will forgive me for saying that he did not quote accurately—the words should have been, "which no fellow can understand." But upon this question of retirement my right hon. Friend has no excuse for not being a prophet, for he sits among the prophets, and, by mesmeric or other influences, he might or ought to have been endued to some extent with the spirit of prophecy in regard to this subject. I find that in 1868 a speech was made in this House having reference to the state of things in 1856, and the speech contained the following calculations as to the regulation value of commissions:—Cavalry, £1,335,290; Foot Guards, £610,110; and Infantry of the Line, £5,180,630: total, £7,126,030. Having quoted these figures, the hon. Member who was speaking proceeded to say that—

"Justice required them to pay not only the regulation price, but also whatever additional sums had really been paid under the system now connived at. Mr. O'Dowd had gone pretty closely into that matter in his pamphlet."—[3 Hansard, xcii. 536.]

Mr. O'Dowd—who, I would remark, is now Deputy Judge Advocate, and therefore a Government official—made out that the over-regulation prices of commissions were—Cavalry, £1,735,000; Foot Guards, £435,000; and Infantry of the Line, £2,849,000: a total of £5,019,000; which, added to the regulation prices—£7,126,030—gives a grand total of £12,145,030. [Mr. OSBORNE: That does not include the artillery.] Do not be in a hurry. We have the retirement to come, and with it the prophecy. This Gentleman said he took the grand total I have just mentioned "as representing the real value of the vested interests in the Army," and then proceeds to say—

"He took off 20 per cent as a fair deduction for promotion to the rank of general, retirement on half-pay, and other vacancies. Therefore, the House must be prepared—not in the course of a generation, but at most in 20 years, to spend first of all £10,000,000, in round figures, to buy out the vested interests of the Army;"—[Ibid, 537.]

which is only different by the sum of, say, £1,500,000 from the sum which my right hon. Friend gave the House the other day as the anticipated cost of the Government scheme. Then the prophet proceeded to say—

"But that was not all it would cost them to get rid of purchase; for they would have to revise their whole system of retirement."—[Ibid.]

He did not say they would have to increase the pay of the officers, though that must be done; but he said a revision would be necessary to "increase the flow of promotion." I particularly ask the attention of the House to these figures. They have not been laid before us by the Government, and I maintain that they ought to have been. He goes on to say—

"In addition to paying the sums he had already stated, they would have to provide for a system of retirement on full pay after 22 years' service, instead of on half-pay after 25 years' service. . . . He thought he was much below the mark when he said that besides the £500,000, that would be added to the Estimates for 20 years at least"—to get rid of regulation and over-regulation purchase—"they would have to pay £1,000,000 a-year, or, in other words, an additional 1d. of income tax for ever."—[Ibid.]

Now this prophet, not satisfied with this very clear and I think valuable and effective statement, which supplements the deficiency of the Government scheme, drew a moral and uttered a warning, as prophets usually do. This moral or warning was not addressed to the House in general; but to those hon. Members who sat below the Gangway, who were most active and urgent on such questions, and who believed they were doing their duty to their constituents by voting for a Bill like that now under discussion. The hon. Member's moral and warning was couched in these words—

"Surely, it was idle complaining of the extravagance of the Estimates if, in the pursuit of a chimera, they were to saddle the country with that increased expenditure. He confessed that he should feel much surprised at finding such a proposal supported by the Members of the Liberal party, who had always been the strenuous advocates of retrenchment."—[Ibid.]

[“Name!”] I do not think it would be kind to mention the name, though the whole point of the observations I have quoted from the hon. Member lies in the fact of his name. [“Name!”] Well, then, these statements were made by no other authority than the present Financial Secretary to the War Office (Captain Vivian), who sits by the side of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. But I will say more. These figures have a great value, because when my hon. and gallant Friend was appointed to his present office, he appeared in the Order in Council almost on a level with the Commander-in-Chief and Controller General. He was appointed in consequence of his financial knowledge and ability, and on his appointment he told his constituents that he was responsible for the finances of the Army. These figures, therefore, have a very peculiar value. They have a value which no figures that may come again from the hon. and gallant Member can possibly have, for they are unofficial figures. They are the product of the pure and virgin financial mind of my hon. and gallant Friend before he was corrupted by office and debauched by the Secretary of State. Now, Sir, I am inclined to think that this addition of 1*d.* to the income tax for ever is one of those measures which are like a fence—the more you look at it the less you like it. That is why I do not intend to vote on this question. I intend to walk out of the House, because I do not think the issue has been fairly sifted; but when it has, I think, the House will find the Government proposal to be the chaff and not the wheat. The more hon. Members who advocate economy look at it the less they will like it. When the hon. Member for the Border Burghs was speaking the other night, he was cheered very loudly by an hon. Member who was near me at the time. I said—"I am glad you like it; but do you know that it will cost the country £10,000,000 down and at least £500,000 a-year for ever?" What was his remark in reply to this? "The deuce!" A deputation came up to me from the country, and, amongst other matters, we spoke of the question of Army purchase. I asked if they knew what it would cost? They had not an idea; and when I gave them some information on the point, they did not answer in the same terms as my hon. Friend, but their remark was one which will have even more effect upon hon. Gentlemen opposite. They said—"But do the constituencies know this?"—I said—"No, they don't." ["Oh, oh!"] They certainly would not know it from the figures put before them. "But," I said, "there are some of us in the House who will take good care that it is known." My impression is that when this question comes to be well sifted in Committee by men who are conversant with the details of the subject the Government will fail to carry their proposal as to Army purchase. At any rate, it is the most wicked, the most wanton, the most uncalled for waste of public money that in 30 years' experience I have ever seen. The proof of that is, as I have demonstrated, that there is not a single thing which you say it is necessary to get by the abolition of purchase that you could not get without it. I will pass on to some of the other provisions of the Bill. The next important question is that of the Ballot. You have 10 clauses for the Ballot, and 44 provisions. That part of the Bill is an absolute waste of paper, in this sense—that the Ballot is to come in force in case of an emergency. Now, I should like to hear my right hon. Friend define what an emergency is. Judging by what has taken place on the Continent, an emergency now-a-days means your capital occupied by the enemy, and a treaty of peace such as has recently been signed at Versailles. Any Bill that comes before us with the word "emergency" is almost self-condemned, even if the means of meeting the emergency were effective. The effect of these 44 provisions will be simply this—that when the emergency in the opinion of the Secretary of State has arisen—and we know how long it is before the Government think an emergency has arisen by the experience of the past—Parliament is to be called together to see that these clauses are to be enforced; and from the time that Parliament meets to decide whether this Bill is to be put into operation, a minimum of 30 days must elapse before you get a single man to meet your emergency, and that man not a trained soldier, but a man whom you then begin to train before he can be put into the ranks to meet Prussian or French soldiers—by that time the French will not be worse than Prussian soldiers. I should like to have the value of 30 days for the purposes of training defined by M. Gambetta, by General d'Aurelles des Paladines, by General Chanzy. They will tell you it will take much more than 30 days to make any man fit to be put into the ranks to defend a nation's safety and honour. I say, then, deliberately, this proposal about the Ballot has been introduced to throw dust into the eyes of the country. It is an absolutely dead provision as it stands. I am an advocate for some arrangement in connection with our military system; but I would sweep such provisions as these away, knowing them to be entirely worthless. I want to see every man serve in his own person; but in this Bill there is a clause that leaves it in the discretion of a magistrate to impose a fine of £100 in case of failure to answer the call under the proposed system. What is that provision but a device to enable a man to get rid of the necessity of personally serving in the defence of his country? I come next to the saving clauses; I thought they might save the Bill. I find one of them is specially introduced for the benefit of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin), as its object is to exempt Quakers from the operation of the Bill. But that is not necessary, as I have just shown. As to the Army Reserve, there is nothing in the Bill which offers any greater inducement than exists at present to men to enter the Reserve. The Secretary of State proposes that there shall be power to transfer men to the Reserve after one year's service, instead of three years, as before. The idea of transferring a man into the Reserve after one year's service never before entered into the head of anyone. Therefore, I maintain this Bill does absolutely nothing in the way of giving us immediate Reserves. The Report of the Commission shows this. It shows how slowly these Reserves have come in. The Bill does not prevent competition with the Militia; it does not give you men with better physique, and it only provides for 14 days' increased drill. With regard to the Volunteers, it gives you no hold over them. We are told that the Mutiny Act has been applied to the Volunteers by this Bill. The impression conveyed by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was that the Bill was intended to give the Government increased power over the Volunteers; but it does nothing of the kind. You cannot force a Volunteer to attend parade, or to go to Wimbledon, Brighton, or anywhere else. All it does is to require a year's notice before a man can leave the force, and as the Ballot is a dead letter, that provision is of no effect. If, however, Volunteers are brigaded with the Regular military, they are both under the Mutiny Act. Now, I have a strong feeling on that point. I wish to see the Volunteers as highly disciplined as it is possible for a force to be. I believe that the Volunteers might be made one of the finest and most reliable forces in the country; but you must get a hold over them if you wish to make them so. You must be able to train the men. But, instead of proposing to get a hold over them, all that the Government do is to endorse all that has been said falsely with reference to their want of discipline. The powers in the hands of the commanding officers for the maintenance of discipline among Volunteers are extreme when they are out; but the difficulty is to get them out. When you get them out you have complete power over them. If a Volunteer be insubordinate, the commanding officer may put him under arrest. He is kept under arrest during the whole of the parade, whether at Brighton, at Wimbledon, or in camp. The commanding officer has complete power to dismiss an insubordinate Volunteer—he has greater power in that respect than a colonel of Militia or of the Army. Therefore, I contend that for the maintenance of discipline among Volunteers the proposition of the Secretary of State is wholly unnecessary. I must say that this country deals discreditably towards the Volunteers. At one moment the country extols us to the sky, and at another moment it insults us. We have undertaken for our country's sake to do a duty that is incumbent on all, and we ought not to be unfairly treated if, accidentally, some want of discipline occurs among a small portion of the force. I am astonished not that you should have had one or two cases of want of discipline in the Volunteer force, but that you should have had 170,000 men, for 11 years with arms in their hands, assembling in large bodies, and yet that during all that time you have had so few cases of that kind. It is a most wonderful instance of the power of moral influence, moral restraint, and a sense of public duty. And what is their reward for all this? The Government endorses every falsehood that has been said against them, and puts in these Mutiny clauses. The Government goes out of its way—I will not say to insult them—but to pay them a very poor compliment. That is the view, in the main, of the officers with whom I have conversed on this matter. These Mutiny clauses give you, as I have said, no hold upon the Volunteer force. Therefore, whether you look at the Army, or the Militia, or the Volunteers, this Bill wholly fails in its intended purpose; and in everything, excepting that portion which relates to the abolition of purchase, is unnecessary and absolutely worthless. I apologize to the House for having detained them so long; but I do not think that the time has been wasted

if it has enabled hon. Gentlemen to gain a correct view of this question. At the close of last Session the Secretary of State stated that our defences were satisfactory. But public opinion has pressed them during the Recess, and this measure which they have brought in is a tribute to public opinion. It appears to me that this is a political and not a national measure. The whole soul of it is in this purchase question, and that, if I am not mistaken, has been introduced to silence the hollow sound from the Provinces that we have heard during the winter, and to satisfy a section of the Liberal party. The Under Secretary of State said that his right hon. Friend had stated publicly, and in a solemn manner, the fact that the House needed no assurance of, that efficiency and economy went hand in hand. Now in this Bill, I see neither efficiency nor economy. Is it economical to waste for any purpose public money to the extent to which this House is to be asked to waste it, when the objects to be attained can be attained by cheaper and surer means? And is there anything in the Bill which tends immediately—I may almost say remotely—to the efficiency of the Army? All that it does with regard to military organization is to take a leaf out of the Fenian book, to establish a system of “head centres” who are to have charge of what are called brigades of 20,000 men—that is to say, to establish a position in peace which will have no counterpart of any kind whatever in war. It is nothing else but inspection under another name. I say that this money, which is going to be wasted on a secondary question altogether, might be, and ought to be—and it is a breach of trust on the part of the Government that it is not—employed in furnishing greater inducements to men to come out of the Army into the Reserve, greater inducements to men to join in completing your artillery, in giving protection to your commercial harbours, in building a second arsenal, in providing reserve stores of guns, and in arming your forts. What the Government have done is this—they have added 20,000 to the Army. I think so little of these 20,000 men, that if there should be a Motion made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) to strike off this 20,000 I intend to vote with him—that is, to a certain extent. He will move to reduce the number by 20,000. I should like it to be reduced by 10,000, and that the other 10,000 should go altogether to the artillery, in which you are utterly wanting, which is absolutely essential, and without which you cannot pretend to exist as a nation. But these 20,000 men in addition to your Army are neither here nor there. They are here to-day and gone to-morrow, and if you want proof of the soundness of the words of the Resolution which I have put on the Paper, but which the forms of the House do not allow me to move, that proof is to be found in the total inadequacy of such an increase to meet a great European crisis. Would it have enabled you to have driven the Prussians out of Belgium; would it have enabled you to have fulfilled your treaty obligations? It would not. I maintain, therefore, that this Bill, while entailing further permanent charges on the people of this country, fails to establish a military system on a sound, economical, and enduring basis. These 20,000 men are not enduring; they will be off, and you have nothing to supply their places with. You will also have no certain Reserve. Now, Sir, I hope that this Bill will not pass. I hope I have said nothing in the course of my remarks which could in any way bear a party character, and if right hon. Gentlemen on this (the Opposition) side had brought in this measure, I should have spoken in exactly the same sense. I hope it will not pass, because I think that the honour, the dignity, and the safety of my country at this present moment are at stake. It is for my country's sake that I hope this Bill will not pass. Pass this Bill and you throw away this golden opportunity of once and for ever settling this great question of your Army organization on a sound, an economical, and an enduring basis. Pass it as it stands, every provision, every line, every word; and three years, six years, ten years hence, if we were to find ourselves in the position in which we stood in the month of August last, and during this fearful war, what would it be worth? If, during the years I have mentioned, the teeth of the French were to be cut anew and we were to be engaged in war with that Power with which they have now made peace, if, possibly vivisected daily by the English Press, they were to look across “the silver streak” and threaten us, not a word, not a line, not a provision of this Bill is calculated in any way to meet the emergency or to save us from panic and alarm. Try it by the gauge of my right hon. Friend. According to my right hon. Friend, this measure is intended "to lay the deep foundations of a system which may render danger or the apprehension of danger in the future altogether unknown." I say try it by that gauge, and this measure will be found absolutely wanting. My right hon. Friend in this Bill, so far from laying foundations such as he would lead the House to believe, is inviting Parliament to sow salt on the seashore—to cast millions fruitlessly away. He is endeavouring to build up a military system on which the honour, the influence, nay, perhaps the safety of our country depend; but which I maintain is nothing but quaking bog and shifting quicksands.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, in replying to the speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down, he would confine himself strictly to the question which was, or ought to have been, under discussion. Yet his noble Friend had made this task difficult, for for one hour and 20 minutes by the clock he had talked upon every subject under the sun connected with military organization except what related to this Bill. His noble Friend began by a long dissertation on foreign policy; but into that subject he did not believe it his duty to follow the noble Lord. But the very last thing which he should attempt was to reconcile the noble Lord's opinions with his acts. His noble Friend had told the House that he was its most independent Member. [Lord ELCHO: I never said that.] His noble Friend had not said so now; but he had frequently heard the noble Lord say so before. His noble Friend had gone so far as to say that he was the only "unwhipped" Member of the House—using that word in a Parliamentary sense. But, if his noble Friend was not "whipped," he begged to remind him of the old nursery phrase—"Spare the rod and spoil the child." He was ready to give his noble Friend credit for the greatest amount of independence that he could asser. Nay, he would go so far as to say that if his noble Friend lived in the days of Noah, sooner than enter the Ark with Shem, Ham, and Japhet, he would prefer to "paddle his own canoe." His noble Friend had told the House that the proposal of the Government to abolish purchase was a most wicked and uncalled-for waste of public money; and yet what was he going to do? How could a noble Lord, representing an English constituency—[Lord ELCHO: Scotch]—reconcile his opinion of the conduct of the Government in proposing a most wicked and uncalled-for waste of public money with what he had told the House in the next breath, that instead of voting he would walk out of the House? How, then, was it possible to reconcile the noble Lord's acts with his words? His noble Friend said—"You don't provide men. What I want is men;" and in the next breath he told them he was going to vote with the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), who proposes to reduce the number of men by 20,000. [Lord ELCHO: I want Reserves.] Reserves could not be made in a day, unless his noble Friend could propose a scheme by which, with the wand of a magician, he could conjure up armed men from the earth. His noble Friend was as impossible to understand in his actions as in his arguments. When at last his noble Friend came to deal with the provisions of the Bill, he told the House they contained the whole scheme of the Government. He would lead hon. Members to believe that outside these provisions his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War had done nothing to create Reserves, or to re-organize the Army. He would ask the House to ignore the fact that last Session a Bill had been brought forward by the Government for the purpose of establishing a system of short service—a system not previously existing, and from which only the formation of a Reserve could be expected. His noble Friend did not, he might add, hesitate to say that purchase was the backbone of our military organization; and, having said that purchase would not be defended, he set to work most elaborately to defend it. [Lord ELCHO: In theory.] A system that could not be logically defended must be practically wrong. The Government, his noble Friend went on to contend, had only two reasons for abolishing purchase—the one being the wish to conciliate the favour of hon. Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway, the other the desire to amalgamate the forces. When at that point of his speech he ventured to interrupt his noble Friend he became very emphatic in his action; but he could assure him there was another reason besides those which he had given. Did not his noble Friend remember that when last year the Secretary for War came down to the House with a very small proposal in the way of the abolition of purchase—namely, to abolish the rank of cornet and ensign—he was met by the obstacle presented by vested interests, and was unable to carry his proposal into effect? There had been since then a Royal Commission, of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) was a Member, and that Commission had unanimously reported that the system of over-regulation prices had been so tacitly admitted that it was no longer possible that they could be ignored. What, then, he would ask, would have been the position of the Government if they had not faced the question of over-regulation prices? They could not have ignored them after the Report of the Commission, and the result would be that they must have asked the House to legalize them. What, again, would be the effect of taking that course? Why, that a colonel's commission, worth £4,000 or £5,000, would have risen in value to something like £7,000, and that a further limitation would be placed upon the class from which our officers were drawn. He did not for a moment mean to contend that our Army was officered by what was known as the aristocratic class; but it was alleged, and he thought with truth, that it was officered by the moneyed classes, and that it was necessary to have money to get on in the service, as, indeed, his noble Friend had himself admitted. It was, indeed, a misrepresentation to say, as had been stated on a former evening by the mover of the Amendment, that a man could get on in the military profession by means of money alone; but he should like to know whether any instance had of late years occurred in which a man having paid his money to obtain promotion was passed over. He, however, took a different ground for wishing to abolish purchase; it was not because a man with money and the necessary qualifications could get on in the Army, but because a man, however great his qualifications might be, could not get on because he did not happen to possess money. An hon.

Captain Vivian

Member (Mr. Buxton) gave as an instance the other evening the case of two of our most famous generals—Lord Clyde and Sir Henry Havelock—who had been passed over dozens and dozens of times because they could not purchase their promotion, and who, there was no doubt, ought in the bloom of their youth to have been in the highest grades of the service because of their great military talents. Such instances as these were, he maintained, of themselves sufficient to condemn the system of purchase. Some of his noble Friend's arguments in favour of the system were, he might add, the most extraordinary to which he had ever listened. He said that purchase enabled us to obtain the services of officers of great physical capability; but, for his own part, he was at a loss to know how health or strength were to be bought. The noble Lord then went on to refer to a speech of his, and had twitted him with inconsistency, although he was kind enough to spare his feelings so far as not to mention him by name. He would, however, beg to remind his noble Friend that the speech in question was not one in favour of purchase, which he proposed should be abolished in every grade except the lower, the reason why he did not propose abolition in the junior ranks being that at the time there was no scheme in contemplation for the amalgamation of the Militia with the Army in any considerable numbers. It was now, however, proposed that officers of Militia should, under certain conditions, get commissions in the Line, and he should like to know how it would be possible to take officers under a non-purchase system and place them side by side with officers in the Regular Army, each of whom had paid £450 for his commission? His noble Friend had proceeded to refer to the cost of buying up the vested interests of officers, observing that the Secretary for War had no right to bring forward any plan involving so large an expenditure until he was prepared to show what the scale of retirement under it was likely to be. Now, as to the cost of abolishing purchase, the figures he had given on a former occasion were pretty much the same as the figures given by the able actuaries, on which the Government calculation was made, and which amounted, in round numbers, to a total of £7,995,000. He must also remind his noble Friend that on the occasion to which he had referred he was speculating on a state of things which would involve promotion by seniority, and not by selection as was now proposed, and when it was not contemplated that a large number of officers should be removed from the Army to serve in the Reserve forces, thereby creating a flow of promotion. As to the flow of retirement under the present scheme, it was impossible to make any reliable calculation with respect to it, until there were sufficient data upon which to proceed, for what would be the state of things two years hence must be a matter of mere speculation. Certain hon. Gentlemen said the other night—"Look at the artillery, and see what you are obliged to do for them." The cases of the Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers were by no means analogous to that of the Army. And for three reasons—first, the scientific corps were in an abnormal condition, because during the time of the Crimean War, and the Indian Mutiny of 1856, those corps were very largely and suddenly increased, and large numbers of officers were introduced into them, all at once, from the colleges, all exactly of the same age, and who were now naturally stopping—blocking promotion. When those blocks of officers, numbering about 70 of the same age, were broken up and dispersed, and the artillery got into its normal condition, there was no reason why promotion would flag. Again, promotion in the artillery was purely by seniority; whereas it was proposed to introduce, to a certain extent, into the Line the element of selection, which would make a material difference. A third reason why there was no analogy between the officers of the scientific corps and those of the rest of the Army was that the former, who had to undergo the severest examinations, and to be as highly tempered and as highly educated as possible, stayed in these corps and made them a profession to a much greater extent than officers did in other branches of the service. He was glad that some hon. Gentlemen had referred to the principle of selection, because he was very near missing it, and it was a point of very great importance. His noble Friend had said to-night that our regimental system was the best thing for the Army. No one could echo and repeat that opinion with more sincerity than he did. He believed every word of it. There was nothing in the whole of our military matters in which we were so superior to other nations as in our regimental system. But, then, the question that he wanted to ask was this—Did the regimental system depend on the officers going up from the bottom to the top of the regiment? In the first place, hon. Gentlemen must remember that, at the present moment, the authorities, who were responsible for the proper condition of the Army and for the regimental system, sanctioned, to a very large extent, exchanges in the Army. He apprehended that if the regimental system depended so much upon officers staying in the regiment, those changes would not be sanctioned to so great an extent. His noble Friend opposite echoed the sentiment, that the regimental system entirely depended on promotion. He held in his hand a Return, most carefully prepared, showing the present condition of the Army, in which mention was made of the number of field officers now serving in their regiments who had risen from the lowest commissioned rank in them, and the number of those who had come in from other regiments, exclusive of the non-purchase regiments. This Return showed that the number of lieutenant colonels who had stuck to their regiments was 80; those who had joined, and were now in command of regiments to which they did not originally belong, were 86. Going a step lower, he found the majors who had stuck to their regiments were 175; those who had joined from other regiments were 137. Therefore, in round numbers, they might fairly say that one-half of the Army at the present moment were commanded by field officers who were not originally connected with their respective regiments. [Colonel NORTH: You have accounted for 166 lieutenant colonels; but we have not so many.] The Return was perfectly correct. There were 80 lieutenant colonels who had gone from other regiments, and 86 who had not. He could not say when the changes took place. He did not learn that these regiments were less efficient than such as were commanded by field officers who had passed through their respective grades in the same regiment, and it was therefore fair to conclude that the regimental system they all admired did not depend upon the rise of officers through their grades in the same regiment. In the regiment in which he had the honour of serving—the 11th Hussars—the colonel established an admirable system, and no regiment could be in better order. Afterwards Colonel Fraser came into the regiment, and, finding a perfect regimental system, never changed a bit of it; the system remained exactly the same as that instituted by Lord Cardigan. Therefore, general promotion, if it were adopted to some extent, would not affect the regimental system. The Surveyor General would by-and-by reply to the figures of his noble Friend affecting the Control Department; but with regard to the Martini-Henry rifle, whose fault was it if we had not yet a sealed pattern? If it was anybody's fault, it was the fault of his noble Friend. Almost every day they heard of changes of pattern, screws, and so forth, which made it absolutely impossible to have a sealed pattern, or adopt a rifle on the merits of which the Committee had not reported. As to the Ballot, his noble Friend said he would try the Government by his gauge, and asked—"What are your armaments, and what should they be?" Now, before discussing the question of compulsory or voluntary service, it was necessary that the House and the country should make up their minds what they really wanted. Gauging his noble Friend by what he required the Government to buy in the shape of artillery, one thing was clear—if his advice were followed, the Government would have a most astounding bill to present to the British taxpayer. His noble Friend wanted 645 guns, all manned and horsed and fully equipped, and always maintained upon a war footing. If this advice were followed, there must be a standing Army to match the guns. If we were to have an Army ready at any moment to cope with the great Powers of the Continent, he admitted at once that our system would not meet any such requirement, and nothing short of a conscription on the Continental system would meet it. But what did they want? Did they want to keep up the traditional policy of England—the policy based on making their Navy their first line of defence—certain and undoubted supremacy of the sea, and keeping an Army to protect us against invasion, and supplying an ordinary contingent for foreign requirements? If they said this was what they wanted, then he said the Government scheme would meet it, and provide all that was required. He regretted that his noble Friend did not go into the state of our home defences. We had now in the Estimates at home 108,000 Regular soldiers; 139,000 Militia; 9,000 Army Reserve; 44,180 Militia Reserve and Pensioners—a total of 300,180 men, or, adding a force of 170,000 Volunteers, 470,180 men. He was not defending the Reserve as it stood. It was not on a proper footing, and that was the reason why his right hon. Friend had proposed a short service system, in order to establish a fitting Reserve. You could not bring trained men up through the floor all on a sudden; but his right hon. Friend hoped to create a proper Reserve by means of the short service system. The next thing was to see whether this force could not be maintained by voluntary enlistment. They had got on the Estimates a total of Regular forces amounting to 197,111, and that produced of rank and file 180,939. If that system was to become popular, the recruiting system must be largely extended. Last year the House of Commons had to add 20,000 men to their forces. He held in his hand a Return from the Adjutant General of the recruits who had joined in each month from the 1st of August. It was as follows:—During August, 1870, 5,523; September, 4,449; October, 3,410; November, 3,190; December, 4,268; January, 1871, 3,715; February (to 15th), 2,222—total, 26,777. So that if they wanted to get up the strength of the Army to that which he had described, he had no doubt that they would be able to get 32,000 men by voluntary enlistment. With regard to the Militia, communications from the commanding officers showed it to be their almost unanimous opinion that there would be a better chance of obtaining recruits by voluntary enlistment than by compulsory measures. His noble Friend trod very lightly on the question of compulsory service. [Lord ELCHO: I will give you another opportunity.] He knew that every step we took was dangerous—

"Fools rushed in where angels feared to tread."

The noble Lord had proved himself an angel that night. His opinion as regarded the Ballot had undergone considerable change; and he did not appear to have quite made up his mind about it.

In October, 1870, he spoke of the compulsory service as a bugbear, and said the Militia should be recruited by voluntary enlistment, and supplemented by the Ballot; but in a more recent letter the noble Lord expressed his opinion that there should be compulsory service without any substitutes. In September his noble Friend was for the supplemental Ballot; and in October he was for the Ballot pure and simple; to-night he did not state what kind of Ballot he supported. But after the criticism to which he had subjected the plan of his right hon. Friend, the noble Lord ought to have told the House what it was he proposed to substitute for it. He would now refer to the effects of the Ballot with substitutes. In 1807 there were 22,956 substitutes to 3,129 men serving in person. In 1810, 8,101 substitutes to 797 men serving in person. In 1807 the price of a Militia recruit was in three counties from £41 to £45; in six, from £16 to £20; in the Isle of Wight, £10; and, in all other counties, from £20 to £40. In 1810 the price in Merioneth was £15; Tower Hamlets, £12 12s.; the rest of Middlesex, £20; Yorkshire, £46 to £55; Wigton, £48; and in addition to these bounties the substitutes in 1810 received £10 10s. from Government. On the whole, the aggregate bounty of Army Reserve substitutes and Militia volunteering to the Line cannot be taken at a lower average than £40 per man. Those enrolled for the Militia in 1810 may be taken at £50. The Ballot for the Army Reserve and Militia commenced about August, 1803, and continued till July, 1804. During that period the recruiting for the Army, which in the month preceding the Ballot had raised 1,827 men, dropped down to an average of 688 men per month. During the first six months of 1807, when there was no Ballot, the ordinary recruiting produced 10,418 men more than it had produced in the whole year of 1804, when there was a Ballot for half of the year. During the last six months of 1807 there was a heavy Militia Ballot for about 37,500 men. The ordinary recruiting produced 7,342 men, or above 3,000 men less than in the preceding half-year. The following arguments against raising recruits for the Army by Ballot were advanced by Mr. Windham in the debate on the military establishments of the country in 1806:—

"Do we mean a conscription which, proceeding by ballot—the only mode I presume to think of—shall be conclusive as to the person on whom the lot falls, and compel him, whoever he may be, to served for a limited term as a soldier? If we do, the hardship would be found to be such as no country could endure."

He compares this to a tax of £1,000,000 divided into 20,000 shares of £50 each, or 50,000 shares of £20 each, levied on persons selected by lot, and remarked that it was easy to see what calamity it must produce. Nothing, he thought, could be so false in principle or oppressive in practice as measures of compulsory service, "which so many without consideration are perpetually calling for." He declared that the feeling of the country was decidedly against the renewal of any measure of the sort for the Army of Reserve, the effect of the trial not encouraging a repetition of the attempt. He added—

"I will not pretend to say that no such measure can at any time be resorted to. It is impossible to say to what the exigencies of the times and the necessity of the State may drive us. But of this I am sure, that without a more urgent necessity than exists at this moment, measures so oppressive in their immediate effects and so injurious in their lasting consequences, should not be resorted to till it was seen that milder and more legitimate methods were incapable of succeeding."—[1 Hansard, vi. 662.]

These were the feelings which operated upon his right hon. Friend, and which had induced him to put aside the question of the Ballot. The noble Lord had railed against every part of the military organization, and said that the right hon. Gentleman had done nothing whatever to reform it. The noble Lord said the whole proposal might be thrown on one side if the abolition of purchase were given up. But, under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, it was proposed to establish, by means of short enlistments, a system of Reserves calculated to come into operation with great rapidity. It was further proposed to localize regiments, and to connect them more closely with the places from which they took their names; to form camps of instruction, where the soldier could learn what he had not the opportunity of learning now—almost every description of work that might be expected of him in the field; to provide for regimental depôts; and the removal of the patronage from the Lord Lieutenant to the Crown—a proposal involving an almost constitutional change; but because the scheme did not involve the Ballot—the noble Lord's panacea for all the evils in the Army—he treated all those proposed changes as mere trifles, unworthy of notice. What could be more important than that the Militia should be brought directly under the control of the Secretary for War, and that Militia officers should hold Her Majesty's Commission? Then came the question of the Reserve. It was admitted that it was desirable to increase the number of men in the Reserve as speedily as possible, and how did the noble Lord seek to accomplish that object? Why, by moving that the number of men in this year's Estimates should be reduced by 10,000. The right hon. Gentleman proposed that during peace the Army should feed the Army of Reserve, by passing men through the former as rapidly as possible, in order that in time of war the Reserve might feed the Army. If that principle were adopted, the number of the regimental cadres might be safely reduced, as a supply of young and trained soldiers would be forthcoming whenever they were required. The noble Lord had proposed a plan of his own which he had got Sir Hope Grant to endorse; but before he adverted to that proposal, he must be permitted to state that this question was simply one of actuarial calculation to be based upon the maximum which could be arrived at. The calculations which he relied upon were made by two eminent actuaries at the War Office, and had been approved by Mr. Finlaison, the well-known actuary. The plan of the Government was as follows:—That in artillery, engineers, and cavalry one-fourth of the men shall serve for 21 years with the colours, the remainder serving eight years with the colours and four in the Reserve; also that in the foot guards and infantry, one-fourth shall serve with the colours for 21 years. That, as regards the other three-fourths, the regiments for foreign service shall serve six years with the colours and six in the Reserve. That the balance of infantry at home shall serve three years with the colours and nine in the Reserve. Under the plan of the noble Lord the troops would have to serve seven years with the colours, seven years with the first Reserve at 4*d.* a day, and seven years with the second Reserve at 8*d.* a day, making a total of 21 years with a pension of 1*s.* a day. Taking the Regular Army, as it stood in the Estimates, to number 180,989 non-commissioned officers and men, the Government plan would require an annual supply of 32,449 recruits, while the noble Lord's would require only 28,203, and therefore it must be admitted that the latter had the advantage of the former to the extent of 4,000. In the Reserves the Government plan would provide 13,674 men in the fourth year after the system commenced, which number would rise to 61,266 in the seventh year, up to which time the noble Lord's plan would have produced none. In the eighth year the noble Lord's Reserve would reach 22,528, while the Government would have 81,811. The Government Reserve would attain its permanent maximum of 178,964, all under the age of 31, in the thirteenth year. The noble Lord's would reach its permanent maximum of 152,253 in the fifteenth year. In the twenty-second year the noble Lord would have a second-class Reserve of 139,088, consisting entirely of men aged from 33 to 40 and not liable to general service. There would be in the country under the Government plan, under the age of 40, trained men to the number of 202,120, on whom the Government could draw in time of emergency, but who, in the meantime, would cost nothing for pay or pension. The Government Reserve, when full, would cost £1,266,884 a-year. The noble Lord's Reserves would cost: first Reserve, at 4*d.* a-day, £926,163; second Reserve, at 8*d.* a-day, £1,692,281: total, £2,618,444. Pensions.—The Government plan would give 36,285 Pensioners, who, at an average pension of 1*s.* 4*d.* a-day, would cost £882,923 a-year. The noble Lord's plan would produce 519,410 Pensioners, who, at only 1*s.* each a-day, would cost £9,479,240 a-year. The total charge for Reserve and Pensioners would, under the Government plan, be £2,149,807, or £12 0*s.* 5*d.* per man in the Reserve, while the noble Lord's would reach £12,097,684, or an average of £41 10*s.* 6*d.* per man in the Reserve. He doubted whether his noble Friend had ever submitted his plan to actuaries, and was glad, therefore, to be able to lay before the House and the British taxpayer a statement of what they might expect when his noble Friend resigned the command of the London Scottish Volunteers, of which he was so brilliant an ornament, in order to take charge of the War Department of the State. He thought he had shown that the time had not come for introducing a system so unendurable by a free people as the Ballot, and believing that the principle on which the Government scheme was based was the only one which would secure, at the same time, efficient Reserves and economical Army Estimates, he recommended that scheme to the House, in the language of the noble Lord, as being at once sound, economical, and endurable.

MR. J. S. HARDY said, the Secretary of State might have in the recesses of his mind, or pigeonholes of the War Office, the economical plan of Army re-organization of which he had spoken; but, so far as the present Bill was concerned, there was no indication of it, and no one could doubt that the real object aimed at was the abolition of the purchase system in the Army. He was sufficiently Conservative to object to the policy of destruction. When people attacked a system which had worked well, provided a satisfactory system of retirement, and excited the admiration of officers in the Army which had recently run so victorious a course in France, they should at least find something to replace it. It was acknowledged on all hands that benefit had resulted from purchase. Although no one could defend the system theoretically, its practical advantages were so great that one was naturally led to ask what were the causes of the present Bill. The causes were only two. Either the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office had been convinced by arguments adduced against purchase and its evils, or, yielding to the great outcry raised by him, he had found it necessary to outbid a certain ex-Member of the Government. There were no advantages likely to arise from the abolition of purchase that justified such an enormous outlay of public money. The very worst and weakest arguments against the abolition had been used by military men who were supposed to know most of the subject. It had been said that it was unfair to call upon an officer to go into action with the price of his commission hanging over his head, and that an officer so situated might perhaps neglect his duty on account of his responsibilities as the head of a family; but if the present measure passed, and the Army was officered by a poorer class of men, the same result would be more likely to follow, because the officer would go into action with the knowledge that he and his family had only his pay to depend upon. He was surprised to hear that there was no way of rewarding deserving officers, because the system of brevet was very well known, although no civilian could understand it. The Judge Advocate General (Mr. Davison) had referred to the cost of commissions; but that was only the theoretical argument tried over again. The Financial Secretary at the War Office (Captain Vivian) had used a most extraordinary plea, contending that it would be impossible to amalgamate the Militia and the Army if purchase were continued. After the Crimean War, it was constantly the practice to draft officers from the Militia to the Army, and a first cousin of his own went directly from a Militia regiment of artillery into the Regular Army; and he (Mr. J. S. Hardy) had been himself introduced to a regiment without purchase over the head of, and in the same Gazette with, an officer who had purchased his commission. In the cavalry, where large prices were paid, promotion was rapid; in the infantry, where commissions brought a moderate price, promotion was fair; while in the artillery stagnation prevailed which threatened evils to the country, and which it would be very undesirable to perpetuate. By the abolition of purchase, selection or the seniority system must be adopted. The latter could be recommended by nobody, and it had been carried too far even in the purchase time. If selection were adopted no system of confidential reports could put the Commander-in-Chief in a position to know the minutiae of officers. He believed that confidential reports from others than the colonels of regiments would create an ill feeling between officers of every grade, and would be unsatisfactory both to Commander-in-Chief and all parties. He thought they must allow the lower grades to be put in nomination by the commanding officers. If field officers were to be brought in from other regiments, the result would be that the field officer, for at least a year, would have no knowledge of the officers belonging to the regiment to which he was removed, and he would be totally unable to give advice to the general commanding-in-chief. He (Mr. J. S. Hardy) had served in the Rifle Brigade for a short time, and would have declined to take promotion in another regiment, because he preferred to remain in his own regiment. Reference had been made to the exchanges which were constantly taking place, and the Financial Secretary had calculated that a large number of the colonels did not originally belong to the regiments; but he did not state from what rank they had exchanged, or from what cause they had exchanged. There were many causes for exchange. There were some few in which ambitious men exchanged, thinking they would get on better by the purchase system. Some exchanged for the benefit of their health, and many because they did not like their regiment. He believed that if officers were promoted from one regiment to another, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, the esprit de corps of regiments would be totally destroyed. At present there was a great demand for commissions, and whilst that demand existed he thought the Government might force upon the officers of the Army a more extended education, so as to improve their military knowledge; but he considered it unnecessary to force this enormous cost upon the country when the benefit would be little or nothing, and the disadvantage to the Army would be very great. With respect to the period of service, he had no doubt that if short service became popular it would be a valuable improvement. The change with regard to the Militia was an enormous change for the better, and also the change in the system of nominations by the Lords Lieutenant, although it might, in some respects, be regarded with suspicion. There was one change that would do immense good if it did not stop the supply of recruits. No one could doubt that the system of taking them for six months for drill would put into the ranks of the Militia a set of men who, when they joined the ranks, would be as well drilled as the recruits joining the Army. But he warned the right hon. Gentleman that it would be useless to attempt to improve the condition of the Militia so long as the system of billeting was pursued, a system which was enough to ruin the discipline of the best regiment in Her Majesty's service in the course of a month. Nothing could be more absurd than the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman that counties should provide the cost of building barracks for the good of the country. That was a national object, and the nation, not the counties, ought to pay the cost. As to the Volunteers, he believed they would never be made a thoroughly satisfactory force until the War Department had a hold over them. The Bill proposed that if a man enlisted for a year he should be exempt from the Ballot for the Militia; but it was stated that except in case of war the Ballot was not to be resorted to. If a Volunteer, however, enlisted for a year and then wished to leave the corps, he simply ceased to attend drills, and the commanding officer had no power over him, except that of turning him out of the corps, and that was exactly what he wanted. Unless some better system than that was adopted, he (Mr. J. S. Hardy) thought the Government would not be justified in making the alterations as to the capitation grants, &c., which the right hon. Gentleman hinted at in his speech on the introduction of the Bill. He could not help thinking that in the present Bill the Government were throwing away a great opportunity. In favour of the purchase system as he was, he should not have opposed the Bill had he seen in it the elements of the future increase of strength in the Army and of prosperity in the country. The right hon. Gentleman had had an opportunity which might never occur again, for many parts of the country were prepared for a much stronger measure than the present. He regretted that the opportunity had been thrown away, and that a parrot cry raised by a Member of the House of Commons should have been taken up by Her Majesty's Government, who were the responsible parties. He regretted that something more solid and beneficial to the country had not been introduced. Had that been the case he should have supported the measure. He should vote with great regret against a Bill which contained so many good clauses; but felt bound to support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay).

MR. RYLANDS, having complimented the Secretary for War on the ability and clearness with which he had introduced his scheme of Army reform to the House, expressed his disappointment at the fact that the country was to be called upon to bear increased burdens for the purpose of military defence. Past schemes for the re-organization of the Army had not been very encouraging in their results. There had been numerous Royal Commissions, Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament, and departmental committees, and yet the only results of their labours had been continued dissatisfaction with the state of the Army, combined with a constant increase of expenditure for military purposes. It was certainly most disheartening that, although this country paid such enormous sums in comparison with Continental nations, we were yet told that our Army would be found entirely useless for the defence of our shores. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), in a letter to The Times, said that—

“Without the Ballot our whole military system must continue to be what it now is—an extravagant and wasteful sham, that gives us no real influence abroad, and fails to save us from periodical and well-founded panics at home.”

It was, perhaps, true that the vivacity of declamation of the noble Lord, which so often charmed the House, was not always associated with exactness of expression, and in this case there was, probably, some exaggeration; but he was bound to say that many persons believed that there was a considerable substratum of truth in the remarks of the noble Lord, and that, notwithstanding the vast sums expended upon them, our military forces were not in a satisfactory position. What, then, must be the feelings of the poorer taxpayers throughout the country when such things were told them of a system which they were called upon to support by taxes drawn from the labour of their hands and the sweat of their brows? The scheme of the Government, in fact, left untouched the main evils of the present system, and it was proposed largely to increase the expenditure instead of diminishing it. It was, however, maintained by some of his hon. Friends near him, and would no doubt be urged by the Government, that the abolition of purchase—the cardinal feature of the present Bill—would make up for all deficiencies; but even that abolition might, in his opinion, be purchased at too great a cost, and the House ought, at all events, to be made acquainted with what it was proposed to give us in exchange. It was proposed to leave the administration of the Horse Guards untouched, and to place in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief a great increase of patronage and influence. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Rylands) felt no security that evils might not spring up as great as those of purchase. He was aware that the House had, by a large majority, expressed its confidence in the administration of the Army by the Horse Guards; but out-of-doors a very different opinion prevailed, and if under the rule of the present Commander-in-Chief, and after the large sums of money expended upon it, the Army was considered nothing but a “sham,” it was but natural that the blame should be laid upon those who were at its head. In dealing with the question of the abolition of purchase, there was one point upon which he wished to lay great stress—he alluded to the proposal of the Government to give compensation for over-regulation prices. Now, what were over-regulation prices? They were illegal prices, to give compensation for which would cost at least £3,000,000. That proposal the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department sought to justify by reference to the Report of the Royal Commission. He said—

“They reported unanimously, and he thought he might, without fear of contradiction, say that their Report was strongly in favour of over-regulation prices.”

He (Mr. Rylands), having carefully read the Report, ventured to dispute the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), who was the Chairman of the Commission, had said in that debate they had no right to make any recommendation in favour of over-regulation prices, and his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), who was also on the Commission, did not consider that their Report bore the character attached to it by the Secretary for War. But they had the Report actually before them, and what did the Commissioners say? They reported that—

“The practice has received no formal or express sanction from any public Departments or officers, and the regulation price only of commissions has been recognized and paid by the War Department in the case of payments to the families of officers killed in action, and of purchase of commissions by means of the reserve fund.”

That, he thought, could scarcely be considered to be reporting "strongly in favour of over-regulation prices." But no doubt the Secretary for War would urge that the Royal Commission reported that the authorities made no attempt to stop the practice by enforcing the law against it. The Commissioners did say—

"There has been no real discouragement of the practice by any authority," and then concluded by saying that there has been—

"A tacit acquiescence in the practice, amounting to a virtual recognition of it by civil and military departments and authorities."

That conclusion was scarcely consistent with the fact previously stated by the Commissioners in relation to officers killed in action. If in any case the practice should have received a "virtual recognition" on the part of the authorities, it should have been in the interest of those men, who, fighting as they believed for the benefit of their country, fell in the field of battle and left widows and families, to whom the value of their commissions would be of considerable importance. But even in those cases the Government only paid the regulation prices, and refused to recognize the over-regulation value. Further than this, the Commissioners quote with approval the Report of the War Office Committee of 1859, to whom had been referred the question of the value of commissions, and when it was complained that they had omitted to take into calculation over-regulation prices, they said—

"It would ill become them as members of a public military department to put forward an estimate of the sum which the public would have to pay as reward or compensation to those who, for their own convenience or their own interests, had deliberately violated one of the most positive and stringent enactments in the statute book."

He commended that opinion of a Committee, composed of distinguished officers, to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and of the House. The simple fact had been, that the authorities had failed to do their duty in administering the law; but the Commissioners, in reporting upon that fact, cannot surely be taken as reporting "strongly in favour of over-regulation prices." The argument in favour of compensation rested entirely on the plea that the authorities had "winked at" the practice; but why did they not enforce the law? They tell us distinctly that they did not know the law was broken. The

Duke of Cambridge, in his evidence before the Committee on Military Organization, in 1859, said—

"I can positively state that, officially, I know nothing of it, and that it is impossible that we should, for if we did know it officially we should instantly take notice of it."

He subsequently said he should be very glad if he could see any way in which they could officially put a stop to it. Again, he said—

"A military authority can only take cognizance of what comes to him officially, and as such, I state positively that we are not aware of any more money being paid."

General Forster, the Military Secretary, gave similar evidence before the Royal Commission last year. He said "in the position he held he knew nothing of the matter whatever," and if it were found out the offenders would be punished. But he went further than that, because, in reply to a further question, he said that not only could they not obtain any evidence sufficient for a conviction in a Court of Law, but they never acquired any moral certainty of the existence of such transactions. But the fact that the authorities profess to be unable to detect and punish the violation of the law is surely no argument for treating positive and stringent enactments as of no effect. Just consider what had been done by Parliament and the Crown to put down this practice. For 150 years there had been a succession of measures, all directed to that end. The Army regulations in 1720 prohibited over-payments, and in 1766 any officers who so offended were threatened with the "highest displeasure" of the King. In 1783 a remarkable general order was issued, under which every officer who bought or sold a commission was bound to make a solemn declaration, on the word and honour of an officer and a gentleman, that neither directly nor indirectly was anything beyond the regulation price paid or received for the commission; the commanding officer being also required to state, that, to the best of his belief, the regulation price had been adhered to. The order was rescinded in 1824, but during this period, officers and gentlemen were able, by some subterfuge, to make this solemn declaration, paying over-regulation prices all the while. In 1804 the Duke of York sent out a circular to Army agents, who were warned against being parties to such transactions, and informed that the commissions so obtained would, on discovery, be immediately cancelled. The Mutiny Act of 1807 contained clauses on the same subject, and penalties were imposed upon Army agents guilty of the offence. In 1809 an important Act of Parliament was passed, and still remained the law of the land, providing that any officers paying or receiving over-regulation prices should be cashiered; the commission sold, the informer should receive £500 from the proceeds, and persons knowingly abetting should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour. Every officer, therefore, who had taken part in these transactions was liable to two years' imprisonment. Yet the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the taxpayers of this country should pay £3,000,000, or, as competent persons believe £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, in order to compensate officers, who, for their own convenience and interest, had deliberately violated the law. The right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) said yesterday, upon a Bill then before the House, that that was the first time he had known the Legislature called upon to sanction a deliberate breach of the law; yet the Secretary for War now called upon the House not only to sanction such a breach, but to compensate those who had been guilty of it. If this proposal for compensating officers for breaking the law were carried into effect he (Mr. Rylands) believed it would have a bad moral influence on the working classes, and would lessen their regard for the sanctity of law, when they saw an influential class of society were not only allowed to break the law with impunity, but were rewarded for so doing, and allowed, in addition, to retain the rank illegally purchased. He admitted that it was a vulgar prejudice to say that the Army was an aristocratic service, for there were a number of wealthy men connected with the middle class of society in it. Nevertheless, a large number of the people whose class had no representatives in Parliament, would not be satisfied when they were told that the House was prepared to vote several millions, to pay men for having broken the law of the land. He found already that this feeling was being expressed out-of-doors, for he had seen a newspaper representing the sentiments of the working classes—he alluded to Reynolds's Newspaper—and in a leading article the remark was made that the principal ground on which the Royal Commission recommended the payment of this great sum was because the violation of the law had become a system, and because the Commander-in-Chief was fully aware of the practice, and, by not stopping it, was supposed to countenance and sanction it. The article went on to say that it was intolerable that the country should be giving so many thousand pounds a-year to the Royal Commander-in-Chief for encouraging breaches of the law; and if he could not prevent this payment being made, another instance would be afforded of how easily the law was overridden when the interests of the privileged orders were at stake. He knew it was said that the abolition of the purchase system could not be obtained unless the Government were supported in their proposition to pay the over-regulation price; but in his opinion it was far better to wait for a good measure than do wrong to carry a good measure. In 1785 a statesman came down to that House and proposed the disfranchisement of 36 boroughs with compensation; but in 1832 a great number of rotten boroughs were disfranchised without any compensation at all. An additional argument against the proposal of the Government to give compensation for these payments was furnished by the fact that, if such compensation were granted it would offer a great encouragement for the breach of future regulations, and for the growth of another system of illegal payments. Nothing could be clearer than the expression of opinion from competent authorities on both sides of the House, that it would be almost impossible to prevent illegal payments for promotion in future. There was also the distinct evidence of the Duke of Cambridge, who stated before the Committee on Military Organization, in 1859, that if you did away with purchase to-morrow he believed that those officers of the Army who were rich would somehow or the other induce those above them to leave in order to make room for them. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War was quite alive to this difficulty. He said, in laying his scheme before the House, that—

"There was one important consideration at the root of this part of the question—namely, that if you did not retain selection at every part of the system, you would immediately find, as soon as you had spent a large sum of money in abolishing one system of purchase, you had laid the foundation of another. The security against the growth of another system of purchase was first a rigid enforcement of the law. The next principal consideration would be, that the successor should never be known until his predecessor had left his place; and the third was that, wherever there was the slightest suspicion that any corrupt pecuniary arrangement had formed the basis of retirement, selection should be vigorously exercised to put it aside."

But it must be remembered that all these securities upon which the right hon. Gentleman relies have been tried for a century and a half and have failed. The very Act of George III. which is embodied in the Bill now before the House, is the Act enacting penalties now in operation, but which have been entirely disregarded. Nay, more than this, the Secretary for War does not propose even as many securities as at one time existed, for he omits the declaration upon the honour of an officer and a gentleman which had formerly to be taken. Then he relies upon the principle of selection; but even upon the plan, as laid down by the Government, it is intended that promotion up to the rank of captain shall be regimental, and clearly that promotion must be by seniority, unless in extremely exceptional cases of surpassing merit or extreme incapacity. The Horse Guards could never be justified in passing over a subaltern, for no fault of his own, in favour of another officer of slightly additional merit. You must be careful to insist upon the necessary qualities and attainments in all those who acquire first commissions, and then, practically, in almost every case, seniority must form the basis of promotion. But the right hon. Gentleman says he will stop regimental promotion at the captaincy, and that all higher grades must be Army promotion. He (Mr. Rylands) did not venture to express any opinion upon questions of that character, upon which he had no sufficient means of forming a judgment; but he had been much struck with the fact that, in the course of the debate, hon. Gentlemen of authority, on both sides of the House, had urged very strong arguments against removing officers on appointment, to higher ranks from the regiment with which they had been previously connected. The plan of the Secretary for War, as regards promotion, would not have the force of law, and if, as would be probably the case, the pressure of interests within the service, as well as that of opinions outside, forced the Horse Guards to carry regimental promotion, in most cases, up to the lieutenant colonelcy, the main securities relied upon by the right hon. Gentleman would disappear. If you have regimental promotion chiefly by seniority, no Acts of Parliament, however penal, and no Royal Warrants, however stringent, could prevent the junior officers in a regiment clubbing together a sum of money to induce a senior officer to clear out of the way so as to secure a flow of promotion. But how did the public suffer by a proceeding of that kind? He was unable to see the slightest public disadvantage in this system of bonus on retirement, which prevailed both in the Indian Army, and in the non-purchase regiments at home. Now, he wished the House to consider for a moment what the nature of regulation prices was. It was simply that the Government, finding that commissions in the Army were articles that could be bought and sold, determined to fix the market price of the commodity, and naturally failed as Governments always have failed, when they have sought to fix by law the market prices of commodities, which necessarily rise and fall with supply and demand. The over-regulation prices represented, in fact, the premium which the commissions commanded in excess of the regulated market price, and this premium rose and fell with the fluctuations of the market. In time of war it disappeared altogether, for men were disinclined to pay a heavy premium for the privilege of being shot at. In the Crimean War there were no over-regulation prices, whilst at the present moment, when the prospects of peace were greater than had been known during that generation, the value of commissions was at its maximum. It was under those circumstances that the Government asked the House to buy up these over-regulation prices—not as a prudent merchant would do in purchasing goods when the market was at the lowest—but at a time when the market value of the commodity was exceptionally high. If the House sanctioned this impolitic proposal, what would be the consequence? The right hon.

Gentleman might entirely fail in preventing bonus payments taking its place, and in that case the expenditure, on account of over-regulation prices, would clearly have been useless and wasteful. But supposing he were to succeed, what would be the consequence? You must either find money out of the public purse to induce the retirement of senior officers, or you would have a block in the Army without any flow of promotion. You would then have the Secretary for War coming down to the House asking for a Vote for retirements, amounting to a large sum, estimated by competent authorities at from £500,000 to £1,000,000 a-year. He (Mr. Rylands) strongly urged upon the Government that they should content themselves with paying the regulation prices and abolishing the purchase system—that would get rid of the vicious element in the system, by means of which deserving officers were bought over by young men whose only qualification was their wealth. The over-regulation prices, in the mode in which they now existed, would disappear without any cost to the public, and then would only remain the system, under which, by the voluntary contributions of his juniors, compensation would be given to a senior officer on his retirement, and so the flow of promotion would be secured, which was necessary for the contentment and efficiency of the service.

COLONEL LEARMONTH said, he thought that the House would admit that the present subject was a most serious one, for it was neither more nor less than an entire revolution in the whole system of our national Army. He had some practical knowledge of this matter, having spent some years in the Army. The re-organization of the Army had been brought before the country during the Recess, and the Government had no course open to them but to bring in some scheme, and their scheme should have calm consideration on both sides of the House. Having listened to the whole of the debate, and considered what had been said, he must say that he had heard nothing that at all altered his opinion that it was a most serious thing to interfere with the present system of officering the Army. He had served both in the Crimea and in the Indian Mutiny with his regiment, and he felt bound to stand up in defence of the regimental system, to which he attributed the great success of our Army both in the Crimea and also during the Mutiny, where that system was tried most severely. Our regimental system was as near as possible perfection, and it was a most serious thing to attempt to interfere with it. While protesting against the total abolition of purchase in the Army, he must express his still stronger disapproval of the system of promotion by selection. He was convinced that such a system would really work very badly for the interior economy of regiments. An officer entering the Army under the present system had a certain prospect, if he did his duty and arrived at the position of senior captain, of becoming major, and a very good prospect of obtaining the command. This was a great inducement for the right class of men to enter the Army and to remain in it. Under the proposed system an officer would have no such certainty; he would have the chances both of seniority and selection against him, and this would throw a cloud over the prospects of every officer and damp the esprit de corps that now existed. An officer would say to himself—"This is not my regiment; I have no chance of succeeding to the command of it; I do not care about the regiment, and I will take things easy." At present a man's regiment was his home, and it was his one idea to act so in his military career that he should be a credit to the regiment which he hoped to command. Our Army was totally different from those of other countries, and no hon. Member must try to model our Army upon the German and the French system; it was the British system that they must look to—that, and that alone. Our Army was different from all others in this—that it was a voluntary Army. We had no conscription, and he hoped that we never should have. We had the highest gentlemen in the land, men from the middle class, and even from a lower rank still, as officers for our Army; so that different classes were very properly thrown together. We had officers whose whole care and thought were for the benefit of their men, and their men would follow them anywhere in the world. No task had ever been set to our Army that they had not performed. The Government said they were prepared to pay the regulation price and the over-regulation price; but this was wasting the time of the House. He wished that hon. Gentlemen would hesitate before they meddled with the present system. The Financial Secretary for War had given details of colonels having commands of regiments who had not risen from the lower ranks in their regiments; but, no doubt, most of those cases resulted from the fact that second battalions had been added to the regiments in question, or that the officer had returned to his regiment after a temporary absence. In his own regiment not one officer had risen to the command who had not risen from the lower ranks. He knew at the present time a regiment, second to none in the Army, where the officer at present in command of it had not purchased a single step, except his first commission as cornet. There were doubtless anomalies in the purchase system; but with all its faults it was a system which had worked admirably. The Army had never failed. It had always performed its duty. Why, then, alter it? They had officers of the very best kind; but they wanted men. It was a step in the right direction to have cadets attached to regiments in the way which had been proposed. They wanted re-organization, a proper system of transport, the supply of provisions and medical comforts. It was the civil element that failed. The chief lesson which he had learned from the late war between France and Germany was, that in the German Army care was taken that the fighting men were at the front provided with everything necessary to keep them in the field. This was a point where the English failed. They nearly failed in the Crimea from the foolish economy of starving the soldier. In Abyssinia we had not a very great enemy to contend with; but the country was unhealthy. And how was that war made successful? The general had everything that was wanted; and the honour of the country was saved.

MAJOR DICKSON regretted that Estimates should have been laid upon the Table which did little more than restore the men removed by the Estimates last year, which made no provision for the increase of the Militia, and which made no additions to the purchase of war material. Even those whose interest in the Army extended no further than a desire to see a good defence of our shores maintained, would be disappointed by a measure which simply trifled with the great question of the re-organization of the Army. The world had just witnessed events which had no parallel in history; and those events showed how necessary it was for a country wishing to preserve its position in the world to be prepared for war even in the time of peace. Was the first duty to be provided for to place England in a position not only to defend our shores, but to guard the honour of England under any circumstances? Did it mean the maintenance of any treaty to which we had become a party, believing that its maintenance was necessary for the welfare of mankind in general? How were they to organize a body of trained soldiers, so that they might be able to resist an invasion? The affairs of Europe were never more critical. Undoubtedly, in theory, the purchase system was wrong; and, if about to establish a new Army, he would not introduce it; but in practice it had worked well, and this was not the opinion of merely English officers, but of the officers of Europe, General Blumenthal among the rest. Ought they not, then, to pause before they put the country to this enormous expenditure, to abolish a system admitted on all hands to work well, and especially as the abolition of the system was not accompanied by anything like an extensive system of re-organization. He could not think the experiment was worth the cost; while in establishing in the Army two classes of officers—the paying and the nonpaying—it would raise difficulties greater than could be at present imagined. It was not consistent in the right hon. Gentleman to refuse to allow more than a certain number of officers to realize their commissions in any one year; for many private and domestic reasons might render such a realization necessary. Under the Bill, an officer could not retire, no matter how urgent might be his case, unless he was prepared to sacrifice his money for the benefit of the State, and if the right hon. Gentleman thus refused to do justice to the officers who were now serving he would be insulting a body of brave men. The right hon. Gentleman, on introducing the Bill, truly said that the purchase system was co-existent with the Army, and under that system English officers had, with rare exceptions,

done their duty. The difficulty of providing a sufficient amount of promotion under the non-purchase system was one that would inevitably have to be encountered, yet the Government had not come forward with any adequate scheme of retirement. That very fact was in itself an admission of weakness, and an evidence of want of statesmanship. The rules and regulations which were intended to supplement the abolition of purchase were looked upon with alarm by officers, who feared that those rules would lead to favouritism; and, although the right hon. Gentleman might not desire to work injustice, he must remember that he was legislating not for himself only, but also for those who would have to follow him. The arguments usually alleged in support of selection were fallacious, and would not bear examination. In the case of the Indian Army the system had been introduced under circumstances sufficiently familiar to hon. Members, and which had no parallel in the circumstances of our own Army. And even in that instance the officers were selected not in the manner now proposed or possible, but from the great mass of officers thrown out of employment. The regimental system was involved in the present proposals of the Government, and the sacrifice of that would involve the destruction of the esprit de corps which was so indispensable an element of a satisfactory Army. He could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the manner in which he proposed to re-organize the auxiliary forces. For many years we had maintained a Militia which was of little more use than to afford a field for the exercise of patronage by political Lords Lieutenant, and the Volunteer force, in its present stage of organization, only gave the opportunity to a few local celebrities to assume military rank. The proposals of the right hon. Gentleman would fail to re-organize these forces. The Militia and Volunteers were the most unsatisfactory of our Reserves. They were badly officered, had little discipline, and their interests were antagonistic. If the Volunteers were to be of real service, they should be placed under military discipline and control. By all means let gentlemen play at soldiering as much as they pleased; but if men received the money of the State they were bound to render in return real and substantial service. Every Volunteer, he considered, ought to be bound to serve for a fixed period, and during that time the State ought to have the absolute power to command his services in case of invasion. In regard to the Militia, the Bill fell far short of his expectations. He had hoped that the line of demarcation between the Militia and the Line would have been absolutely swept away. He believed that England required only an Army composed of two parts; the first drilled and disciplined for garrison work at home and abroad in time of peace; the second, an Army of Reserve; but, unless under any other system that might be adopted they were prepared to adopt compulsion, short service might be a failure, for they would never have the bloom of the youth of the country in their ranks. It was his conviction that permanent service abroad demoralized both officers and men, and that it was succeeded by insubordination. When he first landed in India he found a state of things that was enough to make his hair stand on end; there was insubordination to an alarming degree, and he understood that it was ultimately succeeded by mutiny. In regard to the proper method of military re-organization, he considered that every regiment in the Line ought to have two battalions; that England ought to be divided into military districts, to be sub-divided into regimental head-quarters, at which either the first or second battalion should always have quarters, and that each regiment should have a reserve battalion formed by the re-organized Militia. But he found that this Regulation Bill would unsettle everything, and would regulate nothing. He opposed the Bill, because it put the country to an enormous expenditure with no equivalent results; because it abolished purchase without doing full justice to officers; because it contained no comprehensive scheme of retirement; and because the substitute provided by selection would introduce favouritism and political patronage into the Army. Had the right hon. Gentleman called to his counsels practical military men he would have found no insuperable difficulty, but he would have given the country an Army which would have commanded confidence at home and respect abroad.

SIR HENRY STORKS: I have listened with great attention to the speeches made on both sides of the House in

wasting the time of the House. He wished that hon. Gentlemen would hesitate before they meddled with the present system. SIR HENRY STORKS: I have listened with great attention to the speeches made on both sides of the House in support of the Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay); but I have heard no solid reason or good argument why that Amendment should be supported, and why the second reading of this Bill should be rejected. I am not going to trespass on the House with any lengthened statement of the merits or disadvantages of the present Army system; but I may be permitted to observe that it does appear a strange anomaly that this House should be called on annually to pass an Act regulating the numbers and discipline of the Army, which Act commences by stating in its Preamble that the keeping of a standing Army in time of peace without the consent of Parliament is contrary to law; and, at the same time, that officers of that Army should have acquired vested rights and pecuniary interests requiring the Government to come down to this House for an Act of Parliament and for a large Vote of public money with a view to their extinction. The purchase system is conducted according to a procedure so complex, so extensive in its ramifications, and so varied in its transactions, that I do not hesitate to say that the dealings and transactions of the Stock Exchange, with its bulls and its bears, its script and debentures, its time bargains and its contangoes, are much more intelligible than the rules and regulations which govern the system of purchase in the Army. Moreover, it is not only the system of purchase and sale of commissions, but there is also the question of exchanges between officers on full and half-pay, and between officers in one regiment and in another. These transactions are conducted by irresponsible agents, and extended even to adjutancies of Militia and Volunteers. I hold in my hand a paper published last month, and headed "Army Arrangements." Now, I find that almost every rank in the Army is here represented. We have colonels, seven lieutenant colonels, besides those on half-pay, seven majors, besides those on half-pay, 26 captains, besides those on half-pay, and 19 lieutenants. One person offers to give a bonus, and so the list goes on. Now, all those transactions and Army arrangements have a pecuniary value attached to them, and therefore they are equally as complicated as the system of purchase and sale in the Army. I may mention that this paper is published by an unauthorized agent; but I do not choose to give his name in public, though I shall have no objection to give it to any hon. Member who may feel interested in the matter. I ask hon. Members whether they think transactions of this kind conduce to the efficiency of the Army? Certainly no one can defend the principle of such transactions. I can only regret that such dealings, whether in the sale and purchase of direct commissions or in exchanges, have got to the pitch and height at which they have now arrived. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Headlam) adverted the other night to the position of officers ordered either on active service in the field or to the Colonies, and I entirely agree with him in what he said as to the position of officers so circumstanced. I do not believe any officer goes on foreign service, or on active service in the field who does not think of the danger he runs in connection with the price of his commission. The Government have found, in considering every project submitted to them for the re-organization of the Army, that these vested interests presented themselves at every turn. No reform in regard to the organization of the Army can be effected until these obstructions have been removed. My right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Cardwell) came down to the House last year and proposed the abolition of the rank of cornet and ensign—a proposal which emanated from my right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) when he was Secretary of State for War. My right hon. Friend was, however, obliged to withdraw his proposal in consequence of these obstructions. Even if you want to raise a new battalion you experience difficulties of the same sort, for if you do not give the promotion in the regiment you interfere with the vested interests in the promotion. Thus, whenever the Government attempted to do anything, they always found these vested interests in the way. The experience of modern warfare, and the great events we have lately seen, have shown that a professional class of officers in the Army is absolutely required; not only officers who are sufficiently instructed in the ordinary regimental duties of their grade, but officers professionally instructed in the more or less scientific parts of their profession, and who, when they take the field, will be thoroughly capable of performing their duty in every situation in which they may be placed. Now, it is very difficult to get that class of officers under the purchase system ["No, no!"]; because it is difficult under that system to get a class of officers who are determined to remain in the Army, as many persons enter the Army with the intention of retiring from it after the lapse of a few years. I appeal to my hon. Friends in the military profession on both sides of the House to say whether this is not the case. The Government, under these circumstances, have come forward with a measure of a very liberal character. It is not intended in any way to improve the condition of purchase officers; but it is intended to meet every equitable and just claim which may be brought forward for compensation. Nevertheless, I hold that the proposals of the Government do improve the position of the purchase officer. Under the present system, an officer, wishing to retire from the service, has to wait till he can find a purchaser, and, as many of us very well know, it is often very difficult in regiments to "make up the money;" but, under the Bill, a purchase officer who wishes to retire from the service will not have to wait till he can find a purchaser, as he will always find the Government ready to purchase both with regulation and over-regulation prices. The Government had been charged with acting unfairly because it limits the number of officers who will be permitted to sell out. It is obvious, however, why this restriction was introduced. If every officer had a right to sell, great inconvenience to the public service would result. The Government, therefore, determined to limit the number of sales, and their proposal is based on the average number of sales during the last five years. A clause has, however, been inserted in the Bill enabling the Government to deal with any extraordinary cases which may arise. I hold, therefore, that no injustice is done to the officers in the Army by the limitation. It has been mentioned, in the course of this debate, that it would be a right thing immediately to reimburse the purchase officers the money they have expended in purchase. But I cannot help thinking there would be great injustice in that, independently of the fact that it would stop promotion.

Perhaps, I may be pardoned for illustrating this personally. When I was a lieutenant, I purchased over four lieutenants and became a captain; when I was a captain, I purchased over four captains and became a major. Now, according to the theory laid down in the course of this discussion, I ought, under these circumstances, to get all my purchase money back, and still retain my commission, pay, allowances, prestige, and everything. Why, what would my brother officers, over whose heads I passed, say to such an arrangement? I would also ask hon. Gentlemen who propose such an arrangement what would become of officers who have gained the money value of their commissions by length of service—£100 a-year for every year of foreign, and £50 a-year for every year of home service? Are all these claims to be liquidated? With reference to promotion, the proposal is that ensigns and lieutenants should be amalgamated. Having looked very carefully into the question of selection, I do not think it is open to the objections which have been urged against it. If general officers commanding districts and divisions do their duty, I cannot see that selection will be a very difficult thing. I do not think there is that objection to confidential reports that has been suggested. They now exist; they are made every half-year; but when a report is not in an officer's favour, he ought to be told what is wrong, in order that he may have an opportunity of amending. I never made a confidential report against an officer without informing him of it. It is very important he should know what is defective on an inspection, because by the next inspection he may improve so as to be worthy of promotion. I really cannot see there is any difficulty in the matter. The system prevails in other countries; it exists in Austria. I have seen a good deal of the Austrian Army, and I never heard any objection urged against the means instituted to test the capabilities and the qualities of officers. We have heard a good deal said about the regimental system, and it may be viewed in two aspects—military and social. With regard to the military aspect, if we understand by the regimental system the superintendence of the men by their officers, I cannot see why they should not be as well looked after under a non-purchase system as they are now. I doubt very much whether it is desirable that officers should continue to serve in the same regiments. By doing so I think officers are apt to get narrow ideas; to think nothing of the general service and only of their own regiments; and to become restricted in their views like persons who live in small communities. On this point I will, with the permission of the House, quote a letter I have received from a distinguished officer who has seen considerable service. He says—

“I am entirely in favour of the abolition of purchase, and think the Government have acted in the matter with the greatest liberality. The purchase system is, in my opinion, bad in every way. It has a tendency to make officers think less of their obligations to the public and the duties of their profession in time of peace; they are apt to look on their commissions as their own property, and there is great reluctance in getting rid of inefficient officers on account of the large sums they may have invested. Our best officers are frequently lost to the service (especially when married and with families) rather than risk the money they have paid. . . . Under the regimental system, by which an officer, as a rule, rises from ensign to lieutenant-colonel in his own corps, his ideas become prejudiced and confined, and he has less at heart the interests of the service at large than those of his own regiment. There are a sensitiveness and touchiness about regiments which render officers of other corps extremely reluctant to act up to the Queen's regulations in checking irregularities which come under their notice on duty and otherwise. It must strike everyone the great want of unanimity among military men on the most important subjects of the day in connection with their profession, and, consequently, the little weight our opinions have with the public; and this is more or less traceable to the present system, and the difficulty an officer has in freeing himself from the prevailing opinions of the regiment he has spent his life in. . . . For an Army to be successful in the field it must be carefully trained in time of peace, requiring all the care, energy, patience, and professional pride of which officers are capable. . . . In time of war there is no self-sacrifice or privation that our officers are not equal to; but in these days of rapid campaigns—of railroads and telegraphy, and other means of improved communication and locomotion—there is no longer the time to train on the commencement of hostilities, as in the long wars of former days, when organization was pretty much on a par among the armies of Europe, and no breech-loaders and arms of precision existed, which render mistakes so fatal, and call for the most intimate knowledge of their profession and the art of war from officers of every rank. It is admitted on all sides that our officers do not make a profession of the Army in the same sense as abroad; off duty military topics are looked on as so-called ‘shop,’ and considered by the junior ranks rather a bore. I really think that the purchase system tends so much to impair the efficiency of the officers of the Army, especially in the junior ranks, that the country ought to get rid of it at any expense.”

It is only fair I should mention who my correspondent is, and he has given me permission to mention his name; it is Colonel Cameron, of the 4th Regiment; and perhaps I may trespass on the indulgence of the House by stating what are his claims to attention, as recorded in The Army List—

“Colonel Cameron served in the Grenadier Guards during the Eastern Campaign of 1854, including the battle of the Alma and the siege of Sebastopol, as Assistant Engineer, Right Attack. He was severely wounded on the 20th of October, while in command of the Volunteer Sharpshooters of the 1st Division (medal with two clasps, Knight of the Legion of Honour, fifth class of the Medjidie, and Turkish medal). Commanded the 3rd Regiment German Legion, with commission of lieutenant colonel, from May, 1855, to November, 1856, out of which time seven months in Turkey. Commanded the 1st Battalion 4th King's Own Regiment throughout the Abyssinian campaign, and was present at the action of Arogee and the capture of Magdala (mentioned in Lord Napier's despatches as having won his admiration by the manner in which he has commanded his excellent regiment, and the soldierlike spirit which, by his teaching and example, he has so well fostered and maintained); brevet of colonel, C.B., and medal.”

Even now officers do not always remain in the same regiment, and there are some who have been in many regiments, and my hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Vivian) quoted a Return relating to field officers now serving with their regiments which showed that while there were 80 lieutenant-colonels who had risen from the lowest commissioned rank of their present regiment, there were 86 who had joined them from other regiments. I do not think that what is called the regimental system will in any way be injured by the abolition of purchase. I am sure that every hon. Member will agree with me that the social system of the British Army is, on the whole, excellent, and that there is a good feeling among the officers. If anything can be done to stop extravagance and expenditure it would be most important not only as affecting the happiness of the officers, but also as affecting the well-being of the men. Coming to the second part of the Bill, I may say I do not believe compulsory service to be possible in England. In the Bill there is a clause empowering resort to the Ballot in an emergency. My noble Friend (Lord Elcho) has asked what an emergency is. I should think it would be anything like a threat of invasion. Although you may have in your Bill power to resort to the Ballot, which means compulsory service for the time, such is the feeling of this country that it would be quite unnecessary to resort to the Ballot, because men would voluntarily come forward to defend their country in such numbers as to supersede the necessity for the Ballot. As to Reserves, time is required to form them. That could not be accomplished in a day. What is wanted is sustained and not spasmodic effort — constant, steady, persevering effort to arrive at perfection. Such is the system pursued in Prussia and in the German Army. When we see the great results of the recent war, we cannot but admit the perfection of that system which Prussia has been steadily completing since 1806, after she had suffered very great losses. Our policy ought to be continued, steady, persevering efforts until we arrive at perfection. To arrive at that the abolition of purchase is the first step. I cordially concur in what has been said about improved organization; a great deal has been done in that direction, but much remains to be done. The object we have in view is to define duties and fix responsibilities. Our endeavour has been to decentralize the Army, and to make general officers commanding districts responsible for the discipline and efficiency. They should be held responsible, and should not be able to blame either the Horse Guards or the War Office; and the policy of enabling them to discharge their duties properly and of holding them responsible is that which it is intended to pursue. Before sitting down, I wish to say a few words on another branch of the subject. I wish to live with the times, and to see the Army, like other institutions, reformed; but as a great deal has been said against officers in the Army, I wish to say for them that I think they should be treated with some indulgence. I can recollect the day when a professionally educated Army was decried, and I have been told that I am acting contrary to constitutional principles when I say that we really do require an Army of men educated for their profession, and not an Army officered by men competent to perform ordinary duties only, and who, when those duties are performed, retire to the enjoyment of the special pleasures belonging to their social station. The officers of the British Army have done their duty on all occasions, and under all circumstances, although they are placed in a position different from that occupied by the officers of any Army in Europe. They are called upon very often to perform duties of a very distasteful character, involving long exile in unhealthy stations, and with none of "the pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious war." I am not a laudator temporis acti; but I must be permitted to express an opinion that in all cases they have done their duty with zeal, loyalty, and efficiency. I would also, with the permission of the House, say one word in favour of the rank and file. The rank and file of the Army, no matter how they have enlisted, or whence they come, have proved themselves brave men in battle, patient under privation, loyal to the Crown and country, devoted to their officers. They have been brave men, and I think the Army of the future — if I may so style it — will do their duty with equal zeal, efficiency, and courage. But, Sir, I think it will be well also if the Army of the future turned occasionally to the page of history, and learnt to emulate the great deeds of those who have gone before them.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was bound to admit that the opinions of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down were worthy of respect; but he could not agree with the opinions he had expressed in reference to the abolition of purchase. In the few remarks he intended to make he should consider the question — firstly, in the interest of the officers — in the interest of those men who had invested large sums of money in the purchase of their commissions; and, secondly, in the much wider interest of the nation. He should consider whether they were likely to obtain so much more efficiency in the Army, by adopting the proposals of the Government concerning it, as to justify the expenditure of the enormous sum necessary to effect the abolition of purchase. He admitted there were anomalies in the purchase system; but the blame for them was due to successive Governments, who had been paid large sums of money for commissions by officers, and who believed the conditions of their contract to be that if they remained in the service and proved themselves efficient, they would one day command the regiments in which they had the honour to serve.

The Government now, however, sought to break their contract, and ought, therefore, to bear the consequences of so doing by compensating the persons injured by the line of action they proposed to take. The Government Bill would, by abolishing purchase, place officers of great experience and length of service under great disadvantages as compared with their juniors, and even if it would effect reforms in some directions it would be unwise to cause officers to associate these reforms with the Bill which had, in their opinion, inflicted great personal hardship upon them. He was, therefore, in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Mr. Stanley) that Government should either compound at once with the officers, or enter into an engagement to pay them a certain sum of money in the shape of compensation at the expiration of a stated time. He had thought before hearing the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last addressed the House, that Government expected after their Bill passed to draw the officers from the same social rank which now supplied them; but the right hon. and gallant Gentleman expressed a wish to have in the future a professional class of officers. [Sir HENRY STORKS: "Professionally instructed" was the phrase I used.] By such an officer he should understand one who was dependent for the means of sustenance solely on his pay, and, if he was right in so thinking, the successor to the present Lord of the Admiralty in the post he lately held would have his hands full of work in attending to the large number of applicants for out-door relief who would be called into existence by the working of the plan. It had been said that the regimental system would not be affected by the adoption of the new mode of promotion proposed by the Government; but his experience taught him that the contrary would be the case. Now that a man knew he would be promoted in the regiment in which he had served he would remain in that regiment, though, as in the Rifle Brigade, promotion was slow, and would do his utmost to maintain and improve the efficiency of the regiment whose traditions he so much loved. The case of the 11th Hussars, to which Colonel Fraser had been appointed from another regiment, and in which the excellent service in existence before Colonel

Fraser's appointment had been maintained and continued by him, was alluded to in support of the theory that the Government plan would not effect the regimental system. But it simply proved, if it proved anything, that Colonel Fraser was a practical officer, for, if the officer appointed had, instead of being sensible and conciliatory, been cross-grained and self-opinionated, he would probably have thrown over the traditions of the regiment in favour of his own views, and nothing but dissatisfaction and heart-burning would have resulted. On a previous evening the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Major Arbuthnot) called attention to remarks made in a preceding debate by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) to the effect that Government could not expect competent engineers to go out to India for a miserable annual pittance of £240, and he asked how, then, could they think it likely men would enter the Army for pay amounting to only £90 a-year. This was a very clear and convincing way of putting the point. It was a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. If Government wished to secure the services of professionally educated soldiers, who were entirely dependent on their pay, they must construct an increased scale of remuneration, and so entail much additional expense on the country. One of the objections raised against the purchase system was that under its operation incompetent officers could not be got rid of; but those who brought this objection forward forgot or chose to ignore the fact that the Commander-in-Chief was bound to rid the Army of any officers who proved themselves to be either incompetent or inefficient. It was the height of absurdity to talk about the competency or incompetency of the men in the lower ranks in the Army. To ensure an efficient and economical Army some practical test should be applied to the heads of Departments, because it was absurd to lay down regulations for the lower grades of officers when it was well known that the heads of Departments appointed were entirely ignorant, as in the present instance, of the wants of the services over which they were to preside. The right hon. Gentleman the present War Minister had, however, during the two years he had presided over the War Department, applied his great ability to the subject, and had succeeded in becoming pretty well acquainted with the subject, and he had no doubt the present First Lord of the Admiralty would do the same. At present heads of Departments had entirely to rely for information on subordinates, which was a bad system. As long as their subordinates knew that they were dependent on them for information, they would take a great deal more upon themselves than they otherwise would do. As to the proposal for the abolition of purchase, he could not see in whose interest it was made. If we were to have exactly the same class of officers hereafter as now—that was to say, officers in the same social grade—men with some slight means of their own, and the majority of our officers were such—and who did not object to the purchase system, it was perfectly clear there was no use in abolishing purchase for their sake. As to non-purchase, or poor officers, it was perfectly clear the abolition of purchase would not benefit them, because they rose more rapidly under the present system than they would under that which was proposed. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down gave a few instances of officers who had been unable to rise on account of a want of money, and he thought it was the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) who said that no man, whatever his qualification, could ever rise in his profession unless he had money. Now, in the regiment in which he (Lord George Hamilton) had the honour to serve, there were two gentlemen who had risen from the ranks; one of them was a Staff officer and the other was paymaster. The Staff officer was a most distinguished man. He had served in almost every part of the world, and he had requested him (Lord George Hamilton) to oppose the proposed change—it worked well for the Army, and in his case it represented many thousands of pounds. Turn whichever way he would, he could not see in whose interests this proposal was made. It might be said that clamour out-of-doors had urged the Government to make this proposal; but he should have imagined that the Government was strong enough to have resisted clamour out-of-doors. No doubt the purchase system was wrong in principle; but every practical man knew that it worked well. The more men examined into the purchase system the more they became in favour of it. Strange to say, a Vote was to be taken on the Estimates of £5,000 to pay out old captains and lieutenants out of the artillery, in order to give some impetus to promotion, and it does seem absurd that we should pay an immense sum of money to abolish a system which has worked well for one which, as this Vote clearly demonstrates, has not worked well. If the present proposal were carried, it would be impossible to go on with the regimental system, and hon. Members on the Treasury Bench were aware of that fact, for nothing would give greater dissatisfaction, and destroy that esprit de corps that at present prevailed, than to adopt a system that would put young majors over the heads of old captains in the same regiment. The House had been told that the officers of Her Majesty's Army were opposed to all reform. He denied that they were opposed to reform; but they had a great dread of civilian interference, and he thought the reasons were obvious. It was just possible that in the wars in which the Army had been engaged during the present century the generalship was not so good as it might have been, and that there had been a little want of stratagem. That, however, was made up by hard fighting and valour on the part of officers and men; but everyone of those departments in which the civilian element predominated was characterized by incapacity and inefficiency. During the Crimean War the Commissariat broke down in a manner almost unparalleled in history. Committee after Committee were appointed to examine the cause of that break-down, and if the officers of Her Majesty's Army had a dread of civilian interference, they had a greater dread of the influence of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) than any hon. Gentleman in England. They had been told he was an hereditary Army Reformer, and it would no doubt be recollected that a certain relation of the hon. Member had accomplished a reform—namely, the transfer of the Commissariat from the Treasury to the War Office, but it was an involuntary reform, and only accomplished after the Crimean Army had been almost destroyed. It was not, therefore, surprising that the officers and men of the Army looked forward with some dread to any proposal that came from a member of the same family. He was afraid that hon. Members below the Gangway had not paid sufficient attention to the merits of the purchase system, which had certainly acted well in practice. He felt bound, as representing a constituency which would have to pay a considerable portion of the sum that would be required, to point out his objections to the proposed scheme, which were that it would not conduce to efficiency, that a system of selection must be a system of favouritism, and that it would be the means of introducing politics into the Army. Whichever way he looked at the proposal, he found it to be more and more objectionable, and that it combined, in a manner which he thought nothing but the most perverted ingenuity could devise, the elements of confusion, inefficiency, and extravagance.

MR. STAPLETON said, that the Amendment the House was asked to support was so drawn that hon. Members opposite could vote for it, and yet afterwards when in office carry a measure similar to that of the Government. It was no such great exaggeration to say that commissions were put up to auction. Rich and ambitious officers bought over the heads of those who could pay customary over-regulation price, giving them money to withdraw their names, and when they could not get on in one regiment by this means they exchanged into another. He thought it would be better to discuss the mode by which the Government proposed to carry out the scheme rather than the necessity of the scheme itself, that being beyond further argument. The Government proposed to repay to each officer the over-regulation price of his commission; but that payment would be deferred, contingent, and conditional. It would be deferred, because only a certain number of officers would be allowed to sell out in any one regiment; it would be contingent, because if an officer should die before his time of selling out came he would lose the whole of the purchase money; and it would be conditional, because in order to obtain the money the officer would have to relinquish his profession. But surely the immediate payment of the regulation price would be preferred by many persons to the deferred contingent and conditional payment of the over-regulation price. By paying the regulation price at once we should do justice to the officers; by withholding the over-regulation price we should avoid the scandal of rewarding men by Act of Parliament for violating the law. Coming to the expense of retiring officers under the new system, he did not think it was necessary that the whole expense should be borne by the country, for what could be easier than to require that each person obtaining a commission should place a sum of money in a sort of insurance in the hands of the Government, to be returned to him, with increment, when he was superannuated. Of course those officers who died, who left the service before the time for superannuation, or who attained the rank of major-general, would not have the money returned at all. He considered that these points were worthy of the attention of the Government. What the House wished was to have our officers better educated, so that they should be able to act if left to themselves as the Prussian officers described in The Times were said to be.

Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Sir John Pakington.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, as it appeared to be the wish of the House that the debate should be adjourned, he did not rise for the purpose of objecting. But he hoped there would be an understanding that if the debate was adjourned now it would be finished on Monday evening. [Cries of No; no understanding.]

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—[BILL 2.]

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 8th March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Amendment again proposed, in page 1, line 8, to leave out all the words from the word "heretofore" to the second word "or," in line 9, both inclusive."—(Sir Henry Selwyn-Ibbetson.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would be well that the Committee should understand the question before it. The effect of the clause as it stood would be to legalize the marriage of persons who had taken it upon themselves to act in violation of the law, and that was a most important question, upon which they ought to have the opinion of the Government. There were many cases in which persons who had thus married had afterwards separated, and the question was, were these persons to be held as married in spite of themselves?

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, that these marriages up to 1835 were not void, but voidable, by the action of the Ecclesiastical Courts; but since then they were void ipso facto.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, a great deal of confusion had been caused by, and much misrepresentation employed as to the word "voidable." Every marriage within the prohibited degrees was only voidable up to 1835; so that the most horrible alliances of the nearest kindred belonged to that class up to that date, and equally with the one now under discussion, could only be prevented by a sense of common decency. All the argument used on the other side on that subject tending to show that any particular indulgence was shown to this particular degree was simply misrepresentation.

MR. BARNETT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he would say supposing some person should turn up who demanded a return of legacy duty on the ground that, being a son of a deceased wife's sister, he would be bound to pay 10 per cent on the property left him; whereas being now legitimate, he would be entitled to the property free of duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the answer would be that the money being lawfully paid would not be returned.

MR. HUNT appealed to the Prime Minister to state his opinion and that of the Government upon the question of giving to the Bill the retrospective action proposed, observing that if it were passed in its present shape others who happened to contract marriages hereafter within degrees remoter, but yet forbidden, would come to Parliament with an irresistible claim to have these marriages legalized.

MR. GLADSTONE, having remarked that no Government had hitherto been called upon to declare its views on the question, and admitting that it was far from being free from difficulties, thought his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. Chambers) had exercised a wise discretion, on the whole, in giving validity to the marriages referred to in the clause. The Act of Lord Lyndhurst for the first time gave validity by retrospective action to what was undoubtedly a violation of the law. It became certain that such an example would be followed by continuous efforts to alter the law in some respects, and they were bound to take that into consideration in making allowance for persons who had contracted these alliances since 1835. It appeared to him that the dictates both of equity and policy were in favour of the course taken by his hon. and learned Friend, always supposing that he had—as he believed he had—provided completely for the protection of proprietary rights.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 98: Majority 35.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

WESTMEATH, &c., UNLAWFUL COMBINATIONS.—COMMITTEE.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON moved the nomination of the Select Committee on Westmeath, &c., Unlawful Combinations.

Select Committee nominated:—Marquess of HARTINGTON, Mr. DISBELL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND, Mr. HARDY, Sir GEORGE GREY, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. DOWNING, Viscount SANDON, Mr. JAMES, Mr. PEMBERTON, Mr. MAGUIRE, Mr. RUSSELL GURNET, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. BRUNN, and Mr. SERJEANT SHERLOCK:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, when the noble Lord the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland moved the appointment of this Committee, the noble Lord intimated that it was to be a Secret Committee; but in subsequent discussions the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury declared that the Committee was to act upon the ordinary powers vested in all Select Committees of this House, whereby they would exercise a discretion as to whether they would suppress any parts of the evidence given before them in their Reports to this House. But the right hon. Gentleman added that, although this was a Select Committee, it would not have power to report its opinion with respect to any remedy for the present disturbed state of the county of Westmeath, and the adjoining counties, to the House. Now, Sir, I have examined the precedent which was established in 1852, and I find from the Report of the Committee in that instance that it was appointed at the instance of Mr. Napier, at that time Attorney General for Ireland, in these terms—

“To inquire into the state of those parts of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth, which were referred to in Her Majesty's Speech, into the immediate cause of crime and outrage in those districts, and into the efficiency of the laws, and of their administration for the suppression of such crime and outrage.”

In the Journals of this House I find entries from which I learn that this Committee was appointed on the 19th of March, 1852, and that on the 4th of May following, it was ordered by the House that the Committee should have power to report their opinion, together with the Minutes of Evidence taken before them, to this House. Now, it appears to me that this is a case precisely in point. Whenever the House appoints a Select Committee it appoints what is a delegation of its own; and I believe it to be consistent with all usage that, inasmuch as such Committee emanates from this House, so, as its delegation, it is reponsible to the House, and that its Report must be made to this House, as the sole source of the authority by which it calls for persons and Papers, and enters into an examination of them. If the Committee now proposed to be nominated by the Government is not, or if there is to be an understanding that it is not, to report the evidence it takes, or its own opinion, to the House, then it will have been appointed upon terms different from those I have ever known in any previous case of the appointment of a Select Committee, because, in this instance, a Select Committee of the House will have been appointed, as it were, to be an assistant department of the Executive. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Well, if that is not the case, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain that this Committee is to have the power of reporting to the House any portion of the evidence it may think fit—[Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!]
—and to report any opinion it may arrive at to this House. [Mr. GLADSTONE:

Hear, hear!] Because, as far as the debates have gone hitherto, the inference to be drawn is directly the reverse. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] And if the right hon. Gentleman, in the present disturbed state of the districts concerned in the Inquiry, had come down to the House and announced that he wished to appoint a Royal Commission, under the powers of the Crown, and had selected certain Members of the House to serve upon it, I feel convinced that the House would not have objected. Or, if he had brought in a Bill to constitute a Parliamentary Commission, under the provisions of such a measure, the House might have directed the Commission to report to Her Majesty. Then the Government would have had full discretion as to whether they would report any part of the evidence taken, or the opinions of the Commissioners, to the House. I beg now to move, in accordance with the precedent of the year 1852, to which I have referred, that the Select Committee on Unlawful Combinations, &c., in Westmeath, and adjoining parts of Meath and King's County, have power to report the evidence taken before them, together with their opinion thereon, to this House. I make that Motion, because it is the impression not only on my own mind, but on the minds of other Members of the House, that this Committee is appointed in unusual terms, and unless the right hon. Gentleman shows that it is not, I shall take the opinion of the House upon the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Select Committee have power to report the Evidence taken before them, and their Opinion thereon to the House,”—(Mr. Newdegate.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, that as the Motion was now framed he had no objection to it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS asked whether the Order of Reference would enable the Committee to inquire into the question of how the Government had exercised the powers which they already possessed?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON understood that this must form part of the Inquiry to be entered upon by the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

GAME LAWS AMENDMENT (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to amend and assimilate, in certain respects, the Laws of England and Scotland relating to Game, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 10th March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Prison Ministers * (37).

CRIMINAL LAW—ACQUITTAL OF MARTHA TORPEY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE rose to call the attention of the House to the recent acquittal of Martha Torpey; and to inquire, Whether the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has in contemplation any measure to remedy the present state of the law? The noble Earl said that the facts were so recent, and must be so familiar to their Lordships, that he need only very briefly recapitulate them. In the month of December last Martha Torpey and her husband were residing at Leamington, where they appear to have planned a robbery of a most audacious character. They came to London and, by means of a forged letter of recommendation, hired a furnished house at the West End, under the assumed name of Tyrrell. Under this name Torpey presented himself at the shop of Messrs. London and Ryder, the well-known jewellers of Bond Street. He represented himself as desirous of purchasing some diamond ornaments for his wife, and was shown some cases of great value. Having selected some of these, he requested that they should be sent to him for the inspection of his wife at the house in Upper Berkeley Street, which he had hired under a false name. The assistant of Messrs. London and Ryder accordingly called there at the time appointed with cases of diamonds of the value of nearly £4,000. The street door was opened to him by Torpey himself, for which Torpey apologized, and led him upstairs into the drawing-room; in which was Mrs. Torpey. The assistant having displayed various diamond ornaments, Torpey selected some to the value of about £2,000. The value of the jewelry displayed was about £2,600; but there were other ornaments of great value in the shopman's bag, which he had placed under the table. After some conversation Torpey turned to his wife and said that before concluding the purchase she had better consult her sister. She left the room on this pretence; and returned in a few minutes saying that her sister would be there directly, and then, stepping quickly behind the shopman, placed a handkerchief saturated, as it would seem, with chloroform or some other stupefying substance, to his face. Torpey then rushed upon him and a struggle ensued, during which the woman Torpey again placed the handkerchief over the man's face, and held it there for some time. He then became insensible, but on recovering consciousness found that the jewels had disappeared, as had Torpey and his wife also; but, fortunately, the bag from which he had taken the jewels, which contained more jewelry, was still lying under the table, where he had placed it. Torpey made his way to the Continent, where he disposed of some of the diamonds; while the wife returned to Leamington, where, suspicion having been excited, she was apprehended. On her trial it appeared that in three instances she had taken an independent part in the robbery. The forged letter of recommendation was proved to be in her handwriting; she had sent away the maid-servant from the house on a false message to an address which could not be found, so that this domestic might be absent at the time; and she had left the room in which her husband was, had prepared the handkerchief with the anæsthetic out of his presence, and had returned to apply it herself to the shopman's face. Moreover, some days after the robbery, she sent part of the jewelry to a cousin at Southampton, requesting that care should be taken of it. She was defended not as denying the identity or questioning the robbery, but on the presumption that she had acted under the control of her husband, and therefore was not held guilty in the eye of the law; and her counsel, Mr. Montagu Williams, made such a speech as might be expected from a gentleman of his well-known ability and eloquence. She was acquitted and doubtless by this time had rejoined her husband on the Continent, where they were probably living in luxury—comparative luxury—on their ill-gotten gain. Now, it seemed to him that this case reflected great discredit on the administration of justice and the state of the law in this country. In the first place, the proceedings had been prematurely divulged by the Press, the blame of which, cast upon the magistrates by the police, was cast back upon the police by the magistrates. Thus it happened that newspapers containing the particulars reached Torpey at Amsterdam one morning, at the very time the police were prepared to arrest him. He had just time, therefore, to make his escape. Now, fortunately for us, it had very often happened that bad cases had made good laws; and whenever there had been any flagrant and glaring instance of the violation of justice under the old system, and whenever, on examination, it appeared that nothing could be urged in defence of that system, in this country of free inquiry its fate was doomed and its fall was near. He trusted that this would be the result in this instance, and that Martha Torpey would be entitled to some sort of public gratitude if the case led to a reformation of the law where it was much needed. The presumption of law on which she was acquitted was thus laid down by the learned Recorder, as reported in The Times of the 2nd instant—

“The jury must try the prisoner in the same way as if her husband was by her side. The presumption of law was that when an act was committed by a wife in the presence of her husband it was done under his control; but this presumption was capable of being rebutted by a consideration of acts committed by the wife independently of the husband, and of the character of which the jury were to judge.”

The Recorder, of course, had no need to travel beyond this particular case, or he might have informed the jury that the presumption of law did not extend to cases of treason or murder. Of this their Lordships would remember a striking instance in the case of Mrs. Manning, who committed murder in the presence of her husband, but was, nevertheless, justly condemned, and in due course executed. Now, surely if the principle was a sound one, it ought to be applied to all offences, small and great; but the truth was that it was found so repugnant to all ideas of equity and justice that a wife should escape punishment for murder, if committed in the presence of the husband, that the presumption of law was excluded and left only to cases of a less extreme degree of guilt. If a woman committed an offence under the control of her husband, the fact could be proved in evidence, without any presumption of law, in the same way that a child or an agent might escape responsibility. A flagrant miscarriage of justice had certainly occurred, and he should much regret it if any attempt were made to defend a defective law by alleging the incompetency of the jury, for the jury were bound to look to the general presumption of law as laid down by the learned Recorder. There had been similar instances of legal absurdities, which, on the occurrence of flagrant cases, had been set aside. For a long time the mummery of fines and recoveries existed, by which, when a man desired to settle his estate, he had first, by a legal fiction, to see it forfeited to the Crown, and by a second legal fiction to see it re-granted, both processes involving considerable expense. So, again, for a long period the prosecutions and exactions in the Ecclesiastical Courts were kept up, under the plea that they were all for the good of the offender—pro salute animæ, for his soul's health. When, however, the absurdity of these proceedings became manifest by flagrant cases the wisdom of Parliament interposed to abolish them. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who was not only the head of the law, but—if he might presume to say so in his presence—one of its most distinguished ornaments, could not be indifferent to this great defect, and he hoped to hear from him that it was his intention to apply a remedy.

LORD CAIRNS said, he wished to ask his noble and learned Friend a question that might throw some light upon the subject. It had been stated that when she was apprehended Martha Torpey made a statement that she had been the author of the robbery, that her husband had acted under her directions, and that it was idle for the police to look for him. He wished to know if this was the fact, was it put before the jury on the part of the prosecution, and was it part of the evidence on which they acquitted the prisoner?

Earl Stanhope

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Your Lordships cannot but feel greatly indebted to the noble Earl who has put the Question, and has taken such an interest in the due administration of the law. I agree with him that when cases occur showing great practical grievances arising under the existing state of the law, it is well that attention should be called to them, and inquiry made as to whether or not a remedy should be applied. It is, however, entirely owing to the imperfect statement that has appeared of this particular case that the defect of the law of which the noble Earl complains is supposed to have occasioned the miscarriage of justice which has certainly occurred. I think that when your Lordships hear the whole case, as to which I thought it my duty, on the Notice given by the noble Earl, to inform myself, you will find that it points not to any defect in the law, but to a defect in the conduct of this particular jury; for there can be no doubt that it was simply and solely a gross miscarriage of justice on the part of the jury which led to the prisoner's acquittal. It is quite true that the law presumes, in the first instance, that when a wife commits a crime in the presence of the husband she is to be taken as acting under his coercion and control. It is equally certain that exceptions have been made to that presumption of law which tend, as the noble Earl has justly said, to impugn the expediency of the law itself. The law, I believe, has come down to us from Saxon times, and has existed 1,000 years. Exceptions have been made in the case of manslaughter and murder; and there is also an exception, or, rather, an explanation—namely, that it being but a presumption, and presumption being a matter for the jury to take into consideration on the evidence, it may be rebutted by evidence. The jury, therefore, in cases of theft, fraud, and robbery, are to presume coercion until the contrary is shown. The contrary may be shown by proving—as was clearly proved in this case—that the wife has acted apart from her husband, and has taken part in the crime in his absence and free from his control. It was distinctly proved that Mrs. Torpey had written the fraudulent letter in the absence of her husband, and without the possibility of his control, and that she had sent away the maidservant lest she should be witness of the robbery, also in the absence of her husband. Another fact ought to have appeared at the trial, to which the Question of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) refers, and which I will notice presently. Now, if the case had been barely put before the jury, as given in the reports of the summing-up, the learned Judge would, no doubt, have been greatly in fault, for the report states that he simply informed the jury of the presumption, and told them they might exercise a judgment upon it as a matter of fact and nothing more. I was convinced from my long acquaintance with the learned Recorder that it was quite impossible he could have left the case to the jury in that manner. He is a Judge of very great experience, of calm and sound judgment, and a thorough master of the law which he administers. I thought it necessary to communicate with him, and ask what his summing up was, and I hold his reply in my hand. He told the jury distinctly what the law was—that though it was a presumption of law that the wife had acted under her husband's control, it might be rebutted by any evidence of her separate and independent action in the matter; and he called their attention pointedly to the two circumstances I have mentioned—namely, that Mrs. Torpey wrote the letter in her husband's absence, when there could be no such presumption; and that she sent away the maidservant in her husband's absence, whence there was also an absence of presumption. The learned Recorder put the case, indeed, in a way which made it impossible for the jury, if they exercised the fair judgment which ought to be exercised, to acquit the prisoner. Unfortunately, a circumstance was kept back which might have strengthened the case. The woman voluntarily stated before the magistrate that it was useless to inquire for her husband, that she had planned the whole, that her husband had done nothing in the matter, and that she was the author and contriver of it, as, indeed, the evidence tended to show. That evidence was on the depositions; but no witness was called with reference to it on the part of the prosecution. This so much surprised the learned Recorder that after the trial—of course it was not proper for him to communicate with him before—he asked the counsel for the prosecution how it was that a fact of such importance had been kept back. The answer he received entirely exonerated the counsel, who had no instructions upon the subject; the fact not having been communicated to him, and he being unable to know more than he had been instructed. The case shows a very great failure of justice, in consequence of the jury neglecting to observe the clear and precise ruling of the Judge with reference to the rule of the law and the evidence which pointed to it. There was one unfortunate circumstance which I am afraid we cannot prevent—the appearance of the prisoner in the dock with an infant in her arms. That was a very effective feature in the case. It was a singular coincidence that a Question had been asked in “another place” that very evening, as to a report in the newspapers of a case in which three women were charged before the magistrates with stealing faggot-wood, value 4*d*. The evidence having shown their guilt, the prosecutor said he would not press for a severe penalty against two of the women; but, as the third had used very abusive language to one of his witnesses, he pressed the case against her; she had a baby at her breast, but was sentenced to seven days’ imprisonment. The woman cried and sobbed in a piteous manner, begging for the sake of the baby in her arms and of her little children at home that she might not be sent to prison. The magistrates, however, were inexorable, and it required the united efforts of three policemen to drag the prisoner to the cells below. Inquiry was then made, and it was found that the child in her arms had been out at nurse, and was brought into Court for that particular occasion for the purpose of exciting commiseration. The magistrates, fortunately, were not so sympathizing in that case as Mrs. Torpey’s jury; like men of sense, they saw through the trick. In this case the ruling of the learned Judge was plain and distinct, and the law, whatever its merits or demerits, was not the cause of the woman’s escape from condign punishment. It had been asked in some quarters what evidence there was that the prisoner was Torpey’s wife; but the indictment charged her as his wife, and after that no evidence could be given or inquiry made on that point—it had to be dealt with as charged. As regards the law itself, I have been in conversation with learned Friends, and a communication has been made to me by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Colonsay), who takes a great part in the appellate jurisdiction of this House, and is well versed in the law of Scotland, which he thinks is, in this respect, better than the English law. In Scotland a woman may be acquitted on the ground of her husband’s coercion, but there is no presumption one way or the other. Now, I do not think there was any ground for the presumption in this case; but it may tend to mislead a jury to tell them that such is the presumption of law, instead of leaving it to them to say whether the woman was a free agent or was acting under coercion. I do not go quite as far as the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) with reference to the question of coercion. I do not think it would be tolerated in this country that a woman should be convicted when the crime was clearly shown to have been committed under the husband’s coercion. There is a remarkable case in Scotland, on which a woman was acquitted on this ground—I mean the case of Burke and Hare, who murdered persons and disposed of their bodies. Burke’s wife was acquitted, for, though she was necessarily cognizant of what went on, the jury felt, that placed in a house with Burke and Hare, one of them her husband, it was right that she should be supposed to have acted under coercion. I think that state of the law in Scotland is preferable to the English law; but, after all, this involves a large department of the law as to husband and wife—how far she should be allowed to act as a free agent in the disposal of her property, and other questions—and it would not be right on the spur of the moment, and on a single case, to hurry into an alteration of the law. It is quite right that the matter should be considered; but I cannot at present give any pledge on the subject.

WELLINGTON MONUMENT—ST. PAUL’S CATHEDRAL.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved for all further Correspondence relative to the Wellington Monument between Mr. Penrose and Mr. Stevens with any Department of Her Majesty’s Government up to the present time.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD OVERSTONE said, that the history of this transaction was an exceedingly curious one, and it was desirable that public attention should be directed to it. It originated in the Vote by the House of Commons of a certain sum of money for a Monument to the Duke of Wellington. The Government then decided that the design should be submitted to public competition. Designs were accordingly sent in, and were publicly exhibited in Westminster Hall. It was next proposed to appoint a Committee, who should be intrusted with the duty of awarding the seven premiums which had been offered. He (Lord Overstone) was honoured—though the task was a very unpleasant one—with being appointed on the Committee. He acted in concert with the First Lord of the Treasury, the Grandfather of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), the late Dean of St. Paul's, and several other persons. They allotted the premiums to the designs which they believed the best, but on the clear understanding that their duty was not to decide on the suitability of any of them. Their decision was generally approved. There the matter dropped for several years, until Questions were put in Parliament on the subject. Several changes had, in the interim, occurred in the Government, and it was suddenly announced that the Government had resolved to choose an entirely new site. It might have been expected that as the new site differed in all its features and accessories from the original one, and both being sites of a peculiar character, new designs would be invited. The Government, however, announced that they had selected the design to which the Committee had awarded the third prize, and that they had associated with Mr. Stevens the artist, Mr. Penrose the architect of St. Paul's Cathedral, in order that the design might be adapted to the new site. From such a measure no reasonable or practical man would have expected any satisfactory result; but few would have expected one so thoroughly unsatisfactory as that which had occurred. Years had elapsed since the arrangement was made, and it had been recently stated that the whole sum voted for the Monument had already been spent; while all that the country had got in return was a certain, he could not say ruin, but fragment of the Monument in St. Paul's, with other fragments lying in the artist's studio. The Government, disgusted apparently with the whole proceedings, had taken possession not only of the fragment in the Cathedral, but of the artist's studio and all it contained; it was locked up, and the master of the house was actually precluded access to his own studio. He did not find fault with this, for they had certainly just grounds of complaint; but this showed into what a state the matter had got. He believed the design was the work of a real genius, but of a genius who, as was not unfrequently the case, was totally unable to appreciate the limits of time, space, and expense. What, under these circumstances, were the Government to do? He presumed the Correspondence would give information on this point. According to what he had heard, they would endeavour to make a new association between the artist and some person of practical habits of business to superintend and control him, who would exercise such control as should give the country some security that, within a limited space of time and limited expense, the work, which, was really a work of genius, would be completed. He sincerely hoped that this would be the result; but, judging from past experience, he confessed that he was not very sanguine in the matter. There was, however, some consolation in reflecting that the man to whose honour and memory the Monument was to be erected had, by his great services to the country, by his great deeds in arms, and by his moral standard of patriotism and duty, erected a monument by the side of which the most imposing and durable monument that human hands could erect was comparatively worthless. Exegit monumentum ære perennius.

Motion agreed to.

PRISON MINISTERS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Religious Instruction of Prisoners in County and Borough Prisons—Was presented by The Earl of MORLEY; read 1^a. (No. 37.)

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Friday, 10th March, 1871.*MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Public Accounts, Mr. Baxter added.PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation * [70].Third Reading—Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister [2], and passed.

METROPOLIS—CARRIAGE DRIVE IN HYDE PARK.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will not continue to the inhabitants of Kensington and the public generally the use of the carriage drive in Hyde Park between the Alexandra and Queen's Gates which runs parallel with the Kensington Road, such use having for many years past been of considerable importance and service to them, more especially during the London season?

MR. AYRTON: Sir, I can assure my hon. Friend that no steps shall be taken to alter the usage in regard to this road, without due consideration and a regard to the convenience of all classes of the community. My hon. Friend, in his Question, states that this piece of road is used as a carriage drive by the public in general. I think I ought to observe that although the public in general may drive over this road in their own carriages, yet I imagine that a very small portion of the constituents of my hon. Friend, and of mine also, no doubt, are able to avail themselves of that permission. The public in general go on their own feet, and some of them would like, perhaps, to go there in cabs. That, however, would not be within the usage that has been observed in regard to the road; so that, in fact, a large class of the community derives no benefit from it. When the works are completed it will be necessary to consider what is best to be done for the whole community. It may, perhaps, be thought desirable to shut the road during the night; or it may be found, on the whole, more agreeable to everybody that it should be converted into a promenade; but no course will be adopted until after the most careful consideration of all the conflicting claims that are entitled to be heard.

EXPORT OF ARMS TO BELLIGERENT STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. BIRLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he does not consider that it would be desirable to prohibit, by express enactment, the exportation of arms and destructive munitions of war to Belligerent States?

MR. BOUVERIE: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is consistent with the rules and practice of the House to ask Questions such as this? The subject of the Question, put by the hon. Member, is matter for debate, and I submit it is not in conformity with the rules of the House respecting Questions without debate to ask a Minister his opinion on a matter of great public policy; Questions may be asked as to facts respecting public affairs, or the intentions of a Minister, but if any Question was desired to be put concerning this matter, it should have taken the form of an inquiry whether the Government intend to bring in a Bill in relation to the export of arms and munitions of war to belligerent States.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member for Manchester has passed the prescribed rule relating to Questions, in asking the opinion of the Minister upon a point of so great importance as that to which his Question relates. And I think this is more especially the case in view of the fact that the subject is one which not very long ago received the full attention of the House, on the occasion of a Bill being passed in the last Session in relation to it.

MR. BIRLEY: Then may I ask if the Government mean to introduce a Bill on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, and also to a Question which stands on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Kennaway), I may say that the Government have not at the present time any intention to bring in a new Bill, or to propose amendment in any existing Bill, on the question of the export of arms and munitions of war to belligerent States. I may state, also, that there is no Correspondence on the subject between Her Majesty's Government and the representatives of belligerent Powers other than that which has been already laid upon the Table of the House.

THE PERSHORE MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following report of a case brought before the magistrates at Pershore:—

“ Three women, named Mary Cook, Ann Cook, and Sarah Ann Clifford, were charged with stealing a quantity of faggot-wood from the road-side, value 4*d.*, the property of Mr. George Whittaker, one of the magistrates on the Bench. Mr. Whittaker said he did not wish for a severe penalty in the case of the two Cooks; but as Clifford had used abusive language to one of his witnesses, he should press for a conviction. The Bench dismissed the Cooks on payment of costs 5*s.* each, but sentenced Mrs. Clifford, who had a baby at her breast, to seven days' imprisonment. The poor woman cried and sobbed in a piteous manner, and begged the magistrates, for the sake of the baby she had in her arms, as well as several little children she had at home, not to send her to prison. The magistrates, however, were inexorable, and it required the united efforts of three policemen to literally drag the prisoner from the Court to the cells below :”

whether he has caused inquiry to be made as to the accuracy of the statement; and, if he will be good enough to state what course he proposes to take under the circumstances?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, I have made inquiries into this case, and my hon. Friend will be gratified to hear that it is not so bad as might be inferred from his Question. The facts are these—three women were charged with stealing a quantity of faggot-wood from the road-side, the property of Mr. Whittaker, one of the magistrates in the neighbourhood. It appears that wood had been repeatedly stolen from that place, and that, in consequence, the farm bailiffs of Mr. Whittaker were set to watch it. The three women were caught taking the wood, and by an expression let drop by one of them—Clifford—it appeared that she had been there the previous night for the same purpose. They were summoned before the magistrates; but Mr. Whittaker was not on the Bench when the case was heard. The charge was proved; but Mr. Whittaker said that he did not wish to press the charge against two of the women, who were accordingly dismissed on payment of the costs; but as to Clifford, who had been proved guilty on her own statement of having committed the same offence the previous night, her conduct was so violent and abusive that Mr.

Whittaker declined to interfere in her favour, and left the case to be dealt with by the magistrates. She pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment. With regard to the other points of the Question, the facts are these—the woman is living with a man who is not her husband, and she has three children by him. She did appear in Court with the youngest child in her arms; but I am informed that the child had previously been sent out to nurse, and was brought into Court on that occasion for the purpose of exciting commiseration. The fact of the appearance of the child did not, however, produce on the magistrates the same effect as, in a far more important case, it recently had on a British jury. I am further informed that the prisoner did not cry or sob; but that she screamed out that she would not go to gaol as the witnesses had committed perjury—a statement hardly consistent with the fact that she had herself pleaded guilty. At first she refused to go to the cells, but ultimately she went without any violence being used, and on leaving the Court she repeated against the policeman the same violent language that she had used towards the witnesses. Under these circumstances, it is not my intention to take any further action in the matter.

TRANSFER OF DEBENTURE STOCKS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Why Transfers of the Debenture Stocks of Public Companies and Corporations should not be put on the same footing as the other Stocks of such Bodies by the payment of the same Stamp Duty when transferred on a nominal consideration; and, whether it be his intention to rectify the anomaly in the Stamp Bill now before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, some three or four years ago it was discovered that certain companies had obtained in their Private Acts a right to pay only 6*d.* per cent upon the transfer of their debenture stock. A Bill was brought in to remedy this, and great doubt arose as to whether the stamp ought to be 30*s.* or 35*s.* on debenture stock transferred for a nominal consideration. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), who was then Secretary to the Treasury, and other hon. Members of this House, had a conference on the question with the officers of the Inland Revenue, and, after much consideration, it was resolved to fix it at 2s. 6d. per cent, the sum at which it now stands. I am not prepared to deny the statement of the hon. Member for Stockport that this looks like an anomaly; but, not having had an opportunity of considering the matter since Notice of the Question was given, I cannot pledge myself to take any step in reference to the subject.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—ENTRY OF THE PRUSSIAN ARMY INTO BERLIN—COLONEL WALKER.—QUESTION.

MR. W. LOWTHER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Colonel Walker, the Military Attaché at Berlin, did not in 1866 accompany the triumphal entry of the Prussian Troops into Berlin at the termination of the War with Austria; and, whether General Walker will receive instructions with regard to entering Berlin with the Prussian Army in triumphal procession at the termination of the War with France?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: It is perfectly true, Sir, that Colonel Walker was present at the entry of the Prussian troops into Berlin at the close of the war with Austria in 1866, but I have reason to believe that he was there as a spectator, and that, although in uniform, he did not join in the military cortège as it proceeded from the Brandenburg Gate to the Blücher statue, where the King and Princes took up their position. In his own account Colonel Walker stated that as he did not take part in the military cortège he could not report as to the way in which the troops were received by the crowds who lined the streets. With regard to the second Question, I beg to inform the hon. Gentleman that General Walker is under orders to return to England as soon as the Imperial Crown Prince shall have quitted France, in order to report himself to Her Majesty's Government.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that the accumulation of arrears before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is greatly on the increase, to the serious pecuniary loss of the suitors; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any measure in the present Session to remedy this grievance?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, although the arrears were still considerable, they had recently rather decreased than increased as he was informed. It was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session on the subject.

FRANCE AND GERMANY—DEPARTURE OF GENERAL CLAREMONT FROM PARIS.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether General Claremont, to whom Lord Lyons transferred the protection of British subjects in Paris after the departure of Mr. Wodehouse, was subsequently authorized by Lord Lyons to leave Paris several weeks before the conclusion of the siege; and, if Her Majesty's Government approve of the withdrawal of General Claremont under the circumstances which then existed?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I think, Sir, the best answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman will be to read a passage from the instructions sent by Lord Granville to Lord Lyons, under which General Claremont thought himself at liberty to act. They are to be found in No. 2 of the Correspondence respecting the Franco-German War, page 5, No. 7. At the conclusion of a despatch from Lord Granville to Lord Lyons dated the 18th of October, 1870, are the words—

"I added that, as regards Colonel Claremont, he should follow the course adopted by the military attachés of other countries who may have remained in Paris."

General Claremont left Paris on the 11th of December, at the same time as Prince de Wittgenstein, the Russian military attaché.

ARMY—AMMUNITION FOR THE VOLUNTEERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, What is the reason why Volunteer battalions who had received Snider breech-loading rifles are, in many instances, kept waiting for days and weeks, after application, before they receive any ammunition, blank or ball, which is so necessary for practice and instruction before Easter?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, I am not aware of any delay having taken place in the issue of ammunition, nor have I been able, on inquiry, to discover that any requisitions have been non-complied with. But if my hon. and gallant Friend will be good enough to give me privately the names of the battalions which have complained, I will cause inquiry to be instantly made on the subject. There are ample stocks of ammunition in store everywhere.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY: I can inform the right hon. Gentleman that the 37th and 39th battalions were kept waiting for ammunition for five weeks.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA—THE WAR— OFFER OF MEDIATION.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the statement made to the French Ambassador on the 25th ultimo, Whether Lord Augustus Loftus was directed to tender the good offices of Her Majesty's Government in a Despatch which he did not, and could not, receive until the 27th ultimo, the armistice terminating on the 26th ultimo; why the instructions in the Despatch were not conveyed to Her Majesty's Ambassador by cyphered Telegram on the 24th ultimo; whether Mr. Odo Russell, to whom a Copy of the Despatch alluded to was communicated by Telegram on the 24th ultimo while with Count Bismarck at Versailles, was also instructed to tender to him the good offices of Her Majesty's Government; and, what Reply has been given to Her Majesty's Government as to their proffer of good offices?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, it was only on the 24th of February that the Government were made acquainted with the wishes of the French Government. A despatch on that day was addressed to Lord Augustus Loftus, at Berlin, and was communicated to Count Bernstorff in London, with the request that he would immediately telegraph the substance of it to Count Bismarck. The Government had reason to believe that Count Bismarck received the proffer of their good offices on the morning of the 25th, but they have as yet received no official reply on the subject. On the evening of the 24th the substance of the despatch was telegraphed to Mr. Odo Russell, in order that he might be made fully acquainted with the steps which the Government had thought fit to adopt. It appears from the despatch of Mr. Odo Russell, that he did not receive that telegram till 11 o'clock on the evening of the 25th. The Government considered that in requesting Count Bernstorff to telegraph the substance of the despatch direct to Count Bismarck they took the most direct and expeditious means of bringing themselves into communication with him; and I think that my hon. Friend will agree with me that it was a much more direct mode of proceeding than if we had telegraphed to Lord Augustus Loftus, asking him to ask the Prussian Foreign Minister to telegraph to Count Bismarck.

MR. OTWAY: My noble Friend has not answered the Question to which I attach most importance—whether instructions to tender the good offices of England were sent to Mr. Odo Russell, who was on a special mission to Count Bismarck?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The telegram which was sent to Mr. Odo Russell on the evening of the 24th embodied the substance of the despatch which had been sent to Lord Augustus Loftus, and it was left to Mr. Odo Russell to use his discretion in the matter.

MR. OTWAY: Then no instructions were sent?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I am not able to say that any direct instructions were sent; but the substance of the despatch was communicated by telegraph.

EDUCATION OF BLIND AND DEAF- MUTE CHILDREN.—QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the Vice President of the Council, If it be not possible, either by legislation, by means of the Revised Code, by pecuniary grant, or by some other method, for the Government to provide for and secure the education, generally, of blind and deaf-mute children; or whether Her Majesty's present Government proposes, notwithstanding the recent Education Act, to leave all children so afflicted, save those of the pauper class, wholly dependent upon family funds, or the efforts and resources of private institutional charity alone, for their education?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in reply, that he thought this Question almost came under the class recently referred to by Mr. Speaker. The only answer he could give was that the Government did not see its way to any proposal on the subject. However much he might regret that it was not in the power of the Department to undertake the treatment of such unfortunate children, he saw no way of interference except in the case of such as were paupers, who would fall under the care of the Poor Law Board.

ARMY—PAY AND PROMOTION. QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the alterations in the Royal Warrant concerning pay and promotion, by means of which he purposes to prevent hereafter the practice of paying sums of money in respect of promotions, and of receiving in respect of retirements?

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, in reply, that the Secretary of State for War was not yet in a position to lay on the Table the document referred to; but he would do so at the earliest possible period.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF MILITARY ATTACHES.—QUESTION.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What are the pay and allowances of the Military Attaché to the British Embassy at Paris from the Foreign Office, as well as from the War Office, and whether it is a five years' appointment; what are the pay and allowances of the Military Attachés at Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg, and whether they are five years' appointments; how long the present Military Attaché at Paris has held this post; by whose orders he left the head quarters of the French Army under General Trochu on or about 12th December 1870; whether any other Military Attaché was present with the garrison of Paris to report upon the military operations after 13th December until the Capitulation of the City; whether the Military Attaché who left Paris joined the British Ambassador in France or whether he returned to England; and, if so, by whose orders, and whether any intimation was given to him that Lord Lyons desired the presence of a British Military Attaché with General Bourbaki's Army for which duty he was available; and, also on what day the Military Attaché actually returned to his post, and by whose authority he absented himself from France, and whether he had not received the local rank of Major General to give him greater influence during the active military operations?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The military attaché at Paris receives a salary of £500 a-year, charged in the Diplomatic Estimates, and any expenses of journeys on public service would be allowed on account rendered. There is no limit of time during which the appointment may be held. The military attachés at Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg, are named and paid by the War Department, though nominally they are under the Foreign Office. They have a salary of £500 a-year, and £100 a-year lodging money, charged in the Army Estimates. The present military attaché at Paris has held the appointment since the 1st of October, 1858. He left the head quarters of the French Army under General Trochu, under the discretionary orders conveyed to him from Lord Granville, as appears at page 5, No. 7, in the Correspondence of the Franco-German War, No. 2; those instructions being that he should follow the course adopted by the military attachés of other countries who may have remained in Paris. To the best of my information no other military attaché was present with the garrison of Paris after the 13th of December until the capitulation. The military attaché did not rejoin the British Ambassador, two extra military attachés, Colonels Reilly and Feilding, having during General Claremont's stay in Paris gone out from England to Bordeaux, being instructed to place themselves at Lord Lyons' disposal, and subsequently proceeding to the headquarters of the Army of the Loire. In these circumstances General Claremont arrived in England and reported his arrival to the Secretary of State; he afterwards returned to France, under orders to that effect on 24th February. Both Colonel Walker and Colonel Claremont had the local rank of Major-General conferred upon them as affording them a better position during active military operations.

Mr. Wheelhouse

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Am I to understand the noble Lord as saying that the sole allowance to the military attaché in Paris from the Foreign Office and the War Office is £500 a-year?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The pay of the military attaché in Paris is £500 a-year. That is charged in the Diplomatic Estimates. He also receives his half-pay from the War Office, and an allowance is made to him for certain expenses out of funds in the hands and at the disposal of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST: Is it a five years' appointment?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: The appointment is held for an indefinite period.

DEFENCES OF CANADA.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government are sending guns for the works already completed on the right bank of the St. Lawrence, opposite Quebec; whether the works on the north side are begun, and how far the proposed Vote of £9,000 is expected to go towards their whole estimated cost; and, whether any of the cost of arming these works is included in the Estimates of this year?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, the Government had not yet sent out the guns. No new works have been commenced on the north side. The whole of the £9,000 would be applied to the completion of the works on the south side. There were sufficient guns in store for both the north and south sides, but the time for sending them out had not yet arrived.

NAVY—H.M.S. "MEGÆRA."—QUESTION

MR. KAVANAGH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Why the recommendation of the Admiral at Queenstown that the number of officers on board Her Majesty's ship "Megæra" should be reduced by four, she being in too crowded a state, has not been carried out; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Medical Report on the condition of the ship?

MR. GOSCHEN said, in reply, that the recommendation that the officers on board the Megæra should be reduced by four did not originate with the Admiral at Queenstown. The House might remember that on Monday last the Secretary for the Admiralty communicated to the House the results of a personal inspection by Rear Admiral Forbes of the Megæra. On the receipt of the report of that inspection directions were given to land 100 tons of the cargo, and the Rear Admiral thought it was necessary that four officers should be removed. The matter was left to the discretion of the Rear Admiral. A private letter had been received by Sir Sidney Dacres from Rear Admiral Forbes, stating that when the cargo was properly diminished there would be ample room for all the officers on board.

INFANT SCHOOL CHILDREN.

QUESTION.

MR. BAINES asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether it is intended by Articles 19 to 21 of the New Code that Her Majesty's Inspectors should examine children in Infant Schools under the new First Standard; and whether all the children under seven years of age will be transferred from the infant to the boys' or girls' department?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied that children under seven years would have to be examined in order that the Inspector should be able to ascertain that they are instructed suitably to their age. It would depend on the convenience of the Inspectors whether the examination should be held in the infant or other department of the school.

ENVOY OF PRINCE KASSA, OF ABYSSINIA.—OBSERVATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. POWELL called attention to the circumstances under which an Envoy from His Royal Highness Prince Kassa of Abyssinia to Her Majesty the Queen was detained three months at Alexandria; and asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will state to the House the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to advise the return of the Envoy to Abyssinia without fulfilling his mission? The other evening an hon. and gallant Member congratulated the House upon the great success which had attended the Abyssinian campaign; but it should be borne in mind that that campaign had in a great measure been successful owing to the friendship and timely aid given by Prince Kassa to Lord Napier of Magdala. The British Army went through 240 miles of Prince Kassa's territory; and if Lord Napier were not leaving behind him a friendly Prince he would have had to occupy that country with a line of troops. He did not know the reason why Her Majesty's Government had not received the Envoy; but he could not help thinking that they ought to have shown greater courtesy to a Prince who had done us such good service.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he would endeavour to explain the reasons for the delay of the Envoys of the Abyssinian Prince at Alexandria; but first, with regard to the Correspondence, he wished to state that he would answer the Question another day. He was not aware that any Correspondence existed which could be laid on the Table. The facts with regard to the Envoys were these—On the 7th of October, Colonel Staunton reported the arrival at Suez of two Envoys from Prince Kassa bearing presents for the Queen. These presents were either to be sent to the Queen, or to be brought over to England by the Envoys. The Envoys were willing to pay their expenses to England, but when here expected to be treated as Royal guests, as they had been treated by the Khedive of Egypt. Colonel Staunton therefore requested instructions as to the course which he should pursue. Application was made both to the India Office and the Treasury on the subject. On the 10th of October the India Office expressed their regret that they had no funds available for such a purpose. When the unfavourable reply was received from the India Office application was made to the Treasury, who thought it would not be fair to make use of Imperial funds for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the journey of the Envoys and their maintenance in England. On the 3rd of November, therefore, with the concurrence of the India Office, Colonel Staunton was requested to inform the Envoys that their presents should be sent on to England through him, but that he was not authorized to encourage the journey of the Envoys themselves to England. The presents arrived on the 6th of February, at Southampton, and were said to be of the value of £1,500. They consisted of a gold-mounted burnous or robe, a gold-mounted head-stall for a horse, gold-mounted shoes, a gold-mounted collar or necklace, and a gold-mounted saddle. Accompanying the presents was a letter which it was very difficult to decipher, and it was only the day before yesterday that a translation of it could be obtained. The hon. Member might rest assured that this question had not escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would lay the letter of the Envoys before Her Majesty. In the meantime Colonel Staunton had been requested to convey to those Envoys an assurance of the friendship which Her Majesty entertained, and to inform them that a suitable reply to the letter would be sent to be laid before their Royal Master. The delay was unfortunate; but it was not easy to avoid, but there certainly was no intention on the part either of the Foreign Office or the Treasury to treat the mission of these gentlemen otherwise than with friendly respect.

MR. EASTWICK reminded the House that Prince Kassa had been of the greatest service to our forces in the Abyssinian Expedition, for at the very first interview with Lord Napier he presented the Army with $10,000 worth of food, including flour, which at that time was especially valuable. When our troops were leaving the country presents were made to Prince Kassa, and it was a very natural thing that he should have sent Envoys with return presents to the Queen. He regretted that it had not been thought advisable to pay the expenses of those Envoys. They were educated at Bombay by Dr. Wilson, and could explain the wishes of their master better than could now be done. He hoped it might still be deemed desirable to allow them to come.

MR. GOLDNEY said, the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this subject happened to be a brother of the unfortunate Englishman who was murdered some time back in Abyssinia when on a hunting expedition. When the hon. Member and another brother sought assistance Prince Kassa came forward expressing his regret, and offered them every possible facility for discovering the author of the massacre, and even an army to accompany them into the district. He had heard from persons quite competent to form an opinion on the subject that greater respect for Englishmen could not be shown than had been evinced by Prince Kassa. After all that had been done by the Prince a little more consideration should have been shown to his Envoys.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he could not avoid remarking that, considering that the Abyssinian War had been owing to not answering a letter, it was doubly unfortunate that the same course should be again pursued by the Foreign Office. The noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) who had explained what had occurred in the clearest possible way, gave the House to understand that, up to the present moment, no reply had been given to the letter accompanying the presents brought over from Abyssinia in October last. Not only had no answer up to this day been given to this communication, but the Envoys of the Prince to whom we owed so much, were allowed to remain at Suez for a period of three months, without knowing whether they were ultimately to come to England or to be sent back, their mission uncompleted. He must say the reasons which had been assigned by the noble Lord for the long delay which had occurred, and for the refusal to receive the Envoys of a friendly Prince in England, were such as to give grounds for great regret. It seemed that neither the Government of India nor Her Majesty's Treasury could find the few hundred pounds necessary to receive with ordinary hospitality the Envoys of a friendly Eastern Prince, and he trusted the people of this country would take into consideration the cause of the unhappy line of conduct which had in the present instance been pursued, and would ascribe it to a policy to which we owed so much of the falling off of our prestige not only in the East, but in the West—a policy which led to the cutting down on every occasion, right or wrong, of our expenditure. He, for one, would appeal with confidence to the British public to say whether a few hundred pounds laid out in giving a hospitable reception to the Envoys of a friendly Prince would not be money well expended in the interests of civilization and the maintenance of peace among those Eastern nations.

INDIA—INDIAN HARBOURS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE rose to call attention to the imperfect harbour accommodation which existed in India, and to ask for a Copy of the instructions given to Mr. Robertson, the eminent civil engineer, ordered to report on the subject. It was, he said, a subject of the greatest interest in a commercial point of view. For the last 10 years there had practically been no marine department connected with the India Office, and when it was taken into account that we had in the East something like 4,000 miles of coast, abounding with harbours of the greatest importance to the country, that circumstance was, he thought, somewhat extraordinary. For a period of nine years—he might add, since the surveyors had been discharged—the hydrographical superintendence of the coast of India had been almost completely suspended—a statement which was fully corroborated by a letter which he had received from an officer whose services had been of the greatest value to that department. Now, beginning on the Western Coast with the port of Kurrachee; the mouths of the Indus had been surveyed 20 years ago by the surveyors of the Indian Navy, than whom no abler men ever served any Government, and it was found that the rapidity of the currents made it impracticable to form ports at any of the mouths of that river. But, at the present time, the plans for the harbour at Kurrachee, which had been prepared by the late Mr. Walker, were in a state approaching completion. The harbour, he believed, would be a good one, which would be connected with the railway, which, he hoped, would be carried to Mooltan, and united with the Punjaub Railway, so that the products of that district might be brought down to the coast, passing the Gulfs of Kutch and Cambay. At Bombay there had been, principally by means of private enterprise, set on foot most extensive works of reclamation, which, in the course of time, would supply that city with partial harbour accommodation. But, when it was borne in mind that Bombay would probably, within the next 10 years, be the third or fourth mercantile city in the world, it would, he thought, be well that the Government of India should give such assistance—of a recuperative kind—as would enable the work in progress to be carried on more rapidly. Dry docks were exceedingly necessary at Bombay, and the first which had been built there was, he believed, constructed by a Parsee; its position being so well chosen that by simply lengthening it out, a dock some 400 feet long might be secured, which in itself would be a very great convenience. The Government of India, however, had erected a hydraulic lift at a place called Hog Island, some eight or nine miles off, where every appliance connected with the dockyard must be carried—thus causing great delay in operations connected with the repair of ships; whereas, the old dockyard, by making a slight encroachment on the harbour, might be utilized. Proceeding southward, the first point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the want of lights on the coast of India. Taken altogether, there were only 40 lights, of which very few were first class. There was an urgent want of first-class lights at the following 14 points on the Malabar Coast:—1, Severndroog; 2, Rettna Geria; 3, Viziadroog; 4, Cape Ramus; 5, Pigeon Island; 6, Mangalore; 7, Mount Dilly; 8, Sacrifice Rock; 9, Calicut; 10, Cochinchin; 11, Quilon; 12, Cape Comorin; 13, Minicoy, an island in the Eight Degree Channel; and, 14, one of the Laccadives, abreast Cannanore. The hon. Baronet described in detail the points at which, in his opinion, harbours might be advantageously formed, docks constructed, or lights established, and said that, knowing what he did of these subjects, and having been requested by gentlemen deeply interested in the trade of India, he felt it his duty, though having no longer any personal interest in the matter, to press the subject upon the attention of the Government and of Parliament. The want of lights on the Malabar Coast was very great, and it was almost impossible to approach it with any degree of safety. As an example of the accidents which now happened, he would mention that the General Outram steamer had foundered within easy access of Viziadroog Harbour, between Goa and Bombay, which, in 1844, 1855, 1859, and 1870 had been indicated to the authorities as a natural harbour of refuge, only requiring a light; the Honourable Company's steam frigate Memnon was lost on Cape Guardafui from bad charts; and one of the Peninsular and

Oriental Company's ships was wrecked upon Minicoy from the want of a light there. On the Coromandel Coast there would be no difficulty in clearing the harbour of Negapatam, the outlet of the whole of the magnificent delta of Tanjore, one of the most fertile regions on the face of the earth. The mouth of the river at that place continued very shallow, and laden boats were unable to cross it, except at high water. In 1837 the quantity of grain imported was 650,000 bushels, valued at £149,000; but in 1865 the quantity had increased to 4,694,000 bushels, the value of which was £1,703,000; but rice was principally imported into Ceylon from Negapatam, and there would be no difficulty in clearing away the bar and greatly improving the harbour of Negapatam; but the Government of India would not make the outlay necessary for the purpose. With regard to the harbour of Madras, it was much to be regretted that no steam-tug was stationed there. Some years ago a pier was built for the landing of passengers and goods, to avoid the passage through the surf; but it was hardly finished, when a small French ship broke loose and lodged in the centre of it. Had there been a steam-tug attached to the harbour of Madras, that ship might have been laid hold of and towed clear of the jetty and anchored in some convenient position, or allowed to go ashore; but the repairs of the damage cost £20,000 or £30,000. The intensity of the cyclones occurred pretty nearly in the latitude of Madras, and therefore it was requisite to have two good steam-tugs attached to the roadstead there, so that when ships got into trouble they might be laid hold of and towed out to sea. To the north of Madras there was a harbour called Port Blackwood, formed by a bank of sand and gravel about two miles off shore; and it was only necessary to construct a small breakwater, at little cost, to make it a safe harbour. The want of a light also tended to make the port of Blackwood a dead letter. With these alterations ships would be able to run safely for the harbour when caught in a cyclone. Considering how much had been done by steam dredges to open a way to India through the Suez Canal, he thought that the Government of India would do well to employ one of such dredges to keep open the port of Coringa on the Godavery, and others at the places he had previously described.

The works he had now alluded to were absolutely necessary for the development of the trade of India. In the harbour of Coconada a great number of vessels were built; but it was feared that the mouth of the harbour was silting up. There were various points also on the shore of Orissa where, if they were dredged, light-draught steamers would be able to go. Had that work of dredging been effected before the time of the famine, light-draught steamers, such as he referred to, might have been used in conveying food to the inhabitants during the famine, and thereby vast numbers of human lives might have been saved. He considered it one of the first duties of a Government to turn their attention to. There was a vicious system of centralization in India. The Supreme Government, which consisted of Bengal civilians, assisted by one eminent man from each Presidency, settled all the disbursements to be laid out, even to the smallest sum; and, as Bengal civilians were not so well acquainted with those parts of India where they had not themselves served, they did not attach that importance to the coasting trade of India which it really deserved. Cochin was the best harbour on the Malabar Coast, to the south of Carwar, and by a very little dredging it might be put in such a state that any ship might go there; but although the present state of things had been reported over and over again to the Supreme Government, no improvement had been made. There was a breach in the coast which, if not filled up, would increase, and the safety of the harbour of Cochin be endangered. As they had sent an eminent engineer, Mr. Robertson, to India for the purpose of surveying these harbours, he should be ordered to survey every harbour in India, and report on each seriatim, without waiting to complete the work, so that measures might at once be taken for this improvement piecemeal. Harbour works were the first efforts made by civilization for a country, and he did not see why the Government of India should not place themselves in communication with the Government of this country, with a view to avail themselves of some such means as were intended to be applied to improve the harbour of Galle—he meant a loan from the Imperial Government, to be paid off in 30 years. He was sure that, as the result of these measures, trade would be increased, and the shipping of India would always be ready to pay moderate dues for increased safety, light, and comfort in making their voyages.

SIR JOHN HAY: Sir, I have no wish to delay the House from entering on the discussion of another question which, perhaps, may be more generally interesting; but as I have had the honour of serving in the seas alluded to, and was a Member of the Committee of a former Parliament, which reported on the Paumben Channel, one of the most material subjects alluded to by my hon. and gallant Friend, it will not be necessary for me to speak at any length, for my hon. and gallant Friend has treated the subject in so complete, clear, and exhaustive a manner, that there is little to be added to his general statement. I desire, however, to confirm from personal knowledge one or two of the matters which he has brought under the notice of the House. And, first, let me express the great regret which must be entertained, not only by all Englishmen, but by all the maritime nations of the world, at the abolition of the famous old Hydrographical Office of India, whose surveys for 100 years held the highest rank, quite equal to the magnificent old Spanish surveys, which even now bear the test of modern investigation; or of those which the distinguished surveying officers of our own Navy, under the Hydrographical Office of the Admiralty, produced for the benefit of navigators in all parts of the world. When we remember the enormous seaboard which is within our dominions in the East, and for whose safety we are responsible, I think the House must feel that it would have been wiser if the retrenchment which sacrificed that office some 10 years ago had not occurred. I do not say this with any desire to find fault with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff), who is not responsible for the reduction. Indeed, I think the hon. Gentleman has taken a very proper step in sending out Mr. Robertson to make inquiries; and, though these inquiries are only of a limited nature, and the appointment is not a permanent one, as it should be where there is so large a field for observation and survey, I must tender my thanks for even this limited inquiry. But a permanent and continuous maritime survey would certainly be most advantageous to India, and to the general commerce of the East. On one or two of the other points so exhaustively treated by my noble and gallant Friend, I desire, by the indulgence of the House, to make a few short remarks. And, first, as to the necessity for improvements in the harbour of Bombay. Few ports in the world have a larger commercial importance; and yet during half the year, whilst the south-west monsoon prevails, the shelter necessary for discharging the most valuable cargoes in that harbour was utterly insufficient. The House will remember, in proof of this, that the only part of the great expenditure in the Abyssinian War which could be called unprofitable was due to the impossibility of discharging the transports which crowded the harbour of Bombay, after the necessity for their services had ceased. It surely would be to the interest of the Imperial Government, as well as of the Indian Government, to take steps to improve the harbour of Bombay, so as to afford that protection to shipping which, in almost all other great commercial harbours, was afforded to vessels when loading or discharging cargo. The evils of the absence of the Hydrographical Department is also shown by the want of supervision, instanced in the case of the lighthouse built by the Rajah of Travancore. An enlightened potentate, desirous of contributing in a material manner to the safety of the commerce of India, was unable to obtain the proper advice as to the spot where his generous gift might be most useful, and, as pointed out by my hon. and gallant Friend, the money has been wasted for want of proper supervision. On one other point I desire to corroborate what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Member. I think the hon. Member (Mr. Grant Duff) is mistaken if he considers that the opening of the Paumben Channel is a work for which the revenues of Ceylon should be specially chargeable. So far as Ceylon is concerned, there is now a channel from Palk's Straits to the Gulf of Manaar, through which vessels of light draft can readily pass, and convey the supplies of rice, or other commodities, in which Ceylon is specially interested, from the Coromandel Coast to Colombo. The object of deepening the channel from the Gulf of Manaar to Palk's Straits is for ocean-going steamers, and, since the opening of the Suez Canal to the class of vessels which navigate it, has become of still greater importance. To make the matter clear to the House, let me point out that the islands of Ceylon and of Ireland are about the same size. Let us assume that the trade from Glasgow to Liverpool were interrupted by a narrow isthmus of four miles wide, stretching from Portpatrick to Ireland, and that all the important trade between these two ports had to circumnavigate Ireland by Cape Clear—would the nation which had constructed our great railways and canals hesitate to cut through the obstruction, and shorten the route to that which now exists? Well, the present trade from Western to Eastern India had to pass round the whole island of Ceylon, adding both considerable risk and 320 miles to the voyage; and for a comparatively small sum of £300,000 the whole of this could be saved to our trade. Let me suggest to the hon. Gentleman to consider whether some arrangement similar to that adopted in the building of lighthouses on the Basses, in the same neighbourhood, might not be adopted, and a sum of money advanced in order to complete this work rapidly under the authority of the Public Works Loan Commissioners. The tolls to be collected would be easily adjusted on a consideration of the saving effected in the length and risk of the voyage, and I feel certain would be readily contributed by the commerce of all nations trading to India. Thanking the House for their patience, I would commend this matter to the consideration of the Under Secretary of State for India.

MR. GOURLEY said, he quite concurred with the hon. and gallant Member who had introduced the subject, that it was one of the great duties which the Indian Government was bound to discharge towards the people of India to provide proper harbours and lights along its coasts. Great improvements in those respects were, he believed, very necessary, especially on the coast of Malabar. A new survey of that coast was also much required. An annual charge of £56,000 was made on the Indian Government for the use of the vessels of war we sent out to the Indian Seas; and his impression was that those vessels might be utilized with great advantage in surveying the coasts of India, instead of being generally kept in harbour at Bombay, Calcutta, or some other port. Moreover, the traffic between this country and India by the Red Sea was fast increasing; but he believed that no steps had yet been taken with the view of having the Red Sea re-surveyed, although such an operation was now most urgently needed. Last year he himself put a Question on the subject, owing to a statement made in the public journals that the charts of the Red Sea were so inaccurate as to lead to the probable loss of life and property. It was said that some of the rocks were laid down quite four miles from their real position.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, his hon. Friend had already brought before the House the various plans that had been recommended to the Indian Government with respect to the water way between the island of Ceylon and the mainland of India; but he was not sorry that he had thought fit to call attention to the defective harbour accommodation of India. In a country like India, where the Government was obliged to take the initiative in almost every improvement, the number of public works which it had to call into existence was so enormously great that there was a perpetual battle for life going on among them. One great authority was all for canals, another declared that railways were of the greatest importance, another pointed to common roads, a fourth was for improving the navigation of the back waters, and making half navigable rivers wholly navigable. Every man had his pet project, and five-sixths of the projects were really exceedingly good in themselves, if sometimes a little premature. Under those circumstances, it was perfectly right and reasonable that sailors, who had experienced the want of good harbours and harbour accommodation in India, should come forward and tell them so. The Government of India most fully admitted the existence of the want, and if those who took it to task did not quite do justice to its good intentions and good acts, they nevertheless really strengthened its hands. The remarks of the hon. Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone) fell under two heads—first, harbours; and, second, lights. The hon. Baronet spoke of the Indian Seas from his own knowledge, and, in so far as he himself (Mr. Grant Duff) had any means of checking what he said from books and conversation, his remarks, except with regard to the Paumben Channel and its neighbourhood, under both those heads appeared to him generally correct. He was assured by competent persons that—especially on the Western side of India—there were not a few places where very fair harbours, and two or three where admirable harbours might be made, and at comparatively little expense. He must, however, draw attention to the fact that the best sites for harbours in Western India—Poshetra, Seraia, Marmagao—were all, by an unfortunate accident not in British territory, the first belonging to a feudatory of the Guicowar; the second to another Native Prince, whose name might not be altogether familiar to all hon. Members, the Jam of Nowa Nugga; and the third to the Portuguese. He had no doubt the time would come when we should have several very good harbours on the Western Coast of India, even in British territory—he was told, for example, that an excellent harbour of refuge might be made behind the Vingorla Rocks. But when the hon. Baronet blamed the Government of India for not having done all that might be done in creating harbours of refuge on the Indian Coasts, he should remember that similar negligence had prevailed elsewhere. The hon. Baronet knew something of the difficulty of getting harbours of refuge made even in England. He himself sat with his hon. Friend on a Committee 13 years ago, under the presidency of Mr. James Wilson, to see whether harbours of refuge could not be provided along the British Coasts—at Peterhead and elsewhere—but up to this day it had been found wholly impossible to get the harbours made, because no one could show how the money was to be provided. Everybody admitted they would be desirable; but the number of desirable things on which the nation had set its heart was so great that the desirable things of the few were crushed down under the rush for other desirable things on which a larger number of people had set their hearts. It was very far from true that the Government of India had altogether neglected the harbours of India. Kurrachee had cost, first and last, nearly £400,000, and would cost much more. This was no inconsiderable share of the money which the India Government could reasonably appropriate to the work of harbour improvement. Carwar had cost more than £70,000, and a good deal had been spent at Cochin, in the Hooghley, and elsewhere. But in India much more was thought about the land than about the sea. The mere fact of the Government of India having asked them to send out the engineer, about whose instructions the hon. Baronet asked, showed that his remarks had been anticipated by the suggestions of persons connected with that Government. Mr. Robertson was appointed to prosecute inquiries with a view to the improvement of some of the minor harbours on the Indian coast. The Indian authorities, however, in this country were not in possession of his instructions. Mr. Robertson was directed to report himself to the Government of India, and to receive his instructions from it, except as regards the harbour of Aden, with respect to which he was put in communication with the Government of Bombay. Then as to lights; no doubt, the coast of India was indifferently lighted. There was a light about every 70 miles, from the Indus round to the south of Burmah; but we ought to have more, say one every 50 miles. For instance, Dwarka Point, Viziadroog, Deria Bahadur Ghur in our own territory, and Jinjeera and Enciam Island in non-British territory, were places where it was very desirable that lights should be placed. The establishing of lights at all these places, and at many others, however, was a mere question of time and opportunity, and, above all, of the relative urgency of the demands upon the purse of the Government; but Rome was not built in a day, and they could not do everything at once. It only remained for him to add a few words with reference to the points raised by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley). He (Mr. Grant Duff) was obliged to admit that the Indian marine surveys were in anything but a satisfactory condition, forming a most remarkable contrast to the land surveys. Up to about a generation ago this was very far from being the case, the marine surveying work, which was done in the first 40 years of this century along the Indian Coasts, being very creditable. Then, however, the service began to languish; and in 1861, when the passion for incorporating all Indian things with the things of the Imperial Government was at its height, the whole of the Indian marine surveys were, or were meant to be, handed over to the Admiralty; and the then Secretary of State in Council announced to the then Viceroy that all future surveys and charts would proceed from the Royal Navy at Imperial expense. Whether, however, the Admiralty ever definitely accepted the full responsibility with which the Secretary of State in Council believed that it had become charged was another question. It was enough to say that nothing had been done by the Admiralty to satisfy Indian surveying requirements, and that a great deal of marine surveying work was very urgently needed. The attention of the present Secretary of State in Council having been recently called to this most important matter, a despatch was just about to be sent to India, pointing out the pressing necessity of attending to it, and he hoped the Government would lose no time in informing the Home Government of its views as to what surveys are most wanted to correct and complete the existing charts of the Indian Seas and Coasts. He quite agreed in what the hon. Member had said of the importance of marine surveys, and was very glad that this conversation in the House of Commons should synchronize with, and give further emphasis to the despatch of the Secretary of State in Council.

OBSERVATIONS. RESOLUTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH rose to call attention to the New Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, and now lying upon the Table of the House. Considering that the New Code contained so much that was of importance, he thought he need not apologize for calling the attention of the House to the subject, although, owing to his inexperience of debate, he might fail to make it interesting or attractive. By the Education Act of last year Parliament provided that the quantity of education given in England and Wales should be greatly increased; and by the Minute which the Education Department had recently issued the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. W. E. Forster) had very properly attempted to provide that the quality of the education given in schools aided by the State should be of a satisfactory character. It would be difficult to say which of these tasks—providing for an increase of schools or framing regulations to ensure a good quality of instruction—was the more important. For his own part, he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman—and had no doubt that the House would join him in this—for the admirable provisions he had introduced into the New Code. But he thought it would be more profitable that, instead of dwelling upon the excellencies of the Code, he should call attention to certain points where he thought the right hon. Gentleman had either left undone that which he ought to have done, or had even done that which he ought not to have done. He must, however, first express his delight at finding that this was an absolutely New Code, and not merely a revision of previous revisions of the Revised Code. The first subject to which he desired to address himself was that of infant schools. Hardly any portion of our school organization was more important. Now, he much regretted that, as no Government grant was to be given for children under four years of age, such infants would be practically excluded from these schools. No doubt there was a great deal of truth in the view of the right hon. Gentleman, that infant schools were places where instruction should be given, and not where infants should simply be taken care of. But he thought he could successfully argue that for the sake of education children should be attracted to school before the age of four; and he asked what child of four could be more easily taught—that which came straight from the gutter, or one that had been in the baby-class, and there learned habits of obedience, cleanliness, and order? Again, he would ask if it were intended to exclude from school all children under four years of age, who were to take care of them? He feared that in a great many cases elder sisters would be kept away from school to look after younger children, and, probably, both would spend their time in the gutter. The 400 masters and mistresses who had recently met at King's College had but one feeling—namely, that it was most desirable to afford every encouragement to children to go to an infant school at an early age. He would pass on to the subject of the increased number of attendances required at day schools. This was a provision of which he approved; but he wished to suggest whether the form of the provision would not tend to cause neglect of children whose attendance was irregular? From the Returns which had been moved for by the right hon.

Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) it appeared that 20 per cent of the children presented for examination by day schools in England and Wales did not come up to the requisite number of 250 attendances; and he would suggest that there should be two rates of grant—the higher for children who gave 250 attendances, and the lower for those who could not attend so often, but yet came 200 times in the year. His next point had reference to evening schools. This, he thought, was a very important branch of the subject. The evening schools seemed to have three functions. First, they had to keep alive in one class of children the instruction which had been given to them in the day school. To a second class they had to give elementary education in history, geography, and grammar, and similar subjects; supplementary to that given in the day school. And to a third and higher class of scholars they had to impart instruction in science and art. He hoped that before long the first of these functions would disappear, but, meanwhile, it must not be despised; for, although there would be a progressive rise in evening schools, they had at present to perform a humble work which ought not to be undervalued. With respect to that portion of their work which was supplementary to the education of the day schools, this Code would, he feared, absolutely extinguish the small rural schools, while it gave no support to the higher class of elementary evening schools such as existed in large numbers in Lancashire and Yorkshire. He thought that grants ought to be given for the work which was supplementary to that of the day schools. The right hon. Gentleman proposed, under Schedule 4, to give an additional grant to day schools for instruction in higher subjects; but he did not extend the provision to evening schools for adults, as it would seem that he ought a fortiori to do. The provision, that no scholar over 18 years of age should earn a grant for evening schools, he thought a great mistake. By-and-by there would probably be such a demand for adult education that no such encouragement would be necessary; but at present, at all events, he hoped this limit would be removed. It might be said that elementary education ought not to continue beyond the age of 18; but his answer was that such a rule would tend to stop all elementary education which did not go beyond that of the day schools; and under the Code itself it was intended that a boy who had in the day school passed in any standard could not be examined in the same or a lower one in an evening school. The provisions with respect to the number of meetings and attendances at evening schools deserved the attentive consideration of the House, for the Vice President expected far too much from them. Under the Revised Code the number of attendances required to qualify a scholar to be present at an examination was 24, but under the New Code it was raised to 50; and while, under the former, 40 school meetings were required before an inspection could take place, under the latter 80 meetings were necessary. The Returns issued that morning showed that only 56·6 meetings were on the average held now by schools in receipt of the Government grant, and therefore the sudden increase to 80 seemed too bold. A clergyman residing in a rural district near the borough he had the honour to represent had written to him a letter in which he said that for 10 years he had laboured both summer and winter to support evening schools; but under the New Code he would have to give them up, or do the work and find the money too. His own experience was that the same result would follow in the manufacturing districts, and that it would be found impossible to comply with the demands of the Code. To comply with the conditions as they stood at present, a school held only two nights a-week would have to meet during 40 weeks of the year, and a school held three nights a-week would have to meet for 27 weeks in order to earn the grant, and this seemed impracticable. The meeting of schoolmasters and mistresses to which he had referred was unanimous upon this point—that if so many attendances were required at evening schools they would be practically extinguished; he therefore hoped that the number of attendances would be reduced to 40 and the number of meetings to 60. He much regretted that provision had not been made to have separate teaching staffs for the morning and evening schools, for with a single staff it was impossible that justice should be done to both. He had hoped that the right

hon. Gentleman would either have acted upon the old Code which prohibited a master of evening schools from teaching in a day school on the afternoon of the same day, or — which would be much better—that there should be an itinerating organizing master, who should have charge of a group of evening schools, teaching in each one or two nights a-week. This plan had been tried with considerable effect in that part of the country in which he himself resided. He regretted that under the New Code Miss Burdett Coutts's plan as to rural schools was to be given up, when he had hoped that the principle of it would have been extended to evening schools. There was one alteration introduced into the Code which he thought was a great improvement, and that was that the plan of the Revised Code for a sham examination conducted by managers should be given up, and that something like a real examination was to be substituted for it; but he regretted that there was not to be a regular annual inspection of evening schools with a view to their receiving the Government grant. He would say a few words as to the system of standards. There was nothing to which the teachers more strongly objected than the provisions continued from the Revised Code, by the 27th Article, under which it was provided that no scholar might be presented a second time for examination under the same standard. What was the meaning of this? It meant that there should be a rigid, artificial, uniform rate of progress for every child, whether he were dull or clever, full-time or half-time, industrious or idle. The child must advance exactly at the proper rate or the highest grant could not be obtained. A clever, industrious, full-time child would be held back, because if the teacher were to present him in too high a standard he would run the risk of losing the grant for a year; and as his object was to get the maximum grant by presenting the child under six successive standards for six successive years, he would never allow the child to have what they used to call at Harrow "a double remove." The dull child and the half-timer would be pushed on, and presented each year in a higher standard than last, and still pushed on, though failing in each; and these successive failures must have a most demoralizing effect upon the child.

The teachers' meeting passed a resolution, which suggested that the article should be so altered that the child who had failed might be presented again and re-examined in the same standard with the view of obtaining the grant. By Articles 30 and 31 of the New Code, it was provided that after the 31st of March, 1873, no day scholar above four, nor evening scholar above 13 should be examined in Standard I., and so on; and this was very much objected to by teachers. He would suggest that these regulations should apply only to cases where school boards had been elected, and had adopted a by-law to enforce attendance. He must now say a word as to pupil-teachers. No separate payment was to be made to teachers for the instruction of pupil-teachers, and, consequently, there would be no part of their duty which would be more likely to be neglected. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would make it a condition of the grant that managers should set aside part of it as a payment to the teacher for the instruction of pupil-teachers. There was another subject of much importance—the giving of good-service pensions to teachers; and he regretted that his right hon. Friend had not seen his way to make some provision for the old age of teachers. The inducements to enter this profession were, at present, lamentably small, and parents, he believed, were by no means willing that their children should seek in that direction for their livelihood. The temptations for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses to quit the profession, too, were, at all times, considerable. The establishment, therefore, of a really good system of superannuation pensions would do much to promote the excellence and efficiency of this deserving class of public servants. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) had given Notice of a Motion, the second part of which, if adopted, would work great injustice to many of the best schools; it was that the voluntary contributions should amount to one-third of the Parliamentary grant, or else that the Parliamentary grant should be proportionately reduced. But cases might easily be conceived where, owing to a pressing need for expenditure, the private contributions, in one year, might actually flow in so as to equal the grant, and yet, in the year following, on account of the very largeness of the expenditure in the previous year, they might fall to a point below one-third of the Parliamentary grant; which, accordingly, would have, under the Motion, to be reduced in amount. His hon. Friend would see, therefore, that even in cases where voluntary contributions were forthcoming to a sufficient amount, reckoning two or three years together, his Motion would inflict a very grave injury. In conclusion, he would recapitulate the Amendments to the New Code which he would venture to urge upon the Government. The first was the omission of the limit of age in infant schools to children of four and upwards; the second was the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Assheton Cross) as to the limit of age to 18, and as to the number of meetings and attendances in evening schools; thirdly, the modification of Article 21 so as to extend to evening schools the grant in respect of higher educational subjects; fourthly, the omission of Article 29, so far as it related to scholars who had failed in two of the three rudiments; fifthly, the limitation of Articles 30 and 31 to districts where attendance is compulsory; sixthly, provision for payment to teachers for the instruction of pupil-teachers; and, lastly, a provision for pensions to schoolmasters and schoolmistresses.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that he rose immediately after the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed them (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), because of the peculiar position which they found themselves in in reference to this discussion of the New Code. There were a number of Notices of Amendments on the Paper, yet, under the peculiar circumstances of discussing this question on going into Committee of Supply, it was impossible that they should be moved, and, consequently, hon. Members would not have a proper opportunity of offering Amendments on the New Code. It would, perhaps, be better if the New Code had been before the House for a longer period. It only came before the House on the 17th of February, and of course it would take a long time to circulate through the country. The managers of thousands of village schools were interested in the subject, and many would not receive the Code until, perhaps, a fortnight or three weeks after its publication. The only course hon. Members could pursue on the present occasion was to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council on Education the objections they entertained to the Code; because, if the Amendments they desired could not be made before the Code became law, they would be compelled to take steps by Resolution or otherwise thereafter. There was one satisfactory part of this question—that was that the night-school part of the Code would not come into operation for some time; and no doubt, therefore, they would have an opportunity of bringing forward Motions; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider that part of the Code, and bring it more into conformity with the wishes of the country. With respect to infant schools, there was some doubt in the country as to the meaning of the Code. One section said the children attending such schools were to be above four and under seven years of age at the date of inspection. Therefore, children might attend the schools when they were only three years old. It would seem, however, according to the 25th section, that no grant or allowance would be made in respect of the attendances of a child under four; by that it would seem that these attendances would not be reckoned although the child might have reached the age of four at the time of the examination. He wished to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what would be the effect of that section. He should himself read the two together, and say that as to a child who was four at the time of the examination its attendance would count. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER dissented.] Then he wanted to know what advantage was got from bringing these children up for inspection. If their attendances were reckoned then there would be a certain amount of grant. He had understood, certainly, that a grant would be given for the attendance of every child in the school. He quite concurred in the propriety of not making Government grants for mere baby attendance, because in such cases no instruction could really be given. He had himself seen children two years old brought to school. The question really was how soon valuable instruction could be given to children? He now came to the question of attendance; and, after looking at the Return which was issued that morning, and for which he moved the other day, he must admit there was not much to be said against the 250 attendances. As to pupil-teachers, he understood his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) to say that Amendments would be made to meet the difficulty; and therefore would say no more upon that. He now came to the important subject of the night schools, on which he had received communications from every part of the country, mainly from the rural districts. As a rule, the writers agreed in saying it was impossible for them under the present conditions, or under the conditions which the New Code would impose, to get a night school together as many as 80 times in the course of a year. The Return containing the figures with respect to night schools showed that, though a certain number were open as often as 80 times in the year, yet in the rural districts such a thing never occurred. It was stated in the Return that 2,504 evening schools were examined last year, and that they met altogether 141,890 times, so that each school met on the average 56 odd times. He admitted that in towns there might be 80 openings of a night school in the twelvemonth; but in the rural districts this could not be done, as many of the scholars had to come from a considerable distance, and the time of year during which they could attend was very limited. It should also be borne in mind that, in country places, people went to bed wonderfully early. Every inducement should be offered to working people to keep up their knowledge by their attendance at evening schools, for, even if nothing more than that were accomplished, the schools would do a work which would be most valuable to the State. It was said that the effect of the New Code would be to close 2,000 out of the 2,500 night schools that were inspected last year. He did not say that the managers would not make efforts to keep them open; he was speaking only as far as Government aid was concerned. This was not the view of managers only; but an Inspector wrote that it was “a monstrous and untenable proposition to require 80 meetings of a night school, and that the provision would extinguish every night school in his district.” His pockets were full of letters on the subject, and no doubt many hon. Members had received similar communications. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) that the question of attendances required revision, but that did not necessarily involve going back to the provisions of the old Code. For a few months longer, under its provision, only 24 attendances at evening meetings would be required; but the jump from 24 to 50 was too great; and he should be satisfied with what was asked for by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire—60 openings of the school and 40 attendances. He wished to know how, under the New Code, scholars at night schools were to be examined—for these scholars were mainly young men and boys who were at work all day, and who could not be called away to centres of inspection or examination. Unless 20 scholars were collected at a particular place there could be no inspection there, and there were villages which could not, possibly, muster 20 night scholars. Of course the examination ought to be a real one; but the Inspectors ought to be brought to the spot. The scholars were all persons earning wages, and therefore under the Code there could be no examination without subjecting them to loss. The New Code seemed to omit altogether standards of examination for evening scholars, and it did not provide for their examination in higher subjects. The reduction of the grant by its excess above 15s. per scholar, according to the average attendance, was a limitation which would deprive a number of schools of any advancement; for there were great variations in the proportions between the average attendance and the number sent in for examination. He had received a statement respecting a school in which there were no infants, the master of which calculated that he would not be able to earn anything for extra subjects because the 15s. limitation would come in; and it really seemed that it would be impossible under the New Code for a school to obtain the maximum of the grant. There was thus, practically, no encouragement to go beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic. Then as to the grants to elementary schools—the Resolutions which prefaced the New Code, said the Code of 1870 would determine grants payable up to the 31st of March next, and the New Code those which fell due on and after the 30th of April; and the question therefore arose what was to become of the month of April. Nobody knew whether it was to be under the old or the New Code. As Standard II. in the Old Code was Standard I. in the New Code, on the 1st of May children who entered the school in May last year were to be examined; but it seemed to be unreasonable that children who were now being trained to pass the lower standard should be called upon to pass the higher one at short notice, and that children who had not been examined before should be placed on a footing with those who had been previously examined. He hoped his right hon. Friend would make provision of some months to get the children up to the proper mark for passing the examination, as it was hard that they should be cut off from the Government grant. With regard to the girls being put in the same position as the boys, he reminded his right hon. Friend that girls had to be taught needle-work and cutting out, and yet they were required to be brought up to the same standard of arithmetic as boys, which hardly seemed fair. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: They are much sharper.] Assuming, with the right hon. Gentleman, that girls were sharper than boys, the right hon. Gentleman was not consistent, for in the case of the pupil-teachers, he found that the females were always kept a year behind the males in arithmetic. The right hon. Gentleman had said that in the schools the girls must be kept up to the same standard as the boys; but if he would look at pages 14 and 15 of the New Code, he would find that in the second year the male pupil-teachers were to go as far as Vulgar Fractions, whereas the females were only to go as far as Proportion; that in the third year the males were to go as far as Decimal Fractions, and to the end of the 16th proposition in Book I. of Euclid, whereas the females were only to go as far as Vulgar Fractions; and that in the fourth year the males were required to go as far as Algebra, while the females had to go as far as Decimal Fractions only. He quoted these figures because he thought that they would show that the right hon. Gentleman was inconsistent in requiring that the girls in the schools should be kept up to the same standard as the boys, when he made a distinction between the male and female pupil-teachers.

He was aware that it was said that when the higher branches of arithmetic were reached it was impossible to maintain an equal standard for both males and females, because the former had so much more time to devote to this peculiar branch of study than the latter had at their disposal; but did not that observation apply to the boys and girls in the schools as well as to the pupil-teachers? Upon the subject of the time that ought to be allowed for religious instruction, he thought that some deduction should be made in the hours devoted in the afternoon to secular instruction, in order to permit the children to receive religious instruction without unduly detaining them at school towards evening. It should be recollected that many of the smaller children had to go miles along clayey roads to get home, and that in the short winter days they frequently did not reach home until it became dark. In riding through country districts he had found the children returning from school towards dusk run miles after his horse for the sake of company on the journey. He should suggest that a quarter of an hour should be deducted from the afternoon secular instruction, in which religious instruction could be given. He found, on looking at the Code, that certain regulations were to apply to the "rural districts," and he should be glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman whether that term applied to small country towns as well as purely agricultural districts. He should also be obliged by the right hon. Gentleman explaining distinctly the date at which inspection on religious subjects would cease, as there appeared to be some uncertainty with respect to that subject. He understood it came to an end on the 30th April. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: On the 31st March.] He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Education Department, whose zeal in the cause of education he fully appreciated, would accept the remarks he had thought it to be his duty to make in the spirit in which they were addressed to him, and that after having passed such a great educational measure, which everybody in the country appeared to be endeavouring to carry out not only in its letter, but in its spirit, he would not stint its operation by attempting to save a few pounds annually in grants.

MR. DENT said, that it was only by

going into these questions of detail that they could see how the Education Act could be best carried into operation. He thought that the New Code was, taken altogether, an improvement on the former. He thought, for instance, that increasing the number of attendances would prove of great advantage, and one that could be easily carried out. He thought, also, that the raising of the standards was quite right. With respect to the smaller districts, in the borough which he represented (Scarborough), where there was a large population engaged chiefly in fishing, the children were largely employed during the summer in waiting upon the visitors; whereas they were almost entirely at leisure during the winter months, and therefore it would be a great boon if, as in the rural districts, they were to be excused from attendance at school during the summer, on the understanding that they should make up for lost time during the winter, provided they were able to pass a certain examination. The regulations for examinations should be made rather more stringent, in order that all children who were qualified by their number of attendances should be compelled to come up for examination. By this means not the merit of a selected few of the children, but that of the whole school, would be ascertained. The clause was rather more strong as regarded the pupil-teachers, which he was glad to see, because he thought that hitherto the teaching power had been inferior to what it ought to be. As regarded evening schools, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) complained there was no provision for the examination of boys in the higher standards. But he (Mr. Dent) thought it was scarcely right to ask the country to pay for the education of the poorer classes beyond the point of the sixth standard. He thought that when they reached that they ought to provide their further education at their own expense. He approved the change that had been made in the method of examining in the schools, because he did not think that the examinations ought to be left entirely in the hands of their managers. He concurred entirely in the views that had been expressed respecting infant schools; for unless these were supported the older girls would be kept at home in order to look after the little ones. Again, children ought to be encouraged to learn their lessons out of school, which was seldom done at present—there was very little pains taken to teach the children at home. He hoped the plan of insisting upon two hours in each day being devoted to secular instruction would have the effect of putting a stop to the too prevalent practice among schoolmasters of allowing parents to curtail the hours of their children's attendance at school. With regard to the extra subjects, he thought a better plan than that proposed by the Government would be to grant 1*s.* a-head for each of such subjects, as the 15*s.* per head could be obtained without the extra subjects. With respect to the Motion shortly to be moved in reference to denominational schools, he hoped the House would remember the words of the Act of last Session, and not overweight one class of schools as against another, but let them start fair and run an equal race.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would confine his remarks to the question of night schools, in reference to which he had placed a Notice on the Paper. He was perfectly willing to leave the whole matter in the hands of the Vice President of the Council, because he was sure that an expression of the general feeling of the House on the subject would have as much weight as a Division in its favour. There were 2,500 of these schools scattered about the country, and they were attended by between 90,000 and 100,000 pupils. An impression had been abroad in many places that there was not the same discipline in night schools as there was in day schools; and that, considering the length of time they had been established, and the amount of money that had been spent upon them, they had not accomplished as much good as might be expected of them. The observation was, to some extent, true. They could not be looked upon as part of the regular army of education; they must be regarded as a volunteer contingent; but they had, nevertheless, done good work. He was very far from saying that it would not be wise to enforce on the night schools more discipline than they had hitherto; but if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) thought that by putting them—to continue the simile—under martial law, as was proposed by the New Code—he should improve them, he thought he was mistaken, and that the effect would be to extinguish them altogether in the rural districts. For instance, he thought it would be impossible for night schools in rural districts to be open 80 times in the year, which was the number of times set down in the Code as entitling the schools to receive grants. From the nature of the employment in which rural populations were engaged, and for other reasons incident to their mode of life, the children could only attend school during the 26 weeks of the late autumn and winter, and three times in each week was as often as the pupils could be expected to attend or the schoolmaster to teach—for it must be remembered that in country places there would be only one master to look after both day and night schools. Deducting from these 26 weeks three weeks for holydays at Christmas, there remained only 69 nights. For these reasons he had put upon the Paper his proposal that the night schools being open on 60 nights in the year should be entitled to a grant. The second point was the attendance of children at night schools. He was quite willing to admit that 24 attendances was too little to enable a child to get a grant; but to raise the attendances from 24 to 50 was a pressure which the schools would not bear. Many of the children had a mile or two to go after work was over, when they might be wet, tired, and hungry from their daily toil in the field, and going to school might involve a further walk of one or two miles. He had been requested by the hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. Brogden) to state that in the mining districts, where people worked alternately day and night, it would be absolutely impossible for them to attend the evening schools, and so get a grant. He also hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider that provision in the Code which limited the age of persons who should be permitted to attend night schools to 18. Now that they were extending the advantages of education to all the youth of the country they ought, instead of diminishing, rather to increase the educational opportunities of adults who had not enjoyed the same advantages in their younger days. If this were not done, it would follow in many cases that parents would be put in the painful position of being unable to assist their children in prosecuting their studies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say they were for extending the payment of taxes; but his (Mr. Cross's) answer was, that it was false economy to grudge the money spent in educating those who wished to be educated. They had better spend the money in education than in gaols and lunatic asylums; and, in the long run, the taxpayers would find that the education money had been well laid out. He did not ask hon. Members to be generous—he only asked them to be just. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give way on the subject of the night schools.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR: I am glad my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) has given us an opportunity of discussing the Revised Code. On the second reading of the Scotch Education Bill, I took the opportunity of expressing my appreciation of its great advance upon preceding Codes. There is a characteristic feature in it which should not escape attention, because it happens to be an omission. I allude to the disappearance of the condition in Article 4 of the old Code, that grants were to be limited to the children of the manual labour class. This omission becomes a necessity when schools are supported by rates, for every ratepayer has a right to use the school for which he pays. Now, I know of nothing so important to education and to the social habits of the people as the abolition of this class distinction in relation to education. It has never existed in Scotch schools, and the consequence is that they contain all classes of the community. No English Members would venture to tell the House, as I am enabled to do with pride, and without a particle of humiliation, that my elementary education was obtained at a Scotch parish school—sitting side by side with the children of working men, and at the same time with the sons of the middle classes and gentlemen in the town in which I lived. This admixture of classes has the most admirable effect on the social condition of the people. It draws out the sympathy of class with class, improves the tone of the scholars, and elevates largely the standards of teaching. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council on having withdrawn that restriction to united education, and I venture to assure the House that no change in the Code will ultimately be productive of so much educational as well as social improvement. I wish that I could speak with equal approval of other omissions in the Code. It is with great regret that I see such little provision made for the promotion of music in our schools. Anyone with educational experience knows what a powerful adjunct singing is to the power of the teacher. It has a softening influence on the whole educational system, and tends to unite together the several divisions of the school, and to produce a harmony in the general work. I know the difficulties of admitting singing into the system of the Code. Payments are now based on individual examination, and the appraising a standard of singing is not easy in itself, and may not always be within the qualifications of every Inspector. But though there is a difficulty, it need not be insuperable, and may possibly be overcome by Inspectors of special subjects. Drill and physical training stand in the same position as to difficulty of individual appraisement; but they are highly desirable to encourage in all schools. The new Code does recognize them after a fashion, by allowing drill to count for attendance; but this need of encouragement is far below its importance as an educational agency. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. R. Torrens) has already drawn the attention of the House to the importance of encouraging this branch of instruction as a means of teaching military discipline at a non-productive age, and thus adding to our defensive powers. I fully appreciate this line of argument, for we have the large experience of Switzerland and Germany in its favour, and we see Holland and various other countries imitating their example. But it is in relation to the effects of drill and gymnastics on the employments of civil life that the subject most commends itself to my mind. An urban school especially is made up of very discordant elements, which are difficult to unite in discipline and work for a common object. Nothing aids the master so much in his efforts at mental training as having prompt habits of obedience and harmonious working among his pupils. Drill gives these habits in far quicker time than the mere discipline of school classes. It is therefore a powerful educational means for the promotion of learning, as well as for the development and improvement of the physical condition of the pupils. Those who remember the former condition of Union schools, and their present state since drill has been introduced, will know what I mean. We have a set of Union boys of the lowest physical condition—ill-fed, and stunted in growth—who on the old system of instruction used to give a most unprofitable outcome. When their schooling was ended, more than one-half were returned on the funds of the Union as unprofitable servants—not worthy of being retained by the employers of labour. Now, Mr. Tuffnell, the Inspector of Union schools, tells us that the obedient, well-drilled boys of the best Union schools, taught to work together, and therefore to labour in unison with others, are in active demand by employers of labour, and that not more than 5 per cent, instead of 50 to 60 per cent, are returned as useless servants. I trust that the subject of physical training will receive more direct recognition in the Code than it has now obtained. It is a question of great importance to this country how we are to counteract the physical deterioration of the people incident to overcrowded urban populations. Taking away the children from their homes to keep them in crowded schoolrooms will not mitigate the evil. But a combination of physical with mental training will operate favourably and simultaneously on the development both of mind and body. Let me remind the Vice President that this object was contemplated in the original Minute of 1839 under these words—

“Besides the physical training of the children in various employments, such exercises are to be introduced during the hours of recreation as will develop their strength and activity.”

These wise words have been forgotten for a whole generation. The objections which have been brought against the rules for evening schools are partly valid, but partly invalid. Elementary evening schools for adults ought to have no existence at all in a well-educated country. In other nations such schools are chiefly improvement schools, and are devoted to secondary subjects, especially relating to those branches of science and art which bear on the occupations of the people. In another generation we may hope that mere elementary evening schools will disappear from the Code altogether, and be substituted by secondary improvement schools, to enable working people to apply that elementary education which they have got in the day school. But as the imperfect state of education among our population compels us to have these elementary evening schools as a temporary measure, let us consider how they may be made most effective. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) that it is a hard thing for a master who teaches in the day to teach—even though it is optional—in the evening, and that it would be better for the efficiency of both day and evening schools that they were taught by different masters. But how are you at present to obtain certificated masters for both systems? Now, it is with the utmost difficulty that you can obtain a supply for the demand coming upon you. That demand represents 15,000 new masters, besides that due to waste, which in itself is difficult to meet, and the supply is far from equal to our wants. But as Parliamentary grants can only be given to certificated masters, you must either be content with no evening schools, or you must allow day masters to serve for a term in evening schools. A separate staff for them in the form of peripatetic masters would be undesirable—at least to a great extent—unless you could absorb them rapidly into day schools; for these, if they fulfil their mission, will soon render elementary evening schools altogether unnecessary. But as long as they are requisite, I agree with the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross) that the attendances exacted are too great, and hope that the Vice President is prepared to modify this rule, 60 meetings and 40 attendances being sufficient in most districts, though a higher number might be attained in urban schools. The discussion this evening illustrates the inconvenience of which I have often complained in this House—that there is no proper connection between the Elementary Education Department and that for science and art. My right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council has to ride two horses at one and the same time. But the feat is a difficult one from the tendency of the separate horses to diverge in their path. If there were a more thorough understanding between these educational Departments, the question as to evening schools would be susceptible of easy solution. It ought to be the aim of one Department gradually to lessen the elementary character of such schools, and to induce the other to convert them into improvement schools as quickly as the growing education of the country renders them unnecessary in their lower capacity. With this view, it is scarcely comprehensible why the Code does not extend the special subjects of higher instruction to evening as well as to day schools. This is the scheme followed in most of the Continental States, and accounts for the higher education in matters relating to science and art which you observe among the working classes of other countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) has an Amendment on the Paper to which too much importance cannot be attached. Our day schools are cumbered with entrants having no sort of similarity in their attainments. The master is therefore perplexed in his classification, and in the distribution of time, which he should devote to the lowest and to the highest subjects of school teaching. Children of five years of age should be able to step into the middle of Standard I at once, and ought not to waste the time of the master by obliging him to teach them the alphabet and pot-hooks. Infant schools for children of from three to five years of age may relieve the day school of all this drudgery, and give a great impulse to more thorough education during the legal ages, when attendance may be enforced. The Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend has this object in view, and I hope that his purpose—if not his words—will be adopted by the Government. The marked feature of the present Code is the admission into English schools of the specific subjects of higher instruction placed in Schedule 4 of the Code. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) is, I think, right in pointing out that the Code does not at present give any surety that this provision will necessarily be taken much advantage of, for, as the maximum of 15s. can be won by the lower subjects and by attendances, what inducement is afforded for teaching the higher branches? Nevertheless, teaching them is of great importance. This is not an untried experiment. It has been the practice of Scotch schools for two centuries, and has been productive of the most admirable effects. The three R's are the tools of education, and these specific subjects are the means by which you show the children how to use these tools in the work of their future life. This gives a vitality to schools which invigorates every part of them. It removes the dismal verbalism which, like tares, chokes the growth of wheat, and substitutes conceptions for words. But it is necessary to prevent these higher subjects from displacing the lower ones. I think, therefore, that it is a wise provision in the Code that they should only be paid for in the case of pupils who have given ample evidence that they have acquired elementary instruction to the fullest extent that is available in the schools. There is much more in the Revised Code to which I would gladly have alluded; but I have said enough to indicate a general appreciation of the care and wisdom with which it has been revised on the present occasion, and to point out the direction in which improvements may be made upon it even now, and especially when we are again called in another year to consider its revision.

MR. DIXON expressed his approval of the more stringent conditions of the grants, but regretted that the New Code did not contain grants graduated in such a manner as to give the largest amount of support to the best schools, and a smaller amount to the inferior ones. At the present moment every good school could earn the very large grant which was to be allowed under the New Code, while there were many bad schools which were unable to do so; but hereafter the latter would in all probability be in a position to earn the full grant, and consequently the motive exciting to excellence would disappear. He quite concurred in the opinion that had been expressed on that point by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, and it had been confirmed since the commencement of the debate by a memorial emanating from a meeting of school managers that had been held at Birmingham, and which he had just received; the memorialists strongly urging that the mode in which the Code would operate would be to discourage the teaching of extra subjects, as the necessary limit could be attained without it. It pointed out, with perfect truth, that as the full grant would be earned by proficiency in the lower subjects, the stimulus to acquiring the higher ones would cease to exist. As an illustration of his argument he would take the case of a school now capable of containing 400 children. That school might, if well managed, have an average attendance of 400, and it would, under those circumstances, derive no advantage from the New Code. But in another school also capable of containing 400 children, in which the teaching was of an inferior description, and the average attendance only 300, the result under the Revised Code would be that, without any improvement whatsoever in the management of the school, or the merits of the teaching, it might get the full sum which the better schools only now received, because in all our large towns, and ultimately throughout the whole country, compulsory attendance would be established as a rule. Last year he had protested against the intention of the Government to increase the grants to denominational schools, and it was undeniable that the effect of the Bill had been much more denominational—not only than he himself but than anyone else had expected, including even the Vice President of the Council. In the agricultural districts—in fact everywhere, except in the large towns—there had been lately a great multiplication of voluntary schools in order to avoid the necessity for school boards. The Vice President of the Council had himself admitted that the applications for building grants were now ten times as great as the former average; while in one district—Leeds—it was reported that there would henceforth be no room for undenominational schools. There were throughout England thousands of voluntary and denominational schools of a very inferior description never visited by the Government Inspectors, and not receiving Government grants. Every one of these inferior schools ought to have become rate schools to be managed by the ratepayers. But the result of the Act of 1870 would be that these thousands of schools would remain denominational. The effect, then, of that Act might be stated to be greatly to increase the number of denominational schools, and especially of Church schools. The Nonconformist Body would discover that the Act had been the means of bringing into existence a large number of new Church schools supported by Government money, and there would be a growing disposition on the part of the Nonconformists to look upon this as a new species of religious endowment, with a disastrous result, moreover, from an educational point of view. There was good reason for saying that rate schools would be of a superior class to these voluntary schools. There were two reasons for thinking so. Rate schools would always have a sufficient amount of funds to keep them in a state of efficiency, and they would always be managed by representatives who would act under the control of public opinion and the constituent body. These elements would be wanting in the voluntary schools, and therefore, as a rule, they would be inferior schools. The Act of 1870 would have an unfortunate tendency to multiply and continue denominational schools, instead of making every new school a rate school, managed by the representatives of the public. There were three additions which he should like to see made to the Revised Code. The first and most important recognized the soundness of the principle that no grant should be given to the denominational school unless the subscribers to that school found one-sixth of the total cost. He did not think it was a right thing to allow irresponsible managers to have the control of funds almost entirely, and in some cases exclusively, provided by the fees of the children on the one hand, and the Government grant on the other. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council stated last year the reason why he could not accept such a proposition—namely, that these schools were some of the best in the country, and that it was clear either that the parents had a good deal to do with the management, or that they had great confidence in the managers. To this he would reply that the success of a school depended mainly upon the teacher, and that if the schools referred to by his right hon. Friend had been all transferred to the school boards the teachers would have been continued and the schools have remained as good as before. There were, however, a great many schools under voluntary management that were receiving few or no subscriptions which were badly managed, and these more than counterbalanced the schools which, under similar circumstances, were well managed. When this system came to be carried out side by side with the rate schools there would be created a natural dissatisfaction at finding the voluntary denominational schools under the close and exclusive management of one or two individuals who might be honourable, high-minded, and much interested in education, but who would be likely to act in accordance with their own notions. That the taxpayers and the parents of the children attending the schools should be represented on the board of management, whenever the subscriptions and donations failed to reach 1s. 6d. of the cost of the school, was the opinion of the Prime Minister himself, as expressed in his speeches during the Education debates of last year. On the 16th of June, in the debate on going into Committee, Mr. Gladstone said—

"It is said that the expense of educating a child in an efficient secular school is 30s., of which it may be said one-third is now provided by the Privy Council, one-third from voluntary sources, and one-third by payments from the children. We think that if to the third which is now dispensed the half of the second third were added, subject to the strict conditions which I have described with regard to secular education, the voluntary schools would have no reason to complain."—[3 Hansard, cclii. 280.]

Namely, to complain if left to provide one-sixth by subscriptions. Further on, in that same speech, the Prime Minister said—

"The augmentation would be within a maximum of 50 per cent. It might not be so much; but taking it at about that amount, I think if our propositions be acceded to we may fairly require the promoters of voluntary schools to supply from their own resources and the pence of the children what, with the grant from the Exchequer, will enable them to perfectly well stand in competition with the rated schools."—[Ibid. 282.]

In the adjourned debate on the 24th of June he reiterated these opinions in the following words—

"If, therefore, we do well in holding ourselves detached from the responsibility for the giving of religious instruction in voluntary schools, we shall likewise take care that, under no circumstances, shall the public grants be allowed so to operate as entirely to supply, together with school-pence, the sum necessary to support those schools, and that there shall always remain a void which must be filled up by free private contributions, and without which, failing other sources of assistance, those schools would no longer deserve the character of voluntary."—[Ibid. 938.]

Another point to which he wished to direct attention was that the amount of the grant should be diminished by the amount of any endowments received by elementary schools. There was a provision to that effect in the old Code, and he should like to know from his right hon. Friend the Vice President why it had been omitted from the New Code. In the year ending August, 1869, the Church of England schools received £38,710 in endowments; Roman Catholic schools £406, and the British and Foreign, and other schools, £4,368. By discontinuing the deduction of these endowments from the amount of annual grants the Government would be called upon to pay an extra sum, which might amount to nearly £40,000 yearly, without any reason having been assigned for these increased grants. The third addition was that, in some cases, the income of a school exceeded the actual cost of the school. Now, Government should have the power to demand that a deduction be made from the grant equivalent to the excess of the income over the cost. He held that if the managers gave a fair statement of their income and expenditure, and the legitimate expenditure was smaller than the total income, the difference should be deducted from the grant. That was a fair and just arrangement to which nobody could object. The last portion of the Motion applied to the three points he had just submitted; the first portion of it was the redemption of a pledge he had given last year to resist any increased grants to denominational schools. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. RICHARD seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that such alterations be made in the New Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, and now lying upon the Table of this House, as shall prevent any increased scale of Grants of Public Money to Denominational Schools:

That in Article 32, after Section (a) 1, there be added 'Three times the amount of such subscriptions alone:'

That in Article 32, after Section (a), there be added—

- (b) The amount of any annual endowment;
- (c) The excess of the income of the school for the year from all sources over its expenditure in that year."

Mr. Dixon

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU commenced by offering three suggestions to the Vice President, which he thought would conduce to the convenience of the House if they were followed. The first was, that whenever an important Minute was laid on the Table, the Vice President should make a statement in explanation of it. When he (Lord Robert Montagu) occupied the office which the Vice President now more worthily fills, he understood that this was the rule of the office, which had never been broken, as it had been this year. This would manifestly be more convenient to the House than to lay a Minute on the Table in silence; for not only would the Members themselves understand it at once, without waiting for the Minute to be printed, and issued, and conned over in private, but also their constituents would understand it the next morning, and could, without loss of time, communicate with their representatives. The New Code must become law in a month after the date on which it was laid on the Table. It was three weeks after that date; and yet only just then had Members begun to hear a little of the feelings of their constituents on the subject. It took a fortnight for a Parliamentary Paper to reach the mind of the nation, and another week before the response could, in the very least degree, be heard. He suggested therefore that, in future, a statement should always be made whenever an important Minute was laid upon the Table of the House. The second suggestion was, that the rule which was embodied in the New Code, and which had appeared in every previous Code, should be scrupulously followed. The rule enacted that whenever a new Code were issued, it should be printed so as to show the deviations which were made in it from the Code which happened to be then in force. It would be so manifestly for the convenience of the House for this rule to be strictly followed, that he needed not, at any greater length, to enlarge upon the subject. The third suggestion was, that the Government should provide some convenient time for the debate of an important Minute, before the time at which it became law. A New Code was suddenly thrown upon the Table, at 4 o'clock, before Members had assembled; it might, perhaps, be issued the next morning; but when Members, who were eager upon the subject, came down to the House, they found that the Order Book was filled with Notices of Motions for every "independent Members' " night, before the fatal day upon which the Code became law. What was the consequence? Those who desired to urge the Government to make alterations in the law, rushed tumultuously to the Order Book to put down Motions on going into Supply on Friday. There, next morning, appeared a string of Amendments for Addresses to the Crown on the subject of the Code. On the present occasion, the first was that of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). He alone was able to move his Amendment; all the others, by the rules of the House, were precluded; and their Notices of Motion served no other purpose than that of the short placards at elections — namely, to state succinctly the opinions of the various candidates. He passed to the Motion under the consideration of the House, and the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) in moving it. The aim of both were the same — to abolish entirely all denominational schools. His speech was one continual wail—that the effect of the Bill of last year had been to make denominational schools crop up so that no room was left for his pet project of secular schools. He deplored the case of Leeds by name, because that there every corner was filled with denominational schools, and no space was left where he might plant a school which should exclude all religious teaching. It was very plain that the aim of the hon. Member, and of his party, was not to extend education, but to extend secular education only. Last year he (Lord Robert Montagu) had charged them with not desiring to educate the people, but with seeking only to keep from them every wholesome religious influence and instruction. His argument had been put aside and utterly rejected by the House. Yet now, in less than nine months, the child had come to the birth, and the party below the Gangway had revealed themselves in their true light—not as foster-nurses of education, but as the parents of national infidelity, and the excluders, as an illegitimate offspring, of religion from education. To what point was the Motion of the hon. Member directed in his eager desire to destroy denominational education? It was directed against the compromise of last year. It would be remembered by the House that the Prime Minister had proposed a compromise between the contending parties; he had accepted the Motion of the right hon. Member for Hampshire (Mr. Cowper-Temple) for the exclusion of religious teaching from rate-supported schools; and he had accepted the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) that denominational schools should be cut off from all connection with the school boards, and should not be empowered to receive assistance out of the school rates. This had been the portion of the compromise which was conceded to the party below the Gangway; and it had been made hard and fast, safe and secure, by insertion in the Act of last year. The part of the compromise—and a very inadequate share it was—which had been conceded to the denominationalists, was that the maximum grants to all schools, both secular and denominational, should be increased 50 per cent. This part of the compromise had not been made safe by insertion in the Act of last year. Towards the end of June, he (Lord Robert Montagu) had moved in Committee on the Bill that this part of the compromise should also be inserted in the Bill. The Prime Minister, however, made so definite a promise that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) recommended that the Amendment should not be pressed, on the ground that no better guarantee could be given than the word of the Prime Minister. What, then, was the gist of the Motion before the House? The hon. Member “protested against any increase in the grants to the denominational schools;” he would accept the increased grants for the secular schools, but he would deny them to the denominational schools. He was in the position of a person who, in a fit of generosity, had purchased an extravagant present for his wife on New Year’s-day, and then grumbled when the bill was sent for payment at Christmas. Let the House, however, consider the new grants, and see whether the bargain of last year had been exceeded; and let the House consider the new restrictions which had been imposed, and see whether the grants were not harder to obtain. He would first take the attendance grants. These were formerly 4s. for every scholar in average attendance; they were now to be 6s. This showed an increase of 50 per cent. The grant for every infant in average attendance used to be 6s. 6d.; it was now 8s. This was an increase of three-thirteenths, or 23 per cent. A restriction had, however, been imposed; no infants under four years of age were, in future, to be counted. Of the children on the registers, 7·13 per cent, were infants under four years of age; while 31·17 per cent, were infants between four and seven years of age. The grant had, therefore, been decreased by five-fifteenths by this restriction, while it had been increased by three-thirteenths by the difference of grant. The difference was small. It must, moreover, be remembered that infants were not forbidden to go to school; the State merely refused to pay for infants under four years of age; the State would not give any inducement to the mother to relinquish her maternal duties, and send her children to be nursed by the State, while she went out to make money. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: The grant for infants in separate infant schools is to be 10s.] He was quite aware of that. Of all scholars, 14 per cent were in separate infant schools; and of infants, 37 per cent were in separate infant schools. To this extent there would be a clear gain. He passed now to the examination grants. According to the former Code, the maximum grants on examination were 2s. 8d. a pass for three passes per child; and 1s. 4d. per pass for two passes in extra subjects, up to 120 passes, or £8. The total maximum grant on examinations in small schools, was, therefore, 9s. 4d. for each child which was presented; and in large schools the maximum was 8s. per child, with £8 added. The average maximum grant, under the Revised Code, might, therefore, be taken at 8s. 6d. per child presented for examination. Under the New Code the maximum grant was as follows:—Three passes at 4s. each, for every child presented; together with two passes in extra subjects at 3s. each for those children who had passed in standards above the fourth standard. The total grant was, however, in no case to exceed 15s. This was, therefore, the maximum, however excellent the school might be. This increase was 76 per cent. A great prize, certainly! But it was placed at the top of a very greasy pole; there were so many restrictions, that it would be hard for many schools to climb up to the maximum. He would enumerate these restrictions—First, under the Revised Code, any child might be presented who had attended 200 days; under the New Code he must have attended 250 days. Now, as the Return showed, which had been issued that morning, from 75 to 85 per cent of those children who were presented for examination—that is, who had attended 200 days—had also attended as much as 250 days. On an average, 80 per cent of the children who were presented for examination, had attended 250 days. This rule decreased the increase of grant, therefore, by 20 per cent; and the new grant was thereby rendered less than 61 per cent greater than the old grant. He did not complain of the rule; he thought it would tend to raise the tone of education. He was merely estimating the real increase of grant. The second restriction was contained in the rule which raised the whole scale of standards a peg. At present every 100 children who had made 200 attendances, and were examined, made, on an average, 225 passes. In future only 80 of these children would be presentable; and every 100 of those who would be examined would make about 200 passes. This rule, therefore, reduced the increase of grant to 40 per cent. The third restriction was the limit of the standards to ages. After March 31, 1873, no child above nine years of age could be presented in the New Standard I. (that was, the Old Standard II.). In 1874 no such child could be presented in the New Standard II. or Old Standard III. Now, in 1869-70, three quarters of the children who were examined under the Old Standard II. or New Standard I., were under 10 years of age, and one quarter of such children were above 10 years of age. The numbers were not given in the last Report for any other age. The exact numbers were 134,000 under 10, and 40,000 over 10. In the same year half of the children which had been presented in the Old Standard III., or New Standard II., were over 10 years of age, and half under 10. The exact numbers were 71,000 under 10, and 60,000 over 10. A serious reduction of grant—it would be difficult to estimate the amount with accuracy—would accrue from the operation of this rule. He did not approve of this rule; it was, doubtless, imposed in an endeavour to raise education throughout the kingdom; yet its effect would be, that if a boy was ignorant at nine years old he would be damned to ignorance for ever. There were other reductions of the grant which were of smaller moment. According to the Revised Code, a pupil-teacher must be kept for every 40 children after the first 50, under penalty of a fine of £10 in each case. By the New Code a pupil-teacher must be kept for every 40 children after the first 20, under a penalty of £20. The fine was doubled, and it was made to hit smaller schools. Formerly, a school of 90 children need not have a pupil-teacher. Now a village school of 60 children must have a pupil-teacher, besides the certificated master, and the woman who must teach the girls to sew. In such a school there would be 24 girls and 36 boys; the former would, of an afternoon, be busy sewing; and the 36 boys would be under the tuition of a master and a pupil-teacher. That, he thought, was unnecessary. Again, in the New Code there was a rule according to which the managers would be fined £10 for every pupil-teacher who failed in his examination; and yet the managers would have to pay him nevertheless. In the Boeotian districts of the country, you must choose one of the numerous boobies to be a pupil teacher. Are you then to fine the managers because he is not a Solon? Again, according to the Revised Code, grants were made to managers whenever a pupil-teacher finished his apprenticeship and entered a normal college, and also in the second year of his course at the college. These grants to the school were, at entrance, £10 if he entered in the first class, or £5 if in the second; and in the second year the grants were £8 or £5. These grants had been omitted from the New Code. He allowed that the compromise had been carried out in respect of the attendance grants, but not in regard to the examination grants. Yet that which had to be encouraged was not attendance, but proficiency in examination. There was also another kind of discouragement which had been given to denominational schools. The House was aware that these schools had been established, and were maintained to promote and teach that religion to which they belonged. How was this affected by the rules of the New Code?

Attendance was to be counted for those children only who had undergone two hours of purely secular instruction in the morning, and two hours in the afternoon. The school-roll was to be called over, and the registers to be written up, both morning and afternoon, before the secular instruction was commenced. In those two duties alone, five hours a-day would be consumed. At what time, then, was the religious instruction to be given? According to the New Code, the pupil-teachers were not to teach more than five hours a-day. When was the religious instruction then to be given? If the school-registers were to be kept open until after the religious instruction was over, a premium would be given to the children to shirk the religious instruction; if the registers were to be closed before the half-hour of religious instruction was begun then the managers would fine themselves by cutting off all the attendance grants of those children who arrived after the religious instruction had commenced. The Vice President had, however, answered the other day that the majority of schools met for two hours morning and afternoon. That was very true; but it must be remembered that an ecclesiastic had a right, under the Revised Code, to enter the school at any time and give religious instruction. That right had been taken away by the Act of last year. The same remarks applied also to evening schools. These schools should, no doubt, be "improvement schools," as the hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh University (Dr. Lyon Playfair) had said. Yet they must for many years be content with the work of keeping up the modicum of elementary learning which young men had acquired. When the tone of education throughout the country had been raised, then they might serve the higher purpose. But then he did not understand the reason for the rule of the New Code which denied all grants for extra subjects in the evening schools. Surely the learning of extra subjects should receive every possible encouragement if those schools were to become "improvement schools." Yet, on the other hand, the rules as to the examinations in the standards were imposed as if evening schools were to be merely elementary schools. What would be the effect of these rules? If a boy had passed all the standards by 12 years old, then he could no longer gain any examination grants for his evening school, and would be regarded by the master as a worthless subject. On the other hand, if a boy at 12 knew little or nothing, then also he could not gain, at any time, any examination grants for his evening school, and would be regarded by the master as not worthy to be taught. The evening schools were, in other ways, very hardly treated. Under the Revised Code they had to meet 40 times, and those scholars only were examined who had attended 24 times. Under the New Code, 80 meetings and 50 attendances were required. He asserted that it would be practically impossible to fulfil these conditions. Attendances, as is well-known, could not be secured before the middle of October, nor after the middle of March. Evening schools could meet only for five months in the year, or, omitting the Christmas holiday, for 19 weeks. Now the master had, under the New Code, to teach the pupil teachers for two hours three times a-week. There were, therefore, only 57 days on which the evening school could meet. The Return which had been issued that morning bore out his statement; for he observed that the great majority of evening schools met only 56 times. Add to this that there were weekly evening services, choir practice, and penny readings, to reduce the number of meetings, and it would be seen that such a rule as that contained in the New Code would shut up every evening school in the country. That would be baneful; as an evening school was, at least, a means for keeping young men and women out of mischief. If, instead of the rule that an hour and a half of purely secular instruction was to be given in them, a rule had been made to enforce two hours of instruction, of which half-an-hour was to be religious, they might be made a positive benefit to the nation.

MR. MELLY congratulated his right hon. Friend on the satisfactory criticism passed upon his Revised Code by almost every hon. Gentleman who had spoken. He would, however, suggest to him, considering the advantage of night schools, whether it would not be possible to draw a line between such schools in rural districts and those in towns. It was his intention to oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon); but he trusted his hon. Friend would not divide the House. It was true that last year he (Mr. Melly) had opposed the making of any additional grant to denominational schools; but he confessed that during the year a very important change had occurred in the feeling of the country. School boards had been elected in hundreds of towns, and elected upon the denominational principle. They had seen members of the Church of England, of every political party, going together to secure what they believed to be a fair representation on the board; and they had seen the Wesleyans and other denominations standing together to attain the same object. The result was, that there had been elected a number of gentlemen, second to none in the kingdom in point of ability, energy, and zeal; and, on some boards, even where the majority of the electors were Non-conformists and working men, the rectors of the parishes had been elected unanimously as chairmen and vice-chairmen of boards. The elections were conducted on the principle of denominationalism, but almost every candidate declared himself to be in favour of religious, but unsectarian education. The principle of compulsion, also, had been almost unanimously adopted by the Boards; and he (Mr. Melly) believed it to be the only one under which the children could be properly educated. He hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion. The people of this country might not be very logical or very consistent in their opinions, but they were eminently practical, and he believed that the difficulties of the question, which were aimed at by the Motion, would gradually disappear in the working of the system. He congratulated his right hon. Friend on the success of the new measure, which had largely exceeded the anticipations of its friends, and in no single particular had that been more conspicuous than in the manner in which the principle of compulsion had been received throughout the country.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had not only taken great interest himself in the working of schools in the rural districts, but had been in communication with gentlemen largely interested in the working of those in the metropolis; and spoke their sentiments as well as his own when he said that there was almost perfect unanimity of opinion that the way in which the Council of Education had dealt with the raising of the standard with regard to boys' schools was very much to be praised; but he was certain there was an equally universal impression that a great mistake would be made if girls' schools were dealt with in the same way. The Committee of Council seemed to have forgotten that a very large portion of the time of the girls had to be devoted to needlework—time which, undoubtedly, was most usefully employed when their probable future condition in life was considered. But if that time was devoted to needlework they could hardly be expected to acquire the same amount of general knowledge as boys. With regard to night schools he wished to impress on the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of lowering the standard fixed by the New Code, if he did not wish to destroy these schools. If the standard was raised in the manner proposed, it would practically shut up a great number of the night schools in the rural districts. The tendency in the agricultural districts was to take children away from school for labour before they had acquired any large amount of sound knowledge. The night schools stepped in and assisted in maintaining what they had already acquired, or imparting more. He wished to urge that point specially on the attention of the Government, because he was certain that the tendency of the New Code, as regards night schools, as it now stood, would be to strike a great blow at education in the agricultural districts.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, there had been such an unanimity in the suggestions made with respect to night schools, that he trusted his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council would defer to the wishes of the House, and would so alter the Code as to prevent the extinction—as he feared would be the case—of night schools in the rural districts. He attached much importance to these schools, and even if the periods of teaching were short the pupils might acquire habits of attention, discipline, and mental exertion; moreover, the disposition on the part of young men and young women to study when they were masters of their own time should be encouraged as much as possible; but the provisions of the Code, as at present drawn, would tend to diminish the attendance at such schools. The House, he believed, would be equally unanimous in its condemnation of the Motion of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), whose consistency, however, could not be questioned. The hon. Member last year proposed secular teaching, when he thought the public was with him; this year, when he has admitted that public opinion is against him, he still maintains his secularist theory. The contribution of the hon. Gentleman towards the solution of that difficult subject was one that he (Mr. Cowper-Temple) thought need not be accepted in any quarter with much gratitude, because it simply punished by fines and disabilities the schools he regarded as denominational. But why were the managers of denominational schools to be punished? Up to the present time they had been the only educators of the people, and had supplied all the primary education of the country. The hon. Member had expressed great dismay at the outburst of voluntary zeal in anticipation of this New Code; but in his (Mr. Cowper-Temple's) opinion it should rather be a cause for satisfaction to think that people had really strong feelings upon religious subjects, and were anxious their children should not be left without the Bible in their schools. Education had been given to the poor by charitable efforts; and the great services thus rendered ought not be disregarded and hindered. He feared the Code, by increasing the required number of attendances, by raising the standard, and by other modes, all tending to diminish the earnings, and by raising the age of infants, would prove injurious to the progress of education, especially in the rural districts.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had a strong opinion on the necessity of continuing and keeping up the infant school system, and he was very much afraid it would be seriously affected by Article 25 of the New Code, by which children under four years of age were to be deprived of the grant. He had been informed by managers of these schools that no less than 20 per cent of the children's attendances in infant schools would be excluded by the proposed regulation. In effect, children under five years of age would be deprived of the grants, inasmuch as they must be four years of age before their attendances could be reckoned towards the required number of 250 to enable the Inspector to certify they were entitled to the grant. It would also have a most damaging effect on the education of the elder children, who would be detained at home to look after them. The promise of the right hon. Gentleman last year, that there should be an increased grant to the extent of 50 per cent had been broken so far as the infant schools were concerned. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give way to the representations that had been made, and allow the present regulations to stand, so far as infants were concerned. He ventured to say with regard to the arrangement that children between four and seven years of age should receive two hours' secular education, morning and afternoon, apart from religious instruction—it was a little too hard, and he thought a discretion in the matter might very wisely be left to the school managers. By the New Code it was proposed to give sums of money for attendance, and for passing examinations in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and for extra subjects, whereby a child might earn for the school some 24s.; but in no case was the total grant to exceed an average of 15s. per child. His attention had been called to the point by a very acute school manager, who proved conclusively that it was not necessary that more than 70 per cent of the children in average attendance should be presented for examination, and that the great danger was, that under the New Code the work would not be so perfectly done as by the present system. The slow, dull, and careless children would be neglected for the purpose of pushing on and getting larger grants for the intelligent and industrious children. It would, therefore, be better to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh University (Dr. Lyon Playfair). He (Mr. W. H. Smith) objected to one of the tests provided for children of 11 years of age—namely, that they should be capable of repeating correctly by heart 240 lines of poetry. He doubted if that were the best kind of test. The pupil-teachers of 16 or 17 years of age were not required to repeat correctly by heart more than 50 lines of poetry under similar circumstances.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM said, he would congratulate the House on the tone the discussion had assumed. The discussion had not been a very venomous one for an education debate—though whether dulness had been equally avoided was more than an impartial observer might be able to say. Upon the general question raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) he had nothing to say, for he had not seen any reason to alter the opinion he expressed strongly last year, and, although his hon. Friend had thought it his duty to raise the question, he hoped he would not divide the House upon it. One isolated point had not been noticed in the debate, on which he desired to offer a few remarks—namely, that while a great advantage of this, in the main, very excellent Code was the distinct recognition of extra subjects—thus raising the standard of primary education throughout the country—one of the most important of these extras was not only ignored, but positively excluded—namely, music. As to drawing, he said nothing, because that was taught by the Science and Art Department; but as to music, although great progress had been made in spreading the means of teaching that art in primary schools, the Vice-President had struck out the subject, and the result would be that although its teaching was not absolutely forbidden, yet attention would first be given to those subjects for which grants were paid. He appealed to the House whether children had not better spend their time in learning vocal music than in studying political economy—although he had nothing to say against political economy, which was a very interesting subject to the cultivated mind of a man in rude health? A knowledge of Lord Overstone's tracts on the Bank Acts, or of the First Lord of the Admiralty's work On the Theory of Foreign Exchanges, or of any other branch of political economy, would be very dearly acquired if the teaching of music were sacrificed. He would remind the House that all educationists from Plato to Goethe had insisted on the importance of teaching music, and hon. Members, who revered patristic authority, might remember that St. Augustine was a music master, and had written six learned, though rather unintelligible books upon the subject. He suspected that the Vice President was not a musician—for which he was sorry, though that, perhaps, accounted for many of his aberrations on this subject. Let the right hon. Gentleman remember Shaks-peare's denunciation of "the man who hath no music in his soul," and beware his doom—"Let no such man be trusted." What was the effect produced by the study of music? It taught order, attention, and quickness; it practised the memory; and, above all, was the only study that really cultivated the imagination of which untutored minds were capable. It was to them what all art and literature were to us. Hon. Members were now seeking to benefit the poorer classes, and though they could not make all rich, they thought they could make them wise. But to teach them music was to make them happy, and any man who knew anything of music, and enjoyed it, knew how capable of learning it were the great majority of children, and how much the faculty became deadened by neglect. It afforded a great deal of amusement not only to the children themselves, but to their friends. It was like putting a singing bird in every cottage. He had himself had the misfortune—as some persons esteemed it—to be educated at one of those middle-class schools, which were looked down upon by Inspectors who did not understand them, because they had been educated under a different system, and he, in common with three-fourths of a school of 80 or 100 boys, learnt music. Those who had kept it up in after-life knew well that it was an intense delight and led them sometimes even to resist the fascinations of coming down to that House. He therefore asked his right hon. Friend to give his serious attention to this as a practical matter. He knew it would be objected—and he was ashamed of the answer—that the Inspectors did not know anything about music. So much the worse for the Inspectors, and to require them to learn music would be doing good both to them and their families. There was, however, a means of obtaining qualified examiners, for as the Vice President proposed to appoint some Assistant Inspectors, it might be possible to require from an adequate number of them some knowledge of music. The music that he desired should be taught was not that of those howling young savages the charity children in St. Paul's, but a practical system of notation such as could be easily acquired by any intelligent child. It would be a lasting disgrace—at least it would be a disgrace as long as it lasted—if music were put under a cloud, simply because Inspectors could not be found who were able to examine in that subject. Let hon. Members remember what was done in other countries. In America great stress was laid on the teaching of music; there was a saying, in fact, that there was no primary school without its grand piano. The right hon. Gentleman was proud of the education measure, and wished his name to be associated with it. Let not his name then be handed down to posterity as that of an uncouth barbarian, who refused to allow children to be taught music.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE pointed out that, as the Code now stood, there was no provision for a supply of teachers for infant schools. That was a point of great importance, to which he begged to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. His own experience was that girls between the ages of 17 and 21 years were the best instructors for the purpose, and by a modification of the 59th Article he thought that the object might be attained. There would be a great demand for schoolmistresses, which would increase the difficulty. Pupil-teachers who had been five years in training seldom liked to take such situations, and he thought that an Article similar to the 59th, with alterations in the requirements of age, and years of teaching in the school, would effect the object. He was very anxious about this, as he knew by experience what a humanizing effect infant schools had among the children of country parishes.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I feel myself to be under a considerable difficulty at this moment. I am not only, as has been suggested by the hon. Member for Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities (Dr. Lyon Playfair), in the position of a man who has to drive two horses at once, but I feel that I have three distinct things to do together. In the first place, it is due to the House that I should take this opportunity of explaining the provisions of the New Code. I also feel it right to notice the different objections that have been taken to it in the course of this most practical and useful debate. Lastly, I have to defend myself against the charge of being an uncouth barbarian. No doubt the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu) may think that I have brought this difficulty on myself, because I ought to have given an early explanation of the New Code. I should have been glad to have done so, but when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when in my position, tried to do so, he found that it would hardly be within the rules of the House for him to proceed. A mode might perhaps have been found of overcoming this difficulty; but still the other difficulty remained, with which Parliament is constantly pressed—that of providing time for all the important subjects with which it has to deal. And on this head I wish to make an appeal to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that is, if they can do so with propriety, to allow the New Code to come into operation at the end of the month, and not to require a longer time for its consideration. It will be within the power of this House and of Parliament at any time during the Session to agree to any Address to the Throne upon the subject which they may think proper, and the Government would feel bound to pay every attention to it; but the reason why I press the House not to delay the operation of the New Code is because we have a most arduous and difficult work before us in ascertaining and remedying the educational deficiencies of the country, and in keeping pace with what I am happy to say is the great demand that the country is making on us to give the widest possible effect to the Act of last year. It is almost impossible for us to get to work on the task of going through the whole country to decide what parishes should be grouped together, and where educational deficiency exists, until the New Code is settled. In framing the New Code we had three duties to perform: first, we had to carry out the principles of the Education Act; secondly, to carry out the pledges given by the Prime Minister and by myself that there should be a considerable increase in the assistance to the inspected schools out of the Parliamentary grant; an increase that was not to exceed 50 per cent, but which it was naturally and justifiably supposed would not fall much below it; and, thirdly, we had to consider what improvements we could make in the Code, in which we must necessarily be guided by our experience of the past working of the system, and the consequences of the new position which education was assuming in this country. The House will bear me witness that, in stating the additional assistance we contemplated giving, I always accompanied my observations with the distinct condition that this should be consistent with any changes the Government might think fit to introduce for carrying into effect a more efficient and economical system of education. My first thought was efficiency, and after that economy. The first change that we considered made necessary by the passing of the Education Act was the omission of Article 4 of the Code, which confined the Parliamentary grants to the children of parents engaged in manual labour. This was necessary, because it would have been obviously most unreasonable to expect the small shopkeepers and ratepayers of towns to pay for the education of the children of artisans, from the benefit of which their own children were excluded. But I must say that, apart from that consideration, I was very glad of the change, and for this reason—that I see no reason—but, on the contrary, a great objection—to singling out the class engaged in manual labour, and saying that they specially should obtain the assistance of Parliamentary grants. A very large proportion of that class are perhaps in indigent circumstances, but many are very well off for their station in life; and it is a bad political principle to recognize that they have a special claim on the funds of the country—a principle which I believe they would themselves disavow. Indeed—and we are glad to know it to be the fact, many of those who are engaged in manual labour are in the receipt of wages which place them in a position that makes them perfectly well able to hold their own alongside of any class, and they are better off than many persons not engaged in manual labour who belong to the class of small shopkeepers, and even than many professional men. Therefore, we have taken the definition in the Act that it shall be—

“A school in which elementary education is the object of instruction, and where the ordinary payment for scholars does not exceed 9d. a-week.”

Our next change was the striking out of Article 6 of the former Code, which said that no aid was to be given to any children who were in boarding schools, or anywhere but in day schools. That provision interpreted literally would have prevented aid being given to ragged schools, or to schools in which the managers took charge of the children during the dinner hour. That was so manifestly unjust that I do not think it was ever carried out; but we saw no reason why children in the elementary schools should not receive their share of the Parliamentary grant, simply because they were taken care of by charitable persons during the day, or even during the night. The change that has been made by the omission of this article will extend to training ships, in which the hon. Member for Liverpool and the hon. Member for Hull take so deep an interest. The next change is as follows:—We decided last year that while nothing should be done to discourage religious instruction, yet that provision should be made for aid to purely secular schools, and that the Parliamentary grant should not be confined to those schools which are under denominational management, or in which the Bible is read. It is now, therefore, proposed that in future secular schools shall be admitted to the benefit of the grant. Now I come to the provisions to which objection has been made by some Members this evening, as to the minimum of secular instruction which the Government have deemed it necessary should be established. Under the Revised Code—I call the system of last year the Revised Code, and I call this the New Code—an “attendance” was reckoned as two hours of any school instruction. By the New Code it is required that an “attendance” should be two hours instruction on secular subjects. Many objections have been made on this point, and it is said that this will prove an inconvenient arrangement—especially as regards the afternoon—for the management of the school. I will give shortly the reasons why we do not think it will be found inconvenient. Last year I had the time-tables of a large number of schools examined before I brought in the time-table clause. This year I have looked back to them again, and I find the result to be that out of the first 75 cases there are only 11 which do not meet for more than two hours in the afternoon. When I see that a large proportion of schools meet for more than two hours, I cannot think there is inconvenience in schools meeting for this time, and I will endeavour to show why, on principle, this arrangement ought to be adhered to. I should like to appeal to any Member who objects to this provision to consider that the great test of the Act of last year will be how far it will bear the principle and practice of compulsion. For my own part, I have no doubt whatever that direct compulsion will soon be the rule throughout the country. I have not been at all surprised at seeing one large town after another adopting the principle of compulsion, for I felt sure from the first that that would be the case. Liverpool and London have both adopted this principle, and with other large towns it is only a question of time. It may be taken for granted, therefore, that this principle will be extensively applied in the course of a year or two, and when it is not voluntarily adopted, Parliament may at the expiration of that period be willing to sanction it. Therefore, I say it is most important that all schools deriving aid from the Parliamentary grant should be able to bear the application of this principle. Assuredly voluntary schools will suffer greatly—I think, indeed, they can hardly stand—unless it be possible to apply compulsion to them; and this will not be possible, unless means are taken to secure efficient and sufficient secular teaching. Unless this secular instruction is given for at least four hours daily—for two hours at each meeting—we could hardly compel the children to attend. Some of my hon. Friends are of opinion that it will be difficult to apply any compulsion whatever to voluntary schools, because of their denominational character; but I would remind them that it would be quite as difficult to apply it to undenominational schools, for a vast number of parents would object to being forced to send their children to schools in which there was no possibility of religious instruction. It is a difficulty that will be felt on both sides. Then it has been suggested that the afternoon attendance might be made shorter if a longer space of time were devoted to instruction in the morning; but the objection to this proposal is that it would wholly interfere with the half-time system, which is daily coming more into vogue. My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) has remarked that an attendance of two hours was too long for infant schools. The Department would not, however, think of preventing a portion of that time being set apart for play or pleasant exercises, as far as infant schools were concerned, if it were necessary to prevent the children being overweighed by work. The next proposal which the Government have thought it necessary to make has hardly been alluded to by any speaker to-night—namely, the provision for meeting an increased demand for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses. Undoubtedly there will be a great demand for masters, and though I have always thought we shall be able to obtain more from the training colleges than some hon. Members have anticipated; still, I certainly thought we ought to take all the means in our power for enlisting in our service every good master in the country; at the same time, we thought it most desirable not to give up the principle of certificates. I do not wish, at present, to re-open the question of certificates, and therefore I will only say that, however much we may rely on special examinations for results, they do not constitute by themselves a sufficient guarantee for efficient education and economical expenditure of the public money. The Department, being of this opinion, and yet having to meet this special demand, have made two changes. In the first place, they allow, for three years, certificates to be given without examination to certain masters. Everyone is aware that there are many efficient masters of mature age in schools which, because of the conscientious feelings of the managers, or from some other cause, have not received the Government grant. These masters would find themselves uncertificated, and would have to submit to an examination which, in spite of their acknowledged efficiency, they might have some difficulty in passing. Now, as the Government are desirous of not losing the services of such men—which would be a very hard thing for them, and very inconvenient for us—an arrangement has been made, under Section 59, by which such masters and mistresses will be furnished with a certificate without passing an examination, provided that they are above 35 years old, that they have been teachers for 10 years at least, that they can produce a certificate of good character, and that the Inspectors who have visited their schools report them to be efficient teachers. As regards younger teachers, another change has been introduced. Under the Revised Code, any man or woman above the age of 22, in any school of which the Inspector gave two favourable reports, might present themselves to the examiners of the training colleges, and obtain a certificate without passing through the training schools. The change we have made works in this way. The age at which candidates may be examined for certificates is reduced from 22 to 21, and reports are to be required from an Inspector upon one examination instead of two examinations of the school in which a candidate has been engaged. I must now allude to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon). The passing of the Act of last year obliges us to show perfect impartiality between rate schools and voluntary schools. In that we have no option, because the 97th clause of the Act says that the conditions of any Minute, such as that we have laid upon the Table,

I must remind my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) of the existence of that clause in the Act, because his Motion is contrary to the principle of this clause, which we have honestly endeavoured to carry out. I am convinced that it was a right principle; and it is, indeed, in accordance with my statement when I first brought in the Bill—that we were to have compulsory provision where it was needed, and not unless it was needed. These, then, are the changes which we have found necessary to make on account of the passing of the Education Act. I come now to the second and third duties we have had to perform—those of giving an increased grant and improving the conditions of earning it. I stated last year that I would accompany the increase of grant with such a stimulus to educational activity as we could give. The House must judge whether we have carried out that promise. If we have not, it is not from want of earnest endeavour to do so. I will point out the improvements we have made; first mentioning one which has not been alluded to to-night. It is that we have taken away that restriction of the Revised Code which prevented visits of Inspectors by surprise.

We still arrange that the grant shall be given upon a yearly inspection, of which the managers shall be warned. We could not, in common fairness, conduct the examination in any other manner. We have, however, taken power by Article 12 that the Inspector shall visit at any accidental time, and this arrangement we are enabled to make in consequence of the better organization of district inspection. I think that arrangement is most advisable to secure the general efficiency of the schools, and also to ensure the honest carrying out of the conscience clause. The next point has reference to attendance. It was incumbent upon us to make the change which has been discussed. I believe the time has come when we could safely raise the attendance of the individual children necessary to obtain an examination from 200 to 250. I think I need not dwell upon that, because the House seems to have accepted our alteration. Then there is a special arrangement, which has hardly been noticed, with regard to the half-time schools. A good deal of objection has been taken to it, especially out of the House. Having raised the attendance at day schools from 200 to 250, we have raised the attendance at half-time schools from 100 to 150, because we found they were obtaining more than their share; because they are conducted upon the most rigid principle of compulsion. In my mill school I earn for my children by their examination and attendance more than 15s. per head. No doubt that is partly owing to the sharpness of the Yorkshire child, and partly also to the circumstance that I have good masters; but it is mainly owing to the fact that I can secure the attendance of the children by the strongest compulsion. Their parents, from their absence from school, lose the wage for their work, and that is a greater fine than my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) will be able to establish by direct compulsion. As these schools were obtaining more than their share, we felt justified in requiring a higher attendance; but I shall carefully look at the other half-time Acts, and see how they apply. In answer to the right hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. G. Hardy), I have to say that I should define rural districts as districts in which the parents were engaged in agricultural employment; and if this should apply to small towns in rural districts, I think it ought to do so. We have made an exception for boys above ten in these districts by reducing the attendances to 150, because we hope, as soon as we can find time, to devise the means to establish the principle of working and schooling together for children in agricultural parishes. In the meantime, several landowners and farmers have applied the principle upon their own estates, and we have introduced this regulation for their assistance. The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent) asked why we confined the exception to rural districts; the answer is, that we do not see clearly how to apply it to other cases. But all these arrangements in the New Code must be subject to the information we obtain both as to its working and as to the working of the Act. Now I come to the infants, who have been so paternally cared for by the House. I think every hon. Member who has spoken about these infants will admit that something ought to be done, because in many cases the infant school is turned into a mere crèche, and is merely an excuse for allowing mothers to neglect their duties. We have raised the grant for average attendance from 4s. to 6s.; and 14s. or 16s. a-year would be a good deal for the State to pay for relieving a mother from taking care of a child. By the Code of last year there was no condition as to the age of the child. We certainly did give directions to Inspectors to cast out babies when they could do so; but a good many babies passed, and it was necessary to take some action in the matter, as we have done in those clauses. We have declared by Article 19 (b) that no infant is to be paid for if not four years of age on the day of inspection. We have said also by Article 25 that no attendance is to be allowed for until the child is four. On the day of inspection the child must be more than four, and from the day that it reached that age it would have swelled the average of attendance, and therefore to some extent have been paid for; but it could not obtain the special grant of 8s. or 10s., because it would not have made up the 250 attendances. Upon reconsidering the matter we have arrived at the conclusion that there is a good deal of educational advantage to be gained between three and four. We find it absolutely necessary to keep up the restriction that the child must be four on the day of inspection; but we intend to alter Article 25 by inserting the word "three" instead of "four," which will allow attendances to be taken into account before the child is four years of age. We have increased the age at which children are to be reckoned infants from six years to seven; and the reasons are two-fold—we think that it will be better for the children, and that it is not worth while to have highly-trained Inspectors to examine individually children under seven years old. Now as to the change in the standards. We have made an alteration by which we have struck out Standard I in the Old Code. It was placed exceedingly low in the Old Code, and we think that amount of learning should be obtained by children before coming to school at all, or acquired in the infant school. Our Standards I. II. III. IV. and V. in the New Code very nearly correspond with the Standards II. III. IV. V. and VI. in the Old Code; but still there is a difference between them. The Old Standards III. IV. and V. require that the book in which children should be examined in reading should be one used in school. The ingenuity of man is great; but I should have hardly thought it possible that schoolmasters would have crammed children in reading. But they have done it when reading from a book used in school, so that which seemed to be reading was not reading; and therefore we do not now allow the examination in these standards to be confined to a book used in a school. Then we have introduced a New Standard VI. by which it is attempted to secure a higher class of education, inasmuch as under it children are required to write a theme, or letter, or paraphrase. This does not seem to be a great matter; but it is something to look forward to an examination that implies an original letter or theme. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) appeared shocked to think that children of the 4th Standard should learn so many things by heart; but if he will come to see me in the holidays I will show him children who will do it, and will also make pretty pithy Yorkshire allusions to what they have been reading. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. Hardy) has complained that the female pupil-teachers are required to pass a lower standard than that which the males are required to pass; whereas the girls in schools are examined in the same standard as the boys. The right hon. Gentleman should, however, recollect that the schools are mixed schools, having the same teaching for both sexes; whereas the curriculum in the male and female training colleges is different. In any further alteration to be made in the standard in schools, however, I hope that that for the boys will be raised instead of that for the girls being lowered. Hon. Members have asked why it is not allowed that a leap should be made in the standards? As soon as it is thought safe to encourage schoolmasters to drive their children on and so to skip a standard, the Department will only be too glad to be able to hold out this stimulus to them; but at present it is thought that it might be dangerous to incite masters to push on clever children to the neglect of the others. Therefore, for the present, at all events, no alteration of this description will be made in the Code. The hon. Member (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), in the most excellent speech with which he opened the debate, and which showed that he inherits his father's educational knowledge, made one remark which astonished me, and which I cannot help thinking he will hear about from his father to-morrow. He asked me why we should not allow children who failed in one standard to come up for examination in the same standard the following year? The reason is simply that, if such a thing were allowed, there would be an immediate lowering of the standard throughout the country, and we should get almost no progress at all. But we do give some inducement to push children forward. We give this inducement—that we make grants for special objects only possible to children who have passed in the three upper standards. As to the alteration in special subjects, the Revised Code afforded a capital educational training for masters and managers who understood it; but I was not surprised yesterday to find a gentleman much engaged in education who said he had no idea as to what the old regulations as to special subjects were. There were two ways in which special subjects were paid for; either the child must, after having got through all the six standards, pass in certain special subjects, and earn the 8s., or there was an encouragement to the school that taught special subjects. It was in this form, that there was 1s. 4d. per pass in reading, writing, and ciphering, which was given to masters who fulfilled certain conditions as to pupil-teachers and passes. After all these conditions were fulfilled the grant was stopped when it reached 120 children. We have replaced all these complicated conditions by this arrangement—that there shall be a certain number of special subjects for the examination of children, and they shall be allowed to pass in not more than two. The child upon passing the examination will earn the payment. As to music, there are two ways in which music has been encouraged hitherto—the one way being really efficient, and the other merely nominal. It has been encouraged in a very efficient manner by music and singing being taught in the school in classes, the time so occupied being allowed to count as time occupied in instruction. The result has been that in a vast number of schools there have been musical classes; but out of 4,423 schools that sent up children last year to be examined in special subjects, only 43 sent up children for examination in music. With regard to the question of teaching music as a special subject, I think it would be impossible to effect it at present. To make the examination effective it must be real; and for the present, at least, we have difficulty in finding among our Inspectors the necessary qualification. Their education had been shaped in accordance with the education of the upper and middle classes generally, and of nine-tenths of the Gentlemen who are listening to me at the present moment. If I were in the position of a schoolmaster, and was entitled to ask all those hon. Gentlemen who understood music to hold up their hands, I am afraid very few hands would be held up. It may be said—"You can make it a condition with Inspectors;" but you cannot make it a condition with Inspectors this year—it is impossible. You cannot easily find gentlemen who have all the qualifications you require. A suggestion has been made to have the examination conducted by means of examination papers, and to have the papers sent up to London to be examined. I know that that has been done in the training schools, but I do not think it would be wise to apply it to the elementary schools. It is not merely ignorant people like myself who hold the opinion that such an examination as I am now referring to is not satisfactory; in the Report of last year, I find it stated that Mr. Hullah acknowledges that this plan has not come up to his expectations. We think it necessary to make the examination a reality, and not have it conducted by examiners who do not know what they are examining in. It would be a very bad precedent to have Inspectors examining in what they did not understand; and hence for this year we must strike music out of the list of special subjects. I am quite convinced of the immense advantage which it gives to the children—perhaps more advantage to them than even it does to our own class; and I assure my noble Friend (Lord Robert Montagu) that I will do my very best to encourage it in every school. I am not sure that it would not, after all, be better to make music a matter for general instruction in all schools, if we do not strike it out altogether from the list of subjects, as we have done with drawing, and leave it to be attended to by the Science and Art Department. Passing now to another branch of the subject—the evening schools—I do not deny their advantage, though I think their importance, as purely educational institutions, has been somewhat overrated in the debate of this evening. The hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) says there are three objects which should be kept in view in connection with these schools—first, that they might supply the place of day schools, giving the means of acquiring reading and writing to those boys whose education has been neglected; second, keeping up elementary knowledge obtained at the day school; and third, furnishing the means by which higher knowledge may be obtained. But what great educational good can you expect or hope to obtain from schools which are only required to be open 40 nights in the year, and at which the attendance of a boy or girl is required not more than 24 times? Nevertheless, the grant has been made—2*s.* 6*d.* for average attendance, and 5*s.* for examination; and it is a very large sum to pay for 24 nights. I think we are relying on something which will mislead us when we think that, by establishing such evening schools, we have supplied the want. I do not deny that they are good institutions, and I will on no account give them up—not so much on account of the actual learning acquired at them, as on account of the fact of their reaching and influencing the young people at a time when influence is most useful. But looking to the large sums of money we have expended, and are expending, on them—and we now propose to increase the grant by 50 per cent—the conditions must be made more stringent. I come now to the terms of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. A. Cross), and I will take its last term first—that we should take away the restriction to the age of 18. I cannot hold out any hope that Government will accept that portion of the Amendment. This grant is for young people, not for adults. The men who are making up the deficiencies of their education ought to be kept separate from the boys who come from the day school. The hon. Member does not suppose that the mere fact of their being paid for would make the difference, for if they desired education, and were willing to undertake the labour necessary for acquiring it, they would be both able and willing to pay the small sum necessary for the purpose. But it had been said, why not help them? I do not think we should give Government money to try to coax these persons to learn to read and write. As to the other parts of the Amendment, by the Bill of the late Government night schools were admitted which were not connected with day schools, but these schools were to be kept open 100 times, and the special attendances were to be 60—10 more than my 50. I really see no reason why the advantages to night schools connected with day schools should be more than to schools not connected with day schools. We therefore propose to place all night schools on the same footing. We have also thought it desirable to make the examination a reality, and to get rid of the abuse of a boy or a girl leaving a day school and being allowed to earn money in a lower or even the same standard in a night school. Upon consideration, however, the Government have decided to adopt for one year the proposition of my hon. Friend that the number of nights on which the night schools shall be open shall be 60, and that the number of attendances shall be 40. At the beginning of next year, however, there will be an opportunity of reconsidering that question, and I think practical men will see the advantage of making the respective requirements 80 and 50 for the following years. There is one change suggested by the hon. Member for Hastings that I have not been able to carry out, and that is some plan of paying pensions to schoolmasters. That subject has not been omitted for any want of careful—nay, I might almost say of painful—attention. I think the teachers in schools are to be sympathized with in their desire for a provision for their age. Their labour is very hard, and it unfits them for other employment. I trust, however, that the result of the increase of schools, and of the greater attention now paid to education in the country, will be to make the position of teachers more respected, and to increase their pay, so that they may be able to make some provision for themselves. The Government made it a principle of the Revised Code to give up the direct connection between the State and the teachers. If we had not broken that connection it would have become closer as years went on, and would have resulted in an army of civil servants of from 20,000 to 40,000 in number. We cannot, therefore, consider any superannuation plan, which would imply any direct connection between the Government and the teachers; and, indeed, we think it a matter which primarily concerns the employers of the teachers—namely, the managers of the schools. If any pecuniary aid is asked from the Government, we can only entertain the proposal on the understanding that this aid shall be a reduction in the large increase now made in the grants. However, we will be happy to give our best consideration to any scheme which may be submitted to us by the managers. Hon. Gentlemen have found fault with what they think were in some instances heavy conditions as applied to the managers. The average attendance grant is increased from 4*s.* to 6*s.*, and the examination grant from 8*s.* to 12*s.*; the allowance for each of the three elements from 2*s.* 8*d.* to 4*s.* The evening schools examination grant is increased from 5*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.*; the average attendance from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.* By the Act of Parliament we were bound to take care that the Parliamentary grant did not exceed the whole income of the school from other sources. What we have done in the New Code is, that the Parliamentary grant is not to exceed the amount of the school fees and the subscriptions. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) proposes by his Amendment that there shall be no increased scale of grants to denominational schools. I cannot think my hon. Friend will put the House to the trouble of dividing on that Motion, for by the 97th clause of the Education Act we are compelled to give no advantage to schools supported by the rates over the voluntary schools. It has been asked by several hon. Members—"Why do you keep the 15*s.* reduction?" and there is a notion in their minds that we take back with one hand what we give with the other. But that chiefly arises from a misunderstanding of the term "average attendance." We say the grant shall not exceed 15*s.* on the average attendance. The average attendance is arrived at by dividing all the attendances of all the scholars throughout the year by the number of days. Hon. Members will see at once that the children attending 250 days are no guide at all to the number of average attendances; for in the calculation of the average attendances are included all those children who left school before the inspection, all those who came too late for the 250 days, and those who by accident were not present on the day of inspection. It is a mistake to suppose that many of the schools will suffer from this reduction. I believe it will be a very rare thing indeed; and, if it is not, it will be a warning to us that we ought to make the examination more strict. Hon. Gentlemen may think that rather hard; but we do not think we ought to allow the principle that the State will pay more than half what we suppose the elementary education ought to cost. If we paid more we might be paying for the education generally of the lower middle class. But if we find out, owing to the greater demand for masters, that the cost of education increases, we may fairly raise the maximum above 15*s.* Let me now briefly state what we expect from the Education Act, assisted by this New Code. We have great hope that good, efficient secular instruction will be secured; that a better attendance will be attained; that the wants of the more needy districts, both rural and in towns, will be met by the increased grants; that there will be more efficiency in teaching; and that there will be higher teaching. The country has already responded to the Act in a very satisfactory manner. Ninety-three boroughs, with a population of 4,968,000, have anticipated the action of the Act; the estimated population of all the boroughs of the kingdom being under 6,500,000. Including London, there is a total town population of more than 8,000,000 who have come under the school boards. There are also 74 parishes, or small towns, with a population of 680,000, which have also come under the operation of the Act; and though our regulations for parishes were only issued about five weeks ago, we are issuing orders for districts not in towns at the rate of 15 a-week. There has been a stir in almost every town and every parish, for the school-board districts are electing their best men. Nor can I say that I in any way regret the numerous applications that have been made from all parts of the country to prevent the levy of a rate. I am glad to have found out a mode by which the dislike to rates, especially in the rural districts, has been made the means of assisting educational progress. I will now conclude by thanking the House for the patience and attention with which they have listened to me.

TREATY OF PARIS (1856)—NEUTRALITY OF THE BLACK SEA—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: Seeing the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his place, I wish to inquire whether he can give the House any information respecting the Conference on the Black Sea Question, which I understand has met to-day, and whether the sittings of the Conference are likely to extend over any lengthened period?

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the Question of the noble Duke, I have to state that the Conference met to-day really for the last time, though it will meet again to-morrow for matters of form. It will, no doubt, be satisfactory to your Lordships to know the general character of the conclusions at which it has arrived. A Treaty has been signed to day at the Foreign Office by which, while the clauses of the Treaty of 1856 respecting the neutralization of the Black Sea are abrogated, the restrictions imposed by previously existing treaties upon the Porte in regard to the closing of the Straits of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus when the Porte is at peace, are so far modified as to admit of its opening of them even in time of peace to the ships of war of friendly and allied Powers, in case the Porte should deem it necessary to do so, in order to insure the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris of March 30, 1856. The Treaty just signed also provides for the prolongation of the European Commission of the Danube for 12 years; and, further, for the continued neutrality of the works already created or to be created by the Commission; with a saving, however, of the right of the Porte, as a territorial Power, to send ships of war into the Danube. At the first meeting of the Conference, on the 17th of January, a special Protocol was signed, recording that it was an essential principle of the Law of Nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a Treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement. The French Plenipotentiary has this day signed the Protocol together with the Treaty. The Protocols of the Conference will be presented to Parliament with as little delay as possible.

EDUCATION—THE NEW CODE (1871).

RESOLUTIONS.

EARL NELSON rose to draw attention to the Revised Code of 1871. The noble Earl said that he had put on the Paper a Notice to move the following Resolutions:—

“1. That the children of families migrating from one parish to another (at Lady-day and Michaelmas), and bringing with them a duly certificated table of attendances from the school they have left, be allowed to reckon such attendances in the school to which they have come:

“2. That a certificate be given to every child who has passed in the fourth and two higher standards, and in any extra subject:

But that since he had given his Notice one of the chief points contained in his Resolutions—and, in fact, the only one as to which he should have insisted—had been conceded by the Government; it would not therefore be necessary that he should proceed with his Motion. But although the remaining points were comparatively unimportant, he desired to be permitted to state the reasons why he had desired to lay them before their Lordships. In the first place, he desired to say that he regarded the New Code as a bond fide fulfilment of the pledge given last year. For many features of it he was very thankful. The arrangement that good teachers of a certain age who had conducted schools well should be admitted without examination, and that pupil-teachers who had passed creditably might take charge of schools of a certain calibre, went far to meet the difficulty experienced by poor parishes in obtaining certificated teachers. He also approved the arrangement as to increased attendance in day schools, and the attempt to raise the standard of the education given there. But perhaps the most important of all its proposals, was the attempt to introduce the half-time system into the agricultural districts. He sincerely hoped the attempt would have a successful issue, by permitting boys over 10 in agricultural districts to reckon only 150 attendances for a grant. His first Resolution related to what he would call “migrating children.” It was—

This was intended to meet the case of the children of the better class of labourers—shepherds, carters, &c.—who, in the southern counties at least, were in the habit of changing their situations at those periods of the year. It would otherwise be impossible for them to show the 200 or 250 attendances which were a condition of examination, and there would be a risk of their education being neglected, as it would not be the teacher's interest to induce them to attend if they could get no grant for them. In his own school there were children in this position. In this case a real grievance existed. As, however, a proposal had been made that even in towns, and wherever children moved from one school to another—say from a British School to a National School, and vice versa—the same power of counting attendances should be given, he would not press his own more limited Resolution, but would yield to Mr. Forster's appeal, that any sensible alteration of the Code at that time would impede the operation of the arrangements made under the recent Education Act, which it was desirable should be put into force as speedily as possible. His second Resolution was—

The 4th Standard, requiring the ability to read and write well and the mastery of weights and measures, would prove the best starting point for future education, it could at present rarely be reached by a boy under 11 years of age, and it was desirable to give those on the point of leaving school an inducement to remain a longer time at the day school and to attend in the winter months under the half-time principle, in order to pass this standard and procure a certificate. He believed that employers would see the value of certificates, and that the boys who held them would be benefited by them. The third Resolution—had been accepted by the Government in lieu of 80 days and 50 attendances, on the understanding that next January the original arrangement would probably be reverted to. All who were acquainted with the matter, or had heard the opinions of clergymen and schoolmasters in country districts, were convinced that evening schools could not be kept open more than 20 weeks in the year; for when the evenings lengthened youths found amusements, or attended to their gardens, and could not be induced to attend school. The grant, moreover, under the New Code to evening schools would not permit of the engagement of a special teacher, and the master of a day school, after working all day and attending to a pupil teacher, could not be expected to give up more than three evenings a - week. Indeed, a schoolmaster had assured him that, however great the pecuniary inducement might be, care for his health would preclude his doing more than this. The clergyman and parishioners who usually assisted in the evening school could not be expected to sacrifice more than three nights a-week. One important consideration in regard to the benefit of these night schools should not be lost sight of.

Earl Nelson

If the half-time principle got fairly into operation in the agricultural districts, it was not at all unlikely that boys who had passed to a certain standard in the day school might attain a higher standard at the night school. Hitherto the attempt had been made to retain boys at the day schools until 12 years of age by not admitting them to the night school till that age; but experience clearly showed how impossible it was, in many cases, to prevent boys at, and often below, 10 years of age, from entering upon out-door work. Those boys who were now prevented by this interregnum from continuing their education in the night school from the time they left the day school ought, in common fairness, to be allowed again to pass in the lowest standards of the day schools, for their two or three years work in the fields had left their minds a complete blank. He hoped these points would be considered by the Government.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that as he had given Notice of a Motion for an Address to the Crown with respect to evening schools, he was glad this point had been conceded by the Government. It would, therefore, be sufficient for him—while he had no desire to interpose any difficulty in the working of the New Code—to point out objections to some parts of it, in the hope that the Government would consider them and see their way, either during the present or the next Session, to some modifications. The Government, it would no doubt be said, had been more liberal than had been expected in their grants of money under the New Code; but then the fact must not be lost sight of that, while that was so, the increased grants were subject to more stringent terms than under the former Code; and he doubted, therefore, whether more money would be received under the new than under the old system. As to the grants and attendances at evening schools he concurred with his noble Friend (Earl Nelson), but as to migrating scholars, the change of residence on the part of shepherds and carters was not usual in his own county, though it might be customary in Wiltshire. He feared that 60 was the outside number they could expect night schools to be kept open for in the rural districts, because they could not open them before the 1st of October, or expect to continue them after the 1st of March, when the evenings began to lengthen and the agricultural labourer had to work longer, and had also his little garden, and other matters to attend to. He found that by the New Code attendance was not to be required at any evening school under the age of 12 and above 18; but he submitted that 18 years of age was much too young, and that it should be extended to 25. Young men about, or above the age of 18, were just beginning to appreciate the advantages accruing from education, and if the period of time were extended to 25, much valuable education might be imparted and received in the interval. Under Article 20, he found that 250 attendances, morning or afternoon, were required to qualify a boy above 10 for examination in the rural districts, as he apprehended, with the view of encouraging the half-time system. He should be glad to know whether boys who had that number of attendances would be qualified not only for the examination, but also for the grant? Another point on which he wished to remark was that the Code treated boys and girls exactly alike. This was hardly fair, for while the former devoted their whole time to secular and religious knowledge, the latter devoted a considerable portion of the afternoon to needlework. They would, therefore, be at a considerable disadvantage as compared with boys. A distinction being made between the attainments of male and female pupil-teachers, there should also be a distinction between male and female scholars. The standard of examination appeared to him to be raised too high, the old Standard No. I. being abolished, and all of them being raised a step; so that Standard No. VI. was altogether a new one. This last required the writing of a short theme or letter, or easy paraphrase, and the mastery of vulgar or decimal fractions. Now he did not think boys in agricultural districts would attain such proficiency as to write a theme or paraphrase, or master vulgar or decimal fractions; which last, indeed, was the utmost arithmetical proficiency that was required of the female pupil-teacher in the last three years of her engagement. After the 31st of March, 1873, no day scholar above nine was to be examined in the 1st Standard, nor after the 31st of March, 1874, in the 2nd Standard. Now, the 3rd Standard required the reading of a short paragraph from an advanced reading book, the writing of a sentence from dictation, and a knowledge of the compound rules of money. He doubted whether boys even in the county of the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Halifax) would be sufficiently precocious at the age of nine as to reach this standard. There was also a regulation that no scholar might be presented for examination a second time in the same or a lower standard. He presumed the object was to require every scholar to advance a step in every successive examination.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX said, that his noble Friends had put to him several Questions of which they had given no Notice, and which, therefore, he was unable to answer so fully as he could have wished. He was glad to find that the noble Earl (Earl Nelson) approved the attempt to raise the standard, and most other alterations, proposed by the New Code. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) was of opinion that too great a step had been made; but it was highly desirable that the standard of education should be gradually and steadily raised. Every ploughboy could not, of course, be expected to reach Standard VI. and it was probable that in schools in the country the pupils generally would seldom go beyond Standard IV; but if a boy could reach that standard it would show that he was reasonably well educated; and there could be no objection to encouraging the boy who, by talent and assiduity, attained the highest standard. Moreover, the Code was not designed for the rural districts exclusively; and he saw no reason why a fair proportion of scholars in the country, and still more probably in towns, should not reach the advanced standards. Boys above 10 years of age in a rural district, attending 150 times, would not only be qualified for examination, but would be entitled to a grant. As to migrating children, the alteration proposed by the noble Earl (Earl Nelson) would, in 99 cases out of 100, make no appreciable difference in the sum received by the teacher, and it would be attended with considerable trouble and inconvenience. With regard to certificates, he admitted that there was something to be said in their favour; but there were considerations on the other side, and he could only promise that the point should be carefully considered. As to evening schools, the alteration advocated by the noble Earl had been provisionally conceded; and it would be seen in the course of the year whether 60 evenings, and 40 attendances, were the utmost that could reasonably be expected. The noble Duke was correct in supposing that the object in forbidding a second examination in the same standard was simply to require every scholar to advance a step at every successive examination.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he wished for an explanation on this point. As every standard had been raised a step in the New Code, Standard I. of this year was Standard II. of last year. Therefore, a boy examined under Standard II. of last year would be examined the year following under Standard III. But Standard III. of last year became Standard II. this year; and as the rule declared that a boy could not be examined under the same standard a second year, it would necessarily preclude such boy from being examined at all. But, as that would present an obvious difficulty, and be utterly inconsistent with the principle of the Code, he supposed that the examination referred to applied to the subjects comprised under the standards, and not to the particular number of the standards themselves.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: Yes; the rule against a boy being examined twice under the same standard simply means that he is expected to advance to a higher standard every year.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that if it was necessary to allow migratory children in the rural districts to reckon their attendance at both schools, it was ten thousand times more necessary among the dense populations of the metropolis and great cities. In London alone there were at least 40,000 persons who never continued in one locality three months, but were perpetually on the move. If, then, their attendances at one school were not reckoned on their going to another, they would not be able to reach the required standard, and they would thus be precluded from the benefit of examination; and would consequently be neglected by the teachers, because the latter would derive no advantage from them. That, he submitted, was a matter for serious consideration. At certain periods of the year, moreover, thousands of children went out hop-picking, &c., and their entire attendances ought in fairness to be taken into account. He quite agreed with the noble Earl and the noble Duke that it was impossible to expect attendance at evening schools in agricultural parishes more than 20 weeks a-year. Rural employment was very various; a great many children left off work at 4 or 5 p.m., and the farmers would in many cases be anxious that there should be an opportunity of attending evening schools; but a great many boys had to attend to horses and cattle, and could not leave off work till 6 or 6.30. They had then, with a drenched skin, to go home, get their supper, and change their clothes. It would be too much, therefore, to expect them to attend the evening school more than three times a-week during 20 weeks in the year. He hoped the Government would do all in their power to encourage night schools, for it was the only way in which the compulsory principle could be carried out. Children 10, 12, or 13 years of age would not be compelled to attend day schools. The value of the labour of children between 9 and 13 became much too great for them to attend day schools, unless the parents were compensated for the value of that labour. The only way to obtain a due attendance of children would be a very large increase in the evening schools. In London there were 33,000 ragged children attending school, of whom 22,000 attended day schools; but a very large proportion of these were under seven years of age, and the remainder were found in night schools, these latter being very often from 10 to 18 or 19 years of age. The age of children in infant schools had been reduced, he observed, from five to four. Their Lordships would recollect the disfavour with which he was met last year when he suggested that the age should be less than five. His object was to prevent an enormous abuse which prevailed in many parts of London, children of even three years of age being kept at labour by their mothers. If all the girls between 7 and 12 years of age were to be fixed in day schools, their mothers would be deprived of the services of the only child who could look after the infants while she was out at work. Unless, therefore, the age at which infants could be taken into schools was reduced, girls 12 or 13 years of age would be taken away, and hundreds of thousands of poor children would be packed in large close rooms under the care of some old woman. It was a great mistake to suppose that children three years of age could not be taught anything. They could not be taught intellectually, but they could be taught order, discipline, and obedience—singing and drill, for instance. He had seen hundreds, nay, thousands of children, many of them not more than two or three years of age, go through the regimental drill in capital style, and to their great enjoyment. He deeply regretted that music was not made an indispensable requisite in the education of children. It was impossible to describe the effect of music on the poorer and wilder sort, or the refining influence exerted on rough and lawless parents by children of the tenderest age being taught to sing hymns in sympathy and simplicity. Effects had thus, as he could testify from personal observation, been produced on parents living in the most degraded condition, such as could not have been effected by the action of the clergyman or the activity of the city missionary. To omit music was to neglect one of the best means of refining and elevating the most degraded portions of the human race.

BILL—(No. 29.)
(The Lord Chancellor.)
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that it was identical with that passed by their Lordships in the last Session of Parliament. It was confined to that part of the labours of the Ritual Commissioners which was devoted to the Table of Lessons in our Prayer Book. At the very dawn of the Reformation, by those anxious for its promotion, one of the earliest steps taken was to secure the reading of the Holy Scriptures in a tongue understood by the people. Accordingly, in the first compilation of the Prayer Book, printed by authority, a Table of Lessons was inserted, so that the people might be instructed by hearing the Word of God read in the then existing translation. This Table had only been twice revised—first, in the reign of Elizabeth, and next, at the passing of the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. It had, for some time, been thought very desirable that there should be a further revision. One reason was, that no less than 144 Lessons were taken from the Apocryphal Books; another was, that some books—such as Chronicles—were wholly omitted, which would be both interesting and instructive. There were also chapters read which it was thought, by many (with whom he himself concurred), could be omitted with rather more profit than would attend their continued retention in the Table. The Evening Lessons, moreover, were taken exclusively from the Epistles, no other part of the New Testament being read in the afternoon or evening. Thus domestic servants and others unable to attend morning service never heard the Gospels read. All these points had been alluded to by a Committee of the Ritual Commission, by whom it had been recommended that the number of Lessons from the Apocrypha should be reduced from 144 to 32, those which were retained being chiefly taken from Ecclesiasticus and the Book of Wisdom, both of which contained much that was highly instructive and incentive to the improvement of morals. Portions of the Books which hitherto had been omitted altogether had been introduced into the Lectionary, and all chapters which it was thought undesirable to continue to read publicly had been omitted, the length of certain Lessons had been curtailed, and arrangements had been made by which those who attended evening service only would have the opportunity of hearing portions of the Gospel and of the Acts of the Apostles read. Were he to state the names of those acting upon the Committee, he was quite sure the House would repose the utmost confidence in their recommendations, and feel satisfied with their labours. The Report of the Committee had been adopted not only by the Convocation of Canterbury, but also by a Committee of the Convocation of the Province of York. The measure had now been before the public for nearly two years, and he had not heard a single objection raised to it as a whole, although, no doubt, objections had been taken to some of its details. The subject was one that must be dealt with once and for all, and therefore it was that the present measure was identical with that which had been introduced into their Lordships' House last year. He had heard it objected against the measure that it did not proceed far enough, inasmuch as it did not carry into effect all the recommendations of the Commissioners. There were, however, many reasons why it would have been undesirable to carry the measure further. Thus a great many of the alterations suggested by the Commissioners had relation to the mode of conducting the service, with the object of introducing a more general uniformity in the outward ceremonies of the Church; but, owing to a recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, such proposed alterations had become unnecessary; because it tended in the direction desired by the Commissioners, and it was far from desirable at present to attempt independent legislation which would probably fail in securing uniformity of opinion. With reference to the Report of the Ritual Commission, he was aware of the great discrimination, the forbearance and care with which that body had proceeded; but, at the same time, their last Report had not been so fortunate as to secure unanimous support. No less than 17 out of the 27 members of which the Commission consisted had protested against the Report—a circumstance that was to be explained by the fact that when the Report was agreed to all the Members of the Commission were not in attendance. Under these circumstances it was thought undesirable, at the present moment, to attempt to carry out by this measure the recommendations contained in that Report, more especially as no less than 26 different objections, each signed by more or less of the Commissioners, had been taken to certain of those recommendations. The measure before the House was one that it was desirable to pass as speedily as possible, because the impending change in the form of the Lectionary had thrown a serious impediment in the way of an important branch of trade by preventing the printing of new Prayer Books.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY desired to reiterate the opinion he had expressed last year—that this measure, as far as it went, would prove a great boon; but, at the same time, he did not see why it might not have gone further and have altogether excluded the Apocrypha from the Table of Lessons. He regretted the exclusion from the Lessons for the Sunday of the 14th chapter of Joshua, nor had any reason been assigned for the removal of it from the Sunday to the Week-day Lessons. The Commissioners had gone through a great deal of labour, and had shown the utmost impartiality and fairness in framing their Reports, and he thought their recommendations entitled to the highest respect; but, considering the ability of the Commissioners, he thought it a pity that their Report should have had so small a result as the present measure. He wished, for the sake of the peace of the Church, the Commissioners had found some way of settling the question as to the Athanasian Creed. Had the suggestion been adopted of preserving that Creed in the formulary of the Prayer Book, without requiring it to be compulsorily read, a good deal would have been effected towards reconciling those who objected to the service in its present form. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had urged their Lordships to use speed with respect to this measure, on the ground that an important branch of trade was suffering from the uncertainty that existed at present as to the form of Lectionary that would be finally adopted; but he (the Earl of Shaftesbury) must protest against that observation as being capable of being construed into a pledge that no further alterations would for the present at least be proposed in the Prayer Book. He, for one, sincerely hoped that many of the important changes which had been recommended by the Commissioners would become law before long. Had the changes recommended in the Report of the Commissioners been formerly carried into effect, much would have been done to smooth many difficulties that now existed and to secure the safety of the Church, which during every hour of its existence was drifting into greater danger.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, he could assure the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) that the recommendations to which he had referred had not received by any means unanimous support from the members of the Commission. In reference to the Athanasian Creed, if the noble Earl had been present at the meetings of the Commissioners, he would have found that it was not thought expedient to make any Report regarding it, although there were many members of the Commission to whose mind this Creed did not commend itself. He did not agree with the optional method suggested by the noble Earl, for he thought that there were other means by which a satisfactory adjustment of the difficult question could be arrived at. He concurred with his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack in urging Parliament to adopt this Bill as soon as possible. He had stated in detail last year, and so would not now repeat the care and pains that had been taken by the Commission to make the Table of Lessons as perfect as possible. More recently, objections had been raised to the general principle on which the Lessons had been drawn up; but directly they were stated fairly, they would be found to result from a mistaken view being taken of the matter. A current objection to the provisions of the Bill was that they proposed to substitute a totally novel Lectionary for one dignified by age, of ancient precedent, and, in outline, very generally adopted both in the East and West. It has been urged, then, that the Church of England, by adopting this new Table, would in this respect separate herself from Continental and other Churches, and so would interpose another obstacle to union. The truth, however, was that any Table of Lessons was, comparatively, a new introduction. In the ancient Church no fixed Lectionary existed until about the 11th or 12th century. The Church of Rome in the 4th century had no Lessons but such as were taken from the Epistles and Gospels. He found that, in the early Christian Church, the privilege was allowed, or at any rate assumed, of altering the Lessons according to the subject to which the sermon was to be addressed. St. Augustine more than once alludes to changes which he had himself prescribed, and for which some excellent discourse of his own was apparently responsible. We know a few leading facts as to the choice of Lessons, but nothing more. For instance, in the ancient Church the custom was that the Book of the Prophet Isaiah should be read before Whitsuntide; after Whitsuntide followed the reading of the Books of Samuel and Kings; later on came the reading of the Books of Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes; towards the latter period of the Church year the Books of Tobit and Judith were read very near the time of Lent. If the reader would turn to the Table of Lessons now before the House, he would see that in these particulars, as also in other details, it is carefully maintained in accord with the usage of the ancient Church, and he thought it would be found that all similar objections, founded on mistaken comparisons of the present with an assumed past, would, if considered fairly, at once disappear. He had alluded to this as objections had been recently urged which it seemed proper now, thus briefly, to notice. He trusted, in conclusion, that the Bill would meet with the reception at their Lordships' hands which it obtained last year.

EARL STANHOPE said, that with reference to the points of detail pointed out by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) he thought their Lordships would feel that if a reform of the Table of Lessons was to be carried out at all, it must be done by placing a measure of confidence in those who had had the supervision of its details. Such details would never be suitably discussed or decided in that House. The well-chosen Committee of the Commission to whom that matter was referred were unanimous in their recommendations, as the Lord Chancellor had already stated, and it might be added to his statement that the Commission at large were equally unanimous when the question was whether those recommendations should be adopted and confirmed. He (Earl Stanhope) had, the other night expressed a hope that the measure of the Government might comprise not only the new Table of Lessons, but certain other matters in the Prayer Book. He admitted the difficulty that might have been found in attempting that course. Since, however, the measure was before the House, he thought their Lordships were—especially those who had been Members of the Commission—at liberty to express their sentiments; and he certainly shared in the regret expressed by the noble Earl, that the Athanasian Creed had not been dealt with. It was true that to deal with it, though most desirable, was also not a little difficult. The difficulty lay in the divided state of opinion among the Commissioners, and not among the Commissioners only, but among the Churchmen at large; and although it might be open to the House in Committee to move Amendments in the Bill on this and on other points of great importance, yet, thinking the measure as it stood was an undoubted good, and being anxious to secure that good, he did not wish to hazard it by proposing or supporting Amendments on other points, however desirable they might be in themselves. It was wholly repugnant to English feeling, while upholding and affirming one's own religious belief, to declare the eternal condemnation of all who did not accept it in every particular; and it was, he thought, impossible that a formula like the Athanasian Creed, as it now stood, could long retain its place in the public services of the Church. He might add that although much diversity of opinion had been expressed by the Commissioners as to the manner of dealing with this Creed, there was a decided majority in favour of some change from the present practice. The Archbishop of Canterbury — now unfortunately absent from the House on account of his state of health — had expressed a strong opinion to that effect, and when his Grace returned to England he hoped that the subject of the Athanasian Creed would receive from him, and from others of the right rev. Bench, the attention it deserved. He did not, however, wish to risk the defeat of the present Bill by attempting to remove any other grievance than the one it sought to remedy, and he trusted that the measure would speedily become law.

LORD CAIRNS said, he did not rise to offer any objection to the Lectionary proposed by that Bill. He agreed that if a change was to be made the substituted Lectionary must be accepted as a whole; and as a whole he believed the Lectionary now proposed was a great improvement on the one we at present possessed. But he desired to repeat now the protest he made last year against the manner in which Convocation was connected with the Bill. The recital of the Bill was that those "revised Tables of Lessons have been considered and approved by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury and by a committee of the Convocation of York." He protested, in the first place, on the minor ground, that if it was right to take notice of Convocation and to have its assent, the assent they required was not that of a committee of the Convocation of York, but that of the Convocation of the Province of York itself. But, further, the manner in which Convocation was referred to in the Bill was entirely without precedent. On former occasions, when the assent of Convocation had been noticed, there was a distinct statement that Convocation had received from the Crown that licence without which the assent of Convocation could not be noticed in any Act of Parliament; and now, for the first time in that Bill, they had a recital of the approval of Convocation without any mention of the licence of the Crown to express that approval. They were told last year that no such licence had been given, and that there was such urgency in passing the Bill that any delay would be very injurious. As, however, the measure had stood over for another Session, there was no good reason for departing from the old constitutional practice requiring the assent of Convocation, if it was to be expressed at all, to be duly expressed by both branches of Convocation in pursuance of a licence from the Crown. He did not wish to impede the progress of the measure, but simply to renew his protest on the point he had described; and if no sufficient explanation were given, he hoped that in Committee that part of the recital would be struck out.

LORD EBURY said, he was perfectly astonished when he heard from the Lord Chancellor that the various recommendations made by the Royal Commissioners on other points than the Lectionary would not be included in the Bill. Were the Commissioners to understand that all their recommendations, excepting these, were to be set aside? If so, he was bound to say that was a very unsatisfactory state of things; and although he approved the Table of Lessons as proposed, he could not give his assent to the Bill without entering his protest against the neglect of recommendations of the greatest importance. Reference had been made to the protests made against the last Report; but these so-called protests were scarcely more than qualifying documents, for in only one was the word "protest" used, and out of the 26 remonstrances 11 or 12 related to the Athanasian Creed.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he somewhat sympathized with the noble Lord who had just spoken in regretting that the Bill did not include other important recommendations of the Commission than those relating to the Lectionary; but he presumed the passing of this Bill would not preclude action at some future time with reference to those recommendations. The great advantage of the course adopted was that this Bill having been well canvassed and generally supported, both by clergy and laity, it might be passed without being submitted to minute examination, and so very speedily become law. It could not have been hoped that this would have been the case had the Bill included some other of the recommendations of the Commissioners. He feared there was some possibility of misapprehension from the words used by the Lord Chancellor with reference to the difference of opinion among the Commissioners. Excepting the vexed question of the Athanasian Creed, he believed that, of the 66 recommendations made in the Report, exactly one-half were agreed to unanimously; nine had only one vote recorded against them; 20 passed by majorities varying from 6 to 1 and 2 to 1; and there were only four which were not carried by a majority of at least 2 to 1. The difficulty of the Commissioners was not so much the want of unanimity within the Commission as the want of unanimity without it. It appeared probable that many of the recommendations on which the Commissioners themselves had agreed would excite much disagreement in passing through Parliament; and it was thought that while this Bill, upon which little difference of opinion existed, would pass rapidly through Parliament, public opinion upon other points should have time to consolidate. The real difficulty was the Athanasian Creed. He believed that there were thousands of men, laity as well as clergy, who would not part from the use of that Creed without deep feelings of regret and, he would almost say, indignation. He might be sorry it should be so; but so, no doubt, it was. Besides this, it was doubtful—at least, so it appeared to him—whether the Royal Commissioners, considering they had been appointed to deal with the Rubrics alone, had any power to touch the Athanasian Creed. He, for one, felt strongly that in dealing with the Prayer Book they had no right to remove from the Prayer Book one of the three Creeds which it was declared by the authority of the Thirty-nine Articles ought thoroughly to be received and believed. How far this, the main difficulty, might be removed by time and consideration he did not venture to prophesy; but if in the present Session it had been attempted to carry out the recommendations of the Ritual Commission—especially, if it had been proposed to remove the Athanasian Creed from the Prayer Book—he was convinced that such a measure would not have passed without paining deeply many whose opinions were most highly valued. It would probably have met with strong opposition, and the result might have been that this Bill, which was generally desired, and would meet the wishes which the Church had expressed for many years, would have been lost.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I have no intention of offering any opposition to the passing of the Bill, but like my noble Friend who spoke last but one (Lord Ebury), I acquiesce in its being passed, with much doubt and reluctance, not because I am insensible to the value of the improvement which will be made by substituting the proposed Table of Lessons for that now in use, but because I think that that improvement, great as I admit it to be, would be dearly purchased if it were obtained at the price of throwing a new obstacle in the way of the more extensive improvements which are urgently wanted; and there is some reason to fear that this may prove to be the case. I think, with my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Shaftesbury), that the argument used by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, that the early passing of the Bill is necessary, in order that the trade in Prayer Books may be relieved from suspense, is open to the interpretation that when this Bill is passed we must look for no farther improvements in the Prayer Book; and that printers and publishers may proceed to bring out new editions without apprehension that it will again be changed. In my opinion, to determine that this is to be the end of improvements in the Prayer Book would be most fatal to the interests of the Church of England. There are many of the improvements suggested by the Commissioners which it would be very desirable to adopt, and there is one which they have not recommended, which I regard as far more important, and more urgently necessary, than any which they have proposed. I refer to some alteration in the Rubric for the purpose of putting an end to the necessity of reading the Athanasian Creed in the regular services of the Church. I heard with great regret what was said on this subject by the right

rev. Prelate—my right rev. Friend, if he will allow me to call him so—who spoke last. He told us that this Creed could not be omitted from our services without giving great pain to a large number of excellent clergymen; but surely he must be aware that its retention gives still more pain not only to a larger number of clergymen who are compelled to use it, but also to nine-tenths of the laity. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say that I never hear that Creed read without a feeling of horror and disgust, regarding it, as I do, as being utterly inconsistent with the reverence due to the Supreme Being, and with a sense of devotion. It is now universally admitted that this Creed, which goes by the name of Athanasius, was not written by him, but centuries after his death. It is the barbarous production of a barbarous age; and I can conceive no more shocking presumption, or more gross irreverence to the Creator, than that men should take upon them to define His nature, which is so far above all human comprehension, by words which, as applied to this subject, certainly cannot be understood in their ordinary sense, and convey no real meaning to the mind. I wish the advocates of this Creed would explain what meaning they attach to such words as “begotten,” or “proceeding,” when applied to the person of the Trinity, and whether they even profess to understand the distinction drawn between them. I would ask those who attach so much value to this Creed how they can justify dealing in this manner with such awful mysteries, and then having the presumption to affirm that all who decline to adopt words and definitions which they do not themselves understand, will, beyond doubt, be condemned to eternal torture? The attempt to maintain this Creed in the services of the Church, in spite of its general condemnation by the reason and feelings of the great body of the people would be as unwise as it certainly would be unsuccessful in the end. If it would otherwise have been possible to retain it, the publication of the proceedings of the Commission has now clearly made this impracticable. It is true that the Commission has not recommended that the use of the Creed should be given up; but as my noble Friend (Earl Stanhope), himself one of the Commissioners, has pointed out to us, it has been unequivocally condemned at different times by so large a majority of the whole body as 17 out of 27; and the minority of the body, who were accidentally a majority of the Commissioners present when the final decision on this subject was come to, only agreed to advise its being retained, with the addition of a note to the Rubric, declaring that the most obnoxious words in the Creed were to be understood in a sense directly opposed to their plain, grammatical meaning. We have heard of “Jesuitical proceedings,” and of the want of respect for truth they show; but to my mind nothing in that way could be more shocking than that we should be advised to retain the Creed, but, at the same time put into the Prayer Book a note declaring that it is not to be understood according to the plain meaning of its language. I cannot doubt that, to retain the Creed in this manner, would be most injurious to the Church of England, and would tend to alienate from it a very large number of persons. At the same time I recognize the difficulty in which the Commissioners were placed by the strong opinion in favour of the Creed of many of the clergy; but I think this difficulty might have been overcome by adopting the suggestion of my noble Friend (Earl Stanhope), and substituting the word “may” for “shall” in the Rubric directing the Creed to be used. No violent or sudden change would thus have been made. Those clergymen who think it right to persevere in declaring that all who differ from them on most abstruse metaphysical questions as to the nature of the Deity will, beyond doubt, be condemned to eternal torture, would have been at liberty to go on using the Creed, while those who take what I think a more charitable and a more Christian view of the subject would have been equally at liberty to omit it. Had reading the Creed been thus made optional I am convinced that the common sense and good feeling of congregations would in a few years have caused it to fall into disuse.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he looked with great satisfaction at the Bill now before the House; and he should not have risen to address their Lordships had it not been for the speech of the noble Earl who had just sat down. Their Lordships were not now discussing a Bill for the abolition of the Athanasian Creed, which as the noble Earl had said would perhaps have commanded a very doubtful assent; but after the noble Earl had said that the Commissioners had taken a Jesuitical course, he thought it necessary to speak on behalf of the Report which a majority of the Commissioners had adopted. He would not follow the noble Earl in the interpretation he had put upon the Athanasian Creed further than to say it did not accord with that given by some of the most eminent authorities in the Church of England. The note which it was proposed to append to the Creed was in the very words of the Royal Commissioners who sat in 1689, and were presided over by Archbishop Tillotson—and he left their Lordships to decide whether they were likely to adopt a Jesuitical mode of interpretation. Their Lordships had been told that a majority of the Commissioners were opposed to the retention of the Creed in the services of the Church. If that were so, and the question had been argued three or four times over, how was it that the majority hostile to the Creed had never been able to make itself felt? The fact was that the opponents of the Creed had never been able to define—to themselves even—what it was they wanted, and hence they never had been able to secure harmonious action; accordingly, their various proposals had been defeated in detail. That would show their Lordships the difficulty of bringing forward any proposals as to the Athanasian Creed likely to meet with the approval of the nation at large. It was all very well to talk about nine-tenths of the people of England being opposed to the Creed. He disputed the accuracy of that statement. On the contrary, he believed that the Athanasian Creed had been a source of comfort to thousands who did not put upon its language the exaggerated interpretation which had been placed upon it by the noble Earl. He warned their Lordships against further interference with the formularies and services of the Church of England, as to which, at the present moment, a very strong feeling existed. The Protestantism of the Church had been strained to an alarming extent; and the peace of the Church of England would be best secured and its permanence maintained by abstaining, at present, at all events, from further interference in this direction. Rough handling at the present moment was very likely to bring about danger and disaster, and, instead of leading to those measures of comprehension which everybody desired, might very possibly end in disruption and disestablishment.

THE BISHOP OF CHICHESTER said, that, as he understood, the Government by no means intended to throw aside the other recommendations of the Commissioners, but meant to take their time, and feel the pulse of the country, and bring forward remedial measures when they saw that the proper moment had arrived. As to the denunciation of the Athanasian Creed by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), uttered with a vehemence unsuited to the sacred character of the subject, he need only point out that the two expressions “proceeding” and “begotten,” on which the noble Earl had laid such stress, were the very words Scripture applied to the Holy Ghost and to the Son of God. Accordingly, if the other criticisms of the noble Earl had no greater weight than this, they might be allowed to pass without further observation. His own opinion was that the Athanasian Creed ought not to be used in congregations without due explanation by the clergy. The Athanasian Creed was an exposition of the true sense of Scripture; but the argument that the Creed was intended only to be recited, not believed, went a great deal further than the noble Earl intended, for it would equally apply to the Nicene Creed and to the Apostles’ Creed. As regarded the change in the Table of Lessons, that he believed to be a great improvement, and one which was much needed. He rejoiced, however, that the Committee and the framers of this Bill had been courageous enough to retain the noble chapters from the Apocrypha.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he had only understood the observations of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to apply to the present Session. He trusted that hereafter it would be possible for the Government to give effect to many other of the recommendations of the Commissioners.

EARL GREY very much doubted whether the word “proceeding” was to be found in Scripture applied in the sense mentioned by the right rev. Prelate; but what he most objected to was the attempt to define by words what was beyond all human intellect and comprehension.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would not continue the discussion as to whether the Athanasian Creed ought to be retained or done away with in the services of the Church; but he rose to explain the position in which the Government stood in regard to the Bill. The action of the Government had been misunderstood. The Government had been complained of for not going more fully into the recommendations of the Ritual Commissioners, and especially for not having dealt with the Athanasian Creed. There would have been no unwillingness on their part to deal with that question also had there been any reasonable amount of unanimity among the Commissioners themselves with regard to the Athanasian Creed. The declaration of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had been limited simply to this—that Her Majesty's Government were not prepared at present to deal with a question the difficulties of which was shown by the want of union among the Commissioners. As to the point with which the Government did propose to deal by this Bill, there was almost entire unanimity of opinion. As to the mention in the recital that the revised Tables of Lessons had been considered and approved of by Convocation, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was prepared to yield to what appeared to be the very general opinion of their Lordships on that point, and to strike out the recital in Committee.

IRISH LAND ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. STEWART HARDY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true, as reported in the papers on Friday March 3rd, that a tenant at will in Armagh was awarded twenty-two years' purchase for disturbance in her holding, together with the value of her house and of a sand pit on the land, while the owner in fee simple received only twenty years' purchase; and, whether such a decision is in accordance with the provisions of the Land Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it would not, I think, be any part of my duty to say, with regard to the decision of any Irish Court, whether it was or was not in accordance with the provisions of the Land Act; but I admit that I should have no difficulty in answering any Question as to what were the intentions of the framers of the Land Act, and probably the hon. Member intended to ask me a Question of that kind. I am cognizant of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers as they appear in the public journals. I believe them to be correctly reported, though I do not think they are stated with perfect accuracy in this Question, because I think the sand pit was not a part of the holding. As I understand the statement, the sand pit was embraced in the valuation to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I have no doubt that the relative value of the interests of tenants and landlords under the Ulster custom, under which this case was tried, was not fixed or determined by the Irish Land Act of last year. That was taken as it was found. There was no option of proceeding otherwise than under the provisions of that Act.

POST OFFICE — POSTING OF NEWSPAPERS, &c., IN WALL AND PILLAR LETTER-BOXES.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER said, that in the absence of Mr. Macfie he would beg to ask the Postmaster General, Whether he does not think it expedient, after the long experience, of the great advantage which the public derive from the use of Wall and Pillar Letter-boxes, now to withdraw the prohibition to post therein newspapers, books, and patterns; and, whether he does not think that some of the delays and irregularities for which the Post Office is blamed, are not justly attributable to the practice of dropping along with written correspondence other despatches which may be within the limits of size allowed by the aperture into the same box, in contravention of the present regulations?

MR. MONSELL, in reply, said, it was not expedient to permit wall and pillar letter-boxes to be used for the posting of newspapers, book, and patterns. If the present pillar posts were to be used for those purposes, they would obviously be too much encumbered. He was not aware of the delays or irregularities to which his hon. Friend alluded. But if there were any such delays or irregularities, they arose simply through disobeying directions which ought to be obeyed, and putting newspapers into pillar posts.

POST OFFICE—LETTERS OF OFFICERS AT FOREIGN STATIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that the letters of Officers in Her Majesty's Service, when on duty at Foreign Stations, are now charged full postage, and if they are ordered away from the Stations to which such letters were addressed before the arrival of the mail bags, such letters are charged fresh postage; and, whether he considers such charges just or expedient?

MR. MONSELL said, in reply, that the privilege under which letters of officers in Her Majesty's service serving at foreign stations were formerly conveyed at a lower rate of postage than that charged upon ordinary letters was abolished on the 1st of January, 1870, by a Warrant of the Treasury Board, dated 17th August, 1869. Officers' letters were not liable to any additional charge on re-direction when an officer serving at a foreign station was removed from such station to another station before the letter arrived. That was very clearly stated in Rule 113 of The British Postal Guide.

IRELAND—RIBANDISM.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether a printed form of the following oath, or of an oath to the like effect, alleged to have been taken by Ribandmen in the county of Westmeath has not been seized by the police in that county:—

"By the virtue of the oath I have taken, I will aid and assist, with all my mind and strength when called upon, to massacre Protestants and cut away heretics, burn British churches, annihilate Protestant Kings and Princes, and all others except the Church of Rome and this system; and by the virtue of the oath I have taken I will think it no sin to kill and massacre a Protestant, whenever opportunity occurs; and by virtue of the said oath, if I know any of the said members of this system to be backward in executing any of the aforesaid orders, I will immediately make it known to the captain or committee-man belonging to the Riband Board; and by virtue of the oath, I will always attend at one moment's notice to execute any commands belonging to this system, and I will never see a brother hurt or abused by any not up to this system without assisting him, nor will I buy anything from a Protestant at any terms, if I can get it from a brother; and I also feel bound to believe that there is no absolution to be had from the Pope of Rome, or any other authority belonging to that Church, or that which is to come, from a breach of the test!"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The printed paper, which is quoted almost accurately in the Question of my hon. Friend, was found in a house in Mullingar in the year 1869. There is, I believe, reason to doubt whether it is a genuine Riband document; and, if so, it is supposed to be a copy of an obsolete oath. I have no further information on that subject.

THE TREATY OF PARIS (1856)—NEUTRALIZATION OF THE BLACK SEA—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government, before coming to any decision in the Conference, will not take means to learn what were the contingencies which, in Baron Brunow's opinion, justified a violation of the Treaty of 1856, the more especially as subsequently, in reply to Lord Granville, the Russian Ambassador declared that these contingencies had never been realized? I wish also to ask whether the noble Lord can give us any information concerning proposals made at the Conference?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, in reply to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that Earl Granville has received permission from the Russian Ambassador to state that the contingencies to which his Excellency alluded had reference to the possible bearing of the late war between Austria and Italy on the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire. With reference to the second Question of my hon. Friend, I will, with the permission of the House, make a short statement. I have to inform the House that a Treaty has been signed to-day at the Foreign Office, by which the clauses of the Treaty of 1856 respecting the neutralization of the Black Sea are abrogated, and the restrictions imposed by previously existing treaties upon the Porte in regard to the closing of the Straits of the Dardanelles and the Bos-phorus, when the Porte is at peace, are so far modified as to admit of their being open to ships of war of friendly or allied Powers, in case the Porte should deem it necessary to do so in order to secure the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris of March 30th, 1856. The Treaty just signed also provides for the prolongation of the European Commission of the Danube for 12 years; and, further, for the continued neutrality of the works already created or to be created by the Commission, with a saving, however, of the rights of the Porte, as a territorial Power, to send ships of war into the Danube. At the first meeting of the Conference, on the 17th January, a special Protocol was signed, recording that it was an essential principle of the Law of Nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement. The French Plenipotentiary has this day signed the Protocol, together with the Treaty, and the Protocols of the Conference will be presented to Parliament with the least possible delay.

ARMY—EXAMINATIONS FOR DIRECT COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL CORBETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the gentlemen who passed their examination for direct commissions in the Army in August last will, in event of their being over age when their turn comes for a commission, still be eligible, or whether they will be passed by as superannuated?

MR. CARDWELL: Each candidate who passed in July was furnished with a memorandum explaining to him the prospect of his obtaining a commission, and pointing out within what time he must obtain it or be superannuated.

LORD GARLIES asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there will be any Examination for Direct Commissions within the next few months; and, if so, whether it will be conducted upon the old system, or upon the new one recommended by the recent Commission's Report on the subject?

MR. CARDWELL: As there are upwards of 500 candidates for commissions who have passed, there will not be another examination for the Army generally for a considerable time. If any ex-

minations are necessary for the Guards, they will be conducted under the new system.

ARMY—CHRISTCHURCH BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. G. BENTINCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it was not the intention of the Government last year to sell or pull down the barracks at Christchurch; whether they were deterred from doing so by the intervention of His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief; and, whether it is not the practice to advertise for tenders for contracts for the repairs in barracks; and, if so, whether that course was pursued in the case of the repairs now executing in the barracks at Christchurch; and, if so, in what papers such tenders were advertised?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that there was no intention to sell or pull down the barracks at Christchurch. The repairs were being executed under the triennial contract made in 1868, the tenders for which were advertised in the Builder, Building News, Portsmouth Times, and Hampshire Advertiser.

POOR LAW (METROPOLIS)—SMALL POX HOSPITALS.—QUESTION.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY asked the late President of the Poor Law Board, Whether he is correctly reported to have said to a deputation from Islington that "the Metropolitan Asylums Board could not do more work in the way of providing hospitals for Small Pox cases;" and, if so, upon what grounds he made the statement?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, he had not made the statement in those broad terms in which he was reported to have spoken. He pointed to the extreme difficulty which the Metropolitan Asylums Board had at the present moment, on account of having two large lunatic asylums and three or four small pox establishments on their hands. He also stated that they experienced great difficulty in obtaining sufficient men to work on committees for obtaining sites and superintending plans. That statement he made on the authority of members of the Metropolitan Asylums Board.

Afterwards—

MR. PEEK asked the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, Whether it is the intention of that Board to erect a Small Pox Hospital upon any portion of the surplus lands of Battersea Park; and whether any application has been made to the First Commissioner of Works for a grant of land for that purpose?

MR. HIBBERT said, in reply, that the Poor Law Board had made application to the First Commissioner of Works to ascertain the terms on which the Government would grant land for the purpose of building a small pox hospital thereon. At the same time, there was no present intention on the part either of the Metropolitan Asylums Board or the Poor Law Board to erect a small pox hospital on that site. By saying so, he was not precluding the Poor Law Board from taking any steps that might be necessary.

COST OF THE ABYSSINIAN WAR.

QUESTION.

MR. HUNT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he made a statement on March the 7th, that nineteen millions were added to the National Debt by the Abyssinian War; whether in point of fact any addition to the permanent debt of the Country was made by that war; whether the cost of that war was not below nine millions; and, whether the debt temporarily incurred for a portion of such cost has not been entirely provided for out of Taxes, and extinguished?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I did not say that £19,000,000 were added to the National Debt by the Abyssinian War. The Abyssinian War cost less than £9,000,000. In defraying that charge there were borrowed, I think, £2,000,000 from the Bank of England, which were repaid out of the balances, and therefore did not add to the Debt of the country, and there were Exchequer Bonds for £1,000,000 which have since been paid off, and therefore formed no addition to the public Debt. I was entirely in error when I said that they had. But the error was more technical than real. The fact was that by great exertions in raising more Revenue the cost of the Abyssinian War was prevented from becoming public debt, and was paid off instead. I am happy to acknowledge that for that result the country is indebted to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think that in making the statement I wished to cast any reflection on him.

IRELAND—RIBANDISM IN WESTMEATH, &c.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether and when Her Majesty's Government intend to apply to Parliament for any extraordinary powers to enable them at once to cope with the present disregard of all Law in the counties of Westmeath, Meath, and parts of King's County; or, if the adoption of measures necessary to restore security to life and property in the disturbed districts is to await the Report of the Select Committee just appointed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am at a loss, Sir, to know whether I understand aright the Question of the hon. Baronet, though the terms are so clear that I do not see how I can misapprehend them. But if I do understand the Question, it appears like an invitation to repeat in answer to a Question the substance of a debate on which we lately spent two nights. The opinion of the Government is that they will best discharge their duty with respect to the state of things which exists not in "Westmeath, Meath, and parts of King's County," but in Westmeath, and parts of Meath and King's County, by placing the facts on such a footing as to be beyond all dispute by means of the inquiry of an impartial Committee. That appears to us the most prompt method that can be adopted with a view to an effectual remedy. But I quite agree with the hon. Baronet that it is our duty that the remedy should be applied in the most speedy and effective manner.

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Bill which he stated to a deputation in Dublin had been prepared by Government for the purchase of the Irish Railways?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, in reply, that the Question of his hon. Friend was based on a misreport of what passed on the occasion referred to. He never alluded to any Government Bill being in existence, but to a Bill which the Lord Lieutenant himself had then recently received, through, he believed, the late Lord Mayor, from what was called the Mansion House Committee, on the subject of Irish railways.

That was a Bill providing for the purchase of the Irish railways under an Irish guarantee to be given by means of a system of Irish taxation, and he referred to the subject for the purpose of ascertaining whether the deputation had come to the Lord Lieutenant with a view to support that Bill. He found, upon inquiry, that most of the members of the deputation were not aware of the existence of the Bill, and did not come for the purpose of supporting it. Whether it would be in the power of the Chief Secretary to lay that Bill on the Table he did not know; but he would inquire.

ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE.

QUESTION.

LORD GARLICK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any sum of money provided in the Army Estimates for the contingency of the Abolition of Purchase (in the event of the Army Regulation Bill passing into Law); if so, what the amount of that sum is estimated at for the current Military year; and, if not, whether the passing of this Bill will necessitate a further Supplementary Vote of Money?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, there is no such sum in the present Estimates. When the Army Regulation Bill shall have passed it will be necessary to lay an Estimate on the Table for such portion of the sum estimated by the actuaries as may be necessary to provide for the portion of the year still unexpired after the appointed day. The sum for the whole first year is estimated at £1,060,058, and the sum actually required will be the proportionate part of that amount.

EPPING FOREST.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that the timber in High Beach, a part of Epping Forest, is being marked previous to being cut down by private people; and, if so, whether he is prepared to take any steps to restrain such action till the question as to the inclosure of Epping Forest has been decided?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is not in my power, even if I were willing, to take any steps in the matter. The House is aware that the Government have no property in the land of Epping Forest, but only certain forestal rights over it. In the part of the forest where they are cutting down the timber even these forestal rights have been extinguished, and the Government has no legal power to interfere.

DESPATCH OF MR. ODO RUSSELL.

QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Despatch of Mr. Odo Russell, dated February 27th, Versailles, and presented to Parliament by command of Her Majesty, was written in reply to any Despatch or communication from Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether such last-mentioned Despatch or communication can be also given?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Mr. Odo Russell's despatch, to which my right hon. Friend alludes, was not written in reply to any despatch or communication from the Foreign Office; but after what had passed on the subject, and the comments made on the language he had held to Count Bismarck, Mr. Russell felt it his duty to explain those motives to his official superiors, within whose discretion it then rested to publish the explanation in the same manner as the original conversation had been made known—namely, by presenting to Parliament the despatch containing it.

INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Governor General of India in Council was consulted before any definite steps were taken to establish the Indian Engineering College at Cooper's Hill; and, whether there is any objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence which has taken place between the Secretary of State for India in Council and the Governor General in Council in reference to the establishment of this College?

MR. GRANT DUFF: There will be no objection to producing the Correspondence referred to if the hon. Member will move for it.

MR. FAWCETT: The Under Secretary has not answered my Question. What I wish to know is whether the

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Governor General and Council were consulted before any definite steps were taken in the matter?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I thought I answered both the hon. Gentleman's Questions. Of course, the Correspondence referred to could not be produced unless the Government of India had been consulted.

MR. FAWCETT: The point on which I wish to have an answer from the hon. Gentleman is this—whether the Governor General was communicated with before any definite steps were taken to establish the College?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Certainly.

ARMY REGULATION BILL—[BILL 39.]

SECOND READING. [THIRD NIGHT.]

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [6th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the expenditure necessary for the national defences and the other demands on the Exchequer do not at present justify any Vote of Public Money for the extinction of Purchase in the Army,"—(Colonel Loyd Lindsay.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, it is with extreme regret I find, after giving the most dispassionate consideration in my power to this measure, that I can regard it only with increased feelings of disapprobation and disappointment. At the commencement of the Session my right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) said he was prepared to give the fairest consideration and, if possible, support to Her Majesty's Government in any measure which they might bring forward with the view of carrying out the declared desire of the country that our national defences should be placed on a more satisfactory footing. Now, in speaking for myself, I believe I am speaking for every hon. Gentleman on this side of the House when I say that we are, one and all, prepared to receive favourably, and honestly to support, if we could do so, any measure which the Government might bring forward with regard to this most important question. But I am sorry to say that the result has been very different from what we expected. The Government have now laid before us their plan—and what do we find? We find, as the head and front of this most important measure, a costly, party, crochety project—a sop to democracy—a measure which, when combined and considered with the remainder of the plan of the Government as developed in this Bill, I cannot bring myself to believe will contribute one iota to the national defences of the country. I wish, in the first place, to call the attention of the House to the somewhat extraordinary statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War when he brought forward, I admit most candidly and most fairly, the plan of the Government. He told us that he and his Colleagues had come to the decision to do away with the system of purchase in the Army; and then I anxiously listened to know with what argument and what reason he was about to assail that system. But he gave us none. He only made this statement, with which I shall be prepared to deal before I sit down—he said that it would, in the opinion of the Government, be impossible to amalgamate the Reserve forces with the Line, and reorganize our Army system satisfactorily, unless the system of purchase was done away with. He then proceeded to make another statement which, as far as I can judge, was the most strange one ever made to a British Parliament. He stated that no doubt there were strong reasons in favour of retaining the purchase system, and immediately proceeded to adopt a plan under which we shall impose on the taxpayers of the country a burden, as he says, of £8,000,000 of money. And for what?—to abolish that system which, by his own admission, there are strong reasons for retaining. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), speaking subsequently, went still further. He stated broadly and distinctly the general arguments in favour of the system of purchase, and went on to show the House why, in his opinion, it was a good

system; adding the remarkable words, which are perfectly true, that, under the system of purchase, the non-purchase were better off than the purchase officers. Yet, notwithstanding that declaration, the right hon. Baronet proceeded to state that he, too, was willing to saddle the taxpayers of this country with the payment of millions of money in order to abolish that system. These are, in my opinion, extraordinary statements; and the Government, in bringing forward their proposal, were, I think, bound, under the circumstances, to adduce stronger reasons in support of their policy than any which we have yet heard. I hope the House will now allow me to refer for a moment to the position held by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government in connection with this subject. Little more than two years have passed away since the right hon. Gentleman, in the progress which he made through Lancashire, denounced in no measured terms the wasteful and extravagant expenditure of his predecessors in office, and of my humble self in particular. I cannot help thinking, however, that I ought to find ample consolation for the imputations made against me by the right hon. Gentleman in the events of the last two years. In a letter written by Earl Russell he speaks of my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War as having been appointed to his present office for the purpose of effecting retrenchment, and that he had retrenched. That is perfectly true, for within the first 18 months after the last change of Government 20,000 men were struck off the numbers of the Army as I had left it, and the Estimates were reduced in proportion. But what do I find after those 18 months have passed away? I find the strength of our Army restored to within a few thousand men of the strength at which I left it in 1868, while the Estimates have been brought back to within a few thousands of those very Estimates which had been denounced by the Prime Minister as so wasteful and extravagant. Now, I am making no complaint of this increase of the Estimates—on that score I find no fault with the Government—it is with their denunciations of our supposed extravagance that I think I have just reason to quarrel. And you may judge my profound astonishment when I see a Ministry who placed economy and retrenchment in the very forefront of their policy, and who denounced the late Government as extravagant, coming down to the House of Commons and proposing to us to sanction a scheme which, as was said by my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire a few evenings ago, is one of the most wantonly extravagant and wasteful proposals that have ever been made to Parliament. The Secretary of State, in making his statement the other day, asked us frankly and fairly three questions. Are you prepared, he said, to meet these three objections? Are you prepared to sacrifice a very large sum of money? Are you prepared to deal with the question of retirement? And are you prepared to adopt the principle of selection? Now, I am bound to answer all these questions in the negative. I am not prepared to consent to an enormous sacrifice of public money, unless the Government can show that this sacrifice is for adequate reasons. I am not prepared to plunge into the unknown cost of a scheme of retirement until that scheme is explained. Nor am I prepared to encounter the well-known and proved difficulties of selection. It is to be regretted that the system of purchase in the Army is very imperfectly understood. The Secretary of State led us to think last year that he did not understand it; but it is clear he has now mastered the subject, because he has told us how very strong are the arguments in its favour. Many hon. Members, however, have shown that they do not understand it, and out-of-doors it is understood still less. Gentlemen, including the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), have been riding their hobbies rather hard, and have been going about the country throwing dust into the eyes of the people upon this subject. In my opinion, therefore, it is at this moment of serious national importance that we should endeavour to arrive at a right understanding of the real merits of the question. I was sorry, a few days ago, to read the language addressed by the hon. and learned Solicitor General to his constituents at Exeter. The hon. and learned Member, though distinguished in his own profession, yet not probably knowing much about purchase in the Army, said that under it "rich and incompetent men" buy the right "to destroy regiments and to lose battles." On the part of such a man as the Solicitor General we have a right to expect that, even when addressing his constituents, he should not speak on a subject of such importance with this levity. But the hon. and learned Gentleman went further, and condescended to repeat the trash which I thought was now dismissed from the mind of every intelligent man in this country—always excepting the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan)—that the officers of the British Army are a peculiar and a privileged class. It is deeply to be regretted that this misrepresentation should go abroad; and I want to impress upon the House and the country that, in arriving at a judgment upon this question, which has assumed now a national importance, it is most desirable that opinion should be based not upon partizan statements from either side of the House, but upon authenticated means, which we have at our command. We have the information arrived at after an able, impartial, judicial inquiry by the Royal Commission of 1857, which discussed the purchase system with an ability and a fairness leaving nothing to be desired. I hope I shall not be thought to waste the time of the House if I invite attention to the decision of this Commission. Let me remind the House, in the first place, of whom that Commission was composed. It had at its head the Duke of Somerset, Lord Stanley—now the Earl of Derby—Mr. Sidney Herbert, Sir De Lacy Evans, Sir Harry Jones, and Mr. Carr Glynn—now Lord Wolverton. It will be seen from the composition of the Commission that it had no unfair bias; that it would not lean unduly to aristocratic influence in the Army, nor to any views unfairly opposed to those of the present Government. The Royal Commission, after hearing evidence, wrote a most careful and able Report—and what was their decision? They did not recommend any abolition of purchase in the Army under the rank of major, but they recommended its abolition above that grade, in order that the command of regiments should no longer be subject to purchase. It is now 14 years since that Report was issued. The Government of Lord Palmerston made up their minds to adopt the Report; but when they tried to give practical effect to it they found the difficulties so great that they abandoned the project; and from 1857 to the present moment no attempt has been made to carry out the recommendation of the Commissioners. In two short sentences the Royal Commission summed up the arguments for and against purchase in the Army. They said—

“To comprise in a few words the evils of the purchase system, it is said to restrict the number of those from whom officers can in the first instance be obtained; it deadens the feelings of emulation and the eagerness to acquire military knowledge; and it renders men eligible for the highest command without taking any security that they are fitted for such a position. The chief advantages of the system are said to be that it facilitates the retirement of officers, and thereby accelerates promotion in the Army, which would otherwise stagnate during a period of continual peace; also, it is said to afford to officers a security against the influence of favour, enabling each officer to obtain his advancement by his own means, without being dependent on the good will of the Government, or on the patronage of higher authorities.”

A moment's consideration of these two statements will show that the objections to purchase are objections of theory, while the arguments in its favour are practical. As to the objections to the system, I was struck by what fell from the Secretary of State this evening. He has told us that at this moment there are 500 gentlemen who have passed their examination and are waiting for a commission. We may dismiss, therefore, all uneasiness as to “the number of those from whom officers can in the first instance be obtained.” As to the objection that purchase deadens emulation and the eagerness of officers to acquire a knowledge of their profession, there is an obvious remedy for such an evil if it exists. A stroke of the pen will correct it; the Commander-in-Chief, and those at the head of the Army, have only to prescribe any regulations they choose for increasing the acquirements of officers in the Army. The remaining objection is the most serious—that under the existing system men may be appointed to the highest command, there being no security as to their fitness for such a position. Now, if the facts are examined, I believe it will be found there are in practice very few such cases, and that where they occur they may be dealt with by the exercise of the veto which the Commander-in-Chief possesses. The Royal Commissioners, referring to the constitution of our regiments, and to the fact that each regiment contained only two majors, and a number of captains and subaltern officers, drew this distinction:—"Here," they said, "the purchase system operates favourably for the public service," on account of the officers who retire by the sale of their commissions. Here is the deliberate opinion of an impartial Commission that the purchase system operates for the public advantage. The Commissioners say—

"In the preceding pages we have endeavoured to show that if the purchase system be abolished it will become indispensable, for the purpose of maintaining the efficiency of the British Army, to adopt a new system of retirement and promotion—namely, to make retirement, after a fixed age or period of service compulsory, and to give promotion by selection."

For the present I shall postpone my observations as to promotion by selection, wishing now to examine the substitute proposed by the Government for the system of purchase. In the first place, I will touch upon a subject which has not, I think, been alluded to by any previous speaker. We have heard a great deal of how men are to get out of the Army, and what is to be the system of retirement; but I do not remember to have heard a word as to how young men are to get into the Army. I ask the House to consider whether this question is not immediately and closely connected with the plan of the Government. There are now three modes of getting into the Army. Young men may compete and obtain commissions at Sandhurst without purchase; non-commissioned officers are in a certain ratio raised from the ranks to the position of commissioned officers; and the third mode is the purchase system, by which young men are allowed to enter their names in the list of the Military Secretary, and purchase their commissions. The practical result is, as far as I can judge, that about two-thirds, or between two-thirds and three-fourths, of the young men who enter the Army enter by purchase, and about one-third or one-fourth enter without purchase. The point I wish to press upon the House is that under this system we are free from patronage and favour, jobbing and political influence. A young man gets his name put down for purchase, and when his turn comes round he is brought up for examination—which is most fairly conducted, for in my own personal experience I have known cases where men of very humble position have come out at the top of the list, and where the sons of noblemen have either been at the bottom or, failing altogether, have been unable to make the Army their profession. This is no mean consideration. It is, indeed, a matter of extreme importance. Now, what are the modes of entering the Army which the right hon. Gentleman adopts? Of course, he properly continues the mode of letting men enter the Army by competition and examination at Sandhurst. He also continues the plan of raising men from the ranks, and he is perfectly right in doing so—with the limitation that the practice should not be much farther increased. I do not believe it would be for the good of the Army that the system of raising men from the ranks to commissions should be extended to a greater extent than it exists at present. The right hon. Gentleman next explained his two substitutes for purchase. One is the admission into the Line of Militia officers after two years' training, and the other is the adoption of the cadet system. Now here we must be cautious what we are doing—because we are here going back to favour and patronage. I do not wish to show the slightest disrespect to the eminent and distinguished men who fill the offices of Lords Lieutenant of counties, but, even supposing them to be free from the action, you will expose them to the suspicion of jobbing these appointments. Two of these Lords Lieutenant have told me recently that they have already received from 20 to 30 applications to put down young men who wished to take advantage of this arrangement to enter the Army. We all know what is now said—I do not say justly—with respect to the selection of magistrates by Lords Lieutenant, and the imputations cast on them out-of-doors in respect to that matter; but what would be the case when they shall have the power of selecting from among their own friends those who are to be passed into the Army on such easy terms? Would not such a system be open to the suspicion, at least, of favouritism and jobbery? With regard to the adoption of the cadet system, I wish to be further informed as to the intentions of the Secretary of War. The hon. and gallant Member for Colchester, (Colonel Learmonth), who spoke the other night with such great ability and knowledge of the subject, expressed an opinion very much in favour of that system, and I was not surprised to hear that that gallant Officer took at first sight a favourable view of it. It has, however, been my fate to know a good deal of the Admiralty, and in that Department I had ample experience of what kind of thing the cadet system is. I want to know who is to nominate to these cadetships? At the Admiralty the duty of selection was constantly involving us in the suspicion of favouritism at least. No man could have been First Lord without having his table covered with numerous applications such as this—"I have always supported Conservative or Liberal candidates" (as the case might be), "and I have a very nice boy, nine years old, whom I want to be a cadet." Such are the applications which the First Lord receives day after day. A similar result, I apprehend, will attend this proposal of cadets for the Army. Then I want to know at what age are these cadets to be admitted; at what age are they to commence their career? I say that we have now a system which is free from favour and from the suspicion of political jobbing, and I warn and entreat the Government most solemnly that in their earnest desire to adopt this democratic system—for that is what the abolition of purchase really amounts to—they should beware, lest in trying to avoid the evils which exist, they should incur others of even greater magnitude and importance.

And now let me touch on a subject which has been much discussed, and which, I hope, will receive still more discussion—I mean the question how men are to get out of the Army. What is to be your system of retirement? Here, I think, we have some right to complain of the conduct of the Government, for this is a question of enormous magnitude, closely and immediately affecting the expenditure of the country and the efficiency of our Army, and I think the Government are bound to show what the system of retirement is to be, and what effect it is likely to have on the efficiency of the Army. We are in manifest danger; either you will have the dead routine of seniority, fatal to the efficiency of the Army, or you will have an enormous expenditure to provide for. This is a difficult question, the importance of which it is impossible to overrate. And there is another question germane to it—What are you going to do about the artillery? This question is pressing upon us very strongly. Four years ago the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) presided over a Committee, which entered into arrangements for providing retirements for artillery officers. As long as I was in office, he was constantly asking me whether we were going to adopt these arrangements; but my answer was always the same—"The scheme is too costly; I will not adopt it, and will wait until you are in office, when you can adopt it yourself." But it never has been adopted. Last year the evil was still pressing on the Royal Artillery, and a small departmental committee was appointed by my right hon. Friend at the War Office, consisting of the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), and only two other persons. That committee gave considerable care to the inquiry, and they produced a Report, which was laid upon the Table of this House. I want to know is that Report going to be carried out, or is the suggested plan deemed too expensive? This very morning I received a letter from the father of two young officers in the artillery, complaining in the most bitter terms of the stagnation of their prospects; and I have received several other letters to the same effect within the last few days. One of these letters, which I received this morning, even went to the length of saying—"Do not suppose we can be satisfied with the Report which was cooked up at the War Office last year." Have we not here, in the condition of the Royal Artillery at this moment, and in their prospects, a grave warning against extending these difficulties to the whole Army? What would be the number of officers to be provided for under your system of retirement? Recollect the warning advice given by that fairly constituted Commission. Under the present system the whole thing is provided for. The officers sell their commissions and retire; but, under the new system, nothing will be provided for. I very much fear that the evils in front of you are such that you will find it very difficult to overcome them.

Let me now advert to another very grave consideration in connection with the Government plan—I mean the question of selection in the Army. The difficulties here are even greater than those in respect of retirement; and let me remind you again of the warning voice which we have received from the Royal Commission. The Commissioners alluded to their own recommendation that selection should be exercised in reference to the command of regiments; but they went on to say that the feeling against selection was so strong that the highest military authorities would take refuge in seniority, and if they could not choose the senior major of the regiment they would select the senior major in that arm of the service. My own belief is that, if you adopt the principle of selection in the Army, you will find in time of peace there will be, for the most part, a sort of average degree of merit pervading an immense number of officers to such an extent as to make it almost impossible for any man, however honestly disposed, satisfactorily to select out of that body of officers. What, then, would be the obvious course to adopt? To retire on seniority. The Commissioners say—

“To abolish the purchase system, and to leave promotion to be made by seniority as the future rule of advancement, would, in our opinion, be a course of proceeding most injurious to the efficiency of the British Army.”

I believe that every dispassionate man will concur in that opinion; and here, again, let me appeal to a precedent which is within my own knowledge—the precedent of the Navy. Have we heard no complaints of selection in the Navy? Has any man ever held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty without experiencing a painful feeling that, right or wrong, however anxious he might be to do justice, he could not select a man to command a ship without excluding many other deserving men? And we know the result is that the man who makes the selection must be content to submit to all sorts of imputations. The result has been practically to confirm the language of the Purchase Commissioners that, for the most part, the authorities at the Admiralty, in order to take refuge from these imputations, have had to come down to selection from seniority. Commands to ships are conferred to a large extent by seniority from the impossibility of making selections from such a number of officers. Then there is another argument on this question which we ought not to disregard. The Commander-in-Chief of the British Army has at this time—and has for some time had—to appoint by selection to one appointment, and to one only—that is, to the honorary colonelcies of our regiments. I see my hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) in his place, and I must say that I read with deep regret among many misstatements which disfigure the pages he has published on this subject one most painful imputation on His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, to the effect that in making these selections for honorary colonelcies he has been guided by social rank and personal interest. A more unjust imputation never was made. I speak in the presence of my right hon. Friend opposite the Secretary of State, whose experience I have no doubt has been the same as my own. For nearly two years I was a party to every selection made by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. There was no appointment made without my consent. Sometimes His Royal Highness has consulted me by letter, but more frequently I went with him down the Army List, and over and over again I have known him pass over men of high social class and distinction, and pick out some officer solely on account of his professional merits. Is not this enough to show the difficulties of the system of selection? While I am vindicating, as I feel I ought to vindicate, His Royal Highness from these injurious and unjust imputations, I desire to disclaim on my own part any defence of the system of these honorary colonelcies, for I think the system is not a good one, and that it might very easily be improved.

Let me now say a few words as to the social position and general merits of our officers—but they shall be very few, ample justice having been done to them by previous speakers. The idea that our officers are selected with reference to their rank has, I think, been completely exploded; and though the hon. Member for the Border Burghs has clung to that idea until he has brought himself to believe it, I think he is the only man who entertains the idea that there is anything like what he calls a “class monopoly” in favour of the officers of the British Army. The names of Clive and Havelock have been mentioned. Why, Sir, there is an officer at this moment holding the high and distinguished rank of Field Marshal in the British Army, who is the son of a tradesman of this City of London. I mention this to the honour of the man, to the honour of the system, and to the discomfiture of those who pretend for a moment that the officers of our Army are selected from a privileged class. What have been the services of our Army? In this debate I think we have not made enough of the fact that for 200 years the British Army has been officered under this system of purchase; and what have been its results? Have we not gained all our triumphant successes under that system; and has it not been under that system that our Army has placed this kingdom in the position of power and eminence which it now enjoys? I believe there is no Army in the world where the officers are more deserving of credit than the British Army, or where there is a better feeling between the officers and men. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) would have the Army officered in a more professional manner. But I say that is in your own power. By a stroke of the pen you may prescribe any system of training you like, and make your officers what you please; but the system of purchase has nothing to do with it, one way or the other.

Now, Sir, I come to that more serious question, what is to be the cost of the Government plan? The hon. Member for the Border Burghs has made an extraordinary mistake on this point. He has told us that the cost of doing away with purchase would be, at regulation prices, £2,355,000, or at extra-regulation prices, £3,140,000. That is one of the many inaccuracies into which my hon. Friend has allowed his zeal on this question to hurry him. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State comes down to the House and tells us that it will cost from £7,500,000 to £8,500,000—and I doubt the accuracy even of that estimate. I say this, of course, not only subject to correction, but inviting correction. I do not place implicit faith in the Paper which has been laid before us as the result of the actuary's calculation. I want to know, in the first place, what is the basis of that calculation. Before we can judge of its correctness we ought to know on what basis it is founded. In the Appendix to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1867, there is a most elaborate statement of the prices paid in every regiment, and the regulation sums to which officers of the Army would be entitled. The Army was not then so large as it is now, but the value of the regulation price at that time is shown to be upwards of £7,100,000; to which you have to add £3,000,000 as the value of the over-regulation price; so that I am forced to the conclusion that it would be impossible to carry out the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman and buy up the commissions of the Army at the over-regulation prices at a less cost than from £10,000,000 to £11,000,000. This is a question of fact, on which the right hon. Gentleman will be able to answer me. I have given the reason why I doubt the accuracy of the calculation that we can get rid of purchase in the Army for the amount of £8,000,000. But suppose we could do so, is there any evil in the system, or is there any advantage to be gained by doing away with it, which would justify this House in calling upon the taxpayers of England to provide that large sum of money? What is the answer of the Government? Their answer is "Yes." They say—"We cannot connect the Reserves with the Army—we cannot re-organize the Army—so long as this system of purchase stands in our way." With great deference to the high authorities who sit opposite to me I venture to question that statement. At all events I say you are bound to give us some better reason than we have yet received. I listened with great attention and great pleasure to the able speech of my right hon. Friend the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Sir Henry Storks). I was glad to hear him address the House in so able a manner; but I must question one part of his statement. My hon. Friend gave us what I can only call a very vague reason for doing away with purchase. He said—"When we come to re-organize the Army the question of purchase meets us at every point." When my right hon. Friend has occupied a seat in this House for a little longer time I think he will learn that in discussing subjects of great national importance opinion cannot be changed by vague declarations. We want something a little more specific—we want to be told what are those points. We want to know where they arise and what is their nature, and in what way they meet us at every point. My right hon. Friend did go on to give us one of his points; and, with great submission to him, I venture to say there is nothing in it. The point he gave us was the question of cornet and ensign. What is the history of the question? It is a change which I suggested at the War Office, and in which my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State concurred. He proceeded to effect it afterwards; and when he came to carry it out it is perfectly true that he was met by difficulties connected with the over-regulation prices, and found that it was not to be so easily arranged as he had supposed. He therefore appointed a Commission to consider the over-regulation prices. That Commission has reported, and my right hon. Friend is prepared to act upon their Report. I know of no reason whatever to prevent his carrying into effect that change with regard to cornets and ensigns at this moment without the slightest difficulty, or without proceeding in any way to destroy the purchase system. There was another reason assigned. I see my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) in his place, and I hope he will not be very angry with me if I say that in trying to tell us what one of those points was that met them at every turn, he made a statement which, if it had come from some young Member of this House making a maiden speech upon Army affairs which he did not understand, I should not have been surprised at; but coming as it did from my hon. and gallant Friend, when I heard it I could hardly believe my ears, and when I read it I could hardly believe my eyes. The statement was this—

“It was, however, proposed that officers of the Militia should, under certain conditions, get commissions in the Line; and he should like to know how it would be possible to take officers under the non-purchase system, and place them side by side with officers in the Army, each of whom had paid £450 for his commission.”

Is it possible that my hon. and gallant Friend gravely put that question to the House of Commons? Has he forgotten the Militia officers who passed into the Line in the Crimea, and who were all placed side by side with officers who had given £450 for their commissions? Has he forgotten that from day to day Sandhurst officers are passed into the Army without having paid a single shilling for their commissions?

CAPTAIN VIVIAN: I rise to explain. What I said was, that the only officers who could go to the Line from the Militia were officers who could afford to do so under the present expensive purchase system.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I should like to know, Sir, whether my hon. and gallant Friend has forgotten the men who have been raised from the ranks and placed with officers who have come in under the purchase system. I do not wish to be severe upon my hon. and gallant Friend, with whom I have been so long associated on friendly terms, when I say that if he makes a slip of this kind he must take the consequences. But all I want to state is, that so far as the Government has yet informed us there is absolutely nothing in their arguments to support the pretence that you cannot re-organize the Army unless you do away with the purchase system.

I cannot, however, conclude my remarks upon this immensely important subject without taking some notice of what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to our Reserves and our Militia. On the subject of the Militia, I am sorry to be obliged to say that the statement of my right hon. Friend was not very distinct. He had a very complicated and long statement to make, and so far as I have been able to follow it, I really cannot understand what his intentions with regard to the Militia are. I find that his Estimates do not correspond with the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and that one part of his speech does not correspond with another. The Estimates show the full quota of Militia to be 128,000. In his speech he speaks of their number as being 139,000, and further of 45,000 men which were at some future time to be added. I hope when the proper time arrives that he will give us an explanation of how these apparent discrepancies arise. But my main point is that, in my humble opinion, the Militia of this country is the force on which we ought to rely as our best, surest, and cheapest Reserves—the force from which we ought to derive the military strength that may be necessary over and above the force of the Regular Army. I think we cannot attach too much importance to the proper strength of our Militia; and I must say that I am disappointed that the Government have not told us in their Army scheme of the present year that they intend to raise the Militia to a considerably larger amount than we have any intimation of at present.

After having indulged in so much criticism, I am glad that there are points upon which I am able to concur in the views of Her Majesty's Government. I entirely concur with Her Majesty's Government in the views which they have stated with regard to compulsory service. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that there exists at present in the country much objection to this principle; but, on the other hand, I think that the Government are entirely right in retaining the power of compulsory service. It has long been the constitutional rule of this country with regard to the organization of our Militia, and I should blame the Government most severely if they did not retain that power. Whether my Friends on this side of the House are with me on another point, I know not; but certainly I do not agree with the proposals of my right hon. Friend and the statement of the Bill on the subject of substitutes for the Militia. [Mr. CARDWELL: No substitutes are allowed.] No substitutes are allowed; and I cannot conceive why you should not allow them. The object of the Ballot, whenever you resort to it, is to get the best men to serve the Queen; and supposing the lot falls upon a man who, in consequence of his position in life and the various calls upon him, is unable to serve, if he will give money to another man to serve for him, I believe such an arrangement would be to the advantage of both parties and also to the advantage of the State. In the general principles of the Government in reference to compulsory service, however, I entirely agree; and I am disposed to agree with them with regard to the proposal to do away with the power of Lords Lieutenant. I think they are right to bring under one authority all the forces that serve with the Queen's Commission. As to the training centres which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to establish, I know not what his plan will be. We shall require to be informed how he proposes to arrange for the disposal of the troops when they are assembled at those training centres. I hope to hear where these training centres are to be; and I dwell on the matter with some stress, on account of the power which is proposed to be given by the Bill to magistrates at quarter sessions to levy local rates for the purpose of building barracks for the Militia. The subject has been talked over a good deal in this House, and if the Government depend upon the willingness of the local magistrates of this country to impose upon the rates the burden of building barracks for the Militia, deeply sensible as we all are of the evils of the billeting system, I very much doubt whether my right hon. Friend will find many counties—if I may judge from my own neighbourhood—ready to come forward to incur that expense. If we are to have training centres, where bodies of 15,000 or 20,000 men will be assembled, it is absolutely necessary that adequate provision should be made for their accommodation. Well, I ask when considering the question of the Reserve Forces, what are the changes which render the abolition of the purchase system necessary? I cannot find them. Several modes have occurred to my mind, by which subalterns could be passed from the Militia into the Line with advantage to both services, and without rendering abolition of purchase necessary. The proposal for a combined system of drill does not make it necessary to do away with purchase. The only remaining point where the right hon. Gentleman proposed to fuse the Militia with the Line was in regard to lending officers from the Line to the Militia. I think that is a very good proposal; but what has that to do with the abolition of purchase? Nothing whatever.

There remains only to be touched upon the serious matter of our Reserve forces. If I rightly understand the plan of the Government, as proposed by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), we are to trust entirely to the new system of short enlistments to supply our Reserves, by which means it is calculated that, in the course of 14 or 15 years, we shall obtain an adequate Reserve. Well, Sir, I do not think we can afford to wait so long. Some more prompt and decisive measure is necessary, and I am disappointed that the Government have not brought before us some plan connecting more directly the Militia with the Line, and thus enable us in that direction to obtain our Reserves. I am disappointed, further, that the Government have given us no suggestion for utilizing half-pay and retired officers in connection with our Reserves; and I am also disappointed at the obstinate silence of the Government on that which is one of the most essential conditions of the re-organization of the Army—I mean the absence of provision with regard to equipment and transport of troops; to the civil branches of the service; above all, to the artillery—in fact, all those arrangements without which it would be absolutely impossible in face of any national emergency for these large bodies of troops to take the field. I deeply regret that the Government have thought it right—unnecessarily as I think—to mix up the question of the re-organization of the Army with the controverted question of purchase. In my opinion they would have acted far more wisely if they had abstained from any reference at this moment to the purchase system. I wish they had given us a well-prepared scheme for strengthening the defences of the country, and then, if they had found practically in working out their scheme that purchase in the Army actually stood in the way of improvement, they could have come down to this House with far stronger reasons than they can adduce now for asking Parliament to do away with that system. But in proposing this crude scheme, with abolition of purchase as the head and front of their measure, they lead to the unavoidable suspicion that some political motive is at the root of it.

I am bound to say before I sit down that I agree very much with what fell from my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) the other evening, with regard to the Amendment that has been moved by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay). I am sorry he has directed his Amendment to one part only of this measure, instead of making it rest upon a wider foundation. On the other hand, I am entirely unable to agree with my noble Friend with respect to the vote he proposes to give—or rather which he proposes not to give—on this Amendment. So far as that Amendment goes, I fully agree with it, and if my hon. and gallant Friend proceeds to a Division he shall have my cordial support. But, Sir, I should hope it would be the opinion of all who share my views upon this subject, that whatever may be the decision of the House on the Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend, this great question cannot rest there. I trust it will be discussed and re-discussed, and dealt with in every shape and form; for I cannot for a moment believe that, when it has been thoroughly debated, Parliament will agree to the adoption of what I believe to be the most extravagant proposal ever submitted to the House of Commons.

MR. TREVELYAN*: Sir, I must apologize for interposing between the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Osborne) and his audience; but the hon. Member can always make a full House, while I am anxious to take advantage of finding one, in order to lay before it a few facts and figures which have been somewhat left out of sight during the course of this debate. The right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) who has just sat down has been intimately connected with the War Office, but he has also thrown his protection over the other great spending Department which he has administered in his day, and has made a speech not so much against abolishing purchase in the Army as in favour of instituting it in the Navy. But it would have been as well if he had confined himself to the services, and left me alone, for in the course of this discussion far too much has already been said about my personal relation to this question. One speaker after another has accused me in general terms of making misstatements. Of these charges the most definite is that brought by the right hon. Baronet—that I underrated at Edinburgh the amount required for the compensation of officers who had purchased. But on the occasion referred to I distinctly stated that I took the last available calculation made on the responsibility of the War Office. And where did that calculation see the light? Why, in the War Office Report, consequent on the very Blue Book which the right hon. Baronet has been thrusting down our throats for the last hour, telling us to listen to what he calls its solemn warnings. Then the right hon. and gallant Member for South Shropshire (Major General Sir Percy Herbert) complains that I talked of putting up commissions for sale to the highest bidder—the identical form of words, by the way, that was adopted by the Secretary of State for War. The hon. and gallant Member says—

“The hon. Member for the Border Burghs had made a statement to that effect, not in the heat of debate, but deliberately in a speech, which he had subsequently printed and published in the form of a pamphlet. That was a total misconception of the purchase system as it was now in force. The truth was, that the senior officer on the list, whether he were captain or lieutenant, could not be passed over by any junior officer, provided he was possessed of the regulation price, if he chose to enforce his right."

Does the hon. Member, after the refutations of his statement made by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and by the Judge Advocate General, continue to maintain that officers are in the habit of insisting upon their claim to promotion without being prepared to pay more than the regulation price? If you want military evidence to the contrary, take what General Sir John Macdonald, when Adjutant General, deposed before a Royal Commission—

"There is no member of a regimental society so unpopular as he who proclaims his determination not to exceed the regulated price, thereby standing as an obstacle to promotion by purchase in the regiment to which he belongs."

And Sir Edward Lugard last year expressed his full concurrence in that view. If, then, officers insist on their nominal right, what becomes of that pleasant esprit de corps of which we have heard so much lately? But there is not a military man inside the House, or out of it, who is not perfectly well aware that, in stating that such a right existed only in name, I was stating the precise truth. The right hon. and gallant Member for South Shropshire has made an exception to the kind and moderate manner in which, on the whole, I have been treated by hon. and gallant Gentlemen. He is reported in the newspapers—and has not been at the pains to deny it—to have referred to me at a large meeting of his neighbours as a political adventurer, who abused the Commander-in-Chief in order to get office. The right hon. and gallant Member held a place about the Court during the late Administration. I suppose he wished to prove to the editor of the Financial Reform Tracts that the office was not a sinecure. But His Royal Highness is too kindly and worthy a gentleman to be grateful to the hon. Member for employing such weapons in his defence. A great deal has been said by the right hon. Baronet and others as to my allegation that the command of the Army is, to a great extent, a monopoly. A noble Lord twitted me with talking "aristocratic rubbish," while the right hon. Baronet took me to task for calling purchase an aristocratic system, and then, almost in the same breath, condemned the abolition of it as a democratic notion. But Lord Palmerston, who always weighed his words, said in Parliament that it was—

"Desirable to connect the higher classes of society with the Army, and he did not know any more effective method of connecting them than by allowing members of high families to get on with greater rapidity than they would by mere seniority."

The right hon. Baronet cited the cases of Lord Clyde and Sir Henry Havelock as men of the people who had risen to high command under the purchase system; but it is quite unjustifiable to quote such men as witnesses against their own opinions. Havelock, in his 56th year, was still writing thus—

"I was purchased over, I used to say, by three sots and two fools, so that I presume I must persuade myself that it is a pleasant variety to be superseded by a man of sense and gentlemanly habits. Be this as it may, the honour of an old soldier on the point of having his juniors put over him is so sensitive, that, if I had no family to support, and the right of choice in my own hands, I would not serve one hour longer."

Fortunately for his country, Havelock had a family to support. Lord Clyde's experience of the purchase system may be gathered from his evidence before the Commission of 1856. When asked—

"Do you think that the system of promotion by purchase has an injurious effect upon the Army, by dispiriting many excellent officers who find themselves passed over?" he replies: "As regards those individuals who have been passed over, certainly. I have known very many estimable men, having higher qualities as officers than usual, men of real promise and merit, and well educated, but who could not purchase; when such men were purchased over, their ardour cooled, and they frequently left the service, or, when they continued, it was from necessity, and not from any love of the profession."

When purchase is abolished, we shall get many more Clydes and Havelocks, and we shall get them in the full vigour of their years. Thus, when brought to the proof, this indefinite volume of accusations of misstatement and misrepresentation resolves itself into three charges, as to all of which I have, I think sufficiently justified myself.

But now I pass to a more interesting question—the method by which the Government proposes to extinguish purchase. As regards the amount of money that will be required, many and very various statements have been floating about the House. It may safely be said that there never was a more stupendous fabric of financial assertion founded on a more frail basis of financial fact. The hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary, in the course of one and the same speech, put the expense of abolishing purchase at £8,000,000, £9,000,000, £10,000,000, and £14,000,000.

COLONEL WHITE: I simply explained that it was extremely possible that the money might amount to £14,000,000.

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. and gallant Member, having no confidence in the Government calculation, really took the figures that came uppermost. It is, however, easy to ascertain what the maximum expense would be. A member of the leading firm of Army agents gave the entire sum invested in commissions at £7,668,000 for the regulation price, and £3,577,000 for the over-regulation price; in all, £11,250,000. I have had a careful estimate made out by a most competent authority, which places the amount at £10,871,000. Let us call it £11,000,000. But this £11,000,000 would only have to be paid in case the whole Army were disbanded at once—an absolutely impossible contingency. Large deductions must be made from the capital sum. No officer would get anything who remained on for the sake of the higher promotion, except that, when he became a major-general, he would receive something which would represent the purse which, under the existing state of things, would be made up in the regiment. No one would get anything who retired on full-pay, or who was invalided on half-pay. When we consider that, as an inducement to men to sacrifice the chance of receiving back their capital, the nation already offers annuities to the extent of £500,000 a-year in the shape of different forms of retirement, we shall not be at a loss to account for a difference of £3,000,000 between the gross liabilities of the nation and the actual sum which we shall eventually have to pay, which will be under—as I believe, very much under—£8,000,000. It must be remembered, likewise, that no one will cost us anything who dies, and no one who is killed in action will render us liable to more than the regulation price. It is to be hoped that the Secretary of War will re-consider his determination to limit the annual retirements. We should not keep unwilling officers; and we need not, inasmuch as the number of retirements will limit itself by a self-adjusting process. Every officer who leaves, in all ranks except the lowest, causes promotion which tempts others to stay. There is no reason to fear lest, as has been said, we should wake up one morning and find ourselves with no Army and no Consolidated Fund. The yearly payments made to officers leaving the Army will probably not exceed the annual £850,000 of the five years past; and, if more is required, we shall recover it by the diminution of our estimates for half-pay and full-pay retirement. I hope to be excused if I pass over what has been said by many who, in this debate, have appeared for the first time in the character of economists, and go straight to the remarks of the hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) with reference to the extra-regulation prices; the determination to pay which, according to the Government Return, will involve us in liabilities to the ultimate amount of £2,821,000. The House is always inclined to believe what is told them by a man who believes it himself, and listened with deserved attention while the hon. Member described how the over-regulation prices had grown up, and how persistently the nation had tried to check them. He referred to the Royal Warrants of 1720 and 1760, that forbade such payments; to the solemn declaration of non-complicity in the practice exacted from officers in 1784; to the circular letter of 1804; to the successive penal Acts of 1807, 1809, and 1815. He showed the nature and multiplicity of the powers with which the nation had armed the military authorities, and which those authorities have always shrunk from using. It is much to the credit of the present War Minister that, as soon as he took the Army into his own hands, he refused to be a party to this state of things. When once, by subordinating the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State, he had become responsible for the discipline and promotion of the Army, the right hon. Gentleman considered himself likewise responsible for its morality. He determined that the payment of the over-regulation prices should be either legal or criminal; that the law should be either altered or kept. He would not continue that system of collusion with illegality, dignified by the title of official non-recognition, which is now to cost us so dear. That defiance of the law which the Horse Guards, ever since there had been a Horse Guards, had acquiesced in and protected, the plain right feeling of an English statesman refused to tolerate for a day. The hon. Member for Warrington now protests against the taxpayers being called upon to compensate officers who, for their own convenience and interest, had deliberately violated the law. Now, Sir, if we refuse to pay these over-regulation prices, we must adopt one of three courses. The hon. Members for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) and Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) would have us altogether refuse to recognize these prices, either in the way of compensation or of repression. They would allow officers to make pecuniary arrangements among themselves; and, in fact, would permit the continuance of what is commonly known as a bonus system. They are of opinion that you cannot stamp out purchase. But the fact is that it has been stamped out of every other service under the Crown. Our present military system took its origin at a time when every public appointment had its selling value. Those hon. Gentlemen who read their "Pepys" will remember that Pepys was made Clerk of the Acts in 1660, and immediately received a bid of £500. So legitimate did the transaction appear to him that he "prayed to God to direct me what I do herein." Presently a former holder turned up in the person of a Mr. Barlow,

"An old consumptive man, and fair complexioned. After much talk, I did grant him what he asked—namely, £50 per annum if my salary be not increased, and £100 in case it be £350."

A fortnight after, he gets an offer of £1,000, "which made my mouth water." Now, Sir, what is there peculiar about the conditions of military life which forbids us to hope that this bad practice, which was banished by the Revolution of 1688 from the Admiralty, the Law Courts, and the Civil Departments, can be eradicated from the Army? Why has it not been eradicated hitherto? Why have Royal Warrants and Acts of Parliament, circular letters and declarations on honour, denunciations of fine and imprisonment on principals and accessories, been all equally futile? For the simple reason that you were dealing with that which the Government recognized to be the subject of sale and barter. Once allow an article to be merchantable, and you cannot interfere to regulate its current value. You can no more meddle with the commission market than you can with the corn market. But extinguish purchase root and branch, give the officers no reason to think that they have been ill-used, and you will enable the military authorities effectually to employ their means of repression, when once you have enlisted on the side of the law the moral sense of the profession. While we are on the subject of economy, I do claim for Ministers that they are better economists than my hon. Friends the Members for Warrington and Birmingham. Why are we bent on extinguishing purchase? Because the Army is in pawn to its officers, and the nation wishes to get it back into its own hands, in order that officers may be reduced or changed about as economy and the requirements of the service demand. But if we are to recognize a bonus system—and, by considering it as a set-off against the non-payment by the public of the over-regulation prices, you do so recognize it—you actually leave the service as unelastic and beyond your own control as ever. We could not transfer officers from the Line to the Militia or Volunteers. We could not diminish the superfluity in one regiment, or fill up the vacuity in another. To deal thus freely would be to disturb the operation of the bonus system, and to cheat the men who had sunk their money under it. Which, then, are the better economists—the Government, which proposes to pay £8,000,000 to get rid of purchase, or my hon. Friends, who propose to pay £5,000,000 to keep it? For my own part, I absolutely refuse to vote not £5,000,000, but a single halfpenny, unless we buy out purchase entirely, at once and for ever. And now, Sir—and here I must ask my hon. Friend carefully to follow me, as I am anxious not to misrepresent him—it appeared as if the hon. Member for Warrington was in a manner carried away by the acceptance his remarks met from the hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite—an acceptance which arose rather from a liking for a bonus system than from sympathy with his denunciation of the illegality of the over-regulation prices. The hon. Member said that he wished to show justice, and even indulgence, to the Army; and that he was not averse to paying down the regulation prices at once, leaving the over-regulation prices to take care of themselves. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ripon (Sir Henry Storks) has explained with admirable force and clearness how, if this course was adopted, officers who had purchased would keep the promotion which they had bought, while they got back the money wherewith they had bought it. It would result in men eating their cake, and having it, too, on a gigantic scale, and at the expense of the public. Such a measure would likewise involve a complete stagnation in promotion from this day forth. Every officer who received his regulation price would forfeit his claim to retirement on full or half-pay, and would consequently have no conceivable inducement for leaving the Army. The Government scheme preserves to us all the boasted advantages of purchase as far as the present generation of officers are concerned, because it makes retirement from the Army the condition of getting back their money. But if we pay down money now, we shall have a far more serious block than exists in the Ordnance Corps, and we shall at no long time hence be forced to institute a system of special pensions, in order to clear our lists. The full value of the regulation prices is £7,668,000. The Government relies on being able to extinguish both the regulation and the non-regulation prices for something under £8,000,000. So that if we adopt the advice of my hon. Friends, we shall pay down at once very much the same sum which the Government proposes to spread over a quarter of a century, and we shall not get rid of purchase after all. But, if we make up our minds to have nothing to say to the over-regulation prices, a third course remains; and I hope that hon. Members will attend to what I am now going to say, because this is the course that would infallibly be adopted. My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands) intends to move that the extra-regulation money should not be paid. I shall vote against him, being unwilling to punish officers for the shortcomings of their superiors. Some people—by no means favourable to the purchase system—hope that this Bill will be lost. My hon. Friend appears to be one of them, for he says that it is—

“Far better to wait for a good measure than do wrong to carry it. In 1785, a statesman came down to the House and proposed the disfranchisement of 36 boroughs with compensation; but in 1832 a great number of rotten boroughs were disfranchised without any compensation at all.”

Sir, this is not a fortunate instance to select of the advantages of procrastination. If, during the 47 years which elapsed between 1785 and 1832, there had been sitting in the House of Commons the representatives of 36 large centres of industry, our national history might have been changed; the National Debt might have been half of what it is; and we might be acknowledging at this moment that the £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 spent on buying up those borough interests had been the best investment we had ever made as a nation. We should do ill to wait, I do not say 47 years, but seven years, or even four, in order to reform the Army somewhat more cheaply. Long before 47 years have come to an end we shall have saved, by the abolition of purchase, very much more than as many millions. What is the state of the case? There has been a certain amount of popular interest taken in this question; but—though I am naturally the last to underrate the intensity of that interest—it cannot be denied that public feeling has not yet showed itself strongly enough to force the hands of a reluctant Government. The Ministry has anticipated the tendency of opinion, and for two reasons. It is not advantageous for the discipline of the Army that the officering of that Army should any longer be matter for general and vehement discussion. This consideration is said to have much weight with His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. In the next place, the Government felt that the pecuniary interests involved in the purchase system were too delicate in their nature to commit to the hazard of a long agitation. The Ministers have in this measure steered carefully between injustice and undue concession; and there is great reason to think that the Army recognize that it is so. They have hit exactly the right time. Before this, the aristocratic element in our Constitution was so strong that the nation would have had to give too much. The popular element is now growing so strong that this is the last chance of our not having to give too little. Suppose the Bill lost—and if lost, it would be by the votes of those who wish to keep up purchase for itself, and not of those who wish to save the money that would be spent in paying for it—we should have every politician in the country eagerly discussing whether or not the command of our Army, with all the honours and emoluments appertaining to it, should be confined to some 6,000 families who can afford to purchase, or should be thrown open to every Englishman, Scotchman, and Irishman, who has education enough to succeed in an open competition. The question would be transferred from the floor of Parliament to the platform, and in times of political excitement we all know what the platform is. Public meetings understand broad and simple principles, but they are not places where you can refine or distinguish. Now, the existence of purchase is a question governed by the most broad, simple, and intelligible considerations; but the compensation for its abolition is, of all problems, the most abstruse and complicated. I doubt whether the most eloquent and precise of speakers—I doubt whether the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) himself—arguing in favour of the recognition of over-regulation prices, would not have his audience carried away from him by anyone who could string three sentences together, and who appealed to his hearers not to reimburse those officers, whose influence in the Legislature had just defeated a Bill which was to make our Army national, one farthing of what they had expended contrary to the express injunctions of the law. Quite apart from the question of purchase, the time must come sooner or later when a Government will be forced to say—"We are responsible for the defence of the country. Even if a Bill expressly abolishing purchase cannot get through Parliament, we still are bound to do what the defence of the country demands. We must ignore purchase, and appoint, promote, and transfer officers according to the exigencies of the time." What, Sir, would be the effect of such a declaration on the commission market? It would be like the City the day that the Gurneys failed—it would be like the Exchange at Liverpool, if a material superseding cotton was discovered at 3d. a-pound. But there is another contingency—the very contingency with a view to which we maintain an Army—a war. We all know the operation of a war upon purchase. In a regiment ordered on active service, no one may sell or go on half-pay. Officers are required in such numbers to replace those who fall or are invalided, that commissions become as plentiful as blackberries, and no one will buy an article which is a drug in the market. If long enough, and serious enough, a war sends the price down almost to nothing. We must expect reverses; and, with public opinion on the question in its present state, the first disaster would break down the purchase system like a pack of cards; and then—whether we gave compensation at the current prices of the day, or whether, in a fit of national wrath and injustice such a great crisis is apt to bring, we refused to pay any compensation at all—those who hate purchase, without ceasing to feel pride in our Army, would reflect with pain that the system had been abolished at the cost of the private fortunes of those men who were actually at that moment defending us in the field. The Secretary of State for War has thought it best to abstain from indicating the scale of pension which he proposes to institute when our Army has become a non-purchase force. I do not challenge the wisdom of keeping silence on this head; but hon. Members have supplied the omission by a series of the most alarming, but, happily, the most diversified prophecies as to the amount of retirement which will henceforward be necessary in order to keep up a due flow of promotion. The expense of a scheme of retirement based on sound principles can, however, be pretty closely ascertained, if only we are agreed upon what those principles are. The first condition of a good system is, that we should have a fixed establishment of officers, from generals downwards, exactly proportioned to the amount of active work that has to be done by each rank, and that we should promote only within that establishment. The next condition is, that no one should be allowed to retire permanently on half-pay, except officers invalided before a certain age—say 20 years' service. With this exception, half-pay should be con-

financed to its legitimate function, that of providing a temporary maintenance for those who for a time are prevented by ill-health from performing their duties. The third condition is, that, when an officer is retired, his career should be closed. From that day forward, his pension should be subject neither to increase or diminution. The expensive anomaly of promoting on the half-pay list should entirely cease. The fourth condition is, that an age should be fixed at which officers may retire at their own pleasure, and another at which they must retire as a matter of course, if the Commander-in-Chief has no further occasion for their services. These are virtually the main principles of that system of naval promotion and retirement devised by the late First Lord of the Admiralty, which has given genuine and wide-spread satisfaction to the working members of the service, and is rapidly rendering our expenditure on pay and pensions endurable and intelligible. A scheme based on the above-named conditions was submitted to the War Office Committee of 1857-8—a Committee which was appointed to examine counter-calculations of Army reformers, and which, therefore, may be supposed to have reported on those calculations, I will not say in a hostile, but in a critical spirit. This Committee, whose conclusions on all other points have been referred to over and over again in this debate as so many revelations from Heaven, found that the retired full-pay for that part of the Army where purchase now exists, exclusive of the Household troops, would be £512,000. The same data were submitted to Dr. Farr, Government statistician and Fellow of the Royal Society, who computed that £359,000 per annum would be required in case all officers came to be major generals, and then retired on £800 a-year—of course an impossible supposition. But if officers who did not remain to succeed to vacancies in the higher ranks went out of the service as captains—the natural result of a system of selection under which no inefficient man could become a field officer—the cost of the scheme, according to Dr. Farr, would still be something under £400,000. Take the Ordnance Corps—the funds appropriated to retirement have hitherto kept the Ordnance Corps in a satisfactory condition. A lieutenant colonel in a purchase regiment serves, on an average, 23 years 8 months before reaching his rank. A lieutenant colonel in the Artillery at present obtains his rank in 23 years. A major in a purchasing regiment spends 18 years in attaining his majority. A first captain in the Artillery gets his rank in 16 years. What, then, is the sum of money expended in producing these results? The full-pay retirement for the two corps amounts to £68,400 per annum. There were some other payments, but the sum total must be within £90,000 a-year. There were, after some deductions, 900 officers whose promotion is kept in a healthy condition by a retirement of £100 a-head—a result fairly borne out by the analogous case of the Royal Marines. Now, the officers of the purchasing portion of the Army borne on the English Estimates are, as near as possible, 4,000. A rule-of-three sum gives us £400,000 a-year as the amount of retirement which these officers would require when their conditions of service were assimilated to those of the Ordnance Corps. Placing these various calculations side by side, we may venture to estimate the probable cost of retirement at a maximum of £500,000—the exact figure given by my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) who moved the Amendment which we are now discussing.

Those hon. Members who have followed my hon. and gallant Friend in support of his Amendment, have been content to accept his estimate of £500,000 as the future cost of retirement, with the exception of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) who prefers to place it at double the sum. But this debate has been characterized by an omission so glaring as almost to amount to a phenomenon. Hon. Gentlemen, at the same time that they complain that the abolition of purchase will saddle us with a retirement of £500,000, entirely ignore the fact that we are actually paying at least £500,000 for retirement every year of our lives. At this very moment we, or our Indian fellow-subjects, are spending upwards of £160,000 on the honorary colonelcies, which are nothing more or less than pensions arranged on an inequitable, clumsy, and extravagant system. Between £60,000 and £70,000 a-year goes to unemployed general officers of the purchasing corps. £66,000 a-year falls to the share of the same branch of the Army for full-pay retirement; £20,000 for distinguished services; and about £190,000 for half-pay. During the transition period the two systems may overlap, and cause a temporary increase of liabilities; but, as a matter of course, we shall utilize under the new state of things the funds provided for the retiring list of the old. What have the opponents of the Government to put against these arguments of indisputable analogy, except certain awful financial warnings uttered by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire? But the measure of that noble Lord, as a financier, has been taken by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Truro (Captain Vivian), who told us the results of a comparison between the Government scheme of Reserves and that advocated by the noble Lord. It appears, according to high actuarial authority, that by the seventh year the Government plan would have produced 61,000 trained men, while the noble Lord's plan would have produced none; which is pretty well for an alarmist, who urges that, in these days of European capitals being occupied, everything except the immediate provision of men is a secondary question. The Government Reserve, when full, would cost something over £1,250,000 a-year. The noble Lord's would cost considerably over £2,500,000. The Government plan would involve us in a liability for pensions of £882,000 a-year, as against £1,300,000 a-year, which we now pay; while the noble Lord's plan would cover the country with over 500,000 pensioners, costing—if we treated them with a rigour bordering upon stinginess—hard upon £9,500,000 per annum. The noble Lord would produce a more permanent effect upon the legislation of this country if he would spend over his figures of arithmetic some of the time which he now devotes to his figures of rhetoric. If his computations of the expense of abolishing the purchase system were of a piece with the economical side of his Reserve scheme, it is not to be wondered at that he succeeded in frightening those unhappy miners who, at every political crisis, are trotted out to protest against the liberal questions of the day. But I will venture to say that these working men will succeed no better in saving purchase than in averting household suffrage. The first portion of the noble Lord's speech was listened to by the House with the pleasure which men always feel in hearing what they all think smartly put. The noble Lord divided us in classes, according to our opinions on foreign policy, and then proceeded to detail the deficiencies of our present Army system. In his remarks on this head we were all disposed to acquiesce. We were agreed about the utter want of relation between military expenditure and military performance. We were agreed about the unfortunate distinctions which exist between the Royal Army, the constitutional Militia, and the national Volunteers, with all the consequent absence of combined action and organization. We agreed to a great extent with his remarks about our system of supply, and to a very great extent, indeed, with the desire which he expressed for the localization of our Army—a measure which would solve the difficulties of recruitment, of the exchange of officers, of commissariat, and, in my opinion, of promotion. But many of us go farther than the noble Lord. We see that the country has spent £300,000,000 on her military armaments in the last 20 years: that the average of our military budget has risen from £8,000,000 to £15,000,000. We see the various classes of our community vying to throw upon each other's shoulders the burden of taxation. We see the taxpayer, after making unheard-of efforts, taunted with being defenceless, and accused of niggardly parsimony by the sworn adherents of that very system under which we have spent more money, with less to show for it, than any nation in this world's history. And, before spending any more, we resolved to lay the whole case before classes which have hitherto taken little or no interest in their own Army; to appeal from the few to the many; to make the question of our defences not, indeed, a party, but a political question; to persuade the country to take stock of its military resources, and, when it has looked the matter fairly in the face, to try and knock out a better system for itself. The Government has placed itself at the head of this movement; and, as I have told the noble Lord how far I agree with him, I will now tell him where I begin to disagree. I have more confidence than he in the judgment of the

Government in believing the abolition of purchase to be a necessary preliminary to Army re-organization. When purchase is once abolished, I have more confidence than he in the intentions of the Government with regard to that re-organization. And I have much more confidence that the state of Europe will give the Government time to carry out those intentions. The noble Lord has been very great on his division of military questions into primary and secondary, and told us that one of the secondary questions was the tenure of the Command-in-Chief. If that view of the operation of the virtually permanent tenure which I had the honour of laying before the House on Tuesday fortnight was correct, it can hardly be called a matter of second-rate importance whether, in the event of war or invasion, the fortunes of the country were intrusted to an officer such as the Duke of Wellington was in 1815, or to an officer such as he was in 1850. On this head the noble Lord entertained us with an anecdote respecting a young Army reformer, who wanted to get rid of the Duke of Cambridge because he had shown such minute acquaintance with every point of military detail, and because he was too powerful; and his reason was—

“Because, under our Constitution, we are liable to have a Secretary of State who is not very well versed in military affairs, and therefore he becomes a mere tool in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief.”

Whoever this Army reformer was, he might have defended his opinion by the authority of the Duke of Wellington. On the occasion of the consolidation of the War Office, in 1838, the Duke wrote thus to Lord Melbourne—

“It is not uncommon to see the command of the armies of other countries intrusted to the Ministre de la Guerre. But these countries are each governed by a despotism. The Ministre de la Guerre is responsible for his acts not to a House of Commons, but to the Sovereign himself. The concentration of all the authority in one hand is convenient, and gives strength and security to the Government of the Sovereign. But in our case, the concentration of authority is in the hands of an officer of account, responsible not to the Sovereign, but to the House of Commons.”

It is evident from this passage that the objection of the Duke to the subordination of the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary of State is a political, and not an administrative objection. The noble Lord thinks the salary of the Military Secretary at the Horse Guards a secondary question. Sir, it is because questions of this nature have been made secondary questions, that, while our efficiency is standing still, our expenditure is growing from 10 years to 10 years at a rate that is rapidly disgusting the people with the very name of an Army. It may be a vulgar sentiment, but I hold it to be absolutely wrong that—at a time when we are discharging hundreds of clerks and thousands of artizans, who ask for nothing better than to be permitted to go on working—we should be paying £3,000 a-year to a public servant who, according to the official description of his duties, is an amanuensis and a mouthpiece; and that another public servant, in addition to a handsome salary, should, between the ages of 32 and 52, have drawn £40,000 from a source, the existence of which is defended on the ground that it affords pensions to old and meritorious officers. The noble Lord will have it that purchase is a secondary question, and asks whether anyone would think of abolishing purchase in the event of a crisis such as France has been passing through within the last six months. But this consideration tells equally against all re-organization whatsoever. According to General Trochu, what were the faults which lay at the root of the French disasters? The age, venality, and intemperance of a large part of the re-engaged men; the depressing effect produced on the mass of the Army by the existence of the corps d'élite; and the luxury and personal ambition of the officers, fostered by the tone and habits of the Empire. But when war was declared, and Germany was mustering behind the frontier, who would have dreamed of choosing that moment to dismiss all the vieux grognards, break up the Imperial Guard, and set about recalling the officers to a spirit of Spartan hardihood and self-sacrifice? There is a time for all things; and that was not the season for France to attempt eradicating the inherent vices of her military system. But no one, except those who dislike reason and economy, would deny that we have ample leisure to re-arrange our Army on a rational and economical basis. In order to effect this result, purchase must first be got out of the way. The question of the effect of that institution upon the character of our officers has been so threshed out both in this House and in the country, that I will leave it to the chance of an incidental notice, and will pass on at once to show how nothing short of the abolition of purchase will facilitate, and in some cases render possible, the reforms in our military organization which the changed conditions of warfare demand. To begin with, the whole island should be re-divided into military districts. The present districts were arranged in days when our danger lay in one quarter only; and consequently the South of England is minutely subdivided, while vast regions in the North, with their enormous manufacturing population, are embraced under a single command. Each district should be the seat of an Army corps, with a general at its head, charged not only with the discipline, but with the entire equipment, supply, and finance of his command. The local staff should be responsible for the issue of stores, and for all contracts that can be made advantageously within the district; while the functions of the central office of Control should be confined to keeping the local magazines full, and to a general economical supervision. Thus, and thus only, should we be enabled to introduce the much-admired Prussian system of supply. But how are we to get generals willing and able to undertake these severe and intricate duties, and how are we to surround them with competent subordinates? Mr. Fonblanque, on this point a weighty authority, says in his treatise on the British Army—

“So rarely, indeed, are military officers found to possess the requisite knowledge of finance and account, that it is usual, in large operations, to attach a commissariat officer to the head quarters of the Army in the field, to perform this part of the military secretary's duties, and to relieve him and the general commanding from a responsibility which, partly from their time and attention being absorbed by their more immediate duties, and partly from want of the requisite training, they are seldom in a position to meet.”

The exigencies of the time demand from military men continuous, laborious, and most diversified services. The modern officer should be a professional man in the sense that a surgeon or a civil engineer is professional. But the Army can never be a profession, in the true sense of the word, as long as the purchase system exists. The essential conditions of a profession are, that a man should live by it, and should look forward to rising by exerting himself in it, and by displaying professional knowledge and professional capacity. Does the most ardent supporter of purchase maintain that these conditions exist in our Army as at present constituted? The great change which has come over the conduct of war has given increased importance to scientific training; and this holds good in no Army so much as in our own. Whatever results may arise from the adoption of short service, and the bettering of the condition of our private soldiers, we still can never hope to receive as plentiful a supply of recruits as is possible in countries where conscription exists; and we must, therefore, make up for being weak in the number of our men, by being strong in the scientific acquirements of our officers. But such acquirements it is simply impossible to demand from men who have sunk large sums of money in their commissions at an interest so small that no sane man would regard the transaction as a profitable investment. But, if we cannot obtain captains and administrators of the right stamp by purchase, may we hope to get them by seniority, whether with a bonus system or without it? The Pall Mall Gazette, a journal which has consistently for years past pressed for radical changes in our Army, remarks that, out of 12 important commands in the United Kingdom, only one is given to a general of the scientific corps. I candidly own that at first sight this struck me as an instance of favouritism; but, on inquiry, I was satisfied that the cause lay in the advanced age of the general officers in the Ordnance Corps. Nor would a bonus quicken promotion to the extent of providing us with young commanders, as was proved in the old Indian Army by the selection of men of the lower ranks to lead brigades, and even armies, at a pinch. Herbert Edwardes won battles as a lieutenant, and Nicholson—if recollection does not deceive me—died a captain. If seniority and purchase fail to provide us with what we want, resort must be had to selection, on the plan sketched out by the Secretary of State in his speech on the first reading of the Bill—a plan which is virtually in accord with Prussian practice. There the relative merit of every officer, from highest to lowest, is known to the general Staff at Berlin by confidential reports. The fit men are promoted; and the man who finds himself repeatedly passed over retires. The promotion of the junior officers is regimental; and an officer who shows marked ability is pushed on very rapidly. And yet we are for ever having it thrown in our teeth, that General Blumenthal said to Dr. Russell, of The Times, that he would gladly, if it were possible, see purchase introduced into the Prussian Army. And we are told by the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire, that the French Marshals in the Crimea were in the habit of congratulating him on belonging to a country which possessed so valuable an institution. The French military authorities have now an opportunity of giving practical effect to their opinions. They have to re-make their Army. The ground is clear, and they may lay what foundations they like. We shall see within the next twelve-month to what extent the compliments which they paid my hon. and gallant Friend on his purchase system were due to their national courtesy. Sir, these foreigners fool us to the top of our bent. We shall hear next that the Prussians are minded to borrow our Army agents, at an annual cost of 250,000 thalers a-year, and to pay 20,000 thalers to a Military Secretary for acting as mouth-piece and amanuensis to General Von Moltke. We have had the successes of the German arms referred to triumphantly as an illustration of the advantages of having an Army officered by aristocrats; and this argument is employed in defence of purchase by the very same Gentlemen who can find no words strong enough to express their disapprobation of me for calling purchase an aristocratic institution. But the truth is, that there is very little in common between German aristocrats and the sort of plutocracy which officers our armies. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), in an apothegm which was much in men's mouths during the autumn, told us that Prussia possessed an upper class barbarous enough to esteem the Army the only calling that became a gentleman, and poor enough to work at it as in a profession. Sir Charles Napier expressed the same idea in characteristic phraseology, when he affirmed that the best officer was a needy gentleman. In fact, though brilliant exceptions are not far to seek, mere wealth is the very worst average test of the qualifications for a laborious calling. When appointments are given by open competion, wealth will retain its one legitimate privilege—that of handicapping its possessors with the advantage of the best education that money can buy.

Sir, the discussion that has been going on during the last six months in every journal throughout Great Britain practically resolves itself into this question—"What is the cheapest way of getting the country defended in such a manner as to guarantee us against panic?" Under the present system, that end could only be obtained by an annual expenditure so enormous as to render the change of system a foregone conclusion. The solution of the problem lies in the conversion of our Militia into a reliable force. For this purpose each regiment of the Line should be attached to a particular neighbourhood, and the Militia of that neighbourhood should be incorporated with it as a second or third battalion. According to the Estimates of the forthcoming year, a force of 130,000 Militia is to cost us £950,000. If efficient, it would be cheap at twice the sum; and, to make it efficient, every battalion should be officered in part by officers of the Regular Army, and in part by young men of the locality who were willing to earn their commissions by devoting at least a year of continuous work to learning their business under the teaching of their professional colleagues. That once accomplished, the nation would demand of them, and pay them for, nothing beyond their services in time of war, or during the annual manœuvres. Hon. Gentlemen who defend purchase dwell with frequency, and it must be owned with some justice, on the allegation that it gives us a rapid succession of young men with dash and courage, who, though they lack the scientific training requisite for high commands, for the most part leave the Army before reaching the rank for which that training is an indispensable qualification. Under such a system as I have described, we should get officers of exactly the class which purchase professes to give us, and with this in addition—that we should get them for next to nothing, instead of having to pay for them as if they were educated up to the highest Woolwich standard. It is true that this pay does not go into their own pockets. So much money is invested in commissions that the average income of purchasing officers in the infantry is under £50 a-year; while a lieutenant colonel not only serves for nothing, but pays £15 a-year for the honour of commanding a regiment. But if our officers get little, they had best cost little. At present, under the inexorable demands of purchase, the pay of our commissioned ranks is blest neither to the country that gives nor to the officer who is conventionally supposed to receive. The impossibility of demanding more than a certain quantity and quality of service from men who have purchased the right to serve, has led to our Army being largely over-officered. In a Prussian regiment on a war footing, the officers are to the men as 1 in 45; in France, as 1 to 50; in Russia, as 1 to 40; in Austria, as 1 to 52; and in Italy, as 1 to 38. England has no recognized war complement; but in a battalion going on Indian service, our officers are to our men as 1 to 31. Abolish purchase, and every battalion of the Guards and the Line could spare enough captains and subalterns to suffice for the complement of Army officers in a regiment of Militia. Let hon. Members think what the expense would be of enrolling seven or eight fresh officers for every battalion of our Militia, instead of drawing them gratis from the almost inexhaustible magazine of the Line and the half-pay list. Perhaps a rough calculation will assist them. The average pay and allowances of an officer of the Line amounts to £244; of the Guards, £310; of the Cavalry, £305; of the Horse Guards, £325. Let us take £260 as the figure. To provide seven Army officers for 120 battalions of Militia would cost the country £218,400 a-year. But if you deduct five of every seven from a battalion of the Line, and transfer two from the half-pay list, you will perform the same operation for nothing, and under this single head you would make a saving that would go far to pay the cost of extinguishing purchase, extra-regulation prices and all. But at present the authorities are unable to transfer a Linesman, and still less a Guardsman, into a Militia regiment, without inflicting on him a fine to the full value of his commission; unless we are prepared to disburse on every successive occasion the customary value of the interest which we are disturbing—a policy by which we should, in the course of not very many years, have paid by dribbets the sum now proposed to be paid once for all, with nothing to show for it except a system of purchase more inveterate and more hopelessly complicated than ever. While purchase lasts, it is practically impossible to consult the interests of the public service, because they are more often than not at variance with the pecuniary interests of the individual. You cannot remove an incompetent lieutenant colonel without mulcting him heavily in addition to the loss of his position; and a corps may be allowed to deteriorate because the authorities cannot find the heart to confiscate the property of a well-meaning man who has not been endowed by Providence with tact or wisdom. But abolish purchase, and without spending a farthing, we may equip every Militia battalion with a permanent complement of professional officers; and then, if embodied at the first alarm of a war, by the time an invasion comes we shall have an auxiliary force in every respect fit to stand shoulder to shoulder with our Regulars in the field. Sir, it is not necessary to spend time in arguing for the adoption of short service in our home Army. That the life of barracks and the camp is favourable to the health of the young, but eminently unsuited to men somewhat advanced in life, is shown indisputably by the tables of mortality. In civil life, between the ages of 20 and 25, 8 persons die yearly in 1,000; and in military life 5. When we come to those between the ages of 35 and 40, 11 in 1,000 die yearly among civilians, and among soldiers 15 in 1,000. Between 20 and 25, 22 per cent of the population are married men; and between 35 and 40, 81 per cent—a strong argument in favour of sending back your soldier to the life of a citizen before the age when a sensible man thinks of marrying. The heaviest remediable cause of expense on our Estimates is the pension list for the non-commissioned ranks. At present we spend £1,300,000 a-year on an item which, under a wiser system, would show half that amount; and before many years are out we shall be saddled with pensions to the amount of upwards of £2,000,000, on account of the great number of old soldiers who were encouraged to re-engage some time back under the inspiration of a fit of military bigotry. Since, then, short service is demanded alike by physical, moral, eco-

nomie, and military considerations; we shall require officers who not only know their business, but who are ready to spend their whole time in turning into soldiers successive batches of recruits. But a captain of light cavalry, or a lieutenant colonel in the Guards, has paid his £5,000 or £8,500 in order to secure far different work under much pleasanter circumstances. In altering the duties imposed on officers, we lower the value of their commissions. And therefore in order to guarantee them against a certain loss, the Government places itself towards the holder of the commission in the position now occupied by his brother officers, and undertakes to buy the article at its present value whenever he thinks fit to sell it, however much the price may have fallen in the interval in consequence of the changed conditions of service which the Government has enforced.

The existence of purchase is a practical bar to promotion from the ranks. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire will have it that the war on the Continent has taught me—to use his own expression—that promotion from the ranks “won’t wash.” It is highly undesirable that elderly sergeants should look forward to a commission as the sure reward of a respectable career; but it would be much to the advantage of the service and the country that young men of spirit, who had mastered their calling, and proved themselves capable of command, should not find themselves excluded from rising in their career, because they had begun that career in the ranks. We are told that, if such men become officers, their soldiers will not follow them in battle; but we are not bound to believe that Englishmen are brave because they are commanded by officers who have purchased their commissions, any more than that they are religious because they are preached to by clergymen who have purchased their livings. But the noble Lord, while condemning promotion from the ranks, claims as one attribute of the purchase system that it freely admits of such promotion, and, in support of his assertion, quotes me as having said that 100 commissions were given to non-commissioned officers during the Crimean War. From the first year of the Crimean War to the last year of the Indian Mutiny, not 100, but 483 commissions were so given. But during time of war purchase breaks down, and the noble Lord’s argument with it. In the year 1855 purchase reached its lowest point. Only one-fourth of the commissions went by sale. In that year 148 soldiers were promoted from the ranks. In the years 1861 and 1862, purchase reached its highest point, and three-fourths of the commissions went by sale. In those two years the promotions from the ranks numbered respectively three and four. These figures prove, beyond all question, first, that purchase tends virtually to exclude private soldiers from advancing in their profession; and, next, that the theory of our troops not following officers selected from the ranks does not wash in the hour of stress and danger. Then the noble Lord tells us that purchase is not incompatible with a large resort to appointment by open competition. I should like to see the effect that would be produced if, without abolishing purchase, the authorities threw open, year by year, half of the 400 or 500 first commissions to open competition. It would affect existing officers precisely as the holders of any article whatsoever would be affected by the falling off of half the demand. I cannot understand how hon. and gallant Gentlemen can, without consternation, hear the noble Lord encouraging the Government to deluge the service with men who do not intend to buy. But we have a practical test in the events of the last 18 months. The Royal Commission on Military Education is “decidedly of opinion that the competitive examination for entrance at Sandhurst should be as free as it now is at Woolwich.”

Why was not this recommendation adopted by the Minister of War? Evidently because he could not carry it out in justice to established interests until he had previously abolished purchase. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire thinks the entrance examination at present existing a sufficient guarantee against incompetency. But the experience of every civilized nation has proved that any examination not rigidly competitive soon degenerates into a mere form. Mr. John Stuart Mill tells us that a mere pass examination never, in the long run, does more than exclude absolute dunces, and explains, as clearly as he explains everything, the steps by which a fixed standard of proficiency

"gradually sinks to something contemptible." The hon. and gallant Member insists much on the approval of the Commander-in-Chief being required before an officer obtains his promotion by purchase; and the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire proposes to withdraw the letter of service of that high official if he fails to exercise his duty of rejection. Mr. Fonblanque truly says that

"the regulation is a mere form. Certificates of fitness are given as a matter of course, and it is to be doubted whether there is an instance on record of an officer, in a condition to comply with the ordinary conditions of purchase, being refused promotion on the grounds of incapacity."

This, perhaps, puts the case somewhat too strongly; but it is quite certain that the military authorities cannot spoil the market of the selling officer by looking too closely into the qualifications of the individual who wishes to buy. You cannot introduce moral and intellectual considerations into the traffic in commissions any more than into transactions in piece-goods and pig-iron. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire urges that there are qualities required in an officer which no examiner could bring to light, and fears lest we should shut out the very men we want by judging all by one uniform standard of bookwork. But we must judge them by something; and all the talk we have heard about book-worms, and having a good seat across country, comes to this, that in the opinion of those who indulge in it the possession of a great deal of cash is a better test of capacity for action than success in a competitive examination. I protest against the notion that courage, decision, and self-control, and mental and bodily activity, are more likely to co-exist with wealth and backstairs' influence than with industry, intelligence, and acquirements. I have hardly ever known a time when the sixth form at Harrow and Rugby did not contain more than its due proportion of the cricket and foot-ball elevens. A great deal too much has been said about the word "gentleman;" and in harping so long on this string, hon. and gallant Gentlemen have given an unjust idea of the tone which prevails in the profession that they undertake to represent. The first characteristic of a gentleman is that he never troubles his head as to whether he is a gentleman or not; and the second, that he scorns to gauge worth by money, and to say that the man who becomes a good soldier, because he is rich enough to make it worth his while to enter a profession in which the good things go by sale, is more likely to be a gentleman than the man who comes in by the gate of open competition. It is not the influence of purchase on the regimental system that binds our officers together. It is the national character, which never fails to breed fraternity and fidelity in danger. Speaking of our countrymen, Emerson says—"In war and in politics they hold together by hooks of steel;" and, whether in ship, battery, or regiment, men of British race will always be loyal to their comrades and their duty. The hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire is very much afraid that, when purchase is gone, an officer may be driven to induce his friends "to hang about the lobbies of the Commander-in-Chief, or, worse still, to intrigue among political Members of this House." Sir, I do not see much to choose between haunting the lobby or the broker's office. Nothing can well be worse than a system which diverts the attention of our young officers from the study of their profession, and directs it towards what my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) calls "the low, paltry considerations of abominable money questions." And, with regard to apprehensions of political intrigue, let hon. Members consider what is now passing in the United States. What is the crying evil of the American Constitution—the root of all that is bad in the present, and ominous for the future? Why, the corruption of the public service from top to bottom, owing to the all-pervading influence of political jobbery. Ever since, in an evil hour, a newly-elected President proclaimed that the spoils were for the victors, efficiency, public spirit—even, it is to be feared, honesty itself began rapidly to disappear from Department after Department. And what is the remedy which meets almost universal favour in the eyes of Americans who love their country better than their party? Why, open competition. That, and that alone, cuts off the supply of the materials for jobbery, by admitting men into the service of the public on their own merit, and not in the capacity of constituents, or of the sons and nephews of Ministers. In one

American Department only, in the Census Office, is political influence unknown; and Census clerks have for a long time back been appointed strictly by open competition. Hon. Members, especially those who are afraid of our institutions being Americanized, would do well to read an article on Civil Service Reform in the January number of the North American Review. They will find that, as our Constitution becomes more popular, we recede from instead of approaching nearer to the special evils of American administration, and that according to the confession of Americans themselves. The very able author of this review, speaking of the proposal to introduce free competition, says distinctly—

"There should be no attempt to disguise the fact that it is the purpose of this theory of administration to prevent the public service from being used in any manner or to any extent as a means of party success."

He quotes, with envy and admiration, the declaration of our present Chancellor of the Exchequer, made last autumn at Elgin, with reference to the great change in the mode of appointing to clerkships—

"We have thrown open," says the right hon. Gentleman, "the whole of the public service not to the more privileged classes, but to the nation at large. I do not say that competition will point out the best person. But it has this advantage, that it excludes an enormous quantity of incapacity which has hitherto found its way into the public service. I think the greatest benefit of this measure is that we have withdrawn patronage from the dominion of party, and have given it to the people, and it will be the people's own fault if they do not keep it for themselves now they have got it."

The Government now propose, with regard to the Army, to withdraw patronage from the dominion of wealth, an influence which is not one whit less demoralizing or less conducive to good administration than the influence of party. We have been told that an officer will be hurt and sore at seeing another promoted over his head on the ground of merit; but that no one feels offended when passed over on the score of his own poverty. But, Sir, I deny that poor officers are fairly represented in Parliament. Constituted as this House is constituted, we shall always hear much of the views held by those who profit by purchase, and little or nothing of the views of those who lose by it. Within the last six months I have received 70 or 80 letters from officers still serving or recently retired, which incontestably prove that the purchase system bears very hard upon many of our best and most zealous servants, some of whom are still hoping on against hope, while others have broken down in the struggle, and have thrown up a career which they love as well as the wealthiest of their comrades. After the great indulgence which the House has shown, I dare not enter upon an enumeration of the vast economies which the abolition of purchase will render possible, and the demand for which no Government will henceforward be able to resist. The Army agents, with their £40,000 a-year—in itself more than the interest of one of your millions—must disappear from the Estimates when the only pretext of their public recognition is removed. The special pay and allowances of the Household regiments, which at present cannot be touched, from their connection with the exceptional prices of commissions in those regiments, will very nearly account for the interest of another million. But savings on a much larger scale will result when we are enabled to fix working establishments of officers throughout every rank of the Army. The evidence of the Duke of Wellington before the Select Committee on Army and Navy appointments of 1833 clearly brings out the fact that the inflation of our lists in the higher grades directly results from the operation of purchase, which robs the rich of their money, and the poor of their promotion, and burdens the public to indemnify both. In the item of "Generals" alone, we may fairly expect to save £180,000 a-year. Every hon. Gentleman who votes for the second reading of this Bill will help to lay the foundation of a system under which the nation will at length get its worth for its money, and will do as much as in him lies out of the noxious panic to pluck the flowers of retrenchment and reform.

And now, Sir, I will recapitulate the leading points of that reform which the abolition of purchase will enable the Government to effect. The re-division of the country into districts, and the institution of local recruitment and local military administration. The amalgamation of the Line and the Militia, and the formation in each Militia battalion of a solid nucleus of professional Army officers. The establishment of short service as the rule in our Army. The extension of the command of that Army to the nation at large by means of free competition. The restriction of each grade to a fixed number of working officers, and the arrangement of a certain and impartial, and therefore economical, system of retirement. If these results follow, we may in coming years look back upon the Vote of next Thursday with satisfaction proportioned to our tenderness for the national pocket. But if the Government does not utilize their opportunity in the direction, and to something like the extent, indicated—I had rather put what I have to say in the form of a promise—I can assure right hon. Gentlemen opposite that there is not one in fifty of those who have advocated, or approved of, the abolition of purchase who will not do his best to give them a chance of trying their hands at military administration. When my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) rallied Ministers for shaping their policy with reference to the action taken by individuals, he was of course joking, though he was joking well, and with a certain verisimilitude. But putting that notion aside, I fully agree with the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) that this Bill is not framed as a concession to any section of any party whatsoever. It is evident to all who have closely watched the Secretary of State for War during the last two years, reading his conduct by the light which this measure throws upon it, that from an early period of his tenure of office he has entertained a growing belief that the abolition of purchase was a necessary prelude to any change for the better in our Army. And, while the subject was in his mind, the events which took place on the Continent during the autumn and winter, and the public opinion consequent on those events, afforded him at once a motive and an opportunity. The considerations which actuate Ministers are doubtless such as can only come home to men intimately acquainted with the principles which should govern administrative organization; but when the Government announced its determination to act on those principles, the announcement met with a response from the common sense of the people of this country, who had long ago arrived at the conclusion that no good could come out of a system under which a public trust was bought and sold. The price to pay is heavy; but it is the price at which the nation buys back her own Army. There are hon. Gentlemen who would have us spend this sum upon the materials of war—on guns, powder, and earthworks, instead of sinking it in an alteration of our institutions. But guns rust, and earthworks crumble away, while institutions endure for ever. The materials of war are necessary, but perish in the using, and the expense of replacing them is of annual recurrence; but here the cost is once for all, and the benefit will never cease until the day when Britain is no longer worth defending. The necessity of paying these millions will procure us one result, if no other—that the nation will be driven to take the matter into its own hands; and, as we come to deal successively with first appointment and promotion, and with military government and military expenditure, it will, in the person of us, its Representatives, take good care that the great sacrifice which it is now called upon to make shall not have been made in vain.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE said, it was not his intention to reply to the arguments of the hon. Gentleman, as they had been already answered by previous speakers; but he wished to elicit some information as regarded certain points, and to say a few words on the Reserve forces. In former years the great evil of the service, both as to officers and men, was want of occupation, he was therefore glad to hear that, in addition to a reasonable degree of information in respect to professional subjects, in future, candidates for promotion would be required to possess proficiency in foreign languages. For himself, he did not believe that the abolition of purchase would give us a better class of officer; indeed, he very much questioned whether it would give as good. The Army was officered now not as had been said by the aristocracy and wealth of the country, but by a happy amalgamation of the aristocracy and the middle class of the country. He believed the system recommended by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down would be a failure. It would be impossible to equalize regiments, for there would be always more esprit de corps and better discipline in one regiment than in another. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Sir Henry Storks) seemed to desire a material change in our officers, and wished to see the middle and professional class more numerous represented; but he saw no reason why the sons of our aristocracy, who entered the Army, should not be as well educated as any other class of the community. The proposition of the Government was to do away with both regulation and over-regulation prices, and he could not believe such a proposition would be acceptable to the country generally. The proposal had been stigmatized as contemptible and unworthy of this great country. He did not go so far as that; but he should like to see the principle carried out whereby every officer would be paid down what was fairly owing him; or the commission might be valued and compounded for, the Government paying a small interest till the officer realized his commission. His feeling was, that it would be better not to pay the over-regulation at all; but simply pay no more than the regulation sum. It was improbable that the country would pay so many millions of money for carrying out a private arrangement between officers. At any rate, he had heard nothing from the War Minister as to the reason why it was necessary to pay over-regulation in order to amalgamate the Militia and the Line. He did not see so great an evil in selection as many of his right hon. Friends appeared to do. At any rate, seniority must be the rule, and selection the exception. In his own regiment of Militia he had over and over again had to select officers for promotion, sometimes over the heads of others, but always with the approbation of the whole regiment. The Minister at War, too, had a hold of the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and demanded an inquiry where officers were passed over in the service. Officers would not be passed over without good and sufficient reason. He did not believe that the scheme set forth by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) was at all in unison with that of the Government. The Militia, during the past few years, had been much criticized; its officers were but slightly esteemed, and the men were denounced as the waifs and strays of society. The Volunteer force, of which he spoke with all respect, for he appreciated their patriotism and self-sacrifice—the great Volunteer force had been basking in the sun while the Militia were consigned to the shade. He did not wish to depreciate the wisdom of any former Secretary at War; but he must say no Minister had ever studied more zealously the interests of the Militia than the present Secretary of State, and he tendered the right hon. Gentleman his best acknowledgments. He did not like this Bill altogether. He liked the speech of the right hon. Gentleman better than his Bill. He wanted to know why so much of the Bill was taken up with conscription—a system which the country did not want, and which was, moreover, highly inexpedient. They did not want conscription for the Militia, certainly not that plan proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho); if it were adopted it would certainly impair the Militia, and trample out of it every spark of vitality. If it were necessary to resort to conscription in order to obtain the number of men required in an emergency he would recommend the plan adopted in 1808, when the country was divided into districts, and if the Militia for the district did not produce its quota of men, then the Ballot was enforced to make up the number; but if it did, the Ballot was not resorted to in that district. There was no great hardship in making a man serve his country in his own county, practically without taking him away from his home and family. To conscription for the regular Militia, without substitutes, he did not believe the country would submit; and if we amalgamated the regular Militia with the Regular Army, how could we have conscription for the Militia and not for the Army? If, in 1852, Lord Russell had accepted the suggestion of Lord Palmerston and had given up the word “local,” and inserted the word “regular” in his Militia Bill, his Government would not have been upset as it was in that year. That was a Bill for calling out the Militia; this was a Conscription Bill; and therefore he would now suggest the substitution of the word “local” for the word “regular.” We did not want conscription for the Militia at all, for we could get as many men as we wanted. The men were well paid, and well satisfied with their pay, which might be fairly estimated at 15s. a-week as compared with 13s. a-week in the Army. If 26,000 men had been enlisted into the Army since last Midsummer, as he had been informed, he feared that 12,000 or 14,000 had been taken from the Militia, for he had given 150 men leave to enlist from his own regiment, and 126 of them had been accepted, 24 being rejected as medically unfit. If this proportion were true of other regiments, the ranks of the Militia would have been largely reduced by the success of the Army enlistment. He agreed with the plan of 28 days' drill; but he would have the training period for recruits fixed for the winter months, because the want of employment at that period would swell the ranks, especially in the agricultural districts. He did not approve of drilling recruits with the Line, and would prefer to drill them at head quarters, because a recruit required to be gently handled to make him a soldier, and, if he were handled too roughly at first, he might be fatally prejudiced against the Regular Army. In his own county bad characters had been weeded out of the Militia, and he wished the same had been done throughout the Army. He was sorry to see that no proposal had been made for the increase of the Militia artillery. There should be a certain number of guns and men told off to work them in every regiment. The system had been introduced with good effect in the Indian Army. The withdrawal of the patronage, as far as promotion went, from the Lords Lieutenant was wise; their retaining the appointment to first commissions would give us good useful officers who would be an ornament to the service. Almost every Bill introduced into Parliament fixed additional charges upon counties, and he hoped the matter would be fully re-considered by the Government. He did not like the Bill as it stood; he did not believe that it was understood by the country; the Army did not approve of it, nor did the House; and he trusted that in Committee it would be so amended as to make it a real Army Organization Bill.

MR. GOURLEY said, that in his opinion, to have introduced the Ballot into the measure would have been to revive the pressgang throughout the country. It was utterly unnecessary to resort to such a course, inasmuch as there was ample material in the country from which the Army could be recruited, without recourse being had to such an extreme step. He believed the Secretary for War had struck at the root of the evil that existed in our present military system by proposing to abolish the system of purchase—because, when that impediment to the amalgamation of our various forces had been removed, it would be replaced by a spirit of competition, men of thought and intelligence would take their places in the rank and file and; the Army would become a national, instead of an exclusive force. However, although he approved the proposal to abolish this objectionable system, he objected to the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to effect that object. Either the purchase system should be allowed to die a natural death, or else it should be abolished at once and for ever. If the system was so objectionable that it was absolutely necessary that it should be swept away, why should it be allowed to linger on for years, as would be the case if the Government plan were adopted? The system ought to be got rid of as soon as possible, and he did not think the country would object to pay the money required to buy up the commissions. He further objected to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to substitute the system of promotion by selection in the place of that which now existed, as calculated to lead to patronage and political jobbery. Before asking the people to expend the enormous sum of money the Government plan would require to be spent, the right hon. Gentleman ought to satisfy them that some large and comprehensive plan had been framed for securing the defence of this country—he ought to assure them that the Navy would be re-organized, and that small iron-clad turret-ships, manned by the Coastguard and the Naval Reserve, would be ready to defend our coasts and harbours. They should further be convinced that, in the case of our first line of defence being broken, our land forces would be placed in such a state of efficiency as to enable them to be prepared for any emergency. But he denied that this had been done: notwithstanding the interest that had been excited in this country during the last seven months on the subject of our military affairs, the War Office had brought forward no tangible plan which would serve as a guide in attempting to re-organize the Army. If the War Office had been itself efficient, the country would not have been left in the distracted state in which it now was with reference to the steps to be taken for its defence. What was required was that our various forces should be so equipped, organized, and arranged that they would be prepared to enter on an actual campaign at any moment. Only recently a singular illustration had been offered of the inefficiency of the present system, in the delay which had taken place in supplying clothing, and other equipments, to portions of our troops. If that were to happen, what would be the case were we suddenly brought face to face with an enemy? With all the experience we had gained in the Crimean and the Abyssinian Campaigns, the head of the War Office, he thought, ought at least to see that our various forces were placed in such a condition as to be able to take the field for actual campaign service. No system would be sufficient, or would be such as the country demanded, unless our various forces were put in a position to do that. To accomplish that object, it would be well if the War Office could so arrange our various forces as to place before the public during the ensuing summer, in different parts of the country, a certain number of the Regular Army in connection with a certain number of the Militia and the Volunteers, as though they were going into actual campaign service. When they had placed before them such a combination, the country would be satisfied that there was at least some ground for expecting efficiency in actual service. But until that was done, the public would never be convinced that the War Office was doing its duty.

MR. EASTWICK said, he hoped he should not be thought discursive, if he did not travel altogether side by side with the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire. He wished to state his objections generally to the Bill, and some of them referred to matters of far greater importance than the purchase system. But, notwithstanding his objections to the Bill, he wished to speak with the utmost respect of the efforts of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. No one could deny that the task which devolved upon the right hon. Gentleman was one of immense difficulty; a task, as had been most justly said, perhaps not easier than to build the superstructure of a new military system on a cleared foundation. It was impossible, too, not to admit that there was evidence in the Bill of at least an earnest desire to deal fairly and liberally with the whole question of Army organization. On one point he especially congratulated the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that he had not shown any disposition to sacrifice the public interests, or, indeed, any interests whatever, to false considerations of economy. He would frankly own that he was prepossessed with the idea that the Government were too deeply anchored in economical protestation to be able to swing with the turn of the tide. But if the Bill was unsound, it was not because it was too economical; on the contrary, the objections that had been taken to it were rather of an opposite character. But from the fact that the Bill did not err on the side of economy, he drew the inference—not in a party spirit, but as a general lesson to all parties—that it was an unwise thing for Ministers who valued a reputation for consistency to indulge in unlimited promises of economy; for after, as he believed, a sincere effort to keep pace with their professions, the Government now proposed a Bill which would impose upon the country, at one stroke, a burden equal to the whole cost of the Abyssinian Expedition, a yearly charge of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 for the increase of forces, and an uncertain amount for a future retiring fund. He was as warm a friend of economy as any Member of the House; but, of course, he knew that there were considerations which affected the safety and honour of the country which must be paramount to all others, and to which even economy must be postponed. He was glad, therefore, that it had been admitted that our principal object was not so much how to finance a new military system as how to place the military institutions of the country on a basis of permanent security. Still, he held that the most careful calculations should be made as to expense, and that no alterations should be sanctioned but such as could be proved to be worth the cost, and, what was even still more important, not to contain in them the germs of increasing and indefinite expenditure. Looked at from these points of view, the scheme of the right

hon. Gentleman — unless there was a great deal behind — and judging only from what they saw, and that was all they could judge by, must be unreservedly condemned. It was an inelastic scheme, which did nothing to increase the strength of the Regular Army, and it was positively mischievous, inasmuch as it tended to induce the country to rely in the greatest emergencies on untried forces, which, from their very constitution, could never have fought a battle until they came to fight in that last struggle on which the fate of the nation would depend. It involved an immense outlay, and held out no guarantee that the state of things for the extinction of which that outlay was made would not recur; and it certainly contained the seeds of increasing and unknown expenditure hereafter. In a word, while infinitely more costly than the old system, it contained all the defects inherent in that system. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had laid it down that, before discussing the new military arrangements, it was necessary to decide three important questions — first, whether recruiting should be on the voluntary or the compulsory principle; secondly, whether purchase should be retained or abolished; and, thirdly, whether the commissions in the Reserve forces should be given, as heretofore, by the Lords Lieutenant or by the Crown. He ventured to think there was a question to be considered before all these — a question on which the safety and welfare of the nation depended: that question was — Is England prepared to stake her last stake of all on a Regular Army, or on Irregulars? After this great war which had just passed under their very eyes, were they resolved to follow the example of France, or would they adopt that of Prussia? That was the question which the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken to decide for them; and he now, with the most profound conviction of the fatal nature of the mistake into which he would plunge them, appealed to the House to reverse the decision. In speaking of following the example of Prussia, he did not refer to compulsory military service. He would state in one moment what it was to which he referred; but as the right hon. Gentleman initiated his argument by referring to compulsion, he (Mr. Eastwick) desired, first of all, to say a few words on that head. He was not about to advocate compulsion. He was perhaps as unfriendly to it as the right hon. Gentleman himself, or as that celebrated man before him, who would not even give a reason on compulsion. But he thought that in that discussion the arguments for compulsory military service should be stated fairly and fully, and not in the incomplete and perfunctory manner in which they were alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman. It was not statesmanlike to dismiss the question of compulsory enlistment for the Regular Army with a single remark, and to say that it was a proposition which nobody had ever been bold enough to support. Perhaps nobody had ever been bold enough to support a proposition for adopting that system in England; but it was the system which had been adopted in Prussia, and we had seen the results. If the House and the country wished to come to a full, dispassionate, and safe judgment on that great question they should ponder well those results. Those results proved that the greatest national prosperity which, perhaps, had ever been witnessed in Europe was compatible with compulsory military service. He maintained that the progress of Prussia, both material and moral, was greater even than that of England. The population of Prussia increased more rapidly than that of any country in Europe, except Saxony and Norway. That population was better educated than that of almost any country, and contained upwards of a million of landed proprietors — not mere cottagers, but the majority of them in comfortable circumstances — while here there were but 30,000 landowners with 250,000 tenant-farmers. It was a population in which the poor were but as one to 32, while here they were as one to 22. It was true the average income of Great Britain was about one-third greater than that of Prussia; but Great Britain was three times more heavily taxed, and the charge on account of the National Debt alone was here 16*s.* 6*d.* per head of the population, while it was only 2*s.* 9*d.* in Prussia. It must be remembered, too, that 44 per cent of the revenue of Prussia was raised from sources independent of taxation. He might add other statistics, but he would not weary the House. Our Secretary of Legation at Berlin, Mr. Harris-Gastrell, in his valuable and elaborate Report on the Land Tenure of

Prussia, attempted to account for this astonishing prosperity of a nation of soldiers by saying—

“Possibly the loss of reproductive labour (owing to the number of soldiers) may be compensated to the nation by the gain in physical and moral qualities of the peasant and the artizan. The villages of the proprietary peasantry in Prussia are usually admitted to be the great nurseries for the Army ;”

and the peasants were said to be “much improved by passing through the service.” They were free from the chief vices of the agricultural labourer ; and “as soldiers they respect the purse and the watch of their slain enemy.” Those who imagined that compulsory military service was injurious to the industrial pursuits of a nation could hardly be aware that out of 1,000 men who come to the age for enlistment in Prussia every year only 96 were taken for the Army, and of these the great majority, after a short service of three years, returned to their industrial pursuits invigorated and, in all respects, improved. The advantages of a compulsory military system, such as existed in Prussia, might be summed up under five heads—First, the certain and regular supply of sufficient recruits for the standing Army, instead of an uncertain and irregular one ; second, the binding together all classes of the community by the tie of military companionship ; third, the elevation of the tone of the Army by the infusion of a due proportion of educated men ; fourth, the improvement of the industrial classes by the physical development and moral discipline acquired in the Army ; fifth, the preparation of the most formidable engine of war possible by the formation of an Army not on the absurd principle of the Ballot, but by that of selection, by which the Army would consist, physically and intellectually, of the very flower of the nation. But he thought he need not enlarge upon the question of compulsion, because he understood that the Government intended to adopt the better plan of making the Army an object of attraction rather than of aversion. That was, no doubt, the right course ; but then he must remind the House that it implied increased expenditure. But when he spoke of following the example of Prussia, he referred not to compulsory military service, but to that which seemed to be at the root of all real improvement in the Army. In the Prussian system the Reserve forces were the veterans of the Army ; but in the scheme before the House they were not far from being the very opposite extreme—the recruits. Let him remind the Secretary for War that in the Roman legion it was the Triarii, or veterans, who formed the third line, and who restored the battle when the young soldiers, the Hastati and Principes, were broken. But in this scheme that principle was reversed, and it was the raw troops, the irregular levies, who were to retrieve the day when the best soldiers were beaten. In accordance with this idea was the proposal to transfer officers after two years' service in the Militia to the Line, a proposal which, in his humble opinion, was the very reverse of what should be adopted. A man who had served seven years—he would say five years, or even three years—in the Regular Army was a soldier, and if he were dismissed to industrial pursuits and called back every year to drill for 28 days, or 100 hours, or any reasonable short period, he would lose little, if any, of his military knowledge—nay, perhaps by the change of occupation, and by educating his mind generally, he would even gain, and would return to military service with increased zeal. He was like a man who had once learned to skate well, and who, however short the season, was always d'aplomb on the ice. But a Militiaman or a Volunteer—he spoke of the masses—would remain a Militiaman or a Volunteer to the end of his days, and would never be able to fight a pitched battle with a regular army of veteran soldiers. But this whole scheme proceeded on the supposition that with a few good soldiers and a great number of imperfect ones, the work which was required to be done by a certain number of good soldiers could be effected. There were now in this country, as far as he could make out, 104,826 Regular soldiers and 329,663 Irregulars, and he admired the faith of the right hon. Gentleman if he really believed that that little leaven would leaven the whole mass. No doubt he saw the difficulty ; because they were told that the recruits for the Militia were to be drilled as much as possible with those for the Regular Army, and for a longer period than before. That, of course, meant increased expenditure ; but would it answer the purpose ? He preferred to reply in the words of Mr. Windham, in his speech of April 3, 1806. He (Mr. Windham) said—

"We seem to suppose that whenever we have got a set of men together, no matter on what principle combined, have put them in a certain dress, ranged them in a certain order, and taught them certain exercises, that, then, so far as that number goes, we have created an Army; which is about as wise as what we see of children in their sport, who, when they have fixed a piece of stick in the ground, fancy they have planted a tree. What is wanting in either case is the vital principle. . . .

. . . . Danger and discipline are the very sap and juices out of which all that has life and action must spring. . . . This notion, therefore, of a levy in mass, so far as experience has hitherto gone, would seem to be one to which it would be wholly unsafe to trust."—[1 Hansard, vi. 652.]

Mr. Windham added—

"If ever there was a country calculated to be defended by its inhabitants, if ever there were inhabitants qualified to defend a country, it was Switzerland and the Swiss, and yet how little were these people able to do. I cannot possibly conceive that the enemy would desire anything better than that the country should trust its defence to the Volunteer corps."—[Ibid.]

Those were the words of Mr. Windham, and they must be endorsed to a great extent even now. For though our present Volunteers were better than any that ever existed before, especially as marksmen, yet, not to speak of the fact that every one of them would be required, in case of serious invasion, to defend the fortified camps at Portsmouth and Plymouth, and those he hoped to see constructed near Liverpool and London and other commercial towns, if the question was one of fighting in the open field, the interval between the Volunteers and the Regular soldiers they might have to encounter would still be maintained. It was idle to disguise from themselves that there had grown up on the Continent a great Army, to which nothing that had ever been seen before could be compared, and the soldiers of which, in the opinion of the best judges, were superior even to those of this country in physique, in intelligence, and in experience, and not inferior in courage. It must be remembered, too, that the system by which the Prussian Army had been brought to such a pitch of perfection would be imitated by the other great military nations of the Continent, and that before many years were over we should see a French Army, a Russian Army, and an Austrian Army, which would have made corresponding progress. Where would this country, then, be, if they relied on this scheme of the right hon. Gentleman—a scheme which consisted in endeavouring to assimilate Irregular forces to Regulars, and which might unhappily end in the reverse issue, and in changing our small but noble Army, which up to this late war had been recognized as la plus redoutable de l'Europe, into a great provincial levy? But a question might be put to him which it was only natural to put to those who criticized and condemned the schemes of others. He might be asked—"What would you do yourself?" He had no hesitation in answering that question. He would begin by re-establishing the local European Army for India. That would relieve this country from all anxiety in that quarter, and would enable the Government to bring home in case of emergency the 32,000 men belonging to the Imperial forces which he should propose still to leave in India. He might appeal, he believed, to the very highest authorities as to the great mistake we had made when we abolished our local European Army in India. But he would not go further into the question on that occasion than to say that the present system could not be maintained without continual financial embarrassment. They could not afford to pay £16,000,000 a-year out of the Indian Revenue for their Army in India, and there were only two ways of diminishing the expenditure of the European part of it—one of which was by reducing the number of officers, and the other by extending the period of service for the men. And that extension of service ought not to be left to the accident of choice after the men had arrived in India; if they wished them to be contented and to look upon that country as their home, they ought to elect to serve for a long period before they quitted England. The next step should be to augment the Regular Army in this country up to something like the figure at which it should stand in proportion to the enormous sums expended upon it. They were told there would be 108,000 men of the Regular Army in this country, and according to his scheme they would bring from India 30,000, and if they added 6,000 more they would have 144,000, or four and a-half complete corps d'armée of 32,000 men each. He contended that by judicious economies they could afford to add 6,000 men, who should all be assigned to the military train, and that even with this addition, and the expense of the men from

India, which would no longer be defrayed from the Indian Exchequer, the Army ought not to cost so much as it did at present. He was quite prepared for the outcry which might perhaps be raised at a suggestion for increasing the Regular Army, and for the dismal looks and objections with which it would be received; but he appealed to any general officer of experience whether, in face of the gigantic armies on the Continent, 144,000 Regular soldiers were too many to keep in this country? It should be borne in mind that his proposal was not so much to increase the number of armed men in England as to substitute Regular soldiers for Irregulars. It was said in that House not many nights ago that it would be impossible for England ever to vie with the great military nations of the Continent; but that remark was as mischievous as it was absolutely without foundation. Why was it impossible for England to vie with those nations? Was it on account of the want of men or of money, or of both? Certainly it could not be on account of the want of men, for the population of this country increased so much more rapidly than that of France, for example, that though France had 38,000,000 people, and Great Britain only 31,000,000, yet the latter had actually more men who came to the age for enlistment every year than France. In France there were annually but 330,000 men who came to the age of 20, against 360,000 men in this country. Looking at the stature, strength, and soldierlike qualities of our men, as well as their number, we were, in respect of our resources for recruiting our Army, not very far behind united Germany. Well, then, it was not on account of the want of men that it was impossible to vie with the nations on the Continent. Was it, then, on account of the want of money? Here there could not be even the shadow of a doubt, for they were actually paying for their heterogeneous body of 220,000 Militiamen and Regular soldiers £5,000,000 a-year more than the North German Confederation paid for their great Regular Army, and about £1,000,000 a-year more than France paid for 375,000 regular soldiers on a peace establishment. He was astonished that the people of this country did not awake to this fact and demand an explanation of it. They were told that an English soldier costs £100 a-year, while a French soldier costs £40, and a Prussian only £30; but that was the very point into which the House and the country should insist on inquiring. Why were not explanatory comparative statements of the cost of soldiers of different nations laid upon the Table of the House? In this matter we seemed to resemble the sailor who was so determined to spend his prizemoney that when he found that a gold watch was not to be had, he insisted upon paying as much for a silver one. Would anyone believe that food, arms, and clothing cost more than three times as much in England as they did in Prussia, and more than twice as much as they did in France? No; the whole secret lay in our faulty administration, in our top-heavy service, in our excess of officers to men, and in our inelastic system. He knew that the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) thought differently; but he believed it could be shown from the Statesman's Year-book—and there were other and still more conclusive authorities, that in our infantry we had one officer to every 22 men, while the Prussians had but one to 28; and in our whole Army, including the administrative service, we had one officer to 17 men, while the Prussians had but one to 23. That was on a peace establishment; but on a war establishment there were, in a Prussian corps d'armée, 39,784 non-commissioned officers and men to 975 officers, excluding the administrative and medical service—that was only one officer to nearly 41 men. Moreover, in our Army, the officers in the higher grades, who cost the most money, were greatly in excess as compared with officers of the same grades in the Prussian Army. In every infantry regiment we had two majors to the Prussian one, and ten captains to the Prussian four. It was obvious how much this must increase the expense of the effective service, as well as the amount of the pension and half-pay list. These were vital points, and the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman did not touch them at all; though it was the more incumbent on him to deal with them fully and satisfactorily, because he had decided on the abolition of purchase. He (Mr. Eastwick) declared boldly that, unless the military system was reformed at the same time that purchase was abolished, the country would plunge into a fathomless ocean of expense; and after they had paid away £8,000,000 or £10,000,000, or whatever the sum might be, they would find themselves in a worse position than they were in before—in the Indian difficulty three times aggravated. Begin, he would say, by reducing the number of your company cadres and of your officers to the scale adopted in the Prussian Army, and transfer the 1,036 supernumerary officers you would thus have in the infantry to the Reserve forces. Adopt an elastic system, and divide your 108 regiments of infantry into three battalions each, and then you may mobilize as few of them or as many of them as you please. If you reduce the majors from two to one, and the companies from ten to four, you will have sufficient supernumerary officers, with the 2,074 officers on half-pay, who ought all to be called upon to serve in the Reserves or to retire, and the Militia officers to supply the second and third battalions. In the same way reduce the number of squadrons in the cavalry, but increase their strength, and make the artillery into four corps with 8-gun batteries, each corps being nearly equal to an infantry corps on a war establishment. It was impossible, without better data than any private Member could have, to go into minute details; but it was clear that a scheme might be based on that foundation, which would give three times as many Regular soldiers as we now had, with little increase, perhaps with some diminution of expense. There were already sufficient officers for the Reserves, and if a short service of three years were adopted for two-thirds of the men of the 1st battalions, keeping only one-third old soldiers, and passing the rest through into the 2nd battalions or first Reserve for four years, and then into the 3rd battalion or second Reserve for five years, the time-honoured but effete system of the Militia might gradually be superseded. These Reserves being called out for only eight days in the year, or at most for 14 days, which would be all that was necessary for old soldiers, would cost little more than the Militia, and would be twice as numerous and vastly more efficient. Returning to the question of purchase, it could not be denied that after, at an immense cost, we had bought out purchase, and prohibited in the severest manner—even to the extent of making it penal—any attempt to revive it, even then, unless liberal retiring pensions were provided, and retirement enforced after stated periods of service, the old system would begin to re-appear. It was a weed, if they liked to call it so, that would grow in spite of all that could be done to prevent it, unless it were choked with some more vigorous plant. But then came the question of expense. It would probably be necessary to fix a period of about 12 years for service as a subaltern, and 20, 26, 32, and 38 years as the periods after which an officer should be promoted to the rank of major, lieutenant colonel, colonel, and colonel upon full allowances. But if there were not vacancies sufficient for all the officers arriving at those terms of service, it would be absolutely necessary to cause the supernumeraries to retire on the pensions of their rank, with liability to serve in the Reserves, or in case of invasion. He was quite unable to calculate the yearly charge that this system would entail; but the calculation, no doubt, could be made, and it ought to be made at once. It would, no doubt, be a very expensive system; but it would, at all events, furnish for the Reserve forces an adequate supply of experienced officers. There were only three more points to which he would very briefly refer. No military system could be efficient unless the Army were divided into regular corps d'armées of so many thousand men each, with a due proportion of infantry, cavalry, artillery, engineers, and military train, kept up so as to be able to move at short notice. We had not proceeded as far even as this elementary proposition, for though we had a military unit of 18,000 men, we had not the proper proportion of cavalry, guns, and military train. We had, indeed, 330 field guns, but should require for 144,000 men 430 guns. We had enough artillerymen, but not guns and horses. The House would likewise observe that by fixing on so small a unit as 18,000 men we vastly increased the expense; if we wished to be economical, we should adopt a unit nearer that of the Prussians, which was 42,000. According to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the corps d'armées ought to be localized; but it was of great importance that the military and civil territorial divisions should be identical, as was the case in France and Germany. The civil registers furnished the information as to the number and ages of the population required for military purposes; but if the civil and military districts did not coincide, it would be difficult to utilize that information. Recruiting, he thought, would be much assisted by detaching parties of officers and men from the Regular Army to the civil sub-districts to drill Volunteers, and, in fact, all comers. This would make the masses better acquainted with military matters, and dispose many to enlist. Lastly, he would urge that the old soldiers should be better paid and pensioned, and it was no less important that the soldier generally should receive all he had to receive in money and rations without any deductions. In conclusion, he hoped the House would go into these questions in the most searching manner, would grudge no time in finding how to diminish expense, while preserving the utmost efficiency in the Army, and would grudge no money that might be really necessary to render the Army not only efficient, but as powerful and as numerous as the great position of England and her unavoidable duties as one of the foremost nations of the world required it should be.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT said, one of the arguments advanced by those who defended the purchase system was, that it helped to give us efficiency in our officers; but if that argument was worth anything, it ought to go further and establish that the officers in the infantry and cavalry regiments were more efficient than officers in those branches of the service—the Engineers, the Artillery, the Marines, and the Navy—where purchase did not prevail. Our officers, no doubt, had shown great bravery and self-devotion whenever they were called upon; but Captain Hozier had shown that a different meaning was to be attached to the words. He had stated, in his evidence, that Prussian officers were very much superior in tactical skill to our own, and that in times of war they showed themselves to be better educated, and possessed of greater professional knowledge than English officers, and he came to the conclusion that that was, in a great measure, owing to the fact that young officers in the English Army had a great deal to do in the way of amusements, such as hunting, shooting, and the like, which were far more pleasant and agreeable than receiving instruction in military science in time of peace. He ventured to suggest a study of the whole of Captain Hozier's evidence to his military friends in that House. Another defence for the purchase system was, that it prevented stagnation; but it was hardly fair to defend it on that ground, the answer being contained in one phrase—that there was a retiring list. The answer to the charge that its abolition would introduce favouritism was fallacious; because, by a system of competition on the entrance into the service, and again before attaining the rank of captain, and by afterwards placing the selection in the hands of a Board specially appointed for that purpose, it ought to be possible to prevent all suspicion of favouritism. The strongest plea that had been urged in favour of purchase was the plea made on behalf of the regimental system. It had its advantages, no doubt, as well as its disadvantages; and one of the latter was, that an officer often found that he had not sufficient freedom, and that habits of extravagance were forced upon him which it was difficult for a young officer not to conform to. He appealed to gentlemen who, after leaving college, had entered the Army, whether it was not true that there was much greater freedom for a man to follow the bent of his own individual mind when at college, for study and living economically if he chose to do so, than he would have subsequently when he had obtained a commission in the Army? Those who opposed the principle of selection on account of the regimental system, ought also, to be consistent, to object to the system of exchange. For if an officer was allowed for his own interest to exchange from one regiment to another, surely they might exchange officers from one regiment to another for the common interest and good of the service. Referring next to the system of over-regulation prices, he would remark that it was in the face of the repeated protests and efforts, on the part of the Government, that the over-regulation prices had grown up, and continued to exist, because of the culpable negligence of the Horse Guards ["No."] It never could have gone on unless the officer who retired had been allowed to appoint his successor in all the various steps; and if the Horse Guards had exercised the power it possessed, of throwing great uncertainty in the way of a successor, the fabulous over-regulation prices could never have gone on increasing as they had done. It was, no doubt, unpleasant to say so; but the fact was, that the expense to which the country would be put had arisen partly from the negligence of the Horse Guards. [An hon. MEMBER: The Treasury.] Those prices had very much increased of late years, and it had been possible that such a transaction as he would name might have taken place—but he would not say that it had. A colonel entered a regiment, and made himself very disagreeable. At the end of 15 or 18 months he might intimate his willingness to retire. He did so at 20 or 30 per cent over the regulation price, because the other officers were too ready to subscribe the sum demanded to get rid of a disagreeable commanding officer. ["Oh!"] Surely hon. Members did not mean to say they had never heard of such a thing. There would be a strong feeling in the country that in paying men the over-regulation price they were paying men who had purchased at their own risk, and had thereby deliberately broken the law of the country. It would be an unpleasant task to perform not to pay them, because some officers would lose their money; but it appeared to him that to do so would be wrong and unjust towards the taxpayers—still, he was of opinion that some part of the money ought to be paid. Passing on to a consideration of the other parts of the Bill, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for having dealt with this great and difficult subject; but he felt the Bill was not quite adequate to the occasion. It fell very short in the way of re-organization. In order to consider what was necessary, he would ask the House to remember the position of the country. It should be borne in mind that we had, as it were, two separate wants. We were members both of the great European and of the Asiatic families. Our wants for India, and our other external requirements, might be put down at 80,000 soldiers; but when they considered what was required for our own country, he ventured to say the question would be answered by the country in a manner which would very much surprise some hon. Members. It would be answered by the inquiry, whether a standing

Army was required at all. ["Oh!"] He expected that remark would cause some surprise; but he was afraid that this was not the only institution that was very familiar to them, but which he should not like to name, that might have some day to undergo a change. Great changes had taken place during the last three or four years in the art of war. Nations now no longer sent armies into the field—nations themselves became armies. It was seen in America, and again in Germany; and if they watched what was taking place in Russia and Austria, they would find their military systems were being re-organized on that principle: and he thought they would shortly see it adopted by France also. Under the system of employing the whole of the male population in the defence of their country, they brought a better quality of soldiers into the ranks than we got under our system. The weapons now placed in the hands of troops were of such a kind that they required some moral qualities on the part of the soldiers who had to use them. Von Moltke was reported to have said that the breech-loader had destroyed all the armies in Europe except two, and they were the German and English armies; and the reason that he gave for that statement was that there were no other troops in Europe who were sufficiently calm, resolute, and self-possessed to use it efficiently. However much they might be inclined to give credit to that great General for the German successes in this war, he ventured to give it as his opinion, with very great deference, but still with a strong conviction, that the victories of the Germans were really owing to the individual character of the men—that it was the intelligence of the men, their resolution and patriotism, that decided those great battles; because the German soldiers were the most resolute in advancing and the steadiest in firing. An engagement in the present day had resolved itself into a long line of skirmishers. The mere mechanical position of regiments had lost its value to a great extent, and the individual character of the men had gained by it, for the men were now away from their officers' eye and control, and a great deal depended on what they did and what they were themselves. A professional standing Army offered neither of those two things—numbers or quality.

He believed that great impatience would be manifested by the people of this country, and rightly so, if a standing Army of 100,000 men were maintained; and when they came to examine the state of our Army, and tested it by the number of men who were admitted into our military prisons and hospitals, we could hardly help feeling that good as Englishmen might be, and bravely as they had fought, they were not the class of men who could be said to be the flower of the Army. He asked whether the state of things he had referred to was satisfactory? According to the Estimates the country would, during the current year, spend £29,000 for punishing the Army; £46,000 for preaching to it; £250,000 in doctoring it; and yet, having done this, could we say that we had an Army that could compare with that of Germany, or with any other really national Army? No man who had seen a real national Army would ever believe again in a standing or professional Army. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had said that we had heard in the recent war the knell of standing armies. He (Mr. A. Herbert) did not think the country ought to bear with a standing Army. Neither did he think it would approve of the German system. He confidently recommended the country to accept the Swiss system; which, while being efficient and cheap, would, at the same time, prove an instrument of the highest value in the moral and intellectual training of the troops. Under that system the whole male population of the country was drilled and trained in military manoeuvres from school upwards. First, they were taught a very careful drill at school; this was followed by three months' service for the mass of the army, and a longer training for the scientific branches. That much might be done in a short time in the way of preparing men for warfare he could testify from what he had seen of the Mobiles in Paris, who by the end of the siege had become as fine a body of men as an officer could wish to command. And, in the event of invasion, we should be able to fall back upon some such system as this; but without the advantage of preparation. The handful of a standing Army would soon be used up, and then we must depend upon untrained men. A separate provision must, of course, be made for training the scientific branches of the service; but, so far as the mere fighting men were concerned, the Swiss system was perfect in the results which it produced. In order to carry out a system of universal drill, and so do away with the necessity for a standing Army, the Home and Indian Armies must be entirely separated; and, in the second place, this country must enter upon a new set of relations with Ireland. One of the principal reasons for having to maintain a standing Army was the Irish difficulty. That was a very discreditable fact, and he would therefore advise that Ireland should be put under the same system as that which prevailed in England. Let us pass the Irish people through a short, stern, compulsory service, and we should hear no more of England dictating to Ireland. He was perfectly certain that England's safety in the future would be best assured by relying not upon this or that particular line of defence, but upon every Englishman being compelled to fit himself to take an efficient part in her defence should the occasion unhappily arise.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, it was unfortunate that the present discussion should have been confined to what he considered a secondary point, and should have degenerated into a mere purchase squabble. He did not hesitate to blame the Government for this circumstance. First, they had declined to divide the subject at the request of the hon. and gallant Member for Bewdley (Major Anson); and next, they had put the purchase question prominently forward in the Bill, every speaker who had got up from the Treasury Bench reiterating the cry that the pith and substance of the Bill was abolition of purchase. Last year the country asked the Government two questions—whether they were prepared to defend our shores and to maintain our treaty obligations and allies. In response to that appeal the Government had brought in a Bill for the abolition of purchase at a cost of £8,000,000. In his opinion this was worse than trifling with a great question, because it was proposed to spend upon a secondary object vast resources, which might be applied to much better purposes. At a time when the great Powers of Europe were reconstituting their military system, we were bidden to be satisfied with a small Regular Army composed of regiments, but deficient in artillery, cavalry, and Reserves; with an ill-trained Militia, only half-officered, and with a Yeomanry force, which was much better fitted to take part in the operations of a field-day than to engage in the work of a campaign. In a word, we had neither a sufficient amount of men, ammunition, artillery, Reserves, nor organization. Was this the position which a great country like England, which owned the largest and richest commerce in the world, which possessed a greater extent of Colonies than any other nation, and which up to the other day had a prestige second to none, ought to occupy? Now that peace had been concluded no one could tell how soon the whole state of European affairs would be altered by some unforeseen event, and in that case how would England be prepared to hold her own against troops such as Prussia had recently put into the field with the raw levies—boys of 16 and 18—which his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) described the other day as forming a very large proportion of her Army. Then, with reference to our Reserves. The Financial Secretary of the War Department (Captain Vivian) said, in his speech a few days ago, that it was impossible to improvise Reserve forces out of the ground; in answer to which he (Lord Eustace Cecil) would venture to tell the hon. and gallant Gentleman that, in his opinion and that of many military men, it would be equally impossible to improvise Reserves out of the Bill before the House. He was an admirer of the short-service system; but he feared recent recruits did not approve of it, and we should only be able to rely upon one-sixth of our force of Reserves. He would not go at any length into the questions of artillery and ammunition, which had been dealt with by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), but he wished to know whether the Secretary of State thought 336 guns were sufficient for 170,000 auxiliary and regular forces? When we knew that in the Prussian Army there were six guns to 1,000 men, we were put off with just two-thirds of a gun to 1,000 men. Our deficiency in cavalry was truly lamentable. We had 12,952 regular cavalry, and 14,000 yeomanry, making a total of 26,952 to a force of 470,717 men. Thus we had one cavalry soldier in every 17. The proportion in Prussia, on a peace footing, was one to six; in Austria, one to seven; in Italy, one to twelve; and in the United States, one to seven. The right hon. Gentleman had added 5,000 horses to the Estimates, yet we had only one horse to eight men of our Regular forces, while in Prussia they had one horse to four men; or to put the whole result of these calculations shortly, Continental nations had three times the amount of cavalry in proportion to infantry as we had, and twice as many horses. With regard to organization, he wished to know whether we could put into the field a corps d'armée, brigade, or regiment, with the amount of transport and commissariat necessary to constitute a well-appointed body of men? He could state with confidence that no attempt had been made to make our regiments independent and self-supporting in this respect. He then came to the question of finance. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), when he was at Edinburgh last autumn said that the compensation under the plan for the abolition of purchase would cost £2,100,000; but some months afterwards he stated in the daily papers that it would cost £5,500,000. But whatever the cost would be—whether £8,000,000, £10,000,000, £12,000,000, or £14,000,000—he wished to know whether hon. Members were prepared to consent to such enormous expenditure without having the details of what was to follow submitted to them. He was surprised that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House, who usually advocated economy, could listen without wry faces to the large figures mentioned by the Secretary of State the other day. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) told the House at an early part of the Session that the Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches were a war party, and were for incurring extravagant expenses; and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) carped a good deal at the very moderate dowry to the Princess Louise. Such hon. Members as those seemed ready to strain at a gnat, but were perfectly prepared to swallow a camel. It seemed to him that this proposal of the Government was a most useless and wasteful expenditure of the public money. He should prefer to see this amount expended upon Irish railways, or in the reduction of the National Debt. If, however, it were determined to spend this money upon the national defences, he would suggest several better modes of dealing with it than in abolishing the purchase system. Well, in the first place, we might have an increase of our artillery and cavalry. In the next place, we might carry out the recommendations of the Committee of Defence of 1859—namely, improve the defences of our dockyards, fortify Spithead, and other similar places, complete the defences of Portsmouth, and other harbours; Spithead and the Thames might be made secure; something, too, might be done towards fortifying the Irish coast and harbours, which were almost unprotected. Camps of instruction might be provided; Malta and Gibraltar might be completely armed; or an additional iron-clad fleet for the Mediterranean might have been provided. In any of those ways he contended that this sum of money might have been far better expended than in the way proposed by the Government. Now as to the terms of retirement. He would take this test as showing the expense which would have to be incurred by the country. In respect to the officers of the Royal Marines, the retirement fund was more liberal in every respect than that of the Ordnance Corps. The amount charged for the retirement of Marine officers in the Estimates for 1871-2 was £60,226 for 545 officers, including Staff, and by working a simple rule-of-three sum you would ascertain what the retirement of the officers of the whole Army would cost. He calculated that in England, including the Staff, there were about 6,000 officers. Add a moiety of that number for the officers in India, and you would find that, according to the cost provided in the Estimates for retiring 545 officers of Marines, £900,000 would be a moderate estimate for the retiring officers in England and India. Now, those figures could not be too often stated for the information of hon. Members, particularly of those below the Gangway; and it was desirable that the country and the constituencies, as well as that House, should thoroughly know the amount of the Bill they would have to pay. He now came to the still more vexed question of purchase; and, whilst upon this part of the subject, he could not avoid remarking upon the marvellous skill with which his right

hon. Friend the Secretary for War, in his opening statement of the Army Estimates, had skipped over the long period of time which occurred between the dates to which he had referred. His right hon. Friend seemed to forget the fact that for some 40 years past the question of purchase had occupied a good deal of public attention. In 1833 a Committee on Army Appointments was appointed. The deliberations of that Committee acquired more than ordinary weight and importance from the Memorandum submitted to it by the late Duke of Wellington. In that document the illustrious Duke wrote as follows:—

“ It is this system of promotion by purchase that brings to the service men of fortune and education—men who have some connection with the interest and fortunes of the country, besides the commissions they hold. It is this circumstance which exempts the British Army from the character of being a mere mercenary Army.”

Well, a Royal Commission on this subject sat in 1840. It was presided over by the Duke of Wellington, and was composed of 14 of the most eminent naval and military men of the day. That Commission, as the result of their inquiries and deliberations, reported unanimously in favour of the system of purchase. Passing over a Committee of the House of Commons which sat in 1850, which, though it did not report directly upon purchase, reported indirectly in its favour, inasmuch as it reported against the system prevailing in the Ordnance Corps, he came to the Royal Commission of 1856. That Commission consisted of 10 members, who were presided over by the Duke of Somerset. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, in referring to it, neglected to state certain details connected with that Commission which tended to deprive its Report of that force and authority which it would have possessed had its recommendations been the result of unanimity among its members. Only six signed the Report, three dissented, and one of those who did sign it—Sir De Lacy Evans—qualified his assent. Therefore, its Report might be said to have come out with only half of its members favourable to it. As his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) remarked, it had reported in favour of the purchase system up to the rank of major, and it recommended that the system of selection from the rank of major

to that of commander of a regiment should be introduced most cautiously, and more as an experiment than as a rule. That Report led to a remarkable debate in this House four years afterwards. On the 6th of March, 1860, on a Motion of Sir De Lacy Evans for an Address to the Crown to abolish purchase in the Army, a debate arose in which 13 speakers took part. Ten of those speakers were in favour of purchase, and only three against it. Amongst those 10 were three officers of the Ordnance Corps—Captain Leicester Vernon, Sir Frederick Smith, the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Colonel Jervis), and Mr. Sidney Herbert, Lord Stanley, and Mr. Ellice. What did Mr. Sidney Herbert say—a Gentleman than whom no one understood the wants of the Army, and the feelings of the officers, better? The right hon. Gentleman said—

“ I view with apprehension and alarm any proposal for the entire abolition of purchase. I do not see what there is to replace it. I have looked carefully at the plan of Sir Charles Trevelyan, but I think his proposals would weigh hard upon the officers of the Army, and throw a very heavy burden on the Government. His plan on paper shows a great saving ; but practically I do not think that it would prove so.”

And he added—

“ Beyond the point to which I see my way I will not move an inch. This great machine, the English Army, is not a thing to play with.”—[3 Hansard, clvii. 58.]

What was the verdict given on that occasion by the House of Commons? It wisely followed the advice given by Mr. Sidney Herbert, and rejected the proposal of Sir De Lacy Evans by a majority of 4 to 1. In the majority he found the names of the right hon. Edward Cardwell, the right hon. Chichester Fortescue, Sir Charles Wood, and Henry Austin Bruce, all Members of the present Cabinet. Well, but what has happened in the last 10 years to alter the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department on this question? He should be sorry to pain his right hon. Friends opposite ; but he could not avoid coming to the same conclusion as that arrived at by the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary (Colonel White) — namely, that their present proposal was but a sop to the Radical exigencies of the hon. Members below the Gangway. Nor was he singular in that opinion. Earl Grey had been referred to by his right hon.

Friend in his opening statement when he observed that the noble Lord, in his reply to the Duke of Somerset on the purchase system, said that the wisest course he could pursue in regard to that system was to let it alone, until he could abolish it altogether—his right hon. Friend thereby leading the House to believe that Earl Grey was in favour of the abolition of purchase ; but such was not the fact, as it subsequently turned out. What were Earl Grey's opinions upon that matter? In the course of a debate on the 23rd of February, Earl Grey said—

“ I remain of the opinion I have long held, that, in spite of objections to it, the purchase system has not worked badly. . . . Even if all the benefits anticipated from the abolition of purchase should be realized, it is not a subject of pressing importance, for our regimental system has supplied us on the whole, with an admirable body of regimental officers. . . . But, unfortunately, in deciding upon their measure, popularity—and popularity alone—is the guide of our Government.”—[3 Hansard, cciv. 744.]

He (Lord Eustace Cecil) complained that the War Office and the Treasury Departments had played fast and loose with this question. He complained that, whilst refusing to discourage the ignorant cry against the system of purchase, they had at the same time done everything in their power to make the system stink in the nostrils of the poorer officers of the Army. They had done this, first of all, by squandering the reserve fund, and giving pensions to officers of non-purchase corps out of it ; and, secondly, by confiscating appointments in regiments without purchase that should have gone regimentally and been the legitimate prizes of those poor officers. Again they had done so by a most oppressive regulation which required from those who were desirous of retiring from the service a medical certificate that they were suffering from no mortal disease before they were allowed to sell their commissions ; thus in many cases depriving them of the only provision they had for their wives and families, after, perhaps, years of service in tropical climates, and of sufferings from wounds and disease. This was the way in which poor officers had been deprived of their property by Government confiscation. When they talked of the abuses of the purchase system, these were the real abuses of the purchase system, caused by the systematic system of confiscation pursued by the Government. He would now come to the arguments that had been used against the purchase system. He had heard it stated that purchase was an anomaly and could not be defended. He did not doubt that it was an anomaly, but he said that it could be defended. There were many other anomalies in the State, and, indeed, he could see plenty of them in that House. Were there no anomalies in our political system? Why should there be 658 Members to represent 30,000,000 of people? Was it no anomaly that the county population, which was larger than the town population, should avowedly have fewer representatives? And if he went further into social life and looked at the various professions that existed, he saw there anomalies without end. Take, for instance, a doctor's practice. A medical practitioner, it was well known, when he wanted to leave, could sell his practice to the first comer; but the patients were never consulted whether his successor was most qualified to kill or cure. There were plenty of other trades and professions that were the subject of barter and sale more or less in this country; and why, therefore, should this purchase system in the Army be the only anomaly worth abolishing at the cost of £8,000,000. To him this would have been incomprehensible but for the reason that there was an extraordinary delusion that the purchase system and the aristocracy were intimately connected. The other reason which was given by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was that it was absolutely necessary that there should be an amalgamation of the Regular Army and the Militia, and that the purchase system blocked the way. The fact that it would be necessary to provide Militia subalterns with commissions had been already dealt with by his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich; but he must say that he should have liked the Secretary for War to have explained how the amalgamation was to work. He could not understand whether the officers of the Regular force were to be allowed to exchange with the officers of Militia regiments; whether a colonel commanding a Yeomanry regiment might become the colonel of a Lancer regiment; whether the officers of the Line were to be forced into the Militia, or whether they were to be obliged to serve Her Majesty for one month's pay instead of twelve.

If this was the proposal of the Government, he did not think that it was properly understood by the country. He also did not think that it was understood that the Militia force was to be a portion of the Regular Army. The right hon. Gentleman said that he could not put regular officers into the Militia when he wanted them, and that he had no control over them when they were there. But could he not put officers on half-pay into the Militia, or induce officers to sell out, and then appoint them to the Militia? The right hon. Gentleman must know that this had been done over and over again. There was one part of the scheme that excited his (Lord Eustace Cecil's) astonishment, and that was the proposal of the Government that purchase should not be extinguished for 35 years. If it were true that our auxiliary forces could not be efficient unless an amalgamation of forces should at once take place, he wanted to know why this efficiency should be put off for 35 years. This was a point which required explanation, for it was one which, in the right hon. Gentleman's language, "No fellow could understand." It seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman was blowing hot and cold. He said that we must have an efficient force, and to have it at once we must abolish the purchase system; but at the same time he propounded a scheme by which the purchase system could not be abolished for over 40 years. He need not say much upon the question of selection, although it was a very important subject, but he did wish to say this, that it had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Sir Henry Storks) that the scheme of the Government was generally looked upon by the Army as a very liberal and generous proposal. He did not say that the right hon. Gentleman used those words, but that was the sense of what he said. He would correct him (Lord Eustace Cecil) if he were wrong.

SIR HENRY STORKS explained that the liberality to which he alluded was as regarded the proposals of the Government and not with respect to the Army.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, the officers of the Army were those most interested in the matter, and they might, perhaps, be allowed to express their own opinion. Availing himself of the permission which had been given to officers to communicate their sentiments to private Members of the House, he had sent a circular to every officer commanding a regiment or a dépôt in the United Kingdom. At the same time the House would understand that there had been no meeting of officers to the prejudice of military discipline; but that the commanding officers had obtained the opinions of each officer privately. To the 90 circulars he had sent out, he had received between 70 and 80 answers from regiment and individual officers, and had thus collected opinions from 59 regiments. The officers of 56 of these regiments were entirely opposed to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, and would rather that things should remain as they were. He thought that this should be understood by the House and the country that thirteen-fourteenths of the officers of the British Army were opposed to the Government scheme. They did not take the view of the right hon. Gentleman that his scheme was liberal and generous, and they had expressed their opinions so well and had put them so shortly and concisely, that he would read out what he was convinced was the opinion of thirteen-fourteenths of the British Army. The objections which they had to the scheme might be thus stated—

“1. Because it is a breach of contract, by arbitrarily limiting sales of commissions. 2. Because the non-purchaser under the new system will be receiving a higher rate of pay than the officer remaining in under the old. 3. Because they have the greatest mistrust of the manner in which the Commissioners will adjudicate the amount of over-regulation prices, the customary sum differing at various times even in the same regiment. 4. Because they have great doubts, judging from the state of the Artillery and Engineers, of the liberality of this House in the future in supplying a sufficient retiring fund to prevent stagnation of regimental promotion. 5. Because they believe promotion by selection will destroy all esprit de corps, besides being a breach of contract as far as the present officers of the Army are concerned, who have paid their money in the belief that if they did their duty they would be invariably promoted.”

For all these reasons there was an almost unanimous opinion, that if it were decided to abolish purchase the officers' money should be returned to them. He believed that the Surveyor General said in his speech that it would be very unfair to return the officers' money to them, because officers who had been purchased over would have a right to complain.

He (Lord Eustace Cecil) believed, however, that if the right hon. Gentleman gave himself the trouble to ascertain the opinions of the non-purchase officers who had been purchased over they would one and all be quite content that those who had purchased over them should have their money returned. Officers who had thus purchased over others had invested a large capital in doing so, and they had not received by their higher pay full interest for their money. As to selection, he would only call attention to what his right hon. Friend (the Secretary for War) said in moving the Estimates. He said that he adopted the opinion of the Royal Commissioners of 1856 as regarded the feeling of the Army as to promotion by selection. But what did that Commission really recommend? Instead of supporting the provision of any general scheme of promotion by selection, they showed that it would never be favourably received by officers of the British Army. Now, how would selection work? He would quote another authority. Earl Grey had said that no one dispensed his patronage properly, and to do so he must be a superior being, with full knowledge of men's characters and qualities. When a comparison was drawn between Army promotion and Navy promotion, he thought that the House should recollect that the Navy was a very different service to the Army in this respect. A ship could not be compared with a regiment; a ship might be commissioned to-day and paid off in a week after, but a regiment had traditions of its own, that were looked up to with a veneration that no one could have any idea of who had not served in a regiment. Before concluding, he wished to say one word to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. He hoped they would not be led away by the hope of making this a party triumph. He was sorry to say he had seen in some Gentlemen who sat there—he did not say all—a tendency to make this a party affair. Let not hon. Gentlemen suppose that by revolutionizing the system of promotion in the Army they were dealing a blow at the Conservative party. The officers of the Army were neither party politicians nor Tory aristocrats; by far the larger part of them came from the middle and professional classes, and as such they came to that House and asked them to protect their vested interests. They were not conscious that this system, so much spoken and written against, had ever failed; they connected this system with the glorious annals of the country for 250 years; and they believed that its retention would be for the benefit of the service and for the good of the nation. But, at the same time, if it were the will of the nation that this system should be extirpated root and branch—if it were the will of the House, as representing the nation, that this should take place—the officers of the Army, like good and loyal citizens, would be content to obey—and as he hoped would obey freely and willingly. At the same time he trusted that, as far as their pecuniary interests were concerned, they would not be allowed to go away with a sense of injustice in their hearts, and would not have to say hereafter that for their vested interests they had pleaded in vain for justice to the House of Commons.

CAPTAIN BEAUMONT thought it was a mistake to ask the decision of the House on the question of purchase, and at the same time on the question of organization. The question before the House was that of purchase; but nine-tenths of the debate had proceeded on Army organization. He wished to confine his observations more especially to the question of Army organization. He thought that all Army reformers must be disappointed that the Bill did so little for re-organization; to him it seemed that this Bill ought to be called an Abolition Bill, rather than an Army Organization Bill. What was wanted in Army organization was a better moulding together of the different branches of the service. Our Reserve Forces were not what they ought to be; and it was to be feared that under pressure our Volunteer Force would melt away like a snowball in the sun, and that the Militia would prove a force on which we could not rely in time of trouble. He thought this was a most important part of the question, and that the Bill did not deal with it satisfactorily. There were many other shortcomings of our military organization with which the Bill did not deal. If our Army were now called upon to take the field, we should undoubtedly be deficient in transport. Then there was the question of telegraphs. Field telegraphs were provided for only a small proportion of the Regular Army. Then, again, what arrangement had we for ambulances?

Next to nothing at all. After such an able statement as that made by the Secretary of State of military requirements, it was a cruel disappointment to find that all he did for Army re-organization was to appoint certain colonels to act as go-betweens between the Regular Army and the auxiliary forces, and transfer to the Crown the Militia patronage of the Lords Lieutenant. With respect to the proposal for the appointment of colonels, he thought this was, to a certain extent, a step in the right direction; but he denied that it was a step in Army organization, because these officers would not find any place in actual warfare. Then, as to the privilege of Lords Lieutenant, perhaps it was right and proper that their privileges should cease, and pass into the hands of the Crown; but he denied that this was a great effort of military organization. Both, as he had said, might be steps in the right direction; but both these and the abolition of purchase should have been subordinated to some large proposal for the re-organization of the Army. He agreed with the provisions of the Bill as to the Ballot, though the point was one of secondary importance. The Ballot was already a recognized part of our system; but when the emergency arose, he felt sure that the people of this country would rise as one man in defence of their homes. As to the purchase system, no one could maintain that per se it was right; and if we were beginning with a tabula rasa it was unlikely that it would be instituted, because no person would be so regardless of his own interest as to pay out of his pocket for the privilege of serving the State. It was conceded that the system had given to the service good officers; but he confessed that, with regard to the regimental system, about which a good deal had been said, he was a little in a haze as to what that system was, or what was meant by the statement that it would be upset if purchase were abolished. If by the regimental system they meant anything which was inalienably attached to the question of purchase, he should like to know what it was that was so attached. He had strong grounds for saying that there could not be anything in the regimental system which was inalienably attached to the purchase system. In his opinion, one of the advantages of the purchase system was that it prevented officers from being passed over; and, on the other hand, one of its disadvantages was that it prevented good officers from being selected. After balancing the advantages and disadvantages of the system, he was, on the whole, inclined to vote for the abolition of purchase. But then having agreed on the abolition of purchase, would it be necessary to adopt in its stead the system of selection? He thought it would; but, at the same time, the purchase system was better than a badly organized system of selection. But a system of selection did not need to be bad. Promotion among the non-commissioned officers was by selection, and the system was generally satisfactory; and though he did not say that there was any direct analogy between the promotion of non-commissioned officers and the system of selection in the case of commissioned officers, he still thought there could be found some way of getting over the difficulties attached to the selection of officers. But these were not by any means the strongest reasons for inducing him to vote for abolition of purchase. There were three reasons more which weighed very forcibly with him, two of which, to his astonishment, had not yet been referred to in the course of the debate. The first was one that had been brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War in his statement on the Army Estimates, that the purchase system stood in the way of re-organization, though the right hon. Gentleman did not go so far as to say that if purchase were not done away with, it would be impossible to proceed with Army re-organization. In fact, it seemed clear to him that the question of the abolition of purchase was subordinate to the question of Army organization, because, whether purchase existed or not, Army organization must go on; but it would be a considerable step towards that end if the difficulties attending the purchase question were removed by the abolition of the system. It should not be forgotten that there was a continual change going on between the purchase and non-purchase corps—he alluded to officers of the English regiments changing with officers of the Indian Staff Corps, in which purchase did not prevail. The next point—and it was one which he had not yet heard mentioned in the course of this debate—was that the abolition of purchase would tend to abolish extravagance among the officers. It was well known that the mess-room doors of the Army were besieged by Jews and money-lenders, who were the curse of young officers. An officer had told him the other day that a young officer, within three months of receiving his commission, had received 70 applications from money-lenders, offering to lend him money. It was needless to point out that this evil would be put an end to by the abolition of purchase, because while the commission was a saleable property in an officer's hand, he had not only a temptation to procure, but the means also of procuring ready money; and this was shown by the number of retirements by young officers after unreasonably short service. The next reason that weighed with him was, that the abolition of purchase was an act of justice to the non-purchase corps, which represented one-fourth of the whole Army. It frequently happened in non-purchase corps, with one of which he himself was connected, that young cadets who went to the Military Academy, where they failed to pass their examination, and were rejected, afterwards entered purchase corps, and commanded in garrison the very corps they had not been considered fit to enter. Every question of this kind must be brought down to the standard of pounds, shillings, and pence; and though it might be thought worth while to pay £8,000,000 to get rid of the system, hon. Members would very greatly modify their opinions if they found they had to pay something nearer the double of that. It had been stated, from the Treasury Bench, that the cost would not exceed £8,000,000; but now it was stated, by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), that it would take £10,000,000; his own impression was that it would cost nearer £16,000,000. The cost of the abolition of purchase divided itself into two parts—in the first place, the actual money they would have to pay to officers for their commissions; and, in the next, the cost for retirements. By the Duke of Somerset's Commission the value of the commissions was calculated at £7,126,000. He did not think this a fair estimate, for it did not include the over-regulation prices, which amounted to £3,500,000; bringing the total up to £10,500,000. But since the

have voted irrespective of party considerations; but he should vote against the second reading of the Bill, which would not accomplish the object proposed.

VISCOUNT BURY moved that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. GLADSTONE hoped it would not be unreasonable to come to an understanding that, as the Bill would on Thursday have occupied a fortnight of the Session, as far as Government time was concerned, an endeavour should be made to bring the debate to a close on Thursday evening. ["No, no!"] He did not in the least degree complain of the time occupied by the debate, for the subject was new and involved many points; but, at the same time, they must endeavour to confine themselves within some limits.

MR. G. BENTINCK hoped it would be clearly understood that there could be no understanding as to the time when a debate like this was to terminate. The Prime Minister seemed to be under an impression that there were but two Benches in the House—the Ministerial Bench and the front Opposition Bench; but there were 18 other Benches which claimed an equal right to freedom of discussion. There was an old and mischievous practice on the part of the two front Benches, which was called "coming to an understanding," and which amounted to an attempt to suppress all freedom of debate; but in the absence of any good reason for closing this debate on Thursday night, and depriving many hon. Members of the opportunity of speaking, he should enter his protest against any such understanding as had been suggested.

MR. ANDERSON said, that he entirely agreed with what had just fallen from the hon. Gentleman. It was quite impossible to fix any limit to the present debate. They had sat that night for seven hours, but only five or six Gentlemen had spoken, and on the last occasion only three or four spoke. A large number of hon. Gentlemen doubtless wished to take part in the debate, and he, for one, entirely declined to enter into any arrangement for the conclusion of the debate on Thursday night.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 14th March, 1871.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Incorporation of Trustees of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland (41); Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland Regulation (42). Committee—Prayer Book (Tables of Lessons) (29); Benefices Resignation (7-43).

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF IRELAND BILL.

PRIMITIVE WESLEYAN METHODIST SOCIETY OF IRELAND BILL.

(PRIVATE BILLS.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading of these Bills, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that these Bills had been brought in as Private Bills; but it seemed to him that they more properly belonged to Public Bills.

LORD CAIRNS said, he concurred in the objection of the noble Duke; and the noble Viscount (Viscount Eversley), who at present presided over the Committee of that House, had intimated his opinion that there would be great difficulty in proceeding with these measures as Private Bills. He had been communicated with by the promoters, who were anxious to withdraw them as Private Bills. He believed the objects which it was sought to attain were such as would commend themselves to their Lordships; and he therefore proposed that the Bills should be withdrawn and should be re-introduced as Public Bills—with the omission from the second of a scheme of incorporation which appeared objectionable, whether in a public or private measure.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, whose attention had been called at an early date by the noble Viscount who at present acted as Chairman of Committees to the peculiar character of the Bills, concurred in this course. The objects of the measures, with the exception of the scheme of incorporation referred to by his noble and learned Friend, appeared legitimate.

VISCOUNT EVERSLEY said, he was glad the Bills were to be withdrawn in their present shape. Lord Redesdale had had an opportunity of reading them, and was of opinion that they should be Public Bills. His own somewhat lengthened experience in the House of Commons led him to the same conclusion, and he should have felt bound to oppose the measures as Private Bills.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading discharged. Then—

A Bill for the incorporation of the Irish Presbyterian Church Trustees—Was presented by The Lord CAIRNS; read 1^a. (No. 41.)

A Bill to alter and regulate the proceedings and powers of the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland, and for other purposes—Was presented by The Lord CAIRNS; read 1^a. (No. 42.)

BILL.—(No. 29.)
(The Lord Chancellor.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD CAIRNS moved to omit from the Preamble the words—

“And such revised Tables have been considered and approved of by the Convocation of the province of Canterbury, and by a committee of the Convocation of York.”

EARL NELSON said, that last year he could not have supported the Bill had it not been considered by Convocation; but, as it had been so considered, and as the recital was to be omitted, solely on the ground that Convocation had not received the special licence from the Crown necessary to enable them to do so legally, he should not oppose the Amendment. Admitting the impossibility of legislating on the other recommendations of the Ritual Commission, on account of the difference of opinion which prevailed among them on important points, he would suggest that Government might follow the constitutional course by giving Her Majesty's licence to Convocation to consider the Reports of the Commission. There would thus be a chance of divergencies being reconciled, and of some agreement being arrived at as a basis for legislation. It was most desirable that the Government should do what it could to secure unity of feeling. He would remind their Lordships that when, in William III.'s reign, the Government proposed legislation on the Report of a similar Commission, a Resolution was carried in this House affirming that a licence should first be given to Convocation to express its opinion on the subject.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the recital was inserted in conformity with the precedent of 1662; for though in the Act of Uniformity the approval of Convocation was not recited, it was distinctly stated in the Preface to the Prayer Book which that Act stamped with its authority. He did not think a licence from the Crown was necessary in this case, as Convocation passed no Act nor anything that required to be carried into effect, but simply expressed approbation of the Lectionary. To avoid, however, any difference of opinion on the point, he was willing to omit the recital.

LORD CAIRNS said, he would not say whether or not Convocation was justified in expressing an opinion; but, if Parliament thought proper to take notice of anything it had done, care should be taken that such action had been preceded by the usual licence or request from the Crown. In the absence of such a licence or request the recital ought to be omitted.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought Convocation had been rather hardly used. There was much force in his noble and learned Friend's (Lord Cairns') objection; and, as want of time was assigned last Session as the reason for the non-issue of the licence, it would have been only decent this year to issue the licence and obtain the opinion of Convocation in the proper form. The insertion of the recital and then its unceremonious omission would appear an undeserved slight on the clergy, such as would not conduce to the peace of the Church. He hoped that in the event of more important legislation care would be taken to obtain the properly authorized opinion of Convocation.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON also feared that the Amendment would lead to some misunderstanding out-of-doors on the part of persons who looked up to Convocation as the representative of the Church. There was, however, a good deal of force in the objection to the recital in the present case.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON regretted that the opinion of Convocation had not been obtained in the proper way; but hoped it would be distinctly understood that the recital was omitted purely on formal grounds.

Motion agreed to:—Amendment made.

The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

BENEFICES RESIGNATION BILL—(No. 7.)
(The Lord Bishop of Winchester.)
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD ROMILLY, in the absence of the right rev. Prelate who had introduced the Bill (the Bishop of Winchester), moved that the Committee be postponed till Thursday.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

An Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and insert (“on Thursday next.”)

On Question, That (“now”) stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 60; Not-Contents 23: Majority 37.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definitions).

LORD WESTBURY proposed the omission of the words of the sub-section—

“And if in any case it shall, in the opinion of the Bishop, be doubtful what person or persons or corporation ought to act under the provisions of the Act, it shall be lawful for the Governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne to certify in writing under their Seal, the person, persons, or corporation, who ought so to act, and in such case the person, persons, or corporation so certified shall be deemed the patron for all the purposes of this Act; and the said Governors shall in their certificate specify and direct by whom the costs and expenses of and incident to their so certifying shall be paid, and the amount of such costs and expenses shall be recoverable by or for the said Governors as a debt at law or in equity.”

Under this sub-section any noble Lord might be waited upon by a deputy of the Governors and presented with a bill of costs of £120. On asking for an explanation he would be told—“The Bishop received an application for resignation from the incumbent of such and such a parish, and it became his duty to ascertain who was the patron? He looked into the will of your Lordship's father, and thought it doubtful whether the advowson was devised to you or not. He accordingly referred the matter to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; they considered it with great solemnity, and referred it to their solicitor. The solicitor began, more suo, to labour in his vocation—it is no sin for a man to labour in his vocation—and sent the will, with additional notes, to counsel; and the counsel, in his turn, said the point was doubtful. The Governors were eventually pleased to arrive at the conclusion that you were the patron, and out of mere gratitude to them you will, of course, pay this bill of £120.” This might pass sub silentio if the decision was correct; but supposing the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty decided that the wrong man was the patron?—this wrong man paid the bill, and being made owner of the advowson for all the purposes of the Act, he would present the new incumbent. He would have a Parliamentary title to the advowson, to which he had no more right than the man in the moon.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE BISHOP OF LONDON remarked that uncertainty as to the patron for the time being would only arise in exceptional cases, such as joint or alternate patronage, and the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty were accustomed to deal with such cases.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Limitation of Act).

LORD CAIRNS moved an Amendment excluding benefices of under £300 net yearly value from the operation of the Bill. A line ought to be drawn somewhere, for if a retiring pension of a third was charged on a living of £100 a-year, a fit man could not be induced to accept a living thus mulcted. Moreover, in cases where endowments of £200 or £280 had been raised by subscription, the object of the donors would be defeated by the available income being thus diminished. He would not propose a higher limit, as the operation of the Bill might be thereby so restricted as to be useless.

Moved, at end of clause to add ("and shall not apply to any benefice under the net yearly value of £300.")—(The Lord Cairns).

EARL NELSON said, the noble and learned Lord's Amendment, if adopted, would seriously affect the benefits of the Bill. There were three instances within his own knowledge of benefices of which the incomes were below £300 per annum; and in each case it would be greatly to the advantage, not only of the clergyman, but also of the parishioners, that they should come under the operation of the Bill. There was great difficulty in getting a curate in those cases of non-residence such as patrons would like to have in charge of a parish. In one case the clergyman now pays a curate £100 out of an income of less than £300. He would be glad to get away altogether, and it would be for the benefit of the parish that he should do so; but without the security of the permanent payment under this Bill. He was obliged to stay on, though he could do no duty. In the second case, he was able to obtain the services of the son where the clergyman was past duty altogether by being able to promise the son the next appointment. The third case was that of a parish suffering from the non-residence of the clergyman from ill-health. All the vicar got from the living, which contained a population of 1,400 souls, was £60 a-year; and for that he was obliged to keep a curate, and give him the use of the house, and to pay him a salary of £120 per annum. All these cases could be dealt with under the clause as it stood in the Bill. A curate in charge who had no prospect of succeeding to the incumbency was less likely to be zealous in his duties than a new clergyman, who would be the possessor of the benefice, and who would have the full income at the death of the retiring clergyman. Moreover, incapacitated clergymen would frequently be better off if they retired on a pension, than if they remained in the parish and had to keep a curate.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON pointed out that the Bill would not be applied to any living without full inquiry into the circumstances of the case. It would not, therefore, apply to small livings indiscriminately; nor would the pension necessarily amount to a third of the income. He thought, therefore, that no limit need be imposed.

LORD DYNEVOR also opposed the Amendment, as the Bill was not compulsory, but left it optional with the clergyman who felt it difficult, from age or infirmity, to discharge the duties of his benefice, to apply to retire; and it provided for a full inquiry in every case. He knew an instance in which a clergyman would gladly retire on a small pension, as he possessed a small property which would supplement his income, but could not afford to resign without a pension.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the danger was that small livings might be impoverished by being charged with pensions.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the standard proposed by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cairns) was somewhat too high. To take one-third away from a living of £120 might preclude the parishioners from getting a new incumbent. The term "net yearly value" was likely to raise difficulties, and he would suggest that the gross value should be taken.

EARL GREY remarked that a clergyman would gladly take a living at a small remuneration for a time, if he had the certainty of succeeding to the full income on the death of his predecessor, who might be a very old man. The Bishop would use his discretion in every case.

LORD CAIRNS said, he would have been glad if the pension could be charged on some external fund; but as it would be charged on the living, it was due to the parishioners that a small living should not be unduly impoverished, so as not to be worth any competent person's acceptance.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER said, he could not give way upon this point, as it involved the whole principle of the Bill. If the Amendment of the noble and learned Lord were adopted, the very class of persons for whose benefit the Bill was designed would be excluded from its operation. The object of the measure was to allow incumbents of small benefices who could not afford to employ curates to withdraw, upon the understanding of a certain provision being allowed them during their lives. He trusted that their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment. He begged to apologize to the House for not being in his place when the Order of the Day for going into Committee upon the Bill was read; but his absence had been occasioned by unforeseen circumstances connected with his duties.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Exemption from penalties by 31 Eliz., c. 6, 12 Anne, st. 2, c. 12, &c.).

LORD CAIRNS said, that as the clause stood, it did prevent the persons to these arrangements coming under the Acts against simony.

Amendment moved, to leave out Clause 4, and insert

("The sum assigned as a pension to a retiring incumbent under this Act shall not be deemed a pension, sum of money, or benefit within the meaning of the 31st Elizabeth, chap. 6, or the 12th Anne, stat. 2, chap. 12, or any other Act.")
—(The Lord Cairns.)

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER said, he had no objection to offer to the Amendment.

Clause struck out; new clause inserted.

Clause 5 (How the provisions of the Act are to be put into exercise).

LORD CAIRNS moved two Amendments, one requiring that the rector or vicar availing himself of the provisions of the Bill should have held his living not less than 10 years before he was entitled to a pension, and the second providing that age should not be regarded as a sufficient ground for the grant of such pension unless the vicar or rector were 70 years of age. He also thought that it should be mentioned on the face of the Bill that the only grounds on which such a pension could be allowed were those of age, sickness, or other infirmity, whereby the vicar or rector was prevented from discharging with efficiency the duties of his office.

Amendments moved, after ("benefice") insert ("of which he has been the incumbent for not less than ten years"); and in same line leave out ("for the reasons therein stated") and insert

("On the ground that he is above the age of seventy, or, being under that age, that he is incapacitated by permanent mental or bodily infirmity from the performance of his duties.") line 36, after ("him") insert ("upon the truth of the ground alleged and")—

(The Lord Cairns.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON opposed both of the Amendments as interfering with the good working and with the objects of the Bill. With regard to the proposed limit of age, apart from incapacity of any kind, he was rather disposed to strike out age altogether from the Schedule.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER trusted that the first of the noble and learned Lord's Amendments would not be pressed. It was really at variance with the whole principle of the measure. With regard to the second Amendment, he had a great objection to introducing a hard-and-fast line of 70, or any other number of years. The adoption of any limit of age at all exposed them to the charge of giving a retiring allowance to a man who was still capable of performing his duty. It was difficult to fix upon any age at which it could be declared universally that a man was incapable. He wished the provisions of the Bill to apply to clergymen who were really unable, from age, continued sickness, or permanent infirmity, to discharge the duties of their benefices, and not to those who might be just above or below 70, but subject to no incapacity.

LORD WESTBURY drew attention to another defect in the clause. It contained no condition with regard to the private means of the retiring incumbent. A clergyman who was incapacitated by age, sickness, or infirmity might possess, through his wife, or otherwise, a private fortune which would render it altogether unnecessary that he should receive a retiring allowance; and therefore it would be well to give the pensions only in cases where the retiring incumbents had no other adequate means of support. He thought, too, that it would not do to fix upon the age of 70, and to say that when a man had reached that age he was disqualified from further discharge of duty. He thought that to fix the limit of age, and to fix it at 70, would bear against some of his noble and learned Friends who attended to the appellate jurisdiction of their Lordships' House. Moreover, the machinery for carrying out the objects of the Bill was unsuited for its purpose; and he would suggest that a statutory declaration as to his incapacity from the incumbent proposing to retire, supported by the testimony of a certain number of the resident parishioners, should be the preliminary required in these cases, instead of the cumbrous and expensive formal-ties provided by the Bill. If their Lordships approved a more expeditious and economical process for giving effect to the measure, he would prepare a set of provisions with that view, and move them on the Report.

EARL BEAUCHAMP begged their Lordships to confine their attention to one Amendment at a time, and not attempt to discuss miscellaneous suggestions quite irrelevant to the immediate question before them.

EARL STANHOPE hoped that the Amendment of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) would not be pressed.

LORD CAIRNS said, that as to his first Amendment, his object had been rather to elicit the opinion of their Lordships than to go to a Division on a proposal which might not meet with acceptance. With reference to his second Amendment, he proposed to omit all reference to age and make the grounds of resignation dependent on incapacity from mental or bodily infirmity—because if the incumbent were not infirm age would not be a ground of incapacity.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in answer to a suggestion of a noble Lord, that the case of a lunatic clergyman should be included, said, that great difficulty had been experienced in defining what a lunatic was.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn; Then another Amendment proposed and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Who are to be Commissioners).

LORD CAIRNS stated that as the clause was drawn the Bishop might in some cases nominate all the five Commissioners. He therefore proposed that one of them—the magistrate—should be nominated by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and that the clergyman of the same diocese who should act as Commissioner, instead of being nominated by the Bishop at discretion, should be designated in the Bill by these words—

“The incumbent of the adjacent parish, the parish church of which is nearest in a straight line to the church of the benefice the incumbent of which desires to retire.”

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER accepted the first part of the proposal, but could not agree to the latter portion.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, the object of the Amendment seemed to be to assign a geographical qualification for the Commissioners. But the object of the clause was to obtain the assistance of sensible and well-judging men: it was not always the nearest neighbour who was the best qualified, or would like to undertake the duties imposed by this Bill.

Amendment withdrawn.

LORD CAIRNS moved another Amendment, that the magistrate of the county who should nominate one of the Commissioners, should himself be nominated “by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the county or division of the county.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Commissioners may examine on oath. Limitation of Pension).

LORD DYNEVOR said, this clause would be likely to defeat the object of the Bill, because a man would not retire on a small pittance. He hoped their Lordships would deal liberally with the smaller incumbents.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (How vacancy in Commission to be filled) agreed to.

Clause 9 (Who to consent to deed of resignation).

LORD CAIRNS moved to omit the word “gross” and insert “net” in reference to the annual value of the benefice, and said that if the word were retained it would be very inconvenient to a new incumbent.

On Question, to omit (“gross”)? agreed to; word struck out.

LORD CAIRNS said, it would be necessary to add at the end words to this effect—“Provided that no benefice shall at any time be subject to the payment of more than one pension;” otherwise, if the value of the benefice were from any cause reduced, the new incumbent would have to bear the entire loss out of the residue in his hands beyond the amount of the pension.

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 10 & 11 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 12 (Pensioned incumbent amenable to ecclesiastical discipline).

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER moved the insertion of a proviso to the effect that proceedings might be taken against every offending pensioned clerk in the same manner as if he had remained incumbent of the benefice.

Motion agreed to; Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Parsonage house to belong to new incumbent) agreed to.

Clause 14 (Acceptance of other preferment by pensioned incumbent to alter the pension).

Proviso added, giving power to the incumbent of the benefice to give notice to the Bishop that the retired clerk of the said benefice has undertaken clerical duties elsewhere, and has received remuneration for so doing: Whereupon the Bishop, after inquiry, may determine whether the pension to the said retired clerk shall cease, or be diminished, and in what proportion.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Clause 15 struck out.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 43).

House adjourned at a quarter before

METROPOLIS—THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the First Commissioner of Works, What steps have been taken since November 1870 to secure the completion of the Wellington Monument by some sculptor of established eminence?

The Bishop of Winchester

MR. AYRTON said, in reply, that the subject had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government for the purpose of making some arrangement to secure the object mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member. Her Majesty's Government had not yet arrived at any final determination. He was informed that they would do so in the course of a few days, and that the Papers relating to the arrangement would then be laid on the Table of the House.

ADJUSTMENT OF LOCAL BURDENS.

QUESTION.

MR. ACLAND asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When it is probable that the Bill on the adjustment of Local Burdens, referred to in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, will be introduced?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Bill on the adjustment of local burdens—a subject which I think has been completely mastered by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty—will continue to receive his attention, notwithstanding his change of office. With regard to the date of its introduction, I cannot yet name a day until we have read the Army Regulation Bill a second time, and made some progress with the Army Estimates; but it is our confident intention to introduce the Bill on some day before the Easter holidays.

THE INDIA OFFICE MUSEUM.

COLONEL SYKES asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the zoological collections in the India Office Museum will be accessible to zoologists, as it contains types which the progress of zoology renders it desirable to consult; and, when the next sheet of the Indian Atlas will be published, some years having elapsed since the last sheet appeared?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend's first Question, I have to say that the zoological collections belonging to the Secretary of State in Council are, to a certain extent, even now available to men of science, who can readily obtain permission to examine them. They examine them, however, I am sorry to say, under great difficulties, and difficulties of which I do not see the end; for even if the Secretary of State were to erect on his property Street, as he has sometimes sed to do, a building more contain the great museum and rich he possesses than the which they are now stowed away, nearly the whole available space would be occupied by those Indian productions which it is important to bring under the notice of the commercial classes in this country, and pure science would, I fear, come off very badly. In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend's second question, I have to say that the last sheets of the Indian Atlas—or, rather, quarter sheets, seven in number—were published on the 7th of September, 1870, and that another sheet (No. 114), one-half of which is new matter, will be published to-morrow.

COLONEL SYKES asked, Whether the zoological collections were not really boxed up?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes; they are.

ARMY—WEST INDIAN, CAPE MOUNTED, AND CANADIAN RIFLE REGIMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. DEASE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the officers of the recently disbanded West Indian, Cape Mounted, and Royal Canadian Rifle Regiments, compulsorily placed on half-pay, and who may be desirous of retiring from the service, will receive the over-regulation sums current in their late regiments, and which they would have obtained had their regiments not been disbanded?

SIR HENRY STORKS: In the unavoidable absence of the Secretary of State for War, I will, with the permission of the House, answer the Question that has been just put. The over-regulation price is given by the Bill to those officers who would receive it if the Bill did not pass. Every case will be decided by the Commissioners.

CASE OF THE "EPAMINONDAS."

QUESTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the committal to prison for three months by the magistrates of South Shields, on Wednesday last, of ten seamen for refusing to proceed to Genoa in the "Epaminondas," alleged by them to be unseaworthy, and admitted by the second mate to be making two and a-half inches of water per hour; whether it is true, as alleged, that the "Epaminondas" had grounded twice before sailing, after being loaded, requiring on the first occasion the assistance of three steam-tugs to get her off; whether it is true, as alleged, that the magistrates refused the application made on behalf of the men that the hearing should be postponed a day to enable them to obtain legal assistance; and, whether, if the facts are as stated in the Shields Paper, it is his intention to direct a re-hearing of the case?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that as the Question had been put on the Paper only that morning, it was quite impossible for him to communicate with the magistrates; but if the Question were postponed he should be happy, to put the House in possession of the answer he might receive.

EXPLOSION AT THE SOUTH WALES COLLIERY.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the Coroner's Inquest, which commenced on the 5th instant and is now proceeding, to inquire into the death of Frances Bendall, caused by a Colliery explosion, which took place on the 20th February last at the South Wales Colliery, Cwmtilly near Newport, South Wales; and, if so, whether he has been informed of the fact that the Coroner before whom the said inquest is being held is a shareholder in the said Colliery Company; and whether he has taken, or is prepared to take, any steps to prevent so irregular a proceeding?

MR. BRUCE said, in reply, that he had received a letter complaining of the conduct of a coroner who was at that moment conducting an inquest into a matter in which he was said to be personally interested. The answer that he had given was that he had no power to prevent a coroner from holding an inquest, and that any complaint of improper conduct should be brought under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, who had power to remove him if he thought proper. He (Mr. Bruce) might add that, in his opinion, wherever a coroner was personally interested in an inquiry over which he presided—he was not prepared to say it was so in the present case—it was his duty to appoint a deputy.

IRELAND—OUTRAGE IN MAYO. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON - DAMER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question, of which he had given private Notice, Whether, in consequence of the murder which was committed in the County of Mayo on Saturday last, and the Ribandism prevailing in that county, the Government are prepared to move that it be an Instruction to the Westmeath Committee to consider the state of the County of Mayo also?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Government have at present formed no intention of extending the scope of the inquiry of the Committee. It is quite true that this morning we received a Report of a very horrible, and, I fear, fatal outrage in the county of Mayo; but under any circumstances that particular outrage could not properly form part of the subject of the inquiry by the Committee, inasmuch as it may, and I hope will, become the subject of a judicial inquiry. With regard to the county of Mayo itself, I may state that though outrages have not entirely ceased, still there has been a very great and satisfactory improvement in its general condition. That improvement was alluded to by the Judge in his recent charge to the Grand Jury. Under the circumstances I do not see any reason at present for including the county of Mayo within the scope of the Westmeath Committee.

CONDUCT OF WAR ON LAND. QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to put a Question to the hon. Member for East Surrey with regard to his Notice of Motion as to the rules for the conduct of War on Land. As it refers particularly to a proceeding which my hon. Friend wishes to urge upon the Government, I am bound to say I do not think it would be possible at this moment, when two of the greatest Powers of Europe are about to engage in negotiations for the settlement of definitive terms of peace, even if all difficulties were removed out of the way, for Her Majesty's Government to take any such step as my hon. Friend has in view. Though the question of the rules of war by land is one not unfitted to be introduced to the notice of the House at a seasonable time, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that, founded as it probably would be at this moment on the recital of facts which might be very much contested, and which would be of a character very difficult to handle without giving pain or offence on one side or on both, such a discussion might be somewhat prejudicial to the cause my hon. Friend has at heart?

MR. BUXTON said, he could not think of refusing to accede to the wish of the right hon. Gentleman. He would therefore postpone the Motion until after Easter. The subject was one of the greatest importance, and he fully intended to take the greatest care in handling it.

THE MAGISTRATES OF PERSHORE. QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he had put into the hands of the Home Secretary a Letter from one who was present on the occasion of the trial, and had seen the depositions, and given a very different account from that furnished to the right hon. Gentleman. He wished now to ask, Whether the right hon. Gentleman would cause further inquiry to be made into the facts?

MR. BRUCE replied that he should be very happy to cause further inquiry to be made if it would lead to any satisfactory result. But though the accuracy of his Answer the other evening had, in some particulars, been questioned, the substance of it had not—namely, that the woman pleaded “Guilty” to a charge of stealing faggots, that one of the witnesses stated that he had heard her say that she had stolen more on the previous night, and that the magistrates had passed a sentence upon her of seven days’ imprisonment. The only course which he could take with respect to the magistrates, if he considered their conduct unworthy of their position, would be to report them to the Lord Chancellor, and ask to have them removed from the commission of the peace. He did not think the facts would justify any such proceeding.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. LAMBERT, in rising to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Salaries and Emoluments of Offices held during the pleasure of the Crown by Members of either House of Parliament voted in the annual Estimates, said, the House would recollect that last Session he brought forward a Motion touching the salary of the First Minister of the Crown, which he withdrew after consideration, thinking it would be better to move for an Inquiry into Official Salaries generally, and also for other reasons, which he need not enter into. At the time he withdrew it, he gave Notice that he would, at the earliest opportunity this Session, move for a Committee to inquire into Official Salaries. The Motion was now before the House. His reasons for bringing it forward were short and simple, and he would not take up the time of the House with lengthy statistics. The first reason he should give was, that there had been no inquiry into the subject for 20 years, when there was a Select Committee in 1850. There was an inquiry previous to that by a Committee in 1830, 20 years anterior, when, by their recommendations, salaries were materially reduced, and had, with little alteration, remained at that reduction until the present time—exactly 40 years. To show this, he must give the House a few figures, with some of the leading salaries during that period. In 1830 the salaries were—for the office of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, then united, £10,400; for the Home Office, £6,000; for the Foreign Office, £6,000; for the Colonial Office, £6,000. In 1850, the offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer were separated, each having £5,000 a-year. The salary for the Home Office was reduced to £5,000, as were also the salaries for the Foreign and Colonial Offices. In 1870 the salaries of those officers remained the same. Whilst the salaries had remained stationary during the 40 years, the country had not been standing still; it had been increasing in wealth and prosperity in a manner truly astonishing. The Revenue had increased from £50,933,000 in 1831 net to £75,674,000 net in 1870, and the population from 24,392,000 in 1831 to 30,964,000 in 1871, estimating the decade 1861 to 1871 at the same rate of increase as the three previous decades—that is, about 7,000,000 in the 40 years, and this notwithstanding the large emigration which had taken place. As the wealth and prosperity of the country had increased, there could be no doubt that the duties and responsibilities of the holders of these salaries had also considerably increased; while, at the same time, the expenses of living had largely increased during the 40 years. Hence, the necessity for some inquiry into the subject. He proposed that the inquiry of the Committee be limited to the Salaries and Emoluments of Offices held during the pleasure of the Crown by Members of either House of Parliament, voted in the annual Estimates. He withdrew the latter part of his Motion—namely, and also the Salaries and Emoluments of Judicial Offices in the Superior Courts of Law and Equity in the United Kingdom, and into the Retiring Pensions allotted to Judges—as a Judicature Commission was now sitting, and it was unnecessary to have two inquiries on the same subject. With the permission of the House, he would read a Minute from the Report of the Committee of 1830 on this subject, which very clearly defined the principle which should be acted upon in fixing the amount of salary of public officers. The Select Committee of 1830 stated, at page 447—

“It is impossible not to recognize in its fullest extent the principle that the people have a right to have their service done at the smallest possible expense consistent with its efficient performance. In short, all the Departments of Government should be watched with the same view to economy in general which any individual would apply to the management of his own affairs. No consideration of mere money can be set in competition with the paramount evident necessity of securing for offices of great trust and confidence the highest class of intelligence and integrity. It has been frequently observed—and the observation being founded on truth and reason should never be lost sight of, that offices in a free country should not be put beyond the means of men of moderate fortunes. If salaries should be fixed too low a monopoly would be created in the hands of the wealthy, the power of selection by the Crown would be most injuriously restricted, and the public would be deprived of the services of men of limited means, educated with a view to the pursuit of liberal professions, a class furnishing more than any other the talents and industry suited to official life. It should further be considered that the higher offices of Government require an entire devotion of the whole time and attention of those who fill them; that their own private affairs must necessarily be neglected, and that, if care should be taken, on the one hand, to avoid the scandal of private fortunes amassed at the public expense, it is neither for the interest nor the honour of the country, on the other hand, that they should be ruined in its service."

He thought that some of the present salaries were too low—some might be too high. He would not trouble the House by going into the details of salaries, for that would be the duty of the Committee, should the House please to appoint it. To bear out his views he must take one single case, and he thought he could not do better than take that which was first on the list—that of the First Minister of the Crown, which was £5,000 per annum. He had been long enough in that House to see and appreciate the calls on the mental and physical powers of the First Minister of the Crown. Holding the highest official appointment under the Crown, he was the leading man in the country, and must have the greatest ability and judgment to manage the affairs of this great nation. The grave responsibility of the office was only equalled by the work it entailed. In the House of Commons, whether it was during the day, at midnight, or the small hours in the morning, there he must be either answering Questions or watching or taking part in the debates. His duties did not cease when he left the House, or when Parliament was not sitting, and his labours and responsibilities were, perhaps, the greatest that could fall to the lot of any man, whether it were the right hon. Gentleman he sat near, or the right hon. Gentleman, his Colleague, the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) who sat opposite to him. It was pretty well admitted that the sum of £5,000 was quite an inadequate remuneration for the heavy work and expenses attached to the office of Prime Minister. He, moreover, suffered indirectly by having no time to devote to his private affairs. He believed that the position of Prime Minister of this country was almost open to any individual in it who had great ability, industry, judgment, and perseverance. If, however, he should arrive at this distinguished position, he might find that the expense attached to it, if he should not have a good private fortune, so far exceed the allowance that he might be ruined by it. With the permission of the House he would now read some Minutes of Evidence of the Committee of 1850, and there had been no inquiry into the subject since. Sir Robert Peel, in his evidence before that Committee, said—

"In 1830 it was proposed by the Committee of that year that, when the two offices of First Lord and Chancellor of the Exchequer were united, there should be a saving in the double salary of £2,500—that is to say, that the person holding the two offices together should receive £7,500 a-year; and, in consequence of that suggestion of the Committee, I received at the rate of £7,500 a-year during the period I held office. When re-appointed to office, in 1841, I determined not to undertake the double duties after my experience of them in 1834-5. The salaries of the Secretaries of State were formerly £6,000; they were reduced in 1830 to £5,000 a-year."

In reply to the Chairman, he added—

"Lord North, Mr. Pitt, and Lord Liverpool, when Prime Ministers, held also the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. I believe that in 1780 the emoluments of Lord North as Prime Minister were not less than £10,400 a-year. Those emoluments and advantages have ceased."

The patronage of the Prime Minister did not in the slightest diminish the personal expenditure. He did not deny the extent of the power or value of patronage; but he did not think they ought to be considered as equivalents for salary. A salary sufficient to enable the holder of it to maintain his office with a certain degree of dignity ought to be attached to it. Again, Lord John Russell said—

"The general principle to be kept in view certainly is that you should not narrow too much your choice of public servants. If you say you will not give a salary which shall be sufficient without the possession of a very considerable private fortune, of course you limit the choice of the most important public servants to men who have good private fortunes. I know, for my own part, I never had a debt in my life until I was First Lord of the Treasury. I have now paid it off. But it is necessary to make some outlay in taking one of these great offices unless you have large private fortune. Question.—Is it within your Lordship's knowledge that several persons have suffered materially in their private fortunes by holding office, even those who have held office for many years? Answer.—I believe that certainly is the case, and I believe that every man who has been in public office would say that it is impossible to pay the same attention to your private affairs when you are holding political office, and in consequence of that I believe it is that many persons have found their private affairs much injured. One can well understand if a man is extravagant and is high in office that he may get into great difficulties; but men who do not seem to have any taste for extravagant expenses have injured their private fortunes. Question.—With respect to the whole of those First Lords of the Treasury whom your Lordship has now enumerated, with the exception of those who had large private estates, is it not a matter of notoriety that they all died in debt? Answer.—I believe that to be the case.

He would ask the House if there was any ground to show that the salary of the Prime Minister should be so much less now than it was in the time of Lord Liverpool, Lord North, and Mr. Pitt, when it was £10,400 per annum? On the contrary, the duties of the office had increased with the increase of the population of this great country, and the expense of living had very much increased, as he had already shown. The following was a list of the highest judicial salaries and the annuities attached to them. Judicial salaries paid out of the Consolidated Fund — Lord Chancellor, including £4,000 as Speaker of the House of Lords, £10,000; two Judges of Appeal in Chancery, each £6,000; Master of the Rolls, £6,000; Chief Justice, Queen's Bench, £8,000; Chief Justice, Common Pleas, £7,000; Lord Chief Baron, Court of Exchequer, £7,000; total of the seven salaries, £50,000. The following annuities were paid from the Consolidated Fund for life, on retiring from office, in 1870:— Lord Chancellor, four receiving £5,000; Lord Justice of Appeal in Chancery, £3,750; Lord Chief Baron, Court of Exchequer, £3,750; Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas, £3,750; Puisne Judge, Queen's Bench, two receiving £3,500; Puisne Judge, Common Pleas, £3,500; Vice Chancellor, £3,500; total annual payment of these annuities, £41,750. He now came to the list of official salaries, and he found them to be as follows:—First Lord of Treasury and Chancellor of Exchequer, united, 1830, £10,400; First Lord of Treasury, 1850, £5,000; 1871, £5,000; Chancellor of Exchequer, 1850, £5,000; 1871, £5,000; Secretary of Home Office, 1830, £6,000; 1850, £5,000; 1871, £5,000; Secretary of Foreign Office, 1830, £6,000; 1850, £5,000; 1871, £5,000; Secretary of Colonial Office, 1830, £6,000; 1850, £5,000; 1871, £5,000. Attached to these offices was a first-class pension not exceeding £2,000 per annum, in respect of a service of not less than four years. Nothing could be further from his intention than to imply that the eminent men who held judicial offices were over-paid; but what he contended was that the Prime Minister, with a less salary than any of those he had named, was under-paid. The sum of £5,000 per year was quite out of character with the duties of the leading man in this country, which far exceeded those of anyone in importance and responsibility. He maintained that the dignity and independence of the office very much depended on the amount of remuneration, and if that were insufficient the Prime Minister might be embarrassed with financial difficulties which would, to a certain extent, interfere with the efficient performance of the duties of the office. Many with whom he had spoken, both in and out of this House, had strongly expressed their opinion that the salary of the Prime Minister was too low, and that as his was the highest official position in the country, it ought to have a high official salary attached to it. He believed it was very far from the wish of this House and of the people of this great nation that our leading public men, on whom the very welfare of the country so much depended, and of whom we were so justly proud, should be inadequately remunerated for their services. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Motion.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Motion because he thought it desirable that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the matter. He argued that some of the salaries paid to our Ministers were less than they should be; and if this were found to be the case, it would be unworthy of a great country like this to continue to underpay them. It might be shown that some of our Ministers—the Law Officers, for instance—were overpaid as well as underpaid; and he thought some information might be obtained which would be well worthy the attention of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Salaries and Emoluments of Offices held during the pleasure of the Crown by Members of either House of Parliament voted in the annual Estimates,”—(Mr. Lambert.)

MR. FAWCETT said, he hoped the Committee would be appointed. The economical question was, perhaps, that of the least importance in this inquiry; but the Committee might inquire whether salaries might not be reduced as well as increased, and whether some offices might not with advantage be abolished. Considering that this was an era of excessive expenditure, he hoped the result of the investigation of the Committee would be that if they did not recommend a reduction of the annual charge, they would not recommend an increase. He thought the opportunity might be afforded of carrying out an administrative reform of greater importance than saving a few thousands a-year. In his opinion the time had come when the salaries of all the higher officers of State should be reviewed, from this point of view, that the heads of all the Departments should be placed in a position of exact equality. Nothing was more improper or anomalous than that the President of the Poor Law Board should receive only £2,000 a-year, whilst the Secretary for the Colonies received £5,000 a-year. If the President of the Poor Law Board was sufficiently paid, the Secretary for the Colonies was enormously overpaid. If the Secretary for the Colonies was only sufficiently paid, then the President of the Poor Law Board was, to a corresponding extent, underpaid. At the present moment no Department of the State was more important, and none better tested the qualities of a statesman, than that of the President of the Poor Law Board. Not only ought he to be an accomplished financier, but to be master of the most abstruse principles of economic science. Yet the Presidency of the Poor Law Board was considered a comparatively inferior position to that of Colonial Secretary. The consequence was that if the President of the Poor Law Board, having a salary of only £2,000, did his work well, before he had been in office a couple of years he established a claim for promotion, and was removed to another office, however great the disadvantage to the administration of the Poor Law. A practical illustration of this system had just occurred. There was nothing he regretted more deeply than the removal of the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) from the Poor Law Board. He was doing his work with great distinction. Had he been allowed to remain there two years longer he would probably have grappled effectually with the great problem of pauperism, and in the diminution of pauperism the country would have seen the advantage of his remaining in that office. Having, however, distinguished himself greatly in office, it was felt that he had a claim for promotion, and that it would be ungenerous to place a man over his head in the Cabinet. Now, if all the heads of Departments were equally paid, whether by £3,000, £4,000, or £5,000 a-year, all taking the same rank, and being, perhaps, called Secretary of State, the public service would not suffer as it now did from these constant and repeated removals. He had been told that, considering the great variety of complicated problems in the Poor Law Office and the intricate questions of administrative details arising there, it was impossible for any Minister to learn his work well, and get a sufficient grasp of the cases with which he had to deal, in less than one and a-half or two years. But the right hon. Member (Mr. G. Hardy), who gained a great reputation at the head of the Poor Law Board, and was carrying through many most useful reforms, was taken from the Department and made Home Secretary; and the Department had been sacrificed in just the same way now; so that if the head of the Poor Law Board showed himself an efficient administrator, the Board lost the value of his services.

MR. RATHBONE said, he was glad the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) had given the debate this turn. He (Mr. Rathbone) thought the system of treating some of the most important Departments of the State as stepping-stones to other Departments most fatal to the good management of the affairs of the country. If the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) had remained at the Poor Law Board it could hardly be doubted that there would have been an entire reform in the Poor Law system years ago. When a similar result was expected from the experience of the late President (Mr. Goschen) the country was again disappointed, for he had been removed to a Department in which all his experience would be of no use, and his place had been supplied by a Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) who had displayed the highest abilities, but his experience had been gained in other Departments, and perhaps one of his greatest successes was in the Department of the Admiralty, to which the late President of the Poor Law Board had been transferred. There was a fear—he might almost say a terror—throughout the country lest the Vice President of the Committee of Council should be promoted during the recent changes, and the country lose the benefit of his services at the Education Office. Last year the right hon. Member for Bradford carried a Bill for national education, which was by no means satisfactory to many of his supporters; but perhaps the most distinguishing feature of that measure was that it gave the Minister for Education enormous and despotic powers for carrying it out. But those powers were given, in a great degree, from the reliance on the idea that the right hon. Gentleman would himself carry out the provisions of the Bill. Under these circumstances, he thought that the expectations of the country would have been accomplished if the Education Department had been made into a first-class Department, and if the right hon. Member for Bradford had been placed at the head of it. He did not look upon these matters as being the fault of the Government, or, indeed, of any Government—it was the system that was to blame. It was easy to tell a private Member who called attention to the subject that there were admirable reasons for certain official changes; but it was impossible to persuade the country, so long as these anomalies existed, that promotion most advantageous to the public service was not frequently interfered with by Ministerial etiquette.

MR. G. BENTINCK said, he had listened with some surprise to the proposal and the remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lambert) who brought forward the present Motion. He had always understood that the policy of the great Liberal party was a policy of economy and retrenchment; but what had happened? Simply this, that proposals were made every day from the Liberal side of the House involving additions to the expenditure of millions one day, and at another time, as for instance to-day, of only thousands. There seemed to be a constant wish on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to incur during this present spring a vast additional expenditure of public money; but he should have thought that these Gentlemen could hardly reconcile such proposals with the speeches which he had heard them make. The hon. Member who brought the Motion forward quoted certain figures with certain dates, and stated that the salaries of the higher Officers of State had remained stationary, while the wealth of the country had greatly increased. But had he shown that there had been any increase in the value of the services rendered by those Officers of State? He (Mr. G. Bentinck) would like to have some assurance on that point, for he thought there had been a great decrease in the value of the services to the public. [MR. GLADSTONE: In quantity?] No; the right hon. Gentleman was quite right. The quantity was enormous; but the services had deteriorated in quality. And he therefore could see no reason for augmenting the salaries of the Officers of State. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lambert) had spoken of the enormous calls which were made on the physical powers of those officers; but he had made no distinction between those cases in which the affairs of the country were well managed and those in which they were mismanaged. Were they to increase the salaries of those who mismanaged the affairs of the country, and who could only claim a higher remuneration for doing mischief? Was that Liberal economy, and was that the way in which the affairs of the country were to be conducted in future? He believed that if the Committee now asked for were to be appointed the result would be that they would have to report to the House that on various considerations, some of which he had indicated, there ought to be a considerable reduction in the salaries of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen.

MR. MUNDELLA thanked the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) for having raised the present discussion. He (Mr. Mundella) believed that many of the recent Ministerial changes had been of an undesirable character, not through the fault of the Government, but, as the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) had said, through the fault of the system. In several of the recent changes it was felt by many people that the round men had been put into the square holes, and the square men into the round holes, and he, for one, regretted that, as an absolute calamity. His right hon. Friend the late President (Mr. Goschen) had been removed, for instance, from an office which he filled with great ability to another of greater dignity and honour. He might discharge its duties with equal ability; but it was a matter of regret that he had been removed from an office in which he had experience, and the duties of which he performed with satisfaction. But there was another case in respect to which he was more qualified to speak, and that was as to the changes at the Board of Trade. His constituents in the Chamber of Commerce at Sheffield wished to understand the meaning of those changes, and they asked where, now, was their Trades Marks Bill? The late Secretary to the Board of Trade took two years to study that matter, and made himself thoroughly master of it; and now, in consequence of these changes, there was no prospect of a Trades Marks Bill in the present year, or in the next. He complained of the system and not of any men who might be put into places for which they were not qualified by any previous experience.

MR. GLADSTONE. Although this discussion has been a short one, yet it has covered a rather wide field, and has deviated from an argument upon the expediency of appointing a Committee on Official Salaries into a discussion upon the principle upon which appointments are commonly made in the Government of the country, and upon such appointment as have recently taken place. It will therefore be necessary for me to notice both those subjects. With regard to the question of the Committee, I am bound to say that although I ought to approach it with some natural interest in favour of the Motion, I cannot think that the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Lambert) has made out a case. It seems to me that he evidently contemplated the augmentation of salaries. I thank him for the liberal disposition which pervaded his remarks, and for the manner in which he was disposed to point those remarks to the office which I have the honour to hold; but it is my distinct opinion, quite apart from any question of precise regularity in the adjustment of salaries, there is no case for an augmentation of the salary of that office. I believe that during the whole of my political life all my activity in the matter of salaries has been directed to cutting them down, and not to raising them, in the case of other people, and if I did not hold the opinion which I do hold as to the sufficiency of my own salary, it would come with a very bad grace from me to give the least countenance to any proposal whatever which contemplated the augmentation of that salary, for there would be a loss of credit and authority in attempting to apply principles of public thrift to other persons such as it would be difficult to estimate. But apart from the question of the augmentation of salaries, on which ground we should principally found our attempt to dissuade the House from pressing for this Committee, other topics have been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), and other hon. Gentlemen. The hon. Member for Liverpool has said very kindly that he does not blame one Government more than another; but I want to know whether any Government is to blame in the matter at all? He says the system is to blame; but I deny it. What is the system upon which promotions within the sphere of Government are conducted? I can speak for myself and for others so far as I have watched them, and I say that on all occasions they may err by the infirmity of their own judgment, but not by the adoption of a bad system, for the system is to choose for every place that man who, upon the whole, is the fittest to go into it. My hon. Friend says some one acquires experience in a particular Department, and that he ought to be continued in that Department. Now, I have heard much lately about the regimental system; but we should have the regimental system with a vengeance if we are to be told that a man, having acquired experience in a particular Department, must always remain there whatever change of office may occur. No doubt there will be men with specialities who will have accurately got up the traditions of particular Departments; but I affirm that, although there is inconvenience for the moment in a transfer, still if you want to have statesmen, responsible as Members of the Cabinet for the whole of the affairs of this country, you must encounter that inconvenience and not hesitate in removing them from Department to Department, always being guided by the consideration which, upon the whole, is the best for the public service. I affirm, Sir, that the question of etiquette which has been supposed to intervene was never dreamt of in the matter, not even the just claims of promotion to which my hon. Friend alluded, and which the late President of the Poor Law Board never once thought of urging, but simply the consideration what, on the whole, would be best for the public interest has been the motive which has guided all these changes. But the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) made a particular charge. Now, I ask him whether it is worthy of the equitable spirit which on every other occasion I have seen him display in this House to bring the charge he has done with reference to the Presidency of the Board of Trade, and to sustain that charge by the fact that since the change he had heard nothing of the Trades Marks Bill?

MR. MUNDELLA: I did not say so. I said my constituency had complained of the want of a Trades Marks Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: And that complaint has been made on the accession of my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. C. Fortescue) to the Presidency of the Board of Trade? Now, I ask my hon. Friend whether he marked the course of my right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland during the last Session of Parliament throughout the discussion of the Irish Land Bill, and, if he did, if he approved the discretion, the ability, the consideration, the firmness with which my right hon. Friend conducted himself throughout those difficult discussions—I ask him whether it is really rational to suppose that the capacity of my right hon. Friend is unequal to the task of dealing with a Trades Marks Bill? Why is this question to be brought up in the third or fourth week of the Session? Who has asked for the Trades Marks Bill? Where was it all last year? The Under Secretary for the Home Department said, my hon. Friend, took up the question, and prosecuted it with that indomitable energy which belongs to him. [MR. MUNDELLA: I said, had mastered the question.] Well, mastered the question, and my hon. Friend spoke of the energy of the Under Secretary for the Home Department, which I admire as much as he does; but the Trades Marks Bill was never heard of before last year, and if the Trades Marks Bill was allowed to sleep during the whole of the last Session of Parliament, is it not a gross injustice to the present President of the Board of Trade to put this forward as a proof that he is unfit for the head of that Department? The truth is that in these appointments one important element is fitness for the prosecution and care of the Department; but it is oftentimes necessary to take into view other considerations which dictate changes as upon the whole desirable that in that particular point of view would not be desirable. It is very easy to criticize frequent changes of Office in a Government which involve undoubtedly the frequent severance of men from the experience they have gained; but I ask those who make them to recollect the peculiar, painful, and, as far as my recollection goes, unexampled circumstances in which the present Government has been placed. During the course of nearly 40 years I can remember no case in which, separately, and one by one, over the short period of eight months, three of the most important Members of the Government have been struck down either by death or by illness. Each of those changes, in cases so important, in offices so high, necessarily entailed many other changes; and, I am not ashamed to say—justice requires it of me—considerably impoverished the resources with which the Government was originally formed. It was not therefore to be supposed that we could, in every case, fill up the gaps and join together the openings made in the Government by losses so severe, occurring at short intervals one after another under circumstances of that nature. These were not like the changes made in a Cabinet when a political schism has occurred. When such a schism occurs, the whole has to be dealt with at once, and large allowances are necessarily made for the manner in which it may be dealt with. But these changes have been successive, one after another, after a very short interval, one not connected with another, and they have unitedly created very considerable difficulty in meeting the case thus presented to view. But with respect to the appointments made—and I do not pretend to claim for the present Government any freedom from error in the judgments arrived at—they have been dictated by the same considerations which have governed the general appointments—namely, the desire to make those appointments which, on the whole, would most conduce to the benefit of the public service. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) gave an opinion which in a certain degree I am disposed to contest and to qualify. He appeared to think that there is much that is anomalous and unjust in the present distribution of official salaries. I am not prepared to make that admission. I own it is very difficult to make the distribution of official salaries perfectly just as between the different offices, even at one given moment of time; but it is still more difficult to make it perfectly just if it is not subject to change. It is impossible as among different offices at different periods of time, and for this reason, that the relative importance of different offices varies very considerably with circumstances. For example, reference has been made to the office of my right hon. Friend the Vice President of Council for Education. That is an office which has been constantly growing till it has reached to such a height of importance that if its importance, measured by responsibility and duty, is found to continue, it may be very natural and proper that Parliament should pay attention to the re-arrangement of that office. But in many cases there is an opposite process. Take, as one particular instance, the Presidency of the Poor Law Board. That must at all times be an important office; but it would be a great mistake to suppose that, under ordinary circumstances, it is of primary rank and responsibility. The energy and capacity of the late President (Mr. Goschen) happened to concur with a temporary exigency for dealing with that great and complicated knot of questions generally indicated by the adjustment of local taxation; and it would be difficult to overrate either the labours or responsibility attaching to that office during the time my right hon. Friend was President. But these things vary from period to period. Even the Secretaryships of State have varied very greatly in our recollections. I remember when the Colonial ranked above the Home and even the Foreign Department in difficulty and responsibility; but, on the whole, the distribution of the salaries in high political offices may justly be affirmed to correspond with what good sense would dictate. The highest paid offices are likewise almost invariably the most laborious and the most difficult and responsible, and those which are less highly paid are in ordinary times and circumstances offices of a smaller degree of responsibility, and if a change occurs in the character and scale of an office you ought to take care that that has become a permanent, normal, and established fact before you make any great change in the Department. These are general considerations applicable to this question, and I would ask my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield not to be so rapid in his conclusions founded on the Trades Marks Bill, but to give time and opportunity to the President of the Board of Trade, and that others may do the same in other cases. In that case I feel satisfied there will be no reason to complain of either want of disposition or want of capacity on the part of the holder of that office to discharge every duty attached to it. With regard to the immediate Motion, if the discussion had taken the turn of jealous inquisition into the emoluments of the Government, and a menacing attempt to effect sweeping reductions, we should have felt great difficulty in damping the energy and courage of the House of Commons in that direction; but as a different tone has prevailed, and as, upon the whole, the proposed Committee would rather tend to disturb the nerves of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is the guardian of the public purse, than to serve any other purpose, I hope my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to ask for the expression of the opinion of the House upon his Motion.

MR. HERMON observed that some hon. Members had complained that the Trades Marks Bill had been lost sight of by the Board of Trade. For his own part, he hoped they would never see that measure again. It was clear the late President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Bright) did not approve it, for, had he done so, he had plenty of time to push it forward; and if, as had been remarked, it had been received with coldness, that was nothing more than it deserved, for a measure demanded more thought and adaptation to the circumstances of the case than were shown by that Bill. It would have plunged the commercial interests of the country into more litigation than any Bill ever introduced into the House. He hoped that any Bill which might in future be introduced on the subject would be of a different character.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had not exhibited so much moral courage as he might have been credited with, for no proposal would come with a bad grace from him which was consistent with abstract right and justice, and he would set a good example by advocating what ought to be rather than by defending that which is. He was of opinion that the Prime Minister deserved a much higher salary than he now received, and it was hardly fair to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that a proposal to increase that salary would disturb his equanimity, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be quite prepared to pay for efficiency. The democratic party in the House stood in their own light in this matter, as it was their policy to pay for services their proper value. The higher offices were practically closed against men without private means, who had not the chance of training themselves for these offices, for the sons of the aristocracy, sometimes very common-place men, took the lower grades of office, and being supposed to be fit to hold them because they could fold and docket papers and tie them up with red tape, were advanced without due regard to the higher qualities of statesmanship. If we wanted these higher qualities we must pay for them; if we wanted to get skill and aptitude and to have work well done we must pay people well. Earl Russell never found himself burdened until he became Prime Minister, and then he was oppressed with the demands that were made upon him on all sides. As no one without a fortune could take the office the salary ought to be increased.

MR. LIDDELL said, he was of opinion that the high officers of the State were indifferently paid, and he would like to see a Committee appointed to overhaul salaries and make such augmentations as were demanded by increase of labour. In addition to the performance of their heavy public labours, these gentlemen were required to discharge social duties, in consideration of which he thought separate salaries should be allowed. The right hon. Gentleman had raised the question of appointments, and in alluding to that subject it was impossible to keep out of view some of the recent appointments which had been made. As an independent Member of the House he had seen those appointments with regret; and he was convinced that more attention ought to be paid to the previous training of public servants placed in the great Departments of the State. The interests of the Army and Navy of England were too important to be trifled with; and the country would not be satisfied with the removal of a Minister from a sphere in which he had rendered eminent services, and transferred to an office for which he had received no training whatever. When such a change was made, a right hon. Gentleman had to go through a process of cramming in order to become acquainted with his new Department, which must, at all events, be prejudiced during the time thus spent in the education of the Minister. In the administration of naval and military affairs all the experience that could be obtained ought to be placed at the service of the country.

MR. WHITE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Lambert) would withdraw his Motion. A man would be out of his senses if he entered upon public life with a view of making his livelihood out of it; and, indeed, it would be a calamity if there were a class of men who devoted themselves to public life with that object in view. Hitherto high public offices had been in this country generally held by men who, in seeking them, were not animated by such considerations. What had been said about the social duties of a Minister reminded him of what was stated by Sir Hamilton Seymour before the Select Committee on Official Salaries of 1850. In reply to the Chairman, he said—

“I consider the giving of dinners an essential part of diplomacy; I have no hesitation in saying so. I have no idea of a man being a good diplomatist who does not give good dinners.”

From what had been said by the last speaker it would seem that a man could not be a good Minister unless he gave good dinners. He believed, however, that the country would be better satisfied with a Minister who gave good measures. There had been undue reserve in debating this question, for they all knew that the Prime Minister got only £5,000 a-year; but the late Sir Robert Peel stated something more which had not been mentioned—namely, that if a Prime Minister had relatives who were qualified, he could give them appointments in Church and State, and that patronage he (Mr. White) thought was a main ingredient in this question of Official Salaries. If a Prime Minister had relations whom he deemed qualified to perform clerical or civil duties, on what grounds, it was asked, ought they to be shut out from holding such offices. The late Sir Robert Peel, in his examination before the Select Committee on Official Salaries in 1850, said—

“It generally has happened that a Minister has appointed some of his relations to some offices or other for which he conceived they were qualified ;”

and he admitted, in reply to Mr. Cobden, that “immense power,” was in the hands of the Prime Minister, and the patronage to which he was directly or indirectly entitled amounted to several hundred thousands a-year. This patronage was an essential element which must not be overlooked in the consideration of this question. He hoped the hon. Member would not persevere with his Motion, against which the Prime Minister had protested, for it was singularly ill-timed, especially as the Government had been lately reducing its employés of the humbler class.

MR. LAMBERT said, he had not heard anything to change his views, and he could not, therefore, withdraw the Motion which he had brought before the House.

Question put, and negatived.

POST OFFICE—(SMALL PARCELS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. GRAVES, in rising to move the following Resolutions :—

“1. That it is desirable to restore and extend those facilities for the transmission of Small Parcels by Post which the public enjoyed prior to the 1st day of October 1870. 2. That it is desirable to increase the number of Money Order Offices, especially in the rural districts, and to amend the rates charged for the transmission of Money Orders by establishing a scale of charge which shall press less heavily on the poorer classes of remitters.”

Said, it was with some reluctance that he again troubled the House on the matter of postal administration. The large and liberal concessions made by the Government last year would have satisfied all the requirements for the time, but for the fact that, at the moment of conferring them, the equally valuable facility conferred by the pattern post in 1865 was withdrawn. When the pattern post was established, the Postmaster General, in more than one of his annual Reports announced to the public that he had established in the Post Office a new branch of business, which would afford unusual facilities for the extension of trade and commerce. It was an essential condition of the pattern post that no article sent through it should be of any intrinsic value; but, however easy this might appear to be in theory, in practice it was found impossible to determine what was intrinsic value. For instance, a single glove, shoe, slipper, or stocking might be sent as having no intrinsic value; but a pair of these articles could not go through the post, because an intrinsic value was supposed to exist. Again, a merchant in London could send by post a pattern or sample to a retailer living hundreds of miles away, but the retailer was not allowed to re-transmit the same article back to the merchant, or to a customer who might reside within a few miles of him. It was not to be wondered at, therefore, that these regulations soon broke down; and the pattern post drifted into what was, to all intents and purposes, a small parcels post. This proved a great advantage to the public, so far as cheapness and rapidity of transmission were concerned; and it also caused a marked development throughout the country in the manufacture and sale of small articles of trade. The Post Office took credit to itself for the facilities which had been given; and no later than the early part of last year, with a view still further to extend these facilities and to create more business, it reduced the charge for the transmission of small parcels. In October last, however, for some reason at present unexplained, the policy of the Post Office underwent a complete change. A retrograde step was taken, and the public were coolly informed that, for the future, the pattern post would be restricted to the transmission of articles which were bond fide patterns and samples, thus going back to the system which was found perfectly impracticable in 1865. If this change had been made in order to avoid any obstruction to the legitimate work of the Post Office, consequent on the introduction of the halfpenny stamp, the public would have admitted that to be a reasonable ground for a temporary withdrawal of the privilege. But it did not require a week to prove that the Post Office was perfectly equal to the emergency; and, if the reason which he had suggested had been the one which influenced the authorities, so soon as it was found that no hindrance was caused to the ordinary postal business by the introduction of the halfpenny cards, he thought the pattern post should have been restored. He did not know of any alteration which could have caused more disturbance to the whole daily current of our commercial and social intercourse. The Post Office had established a system upon which certain trades of very great importance to the industry of the country had sprung up; but no sooner had these trades began to develop themselves than that which was their main support was suddenly withdrawn. He maintained that the public were entitled to regard the use of the pattern post in the manner which had existed for so many years, as in some degree a prescriptive right; and he did not think the Post Office was justified in withdrawing the arrangement without stronger grounds than any yet stated. He could hardly do justice to his case without reading a few representative extracts from documents which had been forwarded to him. The first was from a Petition which had been presented from the Liverpool Tradesmen's Guild. It stated that, in the opinion of the petitioners, the privilege enjoyed by the public had created an entirely new traffic in very small articles; the facilities given by the post were highly advantageous to the public, and much valued; but the new regulations had caused injury to business, inconvenience to the public, and, they believed, loss to the Revenue. A Petition from the Guardian Society also stated that the new restrictions had, to a large extent, nullified the advantages intended to be conferred by the halfpenny postage. A memorial adopted at a meeting of seedsmen in London, set forth that the privilege which had been withdrawn had been a great boon to both buyer and seller, and had tended to develop the production of seeds. It was impossible for the postal authorities or themselves to tell what orders were for samples, or which for sowing; the result was indescribable annoyance to all concerned. A statement from Coventry showed how advantageous the post had been to manufacturers, and declared that the stringent rule now imposed had deprived them of a cheap and rapid means of delivering small articles at remote parts of the country, while it had led to the dismissal of many employés who had been compelled to seek engagements elsewhere. Then, as to the transmission of articles connected with science, he had a communication from a microscopical society, which stated that the society had received its death blow, because, under the new restrictions as to the pattern post, they could not send by post their prepared subjects. He had also a letter—one of many—from an indigent gentlewoman, who eked out a small pittance by fancy needlework, but now she could no longer send her work by post, and her small profit would be absorbed if she paid railway charges; and he had another letter from a person in similar circumstances, who complained that she could not get silk and other articles necessary for her work by post. The new regulation was that the articles which passed through the Post Office must be bond fide samples; and all articles having a saleable value were excluded. He would ask the House to consider how the new regulation was enforced. If any hon. Member sent for a small article to be supplied to him, he would find that in nine cases out of ten it would come through the post with the words "sample" or "pattern" marked legibly upon it. He had, to test the matter, sent orders to metropolitan tradesmen and others, and though the articles required were all for private use and of intrinsic value, the packages were all marked "patterns," with a 1*d.* postage in place of 2*d.*, 6*d.*, or 8*d.* There was, in fact, a systematic evasion of the Post Office regulations most demoralizing in the results. The Post Office officials themselves were unable to lay down any uniform rule as to what had or had not an intrinsic value, or was a bond fide pattern or sample. For instance, he had in his hand two envelopes which had received the approval of the Post Office as patterns, yet whilst one of these envelopes passed through the Post Office, the other was overcharged, upon the ground that it was not in conformity with the Post Office regulations, though it had actually been approved by the postal authorities themselves. A druggist at Brighton complained that he had been prevented from sending small boxes of pills through the post. He had written first to the Post Office to know whether he could send them, and, having received a favourable answer, he issued circulars that he would send the article post free all over the country. Now, however, the article was prevented passing through the post, and his trade was seriously injured. He had also a letter from a cripple, who got his living by knitting stockings; and when he had received an order, it had been his practice to send the first stocking to his customer through the post to see whether it would suit. After the new regulation he sent a stocking to a customer by post, and the customer was charged 2s. 8d. extra postage. On another occasion, the local postmaster returned the sample because the sender's was not a recognized place of business. These anomalies must continue so long as the present absurd regulations existed. Again, this system must produce great confusion, and it must, in the Post Office itself, create a serious hindrance to the rapid manipulation of letters, upon which the success of the Post Office so materially depended. Now what was the object attained by all this? So far as he could gather, of all the letters transmitted through the Post Office by inland post, over nine-tenths were sent by 1d. stamp, they being within the weight that would be carried for that amount, thus showing that the residue of letters over $\frac{1}{2}$ oz., and patterns only realized 10 per cent of the gross inland postage. He hoped that some system would be devised by which all distinctions between articles should be done away with, so that, over and within a certain weight, all articles, be they letters, patterns, parcels, closed or open, it mattered not which, should be carried at one uniform rate; for he believed that until some such system were adopted the public would not be satisfied, and the Post Office would not be free from the unceasing system of espionage necessitated by existing prohibitions. There seemed to be a fear, on the part of some of the officials, lest the Post Office should undertake extra work; but Sir Rowland Hill, in his evidence before the Committee, when asked whether he was not afraid that the Post Office would undertake more than it could manage, said—“We are not afraid of that; the more work we get the more profit we make.” He (Mr. Graves) believed that that opinion was as good now as it was when it was first uttered: if the work was excessive for the existing staff, increase it; let the remuneration of postal officials—the carriers especially—be in keeping with the increased requirements, and there need be no fear of the ability of the Post Office to fulfil every duty demanded of it. In looking into the history of the Post Office, he was much struck with the fact that over 200 years ago our ancestors were in the enjoyment of what we were now asking—namely, a parcel post, and it was a curious fact that in 1690 the then head of the Post Office was removed from his office for stopping parcels. He did not wish the present Postmaster General to be dealt with in that way. In a memorial which was presented to the King, it was stated that the Postmaster General forbade the taking of any band-box except very small ones, and stopped all parcels above 1lb. which formerly went by the 1d. post. There was another curious fact, as to the use that was made of the Post Office in and since those days. He found that among the articles sent were 15 couples of hounds to the King of the Romans, and these were sent with a free pass. There were also some parcels of cloth for clothing colonels; two servant maids, who were going out as laundresses to Lord Ambassador Methuen; two cows, and divers other things, the last being four fitches of bacon. Those facts were to be found in the Report of the Postmaster General for the year 1855, which would well repay perusal. One word on a point which had some considerable bearing on this question—namely, the effect of his proposal on the railways. He had always considered that it was an advantage to the railways that the Post Office should carry small parcels, because this system enabled traders to send the pioneers of larger quantities of goods that must go by railways. Be that as it might, he held it to be essential to the restoration and extension of the parcel system that the active co-operation of the railways should be secured; that we should not, as now, be dependent on one or two trains in the day to convey these parcels, but that every train going out of a station should be placed at the disposal of the Post Office. He believed that could be done, and that the railway interest would offer every facility should fair and reasonable proposals be made by the Postmaster General. On the other hand, the public would not permit such an opportunity to be spoilt if inadequate terms were offered by the postal authorities. The House would observe that he had divided his Motion into two sections. He would at once state his views on the money-order question, which he found to be so much associated with the parcel post, that he could not separate the two. In 1839 the utility of a money-order branch of the Post Office was first recognized by the Department. It was expressly stated by the Postmaster General in one of his Reports, to have been established for the purpose of enabling the poor to transmit money from one part of the country to another, and allusion was made to the Irish reapers going back to Ireland, who used to send their money through the money-order offices from town to town, that they might see that it was safe as they passed along. This money-order system in the first year turned over a sum of £300,000, and last year something like 10,000,000 of orders, and £20,000,000 sterling passed through the Post Office. From inquiries made at some of the large provincial offices, he found that more than two-thirds of the whole amount was transmitted in orders of £2 and under. Now, the charge for an order for any sum under £2 was 3*d.*, and it was not to be wondered at that such a charge should lead people to resort to other means of making remittances. They sent coin, contrary to regulation, in registered letters, and very large quantities of postage stamps were sent in payment of small sums. The Post Office authorities had systematically, year after year, asked the public to desist from sending coin and stamps, because of the temptation that the practice offered to the employés. In 1864 the registration fee was lowered with a view to stop the robberies which had become so frequent; and in 1865 the Postmaster General said that the result of the combined measures of reducing the fee and prohibiting the sending of coin had been satisfactory; that the number of applications for missing letters containing coin had fallen from 6,000 to 2,000 per annum; but, on the other hand, the good effect of this had been neutralized by the practice of transmitting postage stamps through the post; the applications for missing letters with postage stamps having increased in exactly the same proportion as the others had decreased. In the previous year when the Postmaster General was asked to reduce the charge for money-orders he refused to do so, because the 3*d.* charged was not sufficient to pay the costs; and he pointed out in his annual Report that many facilities for the transmission of small sums were afforded by postage stamps; so that the Post Office recommended the very thing that next year they appealed to the public in earnest terms to assist them in preventing. What he (Mr. Graves) suggested, was that they should try the results of reduction, and a large extension of money-order offices throughout the country—the rural districts especially. If a money-order for 10*s.* or £1 would be given for 1*d.*—if a simple system was established which everyone could remember, such as a penny in the pound for an order—he believed we should hear no more of robberies of letters, and the Postmaster General would have no occasion to make further appeals to the public to assist him in preventing them. He regretted that some Returns which he had moved for had not been as yet put into the hands of Members; but it appeared that in 1860, after which year the Post Office ceased to give any Returns of the profits from money-orders, there was a gain of £28,000; and from a calculation he had made it would probably now amount to between £40,000 and £50,000, which was not a bad result upon £176,000 receipts. For his own part, he did not care whether there was a profit or a loss upon a particular part of the work done by the Post Office. He contended that the Post Office had no right to say that in one department there might be a loss, and therefore they would do nothing to foster it. The Post Office should be looked upon as a whole, and should give to the starved districts facilities which per se would not be profitable. Upon the same principle he would reduce the charge for small orders, even although there should be a loss upon that particular transaction. He could send his money by a cheque and a 1*d.* stamp all over the country; why should not Government, in the interest of the poorer classes, assist them in doing the same, where it could be done without loss? The Committee of 1838 said that the speedy conveyance of letters was the primary consideration, and revenue of minor importance, and that the Post Office should be looked upon not only as a source of revenue, but as a means by which a price was paid by the public for a particular service. Since he had given Notice of his Motion he had received many communications asking for an extension of the money-order system, and in many places it was complained that there were no facilities for the inhabitants obtaining money-orders. In urging the Government to make this concession, he was aware he was raising a question of revenue at the very moment when the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarded it as of more than ordinary importance. The same argument was used against him last year, or the year before, when he asked for a reduction of a halfpenny on the newspaper stamp. The whole history of the Post Office went to show that whenever it gave increased facilities the public took advantage of them; that the loss of revenue at the outset was soon more than recouped, and that a new business was established. So it would be, he firmly believed, in the present instance, and he had no doubt we should have the Chancellor of the Exchequer stating in another year, as he expected he would be able to do in the present one, when introducing his Estimates, that he was able to inform the House that no loss had been incurred by those concessions which the Government had so wisely and liberally made. Most men who had been in Switzerland knew what the parcel post was there, and how far it was in advance of the parcel post of this country. Those who had been in Belgium knew what the parcel and money-order posts were there. In France they seemed to have got greatly ahead of us, as money-orders up to 15 francs were granted for a charge of 10 centimes, and for sums of 1,000 francs the Post Office was responsible for a charge of 1 per cent. The French Postmaster General, in 1868 or 1869, called upon the Government to adopt vigorous measures to improve the system in France; and he reminded the Government that the Post Office was a system which was meant to serve the interests of the country, and that it should have no limits but these interests. He also recommended, in the same Report, that the profits from the Post Office should be given up for two or three years, to develop all the various branches of the Post Office work. Comparing the facilities in France with the facilities afforded in this country, it was a curious fact that in France there were 43,000 letter-boxes, which were emptied, at least, once every day in the year, while in this country we had 18,000 only. France had, also, a complete rural service by which letters were taken to every house in the smallest hamlet of the country; while in England, in country places, people had to send miles to the post office for their letters. Within the last few years travelling letter-boxes had also been established in France, and there were 500 of these travelling letter-boxes going on wheels up and down the country, so that people were able to post their letters as the box passed by. He had shown the necessity of amending the parcels post system, and it would be for the interest of the money-order system also that the charge should be reduced and the system largely extended. In advancing these two propositions he had endeavoured to disassociate from them every other issue. Hereafter it was possible that it might be desirable there should be a discussion on the Post Office itself, and the principles on which it was managed. But, for the present, he would rest satisfied with laying before the House the two simple propositions, to which he had called attention. They were, to his mind, great blots on the Post Office system. He believed by their removal confidence would be reposed in the institution, and if they were removed there was no reason whatever why the Post Office should not have before it a long career of great usefulness, and that it would confer benefits on the people of this country, which, in the words of the Postmaster General of France, had no limits but the limits of the public requirements. The propositions which he had brought forward he regarded as moderate. The Government would, he hoped, accept them in that light, and he now submitted them to the House, feeling satisfied that he had with him not only the sympathy of the country, but the judgment of the House. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolutions.

MR. AKROYD seconded the Motion, observing that the Halifax Chamber of Commerce had come to a unanimous opinion in favour of the restoration of the pattern post. There was no doubt that the traders in this country who dealt in small articles would be benefited by the restoration; he would even venture to say that there was not a household among the middle and upper classes the ladies of which would not like to be able to send small parcels by post. Although, he might add, we in England had been the first to introduce a system of cheap postage, we had since remained comparatively stationary, while the continental nations had gone on improving upon our system, and the adoption of the Motion of his hon. Friend would, he felt sure, be hailed with satisfaction on all sides throughout the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is desirable to restore and extend those facilities for the transmission of Small Parcels by Post which the public enjoyed prior to the 1st day of October 1870."—(Mr. Graves.)

MR. MONSELL said, he fully appreciated the importance of the two questions which had been raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) in the course of his temperate and able speech. He trusted he should be able to show him that the Government were not indifferent to the considerations which he had advanced, and that he would be satisfied with the proposals which he was about to lay before the House. Before, however, he proceeded to explain those proposals he must venture to comment on the comparison which had been drawn by his hon. Friend between our postal system and that of foreign countries. His hon. Friend had alluded to the importance of establishing some understanding between the Post Office and the railways; but he must remind him that the relations which prevailed among us between the Post Office and the railways were very different from those which existed abroad. In the case of France, for instance, except for special trains, the Post Office had not to pay one halfpenny to the railways. In Belgium many of the important railways belonged to the State, and no payment was therefore made to them; while on most of the other lines there was a gratuitous conveyance of mails stipulated for when the lines were conceded, the total payments last year having amounted to only £1,307. Again, in North Germany there was no payment made except for heavy parcels carried by State railways, and for all parcels by private railways. It was clear, therefore, that there was a wide distinction between our position in that respect and that of foreign countries, and yet in very important cases our Post Office charges were less than those of France, Belgium, and North Germany. His hon. Friend very properly remarked that the greater portion of the postal revenue was connected with the sending of penny letters. Now, in the case of France the charge for letters was double the charge in this country; in that of Belgium the same; while in North Germany the scale of charge was one and one-third. Indeed, in the very instance of the pattern post the present charge in this country was lower than that in France, Belgium, or North Germany. The difference between the rates was—in those countries 3*d.* was charged for 10 ounces, whereas with us 12 ounces were sent for 3*d.* In the next place, he must take exception to the hon. Gentleman's history of the rise and progress of the pattern post. The Post Office had never relaxed the essential condition which had been established, that nothing should be sent by pattern post except patterns. He quite admitted that the rules of the Post Office in that respect had been evaded to a considerable extent, and that it was quite impossible to distinguish between patterns and other articles. Take the case of the seedsmen. Suppose a sorter had to decide between an ounce of picotee seed and half a pound of grass seed. The latter might be a sample; but he would, perhaps, decide that it was not a sample, while he would pass the other, which might be no sample. Such a distinction, therefore, must be absolutely given up. If the transmission of patterns by post was to be maintained it was absolutely necessary that parcels should go by post. But it was very important, indeed, in a matter of this sort to arrive at some system which contained within it the elements of finality. In politics unsettled questions were the cause of grave mischiefs, and in commercial affairs, also, they had the worst possible effect; for people did not know where they stood, and could not make the necessary calculations for carrying on their business when the conditions on which the business depended were being constantly altered. In considering this question he would put aside altogether the question of newspapers, books, and trade circulars, which involved considerations of a different order. Newspapers and books were carried at a low rate, for the sake of the education and general information of the people; and, with regard to trade circulars and halfpenny cards, experience showed that they had not supplanted in any great degree the letter post; but that a great number of announcements hitherto sent by hand, or not sent at all, were now conveyed through the Post Office, the general increase in the number of letters being not diminished by the concession, in obtaining which his hon. Friend took so important a part. Putting aside, therefore, these branches of the service, it appeared to him, with reference to the pattern post, that there was no ground for any distinction between closed and open parcels, and that parcels of whatever sort should be sent either closed or open as the sender desired. Among other results such a change would have the important advantage of diminishing the work of officers in the Post Office, because it would render unnecessary an examination to determine to which class each article belonged. In this way the change would produce economy; and it was also founded on reason and common sense, for if any system were desired containing the elements of finality the present absurd distinction must be abolished, and closed and open parcels must be allowed to go henceforth at the same rate. Now, the next point that they had to consider was, what should the limit of the weight of parcels be? He had consulted a number of persons from different parts of the country, having had the advantage of receiving a deputation representing the greater number of the most important manufacturing towns in the North of England, and the general opinion was that if the limit of weight were fixed at 12 oz. the public would be satisfied. There was no great desire to send any larger parcels by the Post Office. [An hon. MEMBER: Yes, up to a pound.] If the House went with him, as he thought it generally did on these two points, the next matter for consideration was one of vital importance—what should be the initial charge? There could be very little difference of opinion among Gentlemen who really paid any attention to this subject. The mainspring of our whole postal system was the penny letter. Ninety-five per cent of the letters sent were penny letters, and 90 per cent of the postal revenue was derived from the same source. In the year 1863 the number of these letters sent through the Post Office was, in round numbers, 600,000,000, and that number had increased now to 800,000,000. The increase had contributed somewhere about £800,000 a year to the Revenue. It was by means of this initial penny that the Post Office had been able to supply distant districts, establish new modes of conveyance, and make experiments with regard to the pattern or parcel post. The efficiency of the Post Office depended on the maintenance of that initial penny. If they retained it, their system would work satisfactorily, whatever they did; but, if they were to abandon it, they would abandon at once £1,500,000 a year. The Post Office, instead of being a revenue department, would become merely a spending department; there would be all those difficulties which were experienced by other spending departments in the attempt to carry out any public advantage which cost money, and the Post Office, instead of every year conferring greater blessing upon the people, would cease its career of progress and become a saving and niggardly instead of a liberal and generous department. He therefore submitted that the initial amount should be a penny. He would give the rates founded on that principle which he should ask the House to adopt. For parcels and letters of all sorts, closed or open, making no distinction between them, the charge would be—

“Not exceeding 1 oz., 1*d.*; above 1 oz., but not exceeding 2 oz., 1½*d.*; above 2 oz., but not exceeding 4 oz., 2*d.*; above 4 oz., but not exceeding 6 oz., 2½*d.*; above 6 oz., but not exceeding 8 oz., 3*d.*; above 8 oz., but not exceeding 10 oz., 3½*d.*; above 10 oz., but not exceeding 12 oz., 4*d.* 12 oz. to be the limit of weight for letters.

The present rate of letter postage was, for letters not exceeding ½ oz., 1*d.*; above ½ oz., but not exceeding 1 oz., 2*d.*; 1 oz., 3*d.*; 2 oz., 4*d.*; and so on. By the present pattern post, the charge for 12 oz. was 3*d.*; under the arrangement he proposed it would be 4*d.* Therefore, those whom his hon. Friend represented would make a sacrifice to this extent; but, on the other hand, they would gain the advantage of having their parcels closed or open as they pleased. The postage upon letters would be considerably reduced, and upon the whole the advantage to the public, by the proposal he now made, would be considerably greater than that which would be got if they were to relax the present rates and accept the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool. The plan of the Government was a sufficient answer to the supposition that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be likely to interpose an obstacle in the way of the munificence of the Post Office, because under the plan of his hon. Friend the loss to the Exchequer would be less than that which would arise from the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. But the advantage of the proposal made on the part of the Government was that it was founded upon a sound principle, and that, containing within it the elements of finality, they might hope that the public would be satisfied, and that no future changes would be called for. Perhaps the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) might say the plan proposed involved inconsistencies; but it was impossible to avoid inconsistency in any plan. Would the noble Lord, for instance, propose that the postage on The Times should be at the same rate as a letter? Then instead of a halfpenny The Times would be charged 1s. Or, would he propose that there should be any distinction between the postage on a parcel or letter from London to Hampstead, and that on a parcel or letter from the Orkneys to the Channel Islands? There must be such inconsistencies, and the object was to have as few as possible, and to adopt a system which, upon the whole, should be logical, definite, and precise. These, he thought, were the characteristics of the proposal before the House. With regard to what had been stated by his hon. Friend in respect to the co-operation of the railway companies, he had to observe that nothing would be more agreeable to him than to come to some arrangement with the railway companies. It would be necessary for him, he believed, to introduce a Bill in regard to the alterations now proposed, and before that time the railway companies would have had the opportunity of considering the subject, or some arrangement might have been possibly arrived at between them and the Government. He should most willingly co-operate in any such understanding, which, he thought, would be beneficial both to the public and to the companies, and it would then become possible, that, not only two or three trains, but all of them, might be utilized for the conveyance of letters. With respect to the question of money-orders he confessed he felt very much with his hon. Friend. He admitted that the main object of those orders was to benefit the poorer classes, and it was distinctly stated at the time they were first established that revenue was not their principal object. His hon. Friend had somewhat understated the profit derived from money-orders by putting it at £45,000. [Mr. GRAVES: Between £40,000 and £50,000.] He believed, in fact, that the profit on the £20,000,000 of orders annually issued was about £55,000 a year. The Money Order Office had entirely out-shot its original purpose, and had become a great banking concern for retail tradesmen. Take, as an example, the excess of payments over receipts in places where articles in general use were largely manufactured. In Birmingham the orders exceeded the issues by about £250,000 a year, and how largely orders were sent on business was shown by the fact, that in London about 35 per cent of them were paid through bankers. In King Street, Covent Garden, 35 per cent of the amount sent for money-orders was sent by persons connected with Covent Garden Market, and in other parts of London the proportion was about the same; in some it was even rather higher. He was informed that the average cost of money-orders to the Post Office was about 3d. The money-orders for sums not exceeding £1, amounted to £4,271,000; not exceeding £2, to £2,743,000; and the whole amount of all the orders was £9,967,000. Now, it was quite clear that if the precise proposition of his hon. Friend were adopted, there would be not only an immediate and considerable loss of revenue, but that the more money-order business the Post Office did the greater would the loss become. If the rate were fixed at 1d. per pound, the Post Office, instead of gaining about £55,000 annually, would lose about £5,000 a-year, and would lose more and more in proportion as the business was extended. The proposal, therefore, he should be disposed to make would be to substitute the following for the present rates:—For sums under 10s., 1d.; for 10s., and under £1, 2d.; for £1, and under £2, 3d.; for £2, and under £3, 4d.; for £3, and under £4, 5d.; for £4, and under £5, 6d.; for £5, and under £6, 7d.; for £6, and under £7, 8d.; for £7, and under £8, 9d.; for £8, and under £9, 10*d.*; for £9, and under £10, 11*d.*; and for £10 orders, 1*s.* That proposal would accomplish one of the objects of his hon. Friend, and would confer on the poor a very great benefit. Moreover, it would, he thought, tend to produce, as his hon. Friend said, the great benefit of putting a stop to the most fertile source of demoralization and theft among the employés of the Post Office, which arose from the transmission of postage stamps. No doubt the quotations that they had heard that night from his hon. Friend proved the inconsistency of the Post Office in that respect in former times; but it was found that a very great proportion of cases of theft arose from the transmission of postage stamps, and not only did it injuriously affect the morality of the letter-carriers, but it was also doubly detrimental to the public, because it had generally happened that, where cases of theft had been brought home, the accused person was found to have abstracted and destroyed a large number of letters in the hope that they might contain stamps. He also proposed that postmasters should not in future be allowed to purchase stamps. He did not know whether that would have much effect; but, at any rate, it would help to free them from any participation in a system calculated to place temptation in the way of the servants of the Post Office. He was afraid that the statement he had made must have been felt by the House to be dry; but it affected the interests of multitudes of their fellow-countrymen, and if they could arrive at a just solution of the questions he had dealt with, they would not only contribute to the comfort of the wealthy, but would, by facilitating the exchange of the productions of industry, improve the condition of those who live by their daily toil.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, it had not been his intention to trouble the House with any remarks; but after the pointed challenge thrown out by the Postmaster General he felt obliged to say a few words. He congratulated the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) on the triumph he had gained, and he also congratulated the Postmaster General on the statement he had made of his views, and on the abolition of the distinction between open and closed parcels; but, on behalf of the society which he represented, and which had spent much time and money in the prosecution of the subject, he could not subscribe to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman that his present proposals had the merit of finality. They were a great step in advance; but he hoped some day to be able to persuade the right hon. Gentleman to extend a little further the boons he was about to confer on the community. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to grudge the exceptional privilege enjoyed by The Times and other newspapers; but that privilege ought not to be grudged, because the Press of this country must be looked upon as a most useful and cheap means of assisting education. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the expediency of considering whether he could not make arrangements to extend to periodicals published once a fortnight the same privilege as that given to newspapers.

MR. MAGNIAC said, he believed the scheme, as a whole, would afford great facilities, and would meet the approbation of the country. Thanks were, he thought, peculiarly due to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose hand was plainly visible in these new arrangements. No doubt, there must be a material disturbance in the receipts of the Post Office for some time. There would also be a certain amount of expense in despatching heavy parcels by the post. He hoped there would be no delay in the delivery of ordinary letters in consequence of an increase in the heavier parcels. Letters ought to be delivered at the earliest possible moment. He hoped this point would receive the attention of the Postmaster General. With regard to railways, no doubt the Government did not occupy the same position that foreign Governments did; at the same time they possessed a very powerful lever in the enormous surplus revenue of the Post Office. They had in this case a very good object, and might make a very serious impression on the railway companies. It would be highly desirable if postal facilities were given at the railway stations, which might be done at a very small cost. Only a few days ago he was staying at the house of a friend, about 18 miles from London, which was seven miles from the nearest post town, while three railway stations were within a radius of three miles. Many other anomalies also existed, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would exert himself to discover and redress. If he did so, he was quite confident he would give universal satisfaction to the country.

MR. WHEELHOUSE expressed the hope that the proposals of the Government would be brought into operation at the earliest possible date. He also directed the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that in London the pillar letter-boxes were often not large enough to hold the number of letters required to be posted in them on Sundays.

MR. WHITWELL said, he did not expect to hear anything about finality as applicable to any scheme emanating from the Post Office Department, which, as a system of progress and extension, was peculiarly beneficent to the country at large. He was not quite satisfied with the plan now proposed. He regretted that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) for Post Office money-orders of small amounts had not been adopted. It would have been a great convenience, especially to the poorer classes. The expense of a money-order must be very small, certainly not more than 1*d.*, and the increase in the number granted must have been so great that any loss of revenue would have been easily made up. He hoped before the plan actually came into operation some modification would be made in it with respect to Post Office money-orders. It also occurred to him that the limit of parcels should have been fixed at 16 oz., instead of 12 oz., because that was an ordinary standard of commerce, and it would be extremely convenient if the Post Office undertook to carry parcels of that weight for 6*d.* There was another subject mentioned in the Resolution of the hon. Member for Liverpool which had not been alluded to by the Postmaster General—an increase of money-order offices. He believed the more those offices were disseminated the more would the income of the Department be increased. He congratulated his right hon. Friend on the plan he had proposed, as far as it went.

MR. EYKYN said, he would avail himself of this opportunity of urging on the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of considering how soon he could enable them to obtain cheaper telegrams than they could at present. That was a subject in which mercantile men took a very deep interest. He hoped there would be such an expression of opinion on this matter as would lead to a reduction to that level which was promised previous to the transfer of the telegraphs from the companies to the Post Office.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he hoped money-order offices would be increased in the rural districts. In many parts of the country it was impossible to obtain those facilities which were required in this respect, and he hoped some assurance would be given that the subject would not be lost sight of. With regard to the limit of the weight of parcels, he thought there was nothing to complain of. Parcels over 12oz. came fairly within the scope of railways, and there was a danger, if the limit in weight were further extended, of seriously adding to the labours of the already overworked and underpaid letter-carriers.

An hon. MEMBER asked the Postmaster General, whether he could fix the date when the alterations would come into operation?

MR. MONSELL said, that it was not yet possible to assign the precise date. With regard to the other points that had been raised he hoped that some increase would be made in the number of rural money-order offices; it had been decided to reduce the amount of guarantee now required for money-order offices. In respect to the price of telegrams the difficulty was really a physical one. There was not room for increased business in the present buildings, neither were the clerks sufficiently trained to manage it with efficiency. The reduction in the tariff must, therefore, be postponed.

MR. GRAVES said, after the assurances which had been given, and the information which had been communicated on the part of the Government, he should be wanting in appreciation if he cavilled about the minor details of their scheme, though he could have wished a lower and simpler scale for money-orders had been adopted. He tendered them his thanks for the enlightened concessions they had made, and congratulated the Postmaster General not only on the nature of the announcements he had made, but also on the tone and spirit in which he had made them. It augured well for the future of the Post Office that the right hon. Gentleman thoroughly appreciated the responsibilities of his post. He was satisfied, as he believed the country would be satisfied, with the scheme of the Government, considered as a whole, and he therefore asked permission to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GRAVES said, there was another Notice on the Paper in his name of a Motion in reference to postal administration; but it would be more convenient to discuss the matter on another occasion, and he would not, therefore, propose it now.

LAND TRANSFER.—OBSERVATIONS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. G. B. GREGORY, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Royal Commissioners on the operation of the Land Transfer Act, and to move "That it is expedient to afford further facilities for the declaration of title through the office of Land Registry," said, that the matter was one of considerable importance, and well worthy of the consideration of the House. In the year 1857 a Commission was appointed to consider the whole question of the transfer of land and the registration of titles, and they reported that there ought to be throughout the country a compulsory registration of title, but they felt the difficulty inherent in such a scheme—namely, that it would be impossible to compel the registration of antecedent titles—and they proposed for the future to start with the registration of the conveyance on any transfer that might take place; but the effect was this—that a long period of time must elapse before a title could be acquired by means of such legislation; and therefore, in 1859, Lord Cairns, who was then Solicitor General, brought in two Bills—one for the establishment of a Landed Estates Court, and the other for the establishment of a Land Registry, and he proposed to give the Landed Estates Court the power of declaring titles, and it was a matter of great regret that that Bill did not receive the sanction of the Legislature. They had heard that land was prevented from being distributed by entails and settlements; but he believed that the great reason why it was not more distributed was the difficulty and the expense of investigating titles. There was, in fact, large quantities of land in the market, but parties were deterred from purchasing for those reasons. In 1862, the subject was again renewed, and two Bills were brought in, and passed, by one of which power was given to the Court of Chancery to grant a declaration of title, but that Act had become a dead letter. The other Act, which was in more active operation, was that by which a land registry was established to register titles. But that Act was not compulsory. A person was empowered to register his land, and thus acquired an indefeasible title, and could put the property into the market. But the grant of a certificate of title was subject to three conditions which fettered the operation of the Act. These conditions were that a title must be shown to be indefeasible; that the boundaries of land must be mathematically defined; and notice given to every adjoining occupier, and to the party to whom he paid rent, and that all subsequent dealings with the land must also be registered. With regard to the indefeasible title, it was required that it should be for a period of 60 years, and the title had to be traced through the whole of that period, showing that all charges on the land had been met and had been duly and legally released; that all deeds had been properly executed, and all pedigrees and derivations of title had to be shown by legal evidence. Of course, there were many things in a title which must be matters of inference and of presumption rather than of proof; and he entered into the details of a particular case to illustrate the difficulty of satisfying all the conditions imposed. In actual practice minute points were not regarded; but what was done was this. A party desiring to sell had his title investigated by his counsel or solicitor, and if there appeared to be any small defects, they were guarded against by special contract, or by conditions of sale, and one usually adopted and most efficacious in its operation was to throw on the purchaser the expense of clearing up of any defect. The effect of this was that minute points were waived or disregarded. The second condition of registration was that the boundaries of estates should be clearly defined, and notice of the intention to register was to be given to all adjoining landowners, and to all occupying tenants, a regulation that frequently entailed considerable expense and trouble. By rendering such notice imperative persons were encouraged—and, indeed, almost compelled—to make adverse claims, and to revive those which had been long dormant. The third requirement was that all subsequent dealings with the land should be registered and pass through the office. In the case of the subdivision of land for building purposes, it was a great hardship upon poor people who bought a plot of land for £20 or £30 that they should be compelled to pay an additional sum of £3 or £4 as the expense of registration. In 1867 a Royal Commission was issued to inquire into the operation of this Act, and in 1868 they presented a Report, which consisted of two parts—findings and recommendations. As regarded the findings the Commissioners did not differ; but with respect to the recommendations they differed considerably. In dealing with the question of marketable and indefeasible titles, they stated that what the purchaser required was not an indefeasible title, but such a title as would make him reasonably secure, and so little did they want an indefeasible title that they would overlook certain blots and defects. There was considerable difference of opinion as to the remedy to be applied. The Commissioners suggested that they should register the first conveyance—start with that as the root of the title, and that the register and title should take effect from that date. But there was this great difficulty—that no remedy could by this be applied to the existing state of things, and, until after the lapse of 30 or 40 years, the delay, expense, and trouble to which people were now subject, must continue. The question was whether some remedy could not be applied which would be more immediate in its action, and more beneficent in its operation, and by which the delay, trouble, and expense of continued investigation of titles might be saved as at present. Before offering property for sale a vendor always had his title investigated, but this by no means bound the vendor, who had to look into the matter again, and the second investigation was money absolutely thrown away. But no solicitor could give it up. He was responsible for any defect which might appear as to the title, and could waive nothing. What he would suggest was this. There was an office of land registry in operation, and power was given to grant certificates of indefeasible title. Let that office certify such titles as were ordinarily given. Let them grant a certificate that a man possessed a good title, subject to conditions and qualifications. Let the title be good so far as it was certified; but let them make certain reservations, and the man taking the certificate could then go into the market and say—"Here is my title certified so far—you shall have any defects removed at your own expense, or you may waive them if you do not choose to go to that expense." If this proposal were adopted, the large sums which were now spent in investigating titles would be saved, and the transfer of land would be rendered far easier than it was at present. The hon. Gentlemen concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. WREN HOSKYNs, in seconding the Motion, said, he felt obliged to the hon. and learned Member who had introduced the question, than which one more important could hardly be brought before the House. He (Mr. Wren Hoskyns) had for a long time taken a deep interest in this subject, having watched the effect of the existing law during the period to which his hon. and learned Friend had directed the attention of the House. In the Report of the last Commission which sat on that subject, the Commissioners expressed their opinion that before any successful effort could be completed for the transfer of land, there must be a revision of the law of real property altogether. The difficulty which really applied to the transfer of land arose in consequence of the length of title that must be examined into; and so long as the title must be of that length, it was almost impossible to place on the register a title which could be a matter of easy commercial transfer between man and man. Why was it necessary to go back 60 years to get a title? Because so much power was given to landowners to make charges on the land that lasted over a great number of years; and, of course, there must be a correlative power to look into those charges when they endeavoured to make a title. It was a national misfortune that there were so few owners of land in England. Although we had no proper statistics on the subject, yet he believed there was scarcely a continental country in which the ownership of land was con-finer to so small a number of persons as was the case here. Such extensive improvements had been made in the land laws of Prussia, Bavaria, Austria, and even Russia, in this century, that we lagged behind almost every other European country in respect to the extension of the advantages, and, he might say, the blessings of the ownership of land to the general community. In England a man might go into an auction-room and bid for a piece of land, and the moment he had done so he found himself pledged to something equivalent to a positive lawsuit, which might extend over six months or two years before he could realize actual proprietorship. It was a disgrace to a civilized State that there should not be a power of acquiring a portion of the land of the country on terms a little easier than was the case here at present. The attempt to register the muniments of title to land could only have the effect of burdening the register and making it more difficult to examine it. What was wanted was that the results should be registered; and that, he feared, could not be accomplished unless they made up their minds to have a greater number of fee-simple titles to land. There now existed so many estates for life, extending to the next generation, before the actual ownership of the land was decided by the fee-simple. It had been said that it ought to be as easy to buy land as to buy a horse; but how would it be possible to buy a horse if the ownership of the one half of it was in one century and that of the other half was in another century, as was the case with land? The real impediment to the transfer of land was the immense period over which the ownership extended. Our middle classes were accustomed to invest their money where they could at once obtain what they purchased—where there were no delays, no unknown costs, no wearisome forms that disgusted them with their bargain before it was completed; and as to our lower classes, they found the purchase of land to be utterly hopeless. In other countries the acquisition of land was an object attainable by the whole community. All the great political economists said that the accumulation of wealth might make a nation, or part of a nation, rich; but that it was the distribution of wealth which made a nation happy and defended it from an army of pauperism, crime, and other evils to which society was liable. Let them apply the doctrine of Adam Smith to this matter, and they would find that in regard to land they now almost bade defiance to the principles continually appealed to as those which conduced to the happiness and prosperity of a nation. That subject of the transfer of land was made too much of a lawyer's question. They ought, first, to make the article itself transferable, and then its transfer would not be so difficult. The common charge against the Code Napoleon was that it subdivided the land to excess, prescribing so much and leaving so little scope to testamentary power; but in this country we almost imitated the mistakes of that code in a still more dangerous degree, though in a different way, because we cut up the ownership of land into so many different, deferred, and complicated interests, breaking up the true interest into such a great variety of small estates. The hopes built upon Lord Westbury's Act had been disappointed owing to that state of things. Lord Cairns' admirable intentions in regard to that subject were frustrated by the dissolution of Parliament, and Lord Campbell, Lord Brougham, the present Lord Chancellor, and, indeed, almost all the Law Lords had, in turn, attempted to give facilities for simplifying that question; but he was sorry to say he believed that none of those efforts would be successful until they first consented to go into the whole subject of the law of real property. That work was begun in Prussia in 1807, and completed in the middle of this century, and it had nearly doubled the value of land in that country, increasing the national happiness in a manner seldom witnessed in any State. The recent successes of the patriot soldiers of Prussia might be accounted for in no small degree by the fact that a large part of the Prussian Army went from homes which they owned in fee-simple to fight in a foreign country, and had those homes to return to when the war was over. He was not one of those persons who thought that the landed proprietors of this country were to be reproached as the authors of the present state of things; on the contrary, he believed they were oftener the victims. Many men of their class had expressed a most liberal desire to see the transfer of land facilitated in England, and the great subdivision of the interest in land put an end to by fee-simple ownership becoming more common. In Denmark, he thought, and also in Russia, there was a practice of retaining under the system of entails land which belonged to ancient families who were looked up to with honour by the State; and in those cases exceptional entails were made. He did not see why a similar means might not be used in this country for escaping from the great difficulty of any attempt to abolish or interfere with the right and practice of entail. He hoped, in conclusion, that the whole subject of Land Transfer would receive the attention of the House, inasmuch as it was a proper one for early legislation.

Mr. Wren Hoskyns

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to afford further facilities for the declaration of title through the Office of Land Registry."
—(Mr. George Gregory.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had, on a former occasion, when this subject was discussed, stated that it was under the consideration of the Government, and he had now to add that a Bill had been prepared to deal with it; but it was doubtful whether the state of Public Business would permit its introduction during the present Session. He had, however, the authority of the Lord Chancellor for saying that if the Bill were not brought forward this Session it should be introduced early in the next one. When that measure was introduced it was inevitable that the question would have to be discussed at great length, and under those circumstances he should refrain from going into it in detail now. He quite agreed that the transfer of land should be made more easy and simple, and he had no doubt that that result could be arrived at; but he was by no means certain that land could be made as easy of transfer as capital, as there were such inherent differences in the subject-matter which could not be removed. The Act of 1862 had, no doubt, turned out a failure, mainly because it dealt with indefeasible titles, which were very difficult to obtain, while practical merchantable titles were not so difficult to obtain. The Commission had suggested that the existing registry might be utilized, and that by the establishment of an additional registry the transfer of land with an ordinary title might be facilitated. That was the object of the Bill which had been prepared, and was now in the hands of the Lord Chancellor. But he would go into the question at length when the Government Bill was introduced, and in the meantime he trusted that his hon. and learned Friend would not think it necessary to press his abstract Resolution.

MR. G. B. GREGORY said, that after the assurance just given by the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government would deal with the question at as early a time as possible, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PRIVATE CHAPELS BILL—[BILL 37.]
(Mr. Salt, Mr. Dimsdale, Mr. Morrison.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. SALT said, that not having had the opportunity of explaining the provisions of the Bill on moving the second reading, he proposed to do so now. Of late years several measures had been passed which interfered with the ecclesiastical law relating to the rights and powers of incumbents within their parishes—for instance, in the cases of prisons, public schools, and unions, the rights of the incumbent to the spiritual authority within his parish had been superseded. But these were not the only cases in which relief was desirable. As the law at present stood—except in the cases before noticed—the Bishop could not license any clergyman to perform ecclesiastical duties within any parish without the consent of the incumbent. This Bill, however, proposed to enable the Bishop of the diocese to license a minister to any private chapel, or any chapel belonging to any school, college, hospital, asylum, or other public institution; who being so licensed should be authorized to administer the sacraments, and perform all such offices and services of the Church as should be named in the license; but the solemnization of matrimony was excepted from the Bishop's power. By the second clause, any minister so licensed was exempted from control or interference on the part of the incumbent of the parish; but the entire cure of souls throughout the parish, save within the walls of the chapel, was reserved to the incumbent. Objections had been raised to the inclusion of private chapels within the provisions of the Bill, and in Committee he would move the omission of that part of the Bill, with a view to bring up other clauses on the Report. He had been anxious to ascertain whether the provisions of this measure would be acceptable to the clergy, and before introducing it he wrote to several clergymen of his acquaintance in order to ascertain their opinions as to whether it would make any undue invasion of their privileges, and to elicit their criticisms. Without an exception he received answers favourable to the Bill. In fact the Bill only sought to give the sanction of law to the custom which had hitherto prevailed in the majority of cases, for chaplains were generally appointed to public institutions, and even in private families, without objection, while in those few cases in which the incumbent of the parish had raised any objection, and had used his powers of interference in an arbitrary manner, a change in the law was desirable in the interests of religion and education. He had been told that he was making an attack by this Bill on the parochial system; but this Bill contained the very essence and spirit of the parochial system. Anybody acquainted with the history of this country knew that private chapels had been the foundation of parish churches, and even in the last half-century there had been repeated instances of districts carved out of parishes on account of the growth of population. The whole course of modern legislation for the extension of the Church teaching was founded upon the same principle. That would be a very narrow view of the parochial system according to which the privileges of the particular person placed over the district were, under no circumstances or conditions whatever, to be interfered with; and if such a view were to prevail, in fact, the parochial system would stand self-condemned. He moved that the House went into Committee on this Bill.

MR. MONK said, that when he first read the Bill he could not clearly ascertain what object the proposers had in view. The Bill was somewhat vaguely drawn; but now, as the hon. Member had explained its provisions, it would appear that their object was to extend the parochial system by an invasion of the rights of the incumbent of the parish. There was at present power to set up chapels and chapelries in overgrown parishes under the existing Church Buildings Acts. It appeared to him the Bill was intended to empower the owners of private chapels to appoint ministers to them without the consent of the incumbent of the parish, which was a step towards disestablishing incumbents, if not also a step towards the disestablishment of the Church. That might not be the view taken of it by the promoters of the Bill; but it certainly was the view taken by some hon. Members below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House. With the omission of the words "any private chapel" from the Bill he was willing to accept it as a Bill to enable the Bishop to appoint a minister to exercise spiritual functions in the chapel attached to any college, public school, hospital, &c.; but if it was intended to enable the owners of private chapels to obtain the appointment of a minister in opposition to the wishes of the incumbent, he should oppose its further progress.

Bill considered in Committee.

On Motion of Mr. MONK, words relating to private Chapels in Clause 1 struck out.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Friday.

TRADES UNIONS BILL—[BILL 28.]

(Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Bruce.)

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that in making a few remarks on this Bill he wished, in the first place, to disclaim any hostility to the principle of trades unions, or even of strikes. Few who had paid attention to the subject could have failed to perceive that the proportion between wages and profits was very seldom thought of in settling the amount of wages. The political economist might say that a man was not bound to give above the market price for a day's work more than for a coat or a hat, that there was no reason why he should offer higher wages than the lowest that a workman would take, and that if these were not enough to keep body and soul together, so much the worse for the workman, who had nothing more valuable to sell. The case of clerks in many shops and smaller mercantile houses, and of the lace makers in the south of Devon, occurred to him as instances in which, from very different causes, there was no sort of proportion between the profits of the principals and the wages of the workpeople, though in both cases the work was good, and might be much more highly paid. In the former case the enormous supply, compared with the demand, was the cause of low pay; and in the latter the wretched condition of the people and the bondage to which they were reduced by what was practically the truck system. In neither of these cases could there be resistance without combination. The employers could go elsewhere or wait. The labour of the employed—his only saleable property—would not keep. It was like meat or fish, which in hot weather must be rapidly disposed of. Assistance from without alone could place the contracting parties on equal conditions, for he was only speaking of cases in which the employers could well afford to pay more. Trades unions, enabling workpeople to make better terms with their employers, had put an end to starving wages in many trades. No one could expect people to go on receiving such wages with satisfaction. No one could find fault with strikes aimed against injustice and wrong. What were co-operative stores but combination against overcharge and adulteration? But there was another side to the question. It was when the so-called leaders of the workpeople, men who had attained their position perhaps by that all-powerful weapon among the masses, "the gift of the gab," men who delighted in warfare, from which they derived, if not pecuniary benefits, a position of power and consequence. When they sought to abolish the difference between good and bad workmen, and to induce people who were perfectly satisfied with their position and their wages to join in strikes, he was sure that the clear intellect of Mr. Justice Hannen, whom the right hon. Gentleman had quoted on bringing in his Bill, would not fail to see that such proceedings were not only injurious to the particular employer, but to the public. He had seen a somewhat fine distinction drawn in a recent publication—namely, this, that if the strike was in a trade in which we had foreign competitors it was injurious to the public, because it might drive the trade entirely out of the country; but if it was in a home trade, such as the various building trades, then it was a mere question between master and man. But what did an hon. Member complain of last year? That the doors and window frames of the new St. Thomas's Hospital came ready made from abroad, where, in consequence of disputes and strikes in that portion of the building trade, they could be obtained cheaper and better than at home. So much was this question one of degree that it was very difficult to say when the action of a trade union ceased to be beneficial, and became contrary to public policy. But the fault he found with the Bill was that while it did not seem to diminish the chances of disagreement between workmen and employers, it appeared to recognize acts which no one could doubt were contrary to public policy. As far as he understood the Bill, there would be no objection whatever to grant a certificate of registry, with all its advantages, to such unions as those of the Manchester bricklayers and masons, among whose rules he found the following:—

"That no master bricklayer shall have more than three apprentices; that all workmen should be paid the same wages, without reference to their ability or industry."

Let them imagine such regulations emanating from the Inns of Court or Colleges of Surgeons or Physicians? Yet they represented callings which were equally overstocked. Another rule stated that no bricks should be carried in wheelbarrows, which reminded him of the negroes on an estate in Jamaica, who, when wheelbarrows were introduced from England, resented the innovation so much that they carried them on their heads as they had done their old baskets. Bricklayers' labourers were not by another rule to go up one ladder and down another—an edict only to be compared with that in the Arabian Nights, which condemned to death the pastry cook who had made cream tarts without pepper. Again it was ordered—

"That every bricklayer should have an attendant whether he wanted him or not, and that no stones should be shaped in the quarry," but that a quantity of the useless superfluous mass must be brought at increased expense to the workshop. Let the House imagine such a rule enforced with reference, for instance, to the building of the Wolf Rock Lighthouse off the coast of Cornwall. He should be sorry to think that any encouragement, however indirect, was given by the Bill to rules so arbitrary, capricious, and mischievous, and though no agreement to obey such rules could be legally enforced, yet he feared that there would be many other ways of enforcing them within the letter of the law, which would continue to work mischief till the slow progress of true education convinced the upholders of such rules that they were running in the very teeth of their own best interests.

MR. T. HUGHES said, in answer to the objection of his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Cave), as to the nature of some of the rules of the unions, that the object of this Bill was to give the privilege of combination, including the right to strikes, to workpeople, and whether the rules of the unions were objectionable or not did not really matter. There was to be a free right of combination so long as the rules were made public. Of course, if there was anything absolutely illegal in the rules, it would be detected by the registrar, who would refuse to register them. The Bill seemed to him to be an extremely good one in almost every respect. It abolished all the laws which had produced bad results in bygone times, and it gave to societies that right of combination, which it would be admitted they deserved, by the manner in which they had behaved for many years past. It was true that some combinations had done acts, and had made rules, that had caused very serious evils in various parts of the country; but such unions were very few, and in general trades unions had been very beneficial. The great argument from the workmens' point of view for such combinations was, that wherever they had been broken down through strikes not being successful, the result had been that the condition of the workpeople had fallen very low. This was the case 30 years ago in the East End of London with the tailors' union; and ever since this branch of labour had been in a deplorable condition, the wages not being sufficient to support the men in decency. Anyone who perused the evidence given before the Commission must come to the conclusion that trades unions had become so powerful and so well organized that it would be useless to contend any longer against their having a right to that legal position which the Bill proposed to give them. He said on a previous occasion that the only feature of the Bill which was objectionable was that it threatened to perpetuate the evil which had arisen from the construction which had been placed by the Courts upon the words "molestation" and "obstruction" in the Act of Geo. IV. The words had been so construed as to make criminal acts which were not cognizable by the ordinary criminal law; for instance, such acts as calling out in the street to men passing; or such an act as a man, employed to represent the union, telling the master that "there would be a row" if a certain course of action were followed. Since the passing of that Act, there had been a great number of cases in which workpeople had been imprisoned in consequence of the interpretation put upon those words "molestation" and "obstruction;" but in no instance had the Act been brought to bear upon combinations of employers, and the consequence was that the feeling against those clauses of the Act had been for many years exceedingly strong among working men. When he found that this Bill would perpetuate the clauses relating to molestation and obstruction he thought it to be an error, and that the better policy would have been to remove these words, which were extremely difficult of definition, and to pass the Bill without defining what these phrases were to mean. If, however, those words were to be retained, he was bound to admit that the 3rd clause was as successful an attempt to define them as was likely to be made; for it confined their meaning practically to two offences, those of picketing and rattening. These were the two offences dealt with by the clause. His objection to it was, that it made acts penal in one case which you could not suppress in the other. When a strike occurred, the first object of the employer was to prevent his workmen from getting other employment, while the object of the workmen was to prevent him from filling their places. The only way by which the men could effect this object was, to watch and warn other workpeople from furnishing the labour which the employers required. This was the offence of picketing; but if picketing were employed by the men, on the other hand what did the employers do? They sent a list of their workmen to other employers in the neighbourhood with notice that their works were closed, and requesting that their workmen might not be employed in other works in the neighbourhood. Now, this black list was the exact counterpart of picketing as practised by the men. He would give one instance of the use of these black lists, as they were called. Some three years ago there was a strike by the joiners at Manchester, and a circular was produced in evidence before the Trade Union Commissioners, signed by the secretary of the Masters' Union, convening a meeting of employers, "to take what steps may be thought necessary to prevent the men on strike from getting employment in other towns." His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Jessel) was of opinion that words might be inserted in this Bill enforcing penalties against the masters for the issue of a black list, just as against the workmen for picketing. He feared, however, that this was impossible; and, therefore, the Bill was a one-sided enactment, making penal on the side of the men the very act which could not be made penal on the side of the employers. It was far better that this clause should be removed from the Bill. Another reason that he had for objecting to this clause was that it was bringing them back to the old difficulties as to the law of conspiracy. It was proposed to give to two magistrates a jurisdiction in these matters, which had never before been confided to such a tribunal. In the districts where strikes were most common, and where there were great works in the neighbourhood of which trades unions were powerful, the local magistracy was filled with persons of the same class as the employers—persons deeply interested in these questions—and it would be a very unfortunate piece of legislation to give jurisdiction to such persons under such circumstances. He thought if such jurisdiction were conferred upon magistrates, it should be given to stipendiary magistrates. There was this further objection—that they were seeking to introduce into a special Act, applying specially to trades unions, general provisions which, if they had any bearing at all, should apply to every person in the community. This Bill was applicable, not only to members of trades unions, but to all persons who did certain acts. If these offences were to be made penal for every person who committed them, he thought the Government Bill was not the place to introduce such a clause as this. It would be far better if his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department were to put these offences into a separate Act, where they would be dealt with as offences entirely apart from trades unionism, and which should declare that whoever committed them, whether he was a member of a trades union or not, would be subject to certain penalties. All the best men connected with trades unions felt that such offences as rattening, dogging, and hustling men in the streets, should be made penal. With respect to the other clauses, he looked upon them as satisfactory, and he thought that the Bill did all that was necessary. In the 15th clause, subsection 6, it was enacted that—

"The Board of Trade may from time to time make regulations respecting registry under this Act, and respecting the seal (if any) to be used for the purpose of such registry, and the forms to be used for such registry, and the inspection of documents kept by the registrar under this Act, and respecting the fees, if any, to be paid on registry not exceeding the fees specified in the second schedule to this Act, and generally for carrying this Act into effect."

That was a very wide clause, and it should be distinctly understood that such words would be inserted as would be necessary to make it quite clear that the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade was simply with respect to the regulations of the registry, and not with respect to the rules which were to be submitted to it for registration. In the 19th clause there was another question as to registration, which was of some little importance—namely, under what class of societies trades unions were to be registered—whether under the Friendly Societies' Act or the Joint-stock Companies Act. It appeared to him that the proper thing would be to register the unions under the Friendly Societies' Act, as the Joint-stock Acts were framed for the purposes of commercial associations, and were worked by a machinery which was inapplicable to such unions. He thought this Bill would do away with almost all the difficulties, and heartburnings, and jealousies, which had been so prevalent among members of trades unions in consequence of the legislation of past years, and which was regarded by them as extremely one-sided and penal. The existence of these unions as legal associations would greatly help the system of arbitration which had done so much to settle disputes between the employer and the employed, and reserving his opinion on the 3rd clause, he should give his hearty support to the Bill, which, he believed, would work extremely well.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, hon. Members were perfectly agreed as to the general principle of the Bill and ready to support it on the second reading, although there were many who would wish to make alterations in its clauses; but when the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) said they should recognize all kinds of combinations not for illegal purposes, he forgot that their recognition legalized. The law could legalize combinations for all purposes. The real principle at which they had arrived was that, for the purpose of mutual aid, combinations of all sorts should be promoted by the law on condition that there was nothing in the proceedings to militate against the public interest, and nothing of either violence or fraud. This was a principle which they had largely adopted in promoting friendly societies, which had formerly been treated as conspiracies, and the category of friendly societies had been gradually enlarged, while the principle of mutual aid on which they were based had been admitted to be of general application. The old objection to friendly societies was found to be a false one, and the law had restricted the public from entering into many very useful combinations. The principle of these societies had now been recognized, not only for benefit purposes, but also for trade co-operation. Employers of labour were in themselves a great combination, and there ought to be a countervailing power permitted to the employed to guard their own interests. It was to be hoped that this measure would lead, not only to co-operation on each side, but to a great deal of co-operation between these two parties and to the constitution of joint boards of conciliation. The best way to proceed was for the two to act together; but, at all events, the law should not be such as to render the one side powerful and the other weak. His own objection to the Bill generally was that it seemed to needlessly complicate the subject. If we had recognized the general principle of combinations for mutual aid, why not act upon it, in the case of trades unions, so as to bring them, as far as possible, under the principle? It seemed to him to be a great fault to make a new law for every case, as they had made a separate Factory Act for every trade. Uniformity in the application of principle was one of the law's chief merits; and want of uniformity was, in itself, an evil. What was there to prevent trades unions, so far as their operation was for benefit purposes capable of calculation, from being brought under the Friendly Societies' Acts; all benefit societies might be brought under one principle, and the law should give them its protection, and allow them to sue and be sued, provided they would submit to the conditions that would prevent their militating against the general good. Trades unions had two purposes—they were trade societies, and they were benefit societies. In the latter respect there could be no reason why they should not come under the Friendly Societies' Acts. The trade department was not equally capable of calculation. But what reason had been assigned why these trade societies should not also be brought under the general principle of legalized combinations which had been so widely extended of late years for various purposes? He believed he might state, on the high authority of the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, that all such societies should be brought under the law. The two objections made against this Bill had been on account of the 3rd clause, the penal clause, and on account of the terms of registration. There were special crimes which had sprung out of trades unions; but it is said these could have been brought under the general criminal law. He did not himself see any stigma attached to trades unions by dealing with their abuses in the Act which legalized them, any more than similarly dealing with public-house abuses in Licensing Acts stigmatized that trade. But if such an objection were seriously felt it might be easily met. If the special acts were added to the category of crimes in a separate Bill, the whole difficulty would be got rid of at once. The present Bill had grown up during years of struggle, and inquiry, and mutual concessions, for it was desirable to secure the result with goodwill. If what he had suggested should be carried out, he trusted that care would be taken that the Act touching the crimes would be passed before the Royal Assent was given to the Trades Unions Bill, as however partial the abuses of trades unions might be, still it would not be safe to legalize their use without security against such possible abuse.

MR. JESSEL said, he could not admit that the Bill was directed to any such general alteration of the law as the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Adderley) supposed. The object of the Bill was one which he believed the whole House approved—namely, to eliminate one single element of illegality from the constitution of trades unions, this element being that they were unlawful, simply because they were in restraint of trade, and the moment they eliminated this they made them lawful, with the special exception provided by the Act. He entirely agreed with the remarks made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) as to special class legislation; but he wished to point out to the House that this legislation was not fairly obnoxious to the charge of being class legislation. Class legislation was the conferring of special privileges on a single class of the community, or enacting special prohibitions against a single class as distinguished from all others. But it was not class legislation to prohibit offences by any member of the community merely because such offences were committed usually by one class only. There was in our criminal legislation an enactment which prohibited the possession of house-breaking implements by any member of the community. This might be said to be class legislation as regarded burglars, because no other members of the community carried about with them house-breaking implements. But this was not class legislation; and if we prohibited the offences which had been described as “rattening” and “picketing,” it was no answer to say that here was class legislation, because they were not offences likely to be committed except by handicraftsmen. The complaints of the working classes, on the ground of the prohibitory enactments included in the Bill, were not well founded. He thought the working classes had great cause to be grateful to the Government for defining the offences for which they were to be punished. On this question Common Law Judges had differed in opinion, and it might be concluded that they always would differ when it was considered that they had to look back to ancient decisions and from them to educe principles applicable to the present state of things. Though we might be agreed as to a principle, it was difficult to agree as to its application to a totally different state of circumstances from that which formerly existed. If we simply abolished the combination laws, and left the matter to be dealt with by the common law, we should transfer that accurate definition of crime, which ought to be the province of legislation, to the Judges, and we should leave whole classes in utter uncertainty as to what their duties and obligations were. Whether the definitions given in the Bill were accurate, or whether they admitted of improvement was, of course, a question for Committee; but the working classes would wish to see the offences, whatever they might be, accurately and carefully defined. He wished to call attention to the 5th clause, which introduced a new principle as regarded contracts; for this was the first attempt, so far as he knew, to make a legal contract not enforceable by law. It was an illogical proposition, a contradiction in terms, to call that a contract which could not be enforced; there was nothing of the kind in our law at present, and it would be extremely objectionable to enact such a thing. It had lately been often enacted that certain persons, such as women and children under the Factory Acts, should not be at liberty to contract, and this had been extended to the case of some tenant-farmers in Ireland; but always on the ground that they were not competent to contract, and that it was for their own benefit that the power should be withdrawn; but this was the first time it had been proposed that men, fully competent to enter into a contract which was unobjectionable, should not be allowed to enforce it. It was an intelligible proposition that certain contracts were opposed to public policy and that they should be invalid, but the proposition of the Bill was not this. It had been said they were to assimilate trades unions to clubs, so that members were to be entitled to pay their subscriptions or leave them alone as they liked; but members of clubs could be compelled to pay their subscriptions unless they gave notice of their intention to withdraw. We were every day telling the labouring classes that they were capable of managing their own affairs, and were we to refuse them the recognition of contracts which were not obnoxious to the general law of the country? He would suggest for the consideration of the Government that it would be better to declare that certain contracts which were mischievous in themselves, and which were contrary to the general policy of the law, should be invalid. That was a well-known principle, and such invalidity need not draw with it consequences which had been found inconvenient. The 13th clause said that an auditor appointed by the managers of a trade union should decide what sums were properly expended and what were not; and as the clause stood, if the managing body thought that any application of funds towards a strike was not desirable, the auditor appointed by them could disallow the payment, although it might have been made in accordance with the rules, and the unfortunate treasurer would have to pay the money out of his own pocket—this should be altered. As to contract, it would be simpler and wiser to declare that such and such a contract should be invalid; but such invalidity should not prevent the calling the treasurer to account, or any other special object which it was desirable to accomplish, and that could be done without infringing the general policy of the law. Without entering further into the discussion of details, he should only record his opinion that the working classes would be glad to find that it would no longer be several statutes, but one short code, that would tell them what they could not do, and what they could do, in accordance with law.

MR. HERMON said, that when the Bill was introduced he had promised it his support, and he saw no reason now for withdrawing it. He could not agree that trades unions were unmitigated blessings, either to the working classes or to the country at large. He believed that combinations, both of masters and men, were equally objectionable. Representing a constituency whose chief employment was daily labour, he had consulted both the employers and the employed on it, and from neither of them had he received any objection to the Bill. Therefore, he felt bound to consider that they supported it, and he should do the same. He was glad that the Bill contained legal protection to the funds of the trades unions. He regretted that this Bill did not attempt to constitute some legal Court to which disputes between employers and workmen might be referred, although, at the same time, he saw that there might be great difficulty in making the decisions of such a Court binding upon the parties interested. If a little mutual forbearance were exercised at the commencement of strikes, matters might easily be managed. He was sorry to have heard what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes) with reference to the black list; all he could say was that he was in happy ignorance of that part of the subject.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had no reason to be dissatisfied with the Bill, which he regarded as being a good measure. He did not like the 3rd clause, however, which covered matters which might, he thought, be met by common law; and, coupled with Clause 21, it was very objectionable. By the latter, magistrates who were employers might sit on the bench, judging disputes between men and employers, and having to interpret the very peculiar clauses about molestation and obstruction; and the disqualification of masters in the same trade as that with which the case was connected sitting in judgment was not enough. For his own part, he would prefer stipendiary magistrates; and, where there were no such judges, he should be inclined to adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Potter).

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought it might be desirable that he should briefly explain the scope and object of the Bill. It was not a measure which dealt with trades unions only, inasmuch as it proposed to deal with the whole law of combination, whether entered into by trades unions, or any other body of individuals. In pursuit of combination, persons might be guilty of certain acts, in themselves objectionable, which the common law, or any existing statute, did not touch, and which could be dealt with now only by expensive and uncertain means. The 3rd clause would provide for that which had hitherto been left to vagueness and uncertainty, and the definition of which had been enforced in different ways by different Judges, sometimes extremely harshly and unfairly. The Government had endeavoured to limit carefully what acts only should be criminal; what acts should be deemed to constitute "molestation" and "obstruction;" and for none others in pursuit of combination should persons be punishable. It might or might not be successful legislation; but it was, at all events, clear and intelligible. The hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Jessel) objected that, while combination was rendered lawful, there was no legal sanction given for enforcement of their engagements. He (the Solicitor General) concurred in the dictum of Mr. Justice Crompton to the effect that, if such agreements were enforceable at law, they should be also enforceable in equity. And what would be the consequence? The Court of Chancery would be called upon to enforce strikes; actions maintainable for breaches of contract not to work; and all manner of litigation which lawyers would look upon as profitable, but which the country at large would not long stand. Then it must be remembered that in this Bill they were dealing with a subject which stood by itself; and, though its provisions were not to be judged by lawyers, or by logic, it would abide the test of common sense. Under these circumstances, he trusted the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he believed the Bill to be an honest attempt to settle a long-disputed question; and considered it, on the whole, to be a satisfactory measure. The chief objection to it was the 3rd clause; and, with respect to it, there were many offences there made penal which he would have been glad to see punished under the criminal law of the country. He hoped that the clause would be omitted from the Bill.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he thought the 3rd clause ought to be omitted; it was so difficult to define what "molestation" was.

MR. BRUCE said, that while they secured to the fullest extent the civil rights of the trades unions, it was necessary also to protect the workmen themselves against intimidation and molestation. There were certain offences described by these terms which were not met by the criminal law; and it seemed to him that the Government, in dealing with them in the manner proposed, had taken a course which would greatly facilitate the progress of the Bill through both Houses of Parliament.
